KOSTER, Lawrence, or Laurent Janszoon, kos'-ter, the real inventor of printing, according to the Dutch. Adrian Junius, a learned Dutch historian of the 16th century, in his "Batavia," states that Koster was a native of Haarlem, about the middle of the 15th century, and that in the course of his afternoon rambles in the suburbs of the city, he was in the habit of amusing himself with cutting letters out of the bark of the beech-tree. To amuse his grandchildren, he afterwards put these letters together, and printed short sentences with them. Being an inventive man, he is stated to have subsequently compounded a glutinous ink for the printing of his wooden letters, and that, finally, he set up an establishment in which entire pages, adorned with engravings, were printed. In course of time he made his letters of lead, and later of pewter, that being a harder metal. His establishment flourishing, he was induced to augment the number of his assistants, but all were bound by an oath to keep the invention a secret. One of these assistants, by name John, after making himself acquainted with the whole process of casting, joining the characters, and taking impressions from them, is said to have fled, while Koster and his family were at church, hearing a midnight mass, taking away with him all the implements of his master's art. He is alleged to have gone first to Amsterdam, thence to Cologne, and finally to have taken up his residence at Mayence, and there established printing-presses. The thief, called John by Junius, is suspected to be Faust, but he is never named. (See FAUST.) This story having been carefully sifted by competent authorities, has been pronounced unworthy of credit. Certain books stated to have come from Koster's press, have never been satisfactorily discovered. Even admitting the possibility of John's being able to carry away the whole of the apparatus of a printing establishment, why did not Koster exert his ingenuity once more, and replace the loss? Again, Junius, the author of the work in which the claims of Koster have been enforced, died twelve years before his book was published, and it is believed that the whole story was inserted in the volume by some person anxious to advance the reputation of Haarlem.

KOTZEBU, August Frederick Ferdinand von, kots'-boo, a German writer and dramatist, who, after completing his studies for the legal profession at the university of Jena, went to Russia; where he became secretary to a general, and after filling several posts under the government, was ennobled by Catharine II., and appointed governor of Esthonia. He resigned this office after a few years, and, resolved to devote himself to dramatic literature, accepted the directorship of the theatre of Vienna. After a short period spent there, he returned, in 1791 to Russia: but had scarcely crossed the frontier of that country when he was arrested by order of Paul, and conveyed to Siberia. He was accused of having written a pamphlet against the czar. About a year afterwards Pan witteness a play by Kotzebue, translated into Russian, and was so delighted with it that he recalled the author, and appointed him director of the German theatre at St. Petersburg.

After quarrelling with Goethe, he removed to Berlin, where he established a satirical journal. Going to Russia in 1813, he edited a journal directed against Napoleon I., and in 1814 was appointed Russian consul-general at Königsberg. After having again visited St. Petersburg, in 1817, he was sent to Germany with a commission concerning the Russian government. About this time he established a weekly paper, in which, as in all his previous works, he derided every aspiration for freedom and constitutional government. It was this scuffling at liberal institutions which caused him to be assassinated by a German student and political enthusiast, named Sand. From his earliest years he had been an industrious writer for the stage; at his death, he had composed nearly one hundred dramas. The best of these, with a few others, were published in E

KOTZEBUE, Otto von, son of the preceding, was an officer in the Russian navy, and in 1814 went on a voyage round the world, an account of which he published in 1821. In 1824 he again undertook the same task, and discovered two islands in the South Sea. b. 1819.

KOULI-KHAN. (See NADIR SHAH.)

KOZLOV, Ivan Ivanovich, kox'-lof, a Russian poet, who produced numerous translations of English poetry, chiefly from Byron, Wordsworth, and Sir Walter Scott. His mastery of English was so complete that he translated a poem by the Russian poet Pushkin into our language, a specimen of which, published in the "New Monthly Magazine," for 1830, was as correct as if written by an accomplished Englishman. His poems, composed during intervals of pain, and dictated to an amanuensis, the author being afflicted with blindness, are included in two volumes. b. 1774; d. 1839.

ACHENNIKOW, Stephen, kra'-ken-nik'-nikou, a Russian naturalist, was educated at the Academy of St. Petersburg, and, when young, went to Kamtschatka. He returned in 1743 with a number of observations made during ten years' travel. The Academy nominated him an associate, and, in 1763, he was made professor of botany and natural history. He wrote an account of his travels and discoveries in Chappes d'Auteroche's Account of Siberia. b. 1713; d. 1755.

the church of St. Lawrence, Lorenzkirche. It is in the form of a square open Gothic spire, the pinnacle being turned down in the form of a crozier, to avoid one of the arches of the church. It is a very curious structure, and is ornamented with the figures of saints, and with bassi-relievi representations of Christ taking leave of his mother, the Last Supper, Christ on the Mount of Olives, the Saviour before Caiaphas, the Crowning with Thorns, the Scourging, the Crucifixion, and the Resurrection. This elaborate work is said to have been executed by Kraft for a citizen named Hans Imhof, for the small sum of 770 florins, which, if the common florin is meant, would only amount to £70. s. about 1435; d. it is supposed in the hospital of Schwabach, in 1507, but this is uncertain.

KRANACH, Lucas, kra'-nak, a famous German painter, whose proper name was Sunder, but who became known by the name of the place of his birth, in Bamberg. Frederick, elector of Coburg, took Kranach under his patronage, and they together made a tour through Palestine in 1493. Soon after their return, the artist began his career as an historical painter, and, both for the number and excellence of his works, is considered inferior to none of his countrymen. He was on intimate terms with Luther, Melancthon, and other eminent reformers, and his portraits of the two great leaders of the Reformation are among the most interesting memorials we have of them. s. 1472; d. 1553.—His son, whose works are sometimes mistaken for his father's, also became distinguished as a painter. d. 1586.

KRANTZ, Albert, krantz, a German chronicler, studied philosophy and theology at Rostock and at Hamburg, and was sent on several diplomatic missions to France and England by the confederation of the Hanseatic towns. He composed in Latin the "Chronicles of the Kingdoms of Sweden, Denmark, and Norway," the "Ecclesiastical History of Saxony," and other works. s. at Hamburg, about the middle of the 15th century; d. at the same place, 1617.

KRASIŃSKI, Ignacy, kra'-shick-e, an eminent Polish poet, and archbishop of Gnesen. His wit and accomplishments made him the favourite of King Stanislas Poniatowsky. On the partition of Poland, in 1772, he became the subject of Frederick the Great. His poetry takes rank in Polish literature in about the same degree as Pope's in English. He wrote both prose and verse, nearly all of which was collected and published, in 10 vols., in 1804. s. at Dubiecko, 1734; d. at Berlin, 1801.

KRAY, Baron de, krai, an Austrian general, embraced the military profession early in life, and first distinguished himself in the war with the Turks. In the campaigns in the Netherlands, and on the Rhine, from 1793 to 1797, he was one of the most active of the imperial commanders. The brilliant manner in which he opened the campaign in 1799, made way for the future triumphs of Melas and Suwarrow, and in 1800 Kray replaced the Archduke Charles in the command of the army of the Rhine. d. 1804.

KREUTZER, Rodolph, kroo'-sat, a celebrated violinist and musical composer, who travelled in Germany, Holland, and Italy; and, having established a reputation as one of the first performers in Europe, was placed at the head of the orchestra at the grand opera of Paris. He composed the music for the operas of "Lodoiska," "Joan of Arc," "Paul and Virginia," "Charlotte and Werter," and some others. s. at Versailles, 1767; d. 1831.

KREUTZER, Juliana Vietinghoff, Baroness von, kroo'-de-ner, a celebrated German mystic, was the daughter of the governor of Riga, and was married, at the age of fourteen, to the Baron von Krudener, Russian ambassador at the court of Berlin. After spending many years in a gay and brilliant life, she suddenly turned from the world, and gave herself up to an exaltation of devotion. Imagining she had a mission from heaven to regenerate Christianity, she forthwith travelled over Germany, visiting prisons, preaching in the open air, and distributing alms lavishly: being followed throughout her peregrinations by some thousands of disciples. In she had several interviews with the allied princes, who had entered Paris, and greatly impressed the emperor Alexander, to whom it is said she predicted the return of Napoleon from the isle of Elba, and his approaching fall. From Paris she visited Switzerland, and afterwards Germany, where she recommenced prophesying; but her great influence being feared, she was banished. About 1822 she retired to the Crimea, in order to found a refuge for criminals. She published at Paris, in 1803, a romance entitled "Valerie," which was in great part her own autobiography. s. at Riga, 1766; d. in the Crimea, 1824.

KRUILOV, (or KELLOR), Ivan Andreevich, kri'-lof, a clever Russian fabulist, was the son of an officer in the Russian infantry, who, at his death, in 1780, left to his son nothing more than a small box of well-read books, which the youth eagerly perused. Some plays and operas were included in this collection, and the perusal of these led Ivan to attempt something dramatic himself. He wrote an opera called the "Kafeinitza; or, Fortune-Teller by Coffee," when only fifteen years of age. On his mother removing to St. Petersburg, soon afterwards, he took his opera to a German bookseller, who offered him sixty roubles for the manuscript. Young Kruilov took out the money in books, selecting Racine, Moliere, and Boileau. Three years afterwards, he wrote a play, entitled "Philomela," but could not get it produced on the stage. He obtained a post in a government office, and continued, during his hours of leisure, to write essays and dramas, till the year 1801, when he became secretary to Prince Galitzin, governor of Riga, with whom he grew into great favour. The prince invited him to his country house, where he spent three years. He subsequently produced half a dozen plays, which obtained some popularity. At forty years of age he accidentally discovered where his real powers lay. He translated several of La Fontaine's fables, and was advised by Dmitriev, the Russian poet, to persevere. He accordingly wrote some original fables, which rapidly attained the utmost degree of popularity. He continued to produce fables in verse, and, during several subsequent years, his lines were quoted by every class in Russia, from peasant to noble. He wrote 197 fables, 160 of which were original. In 1812 he obtained an appointment in the imperial library of St. Petersburg. An English translation of his fables, with a memoir of the author by W. R. S. Ralston, appeared in 1869. s. at Moscow, 1768; d. at St. Petersburg, 1844.

the most widely circulated of which were, "The Life of St. John," "Cornelius the Centurion," "Parables," and a book of religious poetry for children. The three first of these have been translated into English, and have become popular, the "Parables" particularly so. b. at Tecklenburg, Westphalia, 1768; d. 1815.

KRUMMACHER, Gottfried Daniel, younger brother of the preceding, officiated as preacher in the reformed church at Elberfeld. He published "Sermons on the Wanderings of the Children of Israel," and "Daily Manna," both of which have been reproduced in an English form, the latter under the title of "The Christian's Every-Day Book." b. 1774; d. 1837.

KRUMMACHER, Frederick William, son of Frederick Adolf, acted for some time as pastor to a Lutheran community at New York. He wrote a great number of religious works, many of which have become very popular in England. His principal works are "Elijah the Tishbite," "Elisha," "Solomon and the Shulamite," "Temptation of Christ," "Glimpses into the Kingdom of Grace," and the "Church's Voice of Instruction." In 1856 he attended the annual conference of the Evangelical Alliance at Glasgow. b. at Potsdam, Dec. 10, 1848.

КУБЛА-КАН, koo'-bla-kan, in Chinese, Chitson, founder of the twentieth Chinese dynasty, that of the Mongols or Yen, was the grandson of Genghis-Khan, and was proclaimed emperor of the Mongols in 1260, in succession to his brother Mangou-Khan. He reigned, at first, only in Mongolia and the countries conquered by Genghis-Khan; but invaded China in 1267, captured the Chinese emperor in 1279, and thus overthrew the Song dynasty, which had ruled for 319 years. He extended his conquests over Tibet, Pegu, Corbin-China, and formed the greatest empire known in history, embracing the whole of Asia and part of Europe, from the Dnieper to Japan. He patronized letters and encouraged agriculture, industry, and commerce. Marco Polo passed seventeen years at his court. d. 1291.

KUGLER, Francis Theodore, koo'-ler, an eminent German art-critic, who, after completing his collegiate studies, devoted himself to the elucidation of the early history of painting and architecture, and travelled to Italy to make researches thereon. His great work, the "Handbook of the History of Painting from the Age of Constantine to the Present Time," was published in 1837. It was almost immediately translated into the leading European languages. In England, it was reproduced by several translators. The "Schools of Painting in Italy" was done into English by Lady Eastlake, with notes by Sir Charles Eastlake. The "German, Flemish, and Dutch Schools" were rendered by Sir Edmund Head. Kugler also wrote, "Description of the Art Treasures in Berlin and Potsdam," a very important work; the "History of Frederick the Great," and other valuable contributions to literature. b. at Stettin, Pomerania, 1808; d. at Berlin, 1858.

КУПЕЦКЪ, Johann, koo-pai'-ske, a celebrated portrait painter, was a native of Hungary, and after visiting Rome and undergoing great hardships, was invited to Vienna, where he soon obtained the reputation of being the first portrait painter of his day, and had among his patrons and admirers the emperors Joseph I. and Charles VI., together with Prince Eugene and Peter the Great of Russia, the latter of whom wished him to go with him to Petersburg, but this Kupetzky declined, as he would on no account surrender any portion of his liberty. He was a member of an association called the "Bohemian Brothers," which occasioned an accusation of heresy to be made against him, and he secretly left Vienna, and settled in Nuremberg. It has been said of Kupetzky's pictures that they combine the vigour of Rubens, the truth and elegance of Vandyck, and the effect of Rembrandt. Though principally devoted to portraits, he also painted historical and other subjects; and many of his works have been engraved. b. in 1666 or 1667; d. 1740.

KURSER, Ludolph, koo'-ser, a German literary critic, who studied at Berlin, afterwards travelled on the continent, and visited England, where he completed his edition of Suidas, printed at Cambridge in 1705, and for which that university conferred on him a doctor's degree. Thence he went to Berlin, where he became professor and librarian to the king. He did not, however, long retain these honours, but went to Amsterdam, where he published Lamblichus's "Life of Pythagoras," and a new edition of the plays of Aristophanes, with the Scholia. In 1718 he went to Paris, and through his friend, the Abbé Bignon, obtained a pension. Besides the above, he published "Historia Critica Homerii," and other works. b. at Blomberg, Westphalia, 1670; d. at Paris, 1716.

KURSORF, Michael, Prince of, koo'-too-soo, a celebrated Russian field-marshal, was educated at Strasburg, and entered the Russian army in 1759; served in Poland from 1764 till 1769; and afterwards against the Turks under Romanzoff. He behaved with great gallantry at the siege of Otchakoff, where he was dangerously wounded; and on his recovery joined Suwarow at the storming and capture of Ismail, when he was advanced to the rank of lieutenant-general. In the subsequent Polish war, he was particularly conspicuous during the memorable day of Praga. In 1805, the emperor Alexander gave him the chief command of the first Russian corps against the French, and he headed the allied army at Ansterlitz, where he was wounded. In 1810 and 1811 he obtained several advantages over the Turks; and, in 1812, when 70 years of age, the chief command of the Russian army, destined to oppose Napoleon, was bestowed upon him. To commemorate his victories, he received the surname of "Smolenski." b. 1745; d. 1813.

KURP, Jacob, koi-p, a celebrated landscape-painter, who founded the Academy of Painting at Dort, in 1612. He copied nature with great finish and exactness.

KURZ, Albert, son of the preceding, a distinguished Dutch painter. Very little is known of the circumstances of his life, although he excelled both in landscape and cattle-painting; and, though highly esteemed in England, is comparatively unknown abroad. A picture by him, for which the late Sir Robert Peel paid 350 guineas, was originally purchased at Hoorn, in Holland, for one shilling English money. b. 1606; d. about 1685.

KYD, Thomas, kid, an English writer in the reign of Elizabeth, who published, in 1595, a play called "Pompey the Great," taken from the French of Garnier; he wrote, also, two other plays. The three are included in Dodsley's "Old Plays." Shakspeare caused several of his KYNASTON, Sir Francis, ki-nus'-ton, an English poet, was knighted by Charles I.; became president of a literary institution called the "Museum Minervæ," translated Chaucer's "Troilus and Cressida" into Latin, and was the author of "Leoline and Sydanis," and other pieces. B. in Shropshire, 1597; d. 1642.

KYNASTON, John, an English divine, was educated at Brasenose College, Oxford, of which he was chosen fellow in 1751. He wrote "De Impietate C. Cornelio Tacito falso objectata;" "Oratio habita in Sacello Collegii Ænei Nasi," B. at Chester, 1728; d. 1783.

KYNWELMARSH, Francis, kin'-wel-marsh, an English writer of the 16th century, was a friend of Gascoigne, whom he assisted in translating Euripides' tragedy of "Jocasta." He and his brother Anthony wrote a collection of poetical pieces, some of which are to be found in the collection called the "Paradise of Dainty Devices," 1576.

KYRLE, John, kir'-l, a benevolent Englishman. Though he had only an estate of £500 a year, he bestowed large sums, in the course of his life, in charity, and built a church; but towards this last good work he obtained subscriptions from other pious and charitable persons. On all accounts, however, he deserved the fine eulogium bestowed upon him by Pope, who emphatically calls him "the Man of Ross." B. at Ross, Herefordshire, 1634; d. 1724.

LABADIE, John, la'-ba-de, a French religious impostor, who received his education among the Jesuits, and was admitted a member of that order, which, however, he quitted, to become an itinerant preacher. He pretended to have received visions, declared himself another John the Baptist, and prophesied the second coming of the Messiah. The austerity of his manners, his zeal, and affected piety, procured him many followers, particularly at Amiens, where he obtained a canonry, but, being detected in some criminal intrigues, the bishop ordered him to be put under arrest. Labadie, however, escaped to Toulouse, and became director of a convent of nuns, among whom he introduced a new rule, and the notions of the Quietists, with some additions of his own; viz., that the Scriptures are not necessary to salvation; that outward worship is of no use, but that all prayer should be mental; and that there are two churches, that of Christians in degeneracy, and the other regenerate, or "Labadists," as his followers were called. He renounced the Romish religion at Montauban, in 1650, and after exercising the ministry there some time, went to Geneva: being expelled thence, he removed to Middleburg, where he obtained many followers, among whom was the famous Anna Maria Scharmann. Labadie sent disciples to propagate his doctrines, and to gather contributions, in different parts of Holland; on which account he was obliged to withdraw to Erfurt, and thence to Altona. His works, which are full of mysticism, are now disregarded. B. at Bourg, Guienne, 1610; d. at Altona, 1674.

LABAT, Jean Baptiste, la'-ba', a Dominican missionary, who possessed great mathematical knowledge; and while in America, where he remained twelve years, acted as an engineer in defence of Guadaloupe when attacked by the English in 1703. On his return to Europe in 1703, he surveyed the environs and coast of Andalusia; soon after travelled into Italy and other parts; and finally returned to Paris. He wrote numerous works, the chief of which are his "Voyage aux Iles de l'Amérique," "Travels in Spain and Italy," a "Description of the Countries of Western Africa," &c. B. at Paris, 1663; d. 1738.

LABE, Louise Charly, la-bai', a French poetess, surnamed the "fair rope-maker," on account of her marriage with a manufacturer of cables at Lyons, who left her, at his death, a large fortune. Her first passion was that of arms, and she distinguished herself in a masculine dress, at the siege of Perpignan. She had a taste for literature, and her library was enriched with the best writers, French, Italian, and Spanish; but her fine qualities were tarnished by libertinism. Her poems were printed at Lyons in 1555, and again in 1762. B. at Lyons, 1526; d. 1566.

LA BEAUMELLE, Laurent de, bo'-mel, a French writer, who, in 1751, became professor of French literature in Denmark. He subsequently went to the court of Frederick the Great, but his quarrels with Voltaire caused him to leave Prussia. He returned to Paris, and obtained an appointment in the Bibliothèque Royale. He wrote "Memoirs of the History of Madame de Maintenon," and other works. B. 1726; d. 1778.

LABEDOYERE, Charles Angelique François Huchet, Count de, la'-bai-do'-yai', a famous general, who served as an officer in the Imperial Guards at the battle of Eylau, and in 1803 and 1809 was aide-de-camp to Eugene Beauharnais. He was present in the retreat from Moscow, and distinguished himself at the battles of Lutzen and Bautzen. After the abdication of Bonaparte, he was, in 1815, appointed to a regiment stationed at Grenoble; but on the return of Napoleon from Elba, Labedoyere was the first to join him with his regiment. He was rapidly promoted by the emperor, and eventually raised to the peerage; but after the occupation of Paris by the allied army, was tried by court-martial, and shot, August, 1815.

LABEO, Quintus Fabius, lai'-be-o, a Roman general, who defeated Antiochus, king of Syria, 189 B.C., and became consul 182 B.C. He was a man of liberality and talent, and is said to have assisted Terence in writing some of his plays.

LABEO, Quintus Antistius, a Roman lawyer, who refused the consulship when offered him by Augustus, whose projects he opposed. He composed several works, which are lost. His father was one of the conspirators who assassinated Cæsar, and was killed at the battle of Philippi.—There was another Labeo, who was tribune of the people, B.C. 184. He caused the censor Metellus to be thrown from the Tarpeian rock.

LABERIUS, Decimus, lai-beer'-e-us, a Roman knight, who wrote mimes or satirical productions for the stage. Cæsar obliged him to perform one of his own mimes against his will; on which occasion Laberius spoke a satirical prologue against Cæsar, which is preserved in Aulus Gellius. Fragments of his other works are also extant. D. 44 B.C.

LA BORDE, Alexandre Louis Joseph, Count de, a French author, whose father was a peasant of Béarn, and is said to have come to Paris on foot, in wooden shoes, and to have been successful in making his way in the world by shrewdness and perseverance, and accumulating some money. He took care to give his son a good education, but fearing for his safety in Paris when the first signs of the coming outbreak of the French Revolution shewed themselves, sent him to Vienna, where he entered the Austrian army and served against his native country; but, in 1797, went to France, and devoted himself to literature. He was aide-de-camp to Louis Philippe, general of brigade of the National Guard, and prefect of the Seine, or first magistrate of Paris. He was the editor of many splendid works, a few of the most important being, "Pictorial and Historical Travels in Spain," "Pictorial Travels in Austria," "The Monuments of France," "Travels in Syria," and "Versailles, Ancient and Modern." B. at Paris, 1773; D. 1842.

LA BORDE, Leon Emmanuel Simon Joseph, Count de, son of the preceding, a modern French writer, who in 1830 became secretary of legation to the French embassy in London, and was subsequently appointed conservator of the collection of the Middle Ages and the Renaissance in the Museum of the Louvre. He was a distinguished archaeologist, and, like his father, produced many magnificent pictorial works descriptive of foreign countries. The chief of them are, "Travels in Arabia Petrea," "Travels in the East," "Researches on the Early History of Printing," "Studies on the Arts, Letters, and Industry of the Fifteenth Century," and "The Revival of the Arts at the Court of France." B. at Paris, 1807.

In 1751 he went to the Cape of Good Hope to observe the astral system of the southern heavens. He remained there four years, and compiled during his stay a catalogue of stars. On his return to Paris, he collected his scientific works, published new editions of some, and laboured incessantly at astronomy. His devotion to science at length cost him his life; for he contracted a fever by passing his nights on cold stones, observing the heavens. B. at Rumigny, 1713; D. 1762.

LACEPÈDE, Bernard Germain Stephen de la Ville, Count de, las-e-pai-d, a celebrated French naturalist, who applied himself to the study of natural science from his earliest youth, and, at the age of eighteen years, made himself known to Buffon, by addressing to him several interesting memoirs. In 1776 he went to Paris, and obtained the post of assistant-demonstrator at the Royal Garden, through the interest of Buffon, to whom he proposed to continue his Natural History. On the breaking out of the revolution, Lacepède adopted its principles, and became successively commandant of the National Guard, and deputy-extraordinary for Agen in the Legislative Assembly. He was subsequently nominated senator, and, in 1803, grand chancellor of the Legion of Honour; he also held many offices of distinction under Napoleon I. His chief works are "Natural History of Quadrupeds and Serpents," and "Fishes," both of which formed continuations to Buffon's great work. B. at Agen, 1756; D. at Paris, 1825.

LA CERDA, Bernarda, Donna, thair-da, a Portuguese lady, who distinguished herself by her poetical talents, and was invited to the court of Spain by Philip III., where she taught Latin to the royal children. She wrote several comedies and poetical pieces. B. at Oporto, 1595; D. 1644.

LA CHAISE, François d'Aix, shaise, surnamed Father, a celebrated French Jesuit, who was, for some time, professor of philosophy at Lyons, and became provincial of his order. In 1675, Louis XIV. chose him for his confessor, an office which the father filled till his death, thirty-four years afterwards. He was actively engaged in all the intrigues of the court; his interest was sought by Madame de Montespan and Madame de Maintenon; but he embraced the cause of the latter, and favoured her marriage with Louis XIV. In religious questions, he took part in the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, in 1685; and in the condemnation of Fénelon. He was an energetic opponent of the Jansenists; and on every occasion endeavoured to advance the interests of his order. Although a man of only slender abilities, his adroitness and insinuating manner enabled him to gain a great ascendancy over the king, of whose conscience he was the keeper. He was the author of several works, particularly "A Course of Philosophy," composed in Latin, and published at Lyons in 1682. Louis XIV. built for his confessor a beautiful rustic dwelling near Paris, which was called Mont-Louis. The grounds which surrounded this house have since been converted into a burial-place, and called the Cemetery of Père la Chaise. B. at the castle of Aix, in Foréz, 1624; D. 1709.

Lacordaire

LA COLONIE, John Martin de, kol-o-ne, a field-marshal in the Austrian service, who published his military memoirs at Frankfurt, in 1730. He was also the author of the "History of Bordeaux." B. at Périgord, 1674; D. at Bordeaux, 1759.

LA COMBE, Jacques, kome, a French miscellaneous writer, who translated into the French language, Orrery's "Life of Swift," and Shaftesbury's "Letters on Enthusiasm." He also edited "The Letters of Christina of Sweden," and afterwards added a continuation, entitled "The Secret Letters of Queen Christina," but which has since been pronounced a literary forgery. B. 1733; D. at Montpellier, about 1795.

LA CONDAMINE, Charles Marie de, kone-damene, a celebrated French traveller, who, actuated by an indefatigable desire for knowledge, travelled over almost the whole world, and studied nearly every science. In 1735 he was selected, with Bouguer, to make a voyage to the equator, for the purpose of determining the dimensions and the figure of the earth. In this expedition, he travelled over nearly the whole of South America, and was absent from France for ten years, during which he experienced the utmost fatigue and hardship. On his return he published his "Travels in South America," and "The Figure of the Earth, as determined by the Observations of Messieurs De la Condamine and Bouguer." He also produced several works in English and Spanish; contributed to the scientific memoirs of Paris and Berlin; and maintained a correspondence upon scientific subjects with distinguished men in every European city. He was a member of the Paris Academy of Sciences, of the Académie Française, and of the Royal Society of London. B. at Paris, 1701; D. 1774.

LACORDAIRE, Jean Baptiste Henri, la-kor-dair, a celebrated French preacher. The religious zeal, which was afterwards to form so prominent a trait of his character, gave no sign of its existence in his earliest years; for, until the age of 22, he diligently pursued his studies for the profession of the law. Whatever opinions of a religious nature his mind had formed up to that period, were strongly tinted with the scepticism of Voltaire. Suddenly, in 1824, he entered the college of St. Sulpice, and, after an interval of three years, was ordained a priest. Becoming acquainted with the author of the "Essay on Indifference," he soon showed himself one of his most ardent followers. (See LAMENNAIS.) During the revolution of 1830, Lacordaire, in conjunction with M. de Montalembert, commenced the publication of "L'Avenir," giving to the new paper the motto, "God and Liberty." The task they set themselves to accomplish by the aid of their journal was religious, civil, and political liberty. The strong language and bold opinions of this new religious paper brought Lacordaire before the Court of Assize in the following year. Here he defended himself with the utmost eloquence, and was triumphantly acquitted. He had endeavoured, a few months previously, to join to his priestly function the title of advocate; but the council of that body refused to inscribe his name on their rolls. Not long afterwards, he, with Messrs. Montalembert and De Choux, opened, without authority, a "Free School." In France, such a proceeding was in direct opposition to law; accordingly, he and his coadjutors were ordered to close the establishment. This demand was unheeded, and it was not until force had been employed, that the heads of the school could be induced to leave the place. Lacordaire, Montalembert, and De Choux, were cited before the Chamber of Peers. Condemned to pay the minimum fine, 100 francs, the bold innovators were admitted to have gained the victory. The French clergy were strongly moved by the burning eloquence of Lacordaire and his fellow reformers. What the result would have been it is difficult to imagine; but it is certain that the papacy felt itself threatened, for Gregory XVI., in 1832, put forth his "Encyclical Letter," in which he declared that "the regeneration of the Church" was an absurdity, 'liberty of conscience' a mad dream, and 'liberty of the press' a fatal delusion." If Lacordaire, and the other chiefs of "L'Avenir" had given so much uneasiness to the head of the established religion of their country, their submission was most sudden and complete. The three journalists went to Rome: of Lacordaire it is said, "He prostrated himself on the tomb of St. Peter, and rose submissive and transformed." On his return to Paris he devoted himself to preaching. In 1835 he commenced his pulpit orations at the cathedral of Notre Dame, and gathered about him, says one of his French critics, "the worldly crowd by other attractions besides the sacred word. He held forth as to every topic: under the pretext of religion, he discoursed of the present generation, of every-day emotions and interests, of nationality, of liberty, of political economy, of railroads, and of Napoleon. The brilliancy of his language, the energetic audacity of his movements, captivated his hearers." From this it would appear, that a certain style of pulpit eloquence, lately exceedingly successful in England, is nothing else than an imitation of Lacordaire's manner. In 1836 he made a second journey to Rome, where he was well received, and soon afterwards composed a complete retraction of his former opinions as expressed in "L'Avenir." In 1840 he assumed the habit of a Dominican friar, and wrote his "Life of St. Dominic," wherein he justifies, with more poetical power than historical truth, the Inquisition. During the revolution of 1848 he revived his old republican ideas, and took his seat among the "Mountain" party in the Constituent Assembly. His parliamentary efforts were not very successful, however, and he soon resigned his seat. Subsequently, his voice growing very weak, he became director of the college of Sorrèze. He published several theological works, some sermons, and funeral orations; among others, one upon Daniel O'Connell. b. 1802; d. 1881.

LACRETELLE, Pierre Louis, la'-kre-tel, usually called Lacretelle the Elder, a French writer, was a parliamentary advocate during the French revolution, and afterwards sat in the Legislative Assembly, and acted as a member of the Legislative Corps. During the Empire and the Restoration he remained unemployed, his republican principles not permitting him to serve under these governments. He was a profound and voluminous author. A complete edition of his works was commenced in 1823, and included treatises on eloquence and philosophy, as well as dramatic pieces, &c. He was, for some time, one of the editors of the "Minerve," a famous paper, whose politics were in opposition to the Empire and the Restoration. He also compiled the articles "Logie," "Metaphysics," and "Moral Philosophy," for the "Encyclopédie Méthodique." n. at Metz, 1751; d. 1824.

LACRETELLE, Charles Joseph, a distinguished French historian, was brother of the preceding, and is generally styled the Younger.

LACROIX, Antoine Nicolas de, la'-kroa', an eminent French geographer, who embraced an ecclesiastical life, and devoted himself to the pursuit of geographical knowledge. His "Géographie Moderne" was produced in 1747, and has been several times reprinted, remaining a standard work in his own country. n. at Paris, 1701; d. 1760.—He must not be confounded with another of the same name, who was a teacher of languages and of geography at Lyons, and who produced a "Universal Geography," &c. n. about 1715.

LACTANTIUS, Lucius Caelius Firmianus, Lac-tan'-she-us, an eloquent father of the Church, was, according to some, an African, and, to others, a native of Fermo, in Italy. He studied under Arnobius, and became so famous as a rhetorician, that Constantine appointed him preceptor to his son Crispus. He formed his style upon that of Cicero; but though he wrote with great purity and force, particularly in confuting the pagan errors and follies, he was more of a rhetorician than a theologian. He blended philosophy with divinity, and thereby involved the truths of religion in considerable obscurity. A complete edition of his works was published at Göttingen, 1736; but the best edition is that of Paris, 2 vols. 4to, 1748. Lived at the end of the 3rd and beginning of the 4th century.

LACY, John, la'-se, an English actor and dramatic writer in the reign of Charles II., with whom he was a great favourite. He produced "The Dumb Lady," "The Old Troop; or Monsieur Ragot," and "Sir Hercules Bulboon." d. 1681.—He is not to be taken for John Lacy, an English gentleman, who became the zealous friend of the French impostors who called themselves prophets at the beginning of the 18th century. This person wrote some incoherent tracts on that subject, and was imprisoned for his zeal.

LACTAS, la-si'-das, a Greek philosopher of Cyrene, and disciple of Arcesilaus, whom he succeeded as master of the second Academy. Attalus gave him a garden in which to read his lectures. He foolishly mourned the loss of a favourite goose, which he caused to be buried magnificently. Lived about 240 n.c.

LADISLAUS I., (sometimes written Ladislas and Vladislas), la'-dis-la-us, king of Hungary, the son of Bela I., succeeded his brother Geisa in 1077. He added to his dominions Dalmatia and Croatia, reduced the Bohemians, who had revolted, expelled the Huns, and conquered part of Bulgaria and Russia. He also defeated the Tartars, and was as distinguished for his piety as for his valour. He died in 1095, and was canonized in 1198.

LADISLAUS III. succeeded Stephen V., his father, in 1272. He was a debauched prince, and divorced his lawful wife. He also ill-used the clergy, and, rendering himself an object of universal hatred, was assassinated in 1290.

LADISLAUS IV. was grand-duke of Lithuania, and 3rd or 6th king of this name of Poland, and elected to the throne of Hungary in 1440. He declared war against the Turks, and employed as his general John Hunniades, who was very successful. Ladislaus, however, made peace, which gave such dissatisfaction to the pope and other Christian princes, that he was induced to break it; but he was very unfortunate afterwards, and lost his life in the battle of Varna, in 1444.

LADISLAUS V., the son of Albert of Austria, was made king on the death of Ladislaus IV., under the guardianship of John Hunniades. He was very zealous against the Hussites, by whom he is said to have been poisoned in 1459.

LADISLAUS VI., was the son of Casimir IV., king of Poland, and elected king of Hungary, on the death of Matthias Corvinus, in 1490, in opposition to his own brother, Albert, and to John, the natural son of his predecessor, and to Maximilian of Austria. His reign was very turbulent, being constantly at war with the Turks and other neighbouring powers. He died in 1516.

LADISLAUS, or LANCELOT, king of Naples, called the Liberal and Victorious, succeeded his father, Charles III., in 1386. He had been previously count of Provence and king of Hungary. He obtained the latter crown in 1403, during the imprisonment of Sigismund, who compelled him to return to Italy. On the death of his father, he was opposed by Louis II., duke of Anjou, which occasioned some bloody wars. Pope John XXIII. at first espoused the cause of Louis, but afterwards took the part of Ladislaus, who, however, marched against Rome, and having taken it, turned his arms on the Florentines, whom he compelled to sue for peace, in 1413. b. 1376; d. at Naples, it is suspected of poison, 1414.

LADISLAUS I., king of Poland, succeeded his brother, Boleslaus II., in 1082. He defeated the armies of Prussia and Pomerania. d. 1102.

LADISLAUS II., king of Poland, succeeded his father, Boleslaus III., in 1138. He made war against his brothers on frivolous pretences, and, after several battles, was driven from his throne; but Boleslaus IV., his successor, gave him Silesia at the request of Frederic Barbarossa. d. at Oldenburg, 1159.

LADISLAUS I. (some reckoning him as the first of this name) or IV., king of Poland, came to the throne in 1296. He pillaged his subjects and seized the goods of the clergy, for which he was expelled, and the crown given to Wenceslaus, king of Bohemia. Ladislaus retired to Rome, but, on the death of Wenceslaus, was recalled to Poland, where he governed with moderation and wisdom. Pomerania having revolted, he called to his aid the Teutonic knights, who repaid themselves by seizing Dantzic and other places; but Ladislaus marched against the knights, and defeated them. d. 1333.

LADISLAUS II., or V. (See JAGELLON.)

LADISLAUS III., or VI. (See LADISLAUS IV.)

LADISLAUS IV., or VII., king of Poland, succeeded Sigismund III. in 1682. Before his advancement to the throne, he signalized himself against the Turks, whom he defeated in several actions. He also repulsed the Russians, and forced them to make peace. d. 1649.

LADVOCAT, Jean Baptiste, lad'-vo-ka, a learned French writer, who became doctor, librarian, and professor of the Sorbonne. The duke of Orleans, having founded a Hebrew professorship in the Sorbonne, appointed Ladvoeat to it in 1782. His works are, a "Geographical Dictionary;" an "Historical Dictionary;" which has since been repeatedly enlarged; a "Hebrew Grammar," &c. b. at Vaucouleurs, 1709; d. at Paris, 1765.

LÆLIUS, Caius, le'-li-us, consul of Rome, 140 b.c., distinguished himself as a soldier in Spain, and was no less celebrated for his eloquence and poetical genius. He was the intimate friend of Scipio Africanus the younger, and is said to have assisted Terence in his comedies.—There was another consul of this name, 180 b.c. He accompanied the elder Scipio to Africa, and took part in the victories over Asdrubal and Syphax.

LÆNNÉC, René Théophile Hyacinthe, lan'-nek, a distinguished French physician, inventor of the stethoscope and of the art of "mediate auscultation." After completing his medical education at Nantes, under his uncle, a celebrated physician, and at Paris, he obtained the degree of doctor of medicine in 1814. His literary acquirements were extensive, and he rapidly grew into fame as a lecturer and writer on medicine. In 1816 he became chief physician at the Hôpital Necker, and soon afterwards made known his important discovery in his "Treatise on Mediate Auscultation." His health, which had been always delicate, now grew so infirm that he was compelled to resign his large private practice and his official appointments, to repair into Brittany. In 1821 he returned, with restored health, to Paris, and was appointed professor of medicine in the College of France. Five years later his health again gave way; and it was found, by means of the system he had himself invented, that he was attacked with consumption. He retired to Brittany, and soon afterwards died. His great invention of the stethoscope, as well as his valuable works, elucidated the pathology of diseases of the chest, which till his time had been involved in the greatest obscurity. His most invaluable work, on "Mediate Auscultation," has been translated into English by Dr. Forbes. Besides this, he also produced a number of excellent treatises on medicine, and was altogether one of the reatest advancers of medical science the world as seen during the last century. b. at Quimper, Brittany, 1751; d. 1826.

LA FAYETTE, Louis Mottier, Mademoiselle de, la'-fai-yet, a French lady, celebrated for her beauty and wit, was maid of honour to Anne of Austria. Louis XIII. became inspired with a lively passion for her, but she resisted his entreaties, and sought, in 1637, the retirement of a cloister, where she assumed the name of Sister Angelica, d. 1665. Madame de Genlis made her the heroine of a romance, first published in 1812, entitled "Mademoiselle de la Fayette."

LA FAYETTE, Countess de. (See FAYETTE.)

LA FAYETTE, Gilbert Mottier, Marquis de, a celebrated soldier and patriot, came of a noble family in Auvergne, and, at the age of 20 years, fitted out a frigate at his own expense and sailed for America, to fight in the ranks of the insurgents against British domination. Returning to France at the end of two years, he again sailed for America, with reinforcements of ships, men, and money, and distinguished himself in Virginia and at the siege of Yorktown. His energy and ability greatly contributed to the foundation of the republic of the United States. The renown he had acquired in America caused him to be elected, in 1787, member of the Assembly of Notables, and in 1789 deputy in the National Assembly. In this capacity he warmly defended the republican ideas then in vogue, and proposed the first declaration of the rights of man, which ultimately formed the basis of the constitution. In July, 1789, he was appointed commandant of the national guard, upon which occasion he caused his soldiers to assume a tri-coloured cockade,—blue and red, the colours of the commune of Paris, and white, the colour of the French lily,—this being the origin of what afterwards became the national colours. He protected the royal family on the 5th and 6th October, and when the people broke out into insurrection in July, 1791, he defeated them with his national guards on the Champ de Mars. On being appointed to command the army of the north, he defeated the allies at Philippeville and Maubeuge. In August, 1793, he was outlawed for having arrested the commissioners of the National Assembly sent to watch him at his camp at Compiègne, where it is said he had previously invited the king to seek an asylum. Upon this, he, with a few friends, crossed the frontier, intending to take up his residence in a neutral country, but was arrested by the Austrians, and confined in the fortress of Olmütz, in Moravia. He remained there during five years, but was released by a special article in the treaty of Campo-Formio. Strongly opposed to Napoleon's ambition, La Fayette took no part in public affairs during the Consulate and the Empire. On Napoleon's return from Elba in 1815, La Fayette was returned to the House of Representatives, where, after the defeat at Waterloo, he replied, in answer to Lucien's appeal: "We have followed your brother through the burning sands of Syria, as well as to the frozen deserts of Russia; the bleached bones of two millions of Frenchmen scattered all over the globe attest our devotion to him. That devotion is now exhausted, for his cause is no longer the cause of the nation." As a member of the Chamber of Deputies under the Restoration, he was the untiring advocate of constitutional liberty. In 1824 he visited the United States, where his journey was a perpetual ovation. During the revolution of 1830, he was nominated for the second time chief of the national guard, and was one of the first to propose Louis Philippe as king of the French. The new monarch, however, soon became jealous of his popularity, and sought to counteract his great influence by proposing a measure for the abolition of the post of commander-in-chief of the national guard. This attack La Fayette forestalled by tendering his resignation, and henceforth the relations of La Fayette and Louis Philippe were of the most uncordial character. La Fayette took a distinguished part in some of the greatest events of his epoch, in the American revolution, and in those of France in 1789 and 1830. Although not possessed of commanding genius, he was ever actuated by patriotic and disinterested motives. But perhaps with him the qualities of the heart were superior to those of the mind. Throughout his long career, he showed a want of foresight and decision, and proved himself a general more fitted to excite popular commotion than to direct and establish national security. La Fayette left behind him "Memoirs," which were published by his family in 1837-40. B. at Chavagnac, in the department of the Haute-Loire, 1757; D. at Paris, 1834.

Lafontaine

LAFITTE, Joseph François, la'-f-it-to, a French

Jesuit, who was a missionary among the Iroquois in America. He wrote the "Manners of the Native Americans compared with those of the Primitive Times," a "History of the Discoveries of the Portuguese in the New World," and other works. D. 1740.

LAFITTE, Jacques, la'-fiet, the chief banker of France during the Empire and the Restoration, was the son of a poor carpenter at Bayonne, and in 1787 walked to Paris, where he obtained the situation of assistant clerk in the banking-house of Perregaux, at £18 per annum. He became successively book-keeper, cashier, chief clerk, manager, junior partner, and, in 1809, succeeded to the business, and thenceforth carried it on in his own name. His eminently profound and practical talents for finance procured for him the posts of regent of the Bank of France, and president of the Paris Chamber of Commerce. During a monetary crisis, in 1815, Lafitte lent the government the sum of 2,000,000 francs. In the same year, Louis XVIII., on his departure for Ghent, deposited with the banker a very considerable sum, which Napoleon I. respected. Four months afterwards, the emperor himself, when leaving Paris for the last time, lodged in the same hands the sum of 5,000,000 francs. Lafitte wished to give Napoleon a receipt, but the latter replied, "It is unnecessary. I know you, M. Lafitte; you never liked my government, but you are an honest man." In 1830 he was said to be possessed of a private fortune of upwards of £2,000,000 sterling, but in the following year the great European monetary panic took place, and the house of Lafitte fell, along with those whose creditor he was. At this juncture Lafitte sold off the whole of his private property, amounting to 10,000,000 of francs, and subsequently, after the full discharge of his liabilities, he was ascertained to have a surplus of 8,000,000 francs. At his death, his remains were attended to the cemetery of Père-la-Chaise by the most eminent personages of Paris, and his funeral oration was pronounced by Arago. B. at Bayonne, 1767; D. at Paris, 1844.

DE LADERAT, André Daniel, la'-fong-ge de la-dai'-ba, a French statesman and financier, who, having inherited considerable property, was able to devote his leisure to the study of political economy and the fine arts. He was one of the founders of the Academy of Painting at Bordeaux, and became a member of the Academy of Arts and Sciences in that city, and also of the Agricultural Society of Paris. M. Lafitte was president of the Legislative Assembly when Louis XVI. and his family took refuge in its midst, on the 10th of August, 1792; and in the massacre in September following, he saved the life of the Abbé Sicard. He was subsequently himself exposed to much danger; but having survived the Reign of Terror, was chosen, in September, 1795, a member of the Council of Ancients for the department of the Seine. In 1797 he was among those who were condemned to deportation, and sent to Cayenne; but returned from exile on the establishment of the Consulate. In 1815 he visited England, and collected much information concerning its finances, commerce, and public institutions; and on his return he presented to Louis XVIII. a valuable work on the finances of France. B. 1746; D. 1829.

tane, a German romance writer, among whose numerous works are, "Blanche and Minna, or the Manners of the Burghers," "Moral Systems," "The Country Clergyman, or New Family Pictures," and "Clara du Plessis and Clairaut, or the History of Two Lovers." B. 1756; D. 1831.

LA GALISSONNIERE, Marquis de, ga'-lees-son'-ne-air, a French admiral, who, in 1745, was appointed governor-general of Canada, and became one of the most esteemed of the French viceroys of that colony. In 1756 Louis XV. confided to his charge the fleet destined to act against the English in the Mediterranean. He was opposed to Admiral Byng at Minorca, and co-operated at the taking of Mahon. B. at Rochefort, 1693; D. 1756.

LAGNY, Thomas Fantet de, lan'-ye, a clever French mathematician, who was designed for the bar, but preferred geometry to jurisprudence, and was educated accordingly at Paris, by the liberality of the duke de Noailles. He became a member of the Academy of Sciences, and Louis XIV. appointed him royal hydrographer at Rochefort; but, sixteen years afterwards, he was recalled to Paris, and made librarian to the king, with a considerable pension. He wrote: "New Methods for the Extraction and Approximation of Roots;" "Elements of Arithmetic and Algebra;" "The Cubature of the Sphere;" "A General Analysis or Method of Resolving Problems;" and several papers in the "Memoirs" of the Academy. He was a fellow of the Royal Society of London. B. at Lyons, 1680; D. at Paris, 1734.

LAGRANGE, Joseph Louis de, la'-granj, a celebrated mathematician, who, at the age of eighteen years, took rank among the most learned men of his time, by addressing to Euler some answers relative to the isoperimetrical problems which had engaged his attention from his tenth year. In his nineteenth year he became professor of mathematics in the School of Artillery at Turin, and soon afterwards, in conjunction with a few friends, founded the Royal Academy of the same city. In 1764, and the following years, he bore off the mathematical prize offered by the Paris Academy of Sciences. In 1766 he was invited by Frederick the Great to Berlin, to succeed Euler as president of the Academy, and remained in that city during twenty years. After the death of Frederick he went to reside at Paris, where Louis XVI. had provided apartments for his use in the Louvre. He passed unscathed through the revolutionary period, and was appointed professor at the Polytechnic School. Napoleon I. gave him a seat in the Senate, and loaded him with dignities. His illustrious friend Laplace thus characterized him in his funeral oration:—"Among those who have most effectually extended the limits of our knowledge, Newton and Lagrange appear to have possessed in the highest degree the happy art of detecting general principles, which constitutes the true genius of science. This art, joined to a rare elegance in the exposition of the most abstract theories, characterized Lagrange." "Lagrange," says Professor Hamilton, "has perhaps done more than any other method so suiting the dignity of the results as to make his great work a kind of scientific poem." Of the works of this luminary of mathematical science we have space only to enumerate the most important: these are "Analytical Mechanics," the second edition published in Paris, 1811-15; "Theory of Analytical Functions," second edition published 1813; "Resolution of Numerical Equations," 1826; "Lessons on the Calculus of Functions." In addition to a crowd of highly important contributions to the "Transactions" of the learned Societies of Turin, Berlin, and Paris, he produced treatises "On the Origin of Comets," "On the Calculation of Eclipses," and on the "Method of determining the Orbit of a Comet from Observations." B. at Turin, 1736; D. at Paris, 1813.

LAGUERRE, Louis, la'-goo-air, a French painter, was the godson of Louis XIV., who had him instructed by Le Brun, and in the Royal Academy of Paris. In 1683 he came to England, and was much employed in painting ceilings, halls, &c. He was first engaged by Verrio on the large work at St. Bartholomew's Hospital; subsequently he had lodgings assigned him in Hampton Court Palace, where he painted "The Labours of Hercules." B. 1663; D. 1721.

LAGUS, lai'-gus, a Macedonian of mean extraction, who married Arsinoë, daughter of Meleager, who, according to some accounts, was then pregnant by King Philip, and being willing to hide the disgrace of his wife, Lagus exposed the child in the woods. An eagle preserved the life of the infant, and fed him with her prey. This uncommon preservation was divulged to Lagus, who adopted the child, and called him Ptolemy, conjecturing that as his life had been so singularly preserved, his days would be spent in grandeur and affluence. This Ptolemy became king of Egypt after the death of Alexander. The first of the Ptolemies was called Lagus, to distinguish him from his successors of the same name. Ptolemy, the first of the Macedonian kings of Egypt, wished it to be believed that he was the legitimate son of Lagus, and he preferred the appellation of Lagides to all other appellations. The surname of Lagides was transmitted to all his descendants on the Egyptian throne to the reign of Cleopatra, Antony's mistress.

LA HARPE. (See HARPE, John Francis de la.)

LAMIER, Philippe de, la'-here, a French mathematician, who was professor of astronomy and mathematics in the College of France, and became a member of the Academy of Sciences, in 1678. He was employed in many important public works; among the rest, one for the determination of the water-levels, preparatory to the construction of the aqueduct for supplying Paris. His chief works were treatises "On Conical and Cylindrical Sections," "On Surveying," and "On Mechanics." B. at Paris, 1640; at the same city, 1719.

LAINEZ, James, lai'-naith', a Spaniard, and one of the companions of Loyola, whom he succeeded in the generalship of the Jesuits, in 1558. He assisted at the council of Trent, where he reported the papal authority to an extravagant free. He obtained from Paul IV. the personal generalship of the order, and the following extraordinary privileges: the right of making all manner of contracts without the rivalry or consent of the society; that of giving authority and authenticity to all comments and explanations of the constitutions; the power of LAING, Malcolm, laing, a Scottish historian, who studied at the university of Edinburgh, where he became a member of the celebrated Speculative Society. He was subsequently called to the Scottish bar; but, although he displayed high forensic abilities, he never succeeded in obtaining much practice. In 1793 he commenced his literary career by editing Henry's "History of Britain." Five years later, he produced "The History of Scotland, from the Union of the Crowns, on the Accession of James VI., to the Union of the Kingdoms in the Reign of Queen Anne." He afterwards appended to the second edition of this work a "Preliminary Dissertation on the Participation of Mary Queen of Scots in the Murder of Darnley." He represented Orkney for some time in Parliament, and enjoyed the friendship of Fox. b. in Orkney, 1762; d. 1813.

LAING, Samuel, an English traveller and writer, brother of the preceding, composed some valuable works, the chief of which were "Notes of a Traveller," "Travels in Norway," and the "Heimskringla."

LAING, Alexander, an antiquarian and miscellaneous writer, of whose early history but little is known, latterly followed the calling of an itinerant vender of old books; and, being a man of much humour and eccentricity, obtained access to many sources of information, which he turned to account in the "Doncan Tourist," in verse, with copious notes, giving an account of the battles, castles, families, gentlemen's seats, &c., on the banks of the river Don; and "The Caledonian Itinerary, or a Tour on the Banks of the Dee," a poem, with historical notes. He was also the compiler of the "Eccentric Magazine," which contains many curious and whimsical epitaphs gleaned from churchyards in Aberdeenshire. b. 1778; d. 1838.

LAKE, Gerard, Viscount, laik, a distinguished English general, who entered the army at the age of fourteen, served in the Seven Years' War, and subsequently participated in the campaigns in America and in Holland. During the rebellion in Ireland in 1797-98, he acted as commander-in-chief of the British force. In 1800 he went out to India as commander-in-chief, and three years afterwards took the field against the Mahrattas, whom he signally defeated before the city of Delhi. On entering that city, he obtained possession of Shah Allum, the Mogul emperor, nominally the sovereign of India, but in reality the tool of the Mahrattas. He afterwards reduced Agra, and, by a series of brilliant successes, took from Scindiah all his possessions beyond the river Chumbul. He operated in 1804-5 against Holkar, whom he defeated after an obstinate resistance. For his distinguished services, he was created, on his return to England in 1807, a viscount, having been previously raised to the peerage as Baron Lake of Delhi and Laswaree. b. 1744; d. 1808.

LALANDE, Michael Richard de, la'land, a French musician who, when young, became a chorister in the church of St. Germain l'Auxerre, but on reaching manhood lost his fine voice, and applied himself to the study of the violin, in hopes of being employed by Lully at the opera; but, being refused, he broke his instrument, and studied the organ. The duke of Noailles recommended him to Louis XIV., who appointed him musical instructor to the court. He was also composer and chapel-master to the king. b. at Paris, 1637; d. at Versailles, 1726.

LALANDE, Joseph Jérôme le Français de, an eminent French astronomer, who was sent to Paris for the purpose of studying jurisprudence, but his attention having been early directed to Fontenelle's "Discourses on the Plurality of Worlds," he secretly devoted himself to the pursuit of astronomical science. He attended the lectures of Lemonnier and Delille, and made such considerable progress as to be able to undertake, before he had attained his nineteenth year, a series of observations for determining the moon's distance from the earth, at the observatory of Berlin. On his return to Paris, the Royal Academy, in token of their admiration of the manner in which he had completed his task, elected him a member of their body. His reputation as an astronomer was thus permanently fixed. In 1762 he became professor of astronomy at the College of France, and filled that office during forty-five years with the greatest success. None of his contemporaries surpassed him in presenting a succinct exposition of the science of astronomy. As an author, he was eminently successful in conveying, in a clear and popular manner, the truths of his favourite science to the ordinary reader. He was an industrious observer, and contributed largely to the scientific memoirs of the French Academy. His principal works were, "Treatise on Astronomy," "Reflections on Eclipses of the Sun," "Compendium of Historical and Astronomical Navigation," "Astronomy for Ladies," "Letter on Saturn's Ring," and "Astronomical Bibliography." b. at Bourges, in the department of Ain, 1732; d. at Paris, 1807.

LALLI, John Baptist, la'l-le, an Italian poet, who was employed by the duke of Parma and the pope in the government of several cities. He wrote, among other works, "The nefarious French," "Jerusalem Forlorn," and the "Æneid Travestie." b. at Norcia, 1672; d. at Norcia, in Umbria, 1637.

LALLY, Thomas Arthur, Count de, la'l-le, a distinguished French general, was sprung from an Irish family that had followed James II. to France. He signalized himself at the battle of Fontenoy, and was appointed brigadier in the field by Louis XV. In 1756 he was sent to the East Indies as governor of the French possessions. He took Gondaloro and Fort St. David, but was defeated before Madras, on which he retired to Pondicherry, which he was obliged to surrender to the English in 1761. On his arrival in France, he was accused of betraying French interests in India, and the popular clamour was so great that he was sent to the Bastille, and afterwards tried by the Parliament, which condemned him to be beheaded, on the absurd charge of having sold Pondicherry to the enemy. He underwent his sentence with great fortitude, in 1766.

LALLY TOLLENDAL, Marquis de, son of the above, was educated at the College of Harcourt. He wrote, when only 15, a Latin poem on the story of John Calas, who had been sacrificed to the fury of a mob; and when he had attained a more mature age, warmly exerted himself to retrieve from obloquy the memory of his father; and in 1783 regained possession of his paternal estates. Previously to the Revolution, he was captain of cuirassiers; and in 1789 was nominated deputy from the nobility of Paris to the States-general. He soon became one of the most popular members of the Constituent Assembly, gave his support to the declaration of the rights of man proposed by Lafayette, and subsequently suggested as an amendment, that all citizens should be eligible to public employments, which was adopted by acclamation. But though a democrat, he was not an anarchist, and proposed the British constitution as a model of government; but perceiving that principles prevailed at variance with his ideas of what was just, he resigned his seat in the Assembly, and retired into Switzerland. He composed a work, entitled "Quintus Capitolinus," in which he reviewed the proceedings of the National Assembly, pointed out the faults of the constitution, and condemned the suppression of the higher orders of the state. Having returned to France in 1792, he was arrested and sent to the Abbaye, but, escaping the massacres which took place in the prisons in September, effected his escape to England, where he obtained a pension from the government. On the trial of Louis XVI. he wrote to the Convention to offer himself as the official advocate of that prince, and afterwards published the speech which he had composed in his defence. When Bonaparte became Consul, the marquis returned to France, where he resided till the restoration of the Bourbons in 1814. He accompanied Louis XVIII. to Ghent, as one of the members of his privy council, and is supposed to have drawn up the manifesto of the king to the French nation. He wrote an excellent work, entitled "The Defence of the Emigrants," published in 1796; also an "Essay on the Life of the Earl of Stratford, the Minister of Charles I.;" and a tragedy on the fate of that nobleman. B. 1751; D. 1830.

LAMARCK, Jean Baptiste Pierre Antoine de Monet, Chevalier de, la-marck, an eminent French botanist and zoologist, served for some time under Marshal de Broglie, but quitted the career of arms for that of science. He at first devoted himself to botany, and made the acquaintance of Buffon, who greatly assisted him. In 1779 he became a member of the Academy of Sciences, and was despatched on a travelling tour over Europe to collect rare specimens of plants for the Jardin du Roi. In 1794 he was appointed professor of zoology in that institution, a post he retained until his death. His principal works were "The Natural History of Invertebrate Animals," and the "French Flora." He also wrote botanical articles for the "Encyclopédie Méthodique." B. 1744; D. at Paris, 1829.

LAMARQUE, Maximilien, Comte de, la-marck, a distinguished French officer and statesman, entered the army as a private, and soon became captain of grenadiers in a famous corps commanded by Latour d'Auvergne, first grenadier of France. He served in the wars of the republic, and in the campaigns of Austerlitz, the Tyrol, Naples, and Wagram; rendered himself eminently conspicuous in Italy, especially by the capture of Caprea; and was afterwards sent to Spain, where he added to his military reputation. On the return of Bonaparte from Elba, he conferred on Lamarque the command of Paris, and afterwards nominated him general-in-chief of the army of La Vendée. He was proscribed in 1815; but returned to France in 1818, and wrote numerous articles for the opposition journals, chiefly relating to foreign politics. In 1826 he was elected to the Chamber of Deputies, and after the accession of Louis Philippe, became a leading member of the progressive party. B. 1770; D. 1832.

LAMARTINE, Alphonse, la-mar-teen, an illustrious French poet, whose family name was Du Prat, but he assumed that of Lamartine from a maternal uncle. His father was a major of cavalry in the royal service, and was imprisoned during the Reign of Terror; but, after the fall of Robespierre, the family retired to their country seat at Milley, where the future poet received his first education, in the midst of a domestic serenity he afterwards depicted in his "Confidences." He was subsequently sent to finish his studies at Belley, with the "Pères de la Foi." After a short sojourn at Lyons, he made his first visit to Italy; and, towards the close of the Empire, repaired to Paris, where he devoted himself to study, to the composition of verse, and to social enjoyment. On the exile of Napoleon to Elba, he took military service under Louis XVIII.; but after the Hundred Days, he left the military for a literary career. He visited Italy for the second time in 1818. In 1820 his fame suddenly and unexpectedly commenced; in that year he produced a small and modest volume, for which he could hardly find a publisher; this was entitled "Méditations Poétiques." With the exception of some translations from Byron, French literature had, for a considerable period, been without anything like sentimental or impassioned poetry. Accordingly, this new style of verse was received with universal admiration; 45,000 copies of the volume were sold in the course of four years, and its author was hailed as a great French poet, worthy to take rank with Béranger; the latter being the poet of imperialism and the Revolution, the former that of religion and royalty. A diplomatic career next opened to the popular poet; he was appointed to a post at the French embassy at Florence, and afterwards became secretary of embassy at Naples and at London, where he married a young and beautiful English lady, who was possessed of a large fortune. About this time his maternal uncle made him his heir, on condition that he should assume the name of Lamartine. He was next chargé-d'affaires in Tuscany, when some remarks made by him in his "Dernier chant de Child Harold," derogatory to Italian national character, led to a duel between himself and Colonel Pepé, afterwards celebrated as an Italian patriot general, wherein the poet was dangerously wounded. He composed several poetical works while sojourning in Italy; among the rest, his "Nouvelles Méditations," first published in 1823; the "Mort de Socrate," and the "Harmonies Poétiques et Religieuses." In all these a strong religious sentiment and a spirit of loyalty to the Bourbons, as well as a bitter feeling towards the Empire and the Revolution, were displayed. He was recalled to France in 1829, and was elected a member of the Académie Française. On the outburst of the French Revolution of 1830, he was about to proceed to Greece, as minister plenipotentiary of Charles X. The new monarch, Louis Philippe, offered to retain him in his appointment, but Lamartine declined. The events which had brought about the fall of the elder Bourbons produced a profound impression on his enthusiastic spirit. He had seen his much-loved Bourbon dynasty hurled from power by a succession of foolish acts. This year was to prove the turning point of his career. He was henceforth to commence a life of political activity; his career as a poet may almost be said to have ended at this time, for, except "Jocelyn," "La Chute d'un Ange," and a few songs, he wrote no more verse. As a politician and a prose writer, he resolved to spend the remainder of his life. Speaking of this crisis in his career, he said, "The past may be regretted, but the day must not be wasted in idle tears. I wish to enter the ranks of the people; to think, speak, act with them." He now sought to obtain a seat in the Chamber of Deputies, and successively presented himself as candidate for the suffrages of Toulon and Dunkirk, but without success. Prevented for the time from taking an active part in political affairs, he resolved to repair to the land of his aspirations and his dreams, the East. In 1832 he set sail from Marseilles, with his wife and daughter, on board a vessel which he had himself equipped, carrying with him a collection of princely presents for the chiefs of the lands he was about to visit. He travelled in oriental countries for sixteen months, but was recalled, just as he had reached Jerusalem, by the news that he had been elected deputy by the Legitimist constituency of Bergues. He was now actively engaged in politics, and soon became a leader of the "Progressive Conservative" party; but, in 1845, he openly expressed his dislike for the government of Louis Philippe and his minister Guizot, which he characterized as one of "vulgar utility." He became an influential member of the opposition party. It may be mentioned, by the way, that his greatest oratorical achievements in the Chamber of Deputies, up to this period, had been his speeches on Eastern questions, on the abolition of the punishment of death, and against M. Arago in defence of literary studies. He wrote, too, at the same period, many small works expressive of his opinions on passing events. In 1835 he published his celebrated "Souvenirs, Impressions, Pensées, et Paysages pendant un voyage en Orient," which was almost as popular in an English translation,—"Pictures of the East," as in its original language. His great effort, however, during the last years of Louis Philippe's reign, was the "History of the Girondins," which had an immense influence in producing the fall of the minister Guizot, and in bringing about the Revolution of 1848. During that eventful period, Lamartine became one of the most prominent, if not the most prominent, man of the day. It was owing to his eloquence that the Chamber of Deputies refused a compromise between the Revolution and the Orleans family. He risked his life in withstanding the demands of the leaders of the insurgents and their followers, that the red flag should be the colours of the new republic. "For myself," he said, "I will never consent to adopt it. The tricoloured flag has waved all over the world. It is identified with your liberties and your glory. The red flag has never waved but over the Champ de Mars, and has only been imbrued with the blood of the people." He became a member of the provisional government, and the foreign minister of the republic. He did good service to his country in that capacity, by preventing a general war of revolutionary interference, which the more violent revolutionists desired. His popularity during several months was immense; he was the particular idol of the middle classes, who beheld in him a bulwark between themselves and anarchy. Curiously enough, after a few months, his countrymen grew so indifferent towards him, that it was with difficulty he was elected to the Chamber of Deputies. When his name was announced with that of Louis Napoleon and Cavaignac for the office of president, he obtained by far the fewest votes of the trio. After the coup d'état of December, 1851, he retired from politics and devoted himself exclusively to literature. Indeed his means had become so straitened that a most strenuous effort had to be made by him to ward off total pecuniary ruin. A French critic observes of this circumstance, "Notwithstanding the illusory wealth bestowed upon him by the Sultan in the shape of territorial grants, notwithstanding the enormous sale of his works, notwithstanding the vast subscriptions started for his benefit in France and abroad, the ruin of his fortune by public disturbances, and by his own life of princely munificence, has condemned him to a species of literary drudgery to which he has nobly submitted, but in which he has consumed, in a number of ephemeral productions, more force and power of intellect than would have been required to produce three or four great and immortal works." In obedience to the call of pressing necessity, he was, after his retirement from political life, one of the most industrious authors in France. We can only particularize a few of his most important productions, these are: "The History of the Revolution of 1848," "Raphael," "Les Confidences," sia," and "Fresh Travels in the East." Most of these have been translated into English and the other European languages. He was the proprietor and director of two newspapers, the "Bien Publicque," published at Macon, and the "Pays," published at Paris. His poetical and prose works have been collected and republished in several forms; but, in addition to these, he produced numerous pamphlets and political effusions. b. at Macon, 1792; d. 1869.

LAMB, Lady Caroline, lám, daughter of the Earl of Besborough, and wife of the Hon. William Lamb, afterwards Lord Melbourne, was distinguished for her literary talents and the decided part she took in political affairs, particularly at the time her brother-in-law, the Hon. Geo. Lamb, was a candidate for Westminster, when she personally canvassed the electors, and made herself the subject of great notoriety. She possessed a masculine mind, and was on terms of friendship with several literary characters, but more especially with Lord Byron, for whom she entertained an attachment fatal to her domestic happiness. She wrote the novels of "Glenarvon," "Graham Hamilton," and "Ada Reis," besides contributing to various newspapers and periodicals. b. 1786; d. 1828.

LAMB, Charles, a distinguished English essayist and humorist, was the son of a clerk to Mr. Salt, a bencher of the Inner Temple, in which legal stronghold he first saw the light. He was sent at an early age to Christ's Hospital, where Coleridge was his schoolfellow. Reared in the very heart of the metropolis, he throughout life evinced a strong perception of the splendour, squalidness, excitement, and oddities of the great world of London. "I often shed tears," he said, "in the motley Strand, for fullness of joy at so much life." An impediment in his speech prevented his gaining an exhibition at the university, and, in 1792, he became a clerk in the India House, post he retained during thirty-three years. With the exception of one terrible circumstance, his life was very uneventful. In 1796 his sister, worn out by constant toil at her needle, as well as weakened in nerves by confinement, took her mother's life in an uncontrollable fit of frenzy. Her insanity being established, she was allowed to remain in the charge of her brother, a duty which Lamb religiously fulfilled to the end of his life. She subsequently recovered her reason, and her brother, who was never married, passed his days with her, both evincing the utmost affection and devotedness to each other. He first appeared as an author in a small book of poems published in conjunction with Coleridge and Lloyd. Although this was severely handled by the "Anti-Jacobin," Lamb was not deterred from authorship; for, some time afterwards, he produced a drama, entitled "John Woodvill." His delightful "Essays of Elia," upon which his fame mainly rests, were first printed in the "London Magazine." He was highly esteemed by a large intellectual circle, among which may be named his life-long friend Coleridge, Leigh Hunt, Southey, Rogers, and Talfourd. The last gentleman published "Lamb's Letters," and "Final Memorials," in 1843; and those who would fully appreciate his captivating essays, and morsels of autobiography scattered through his writings, should consult these tributes to a genial and estimable man. His complete works include two volumes of verse, the "Essays of Elia," and "Specimens of English Dramatic Poets who lived about the time of Shakespeare." The "Farewell to Tobacco," "Essay on Roast Pig," "Christ's Hospital thirty years ago," and the "Old Benchers of Lincoln's Inn," may be mentioned as representative bits of his refined, quaint, easy humour. In one of the last essays of "Elia" he records his feelings on being released from drudgery at the India House in a delightful manner. The paper is called "The Superannuated Man;" and the event happened in 1825. His death was the consequence of what was at first thought but a slight accident. For quaint, genial, and unconventional humour, Lamb has, perhaps, never been excelled. B. in London, 1775; d. at Edmonton, 1834.

LAMB, Sir James Bland Burges, D.C.L., the son of George Burges, Esq., comptroller of customs in Scotland, was educated at Oxford, and after travelling on the continent, was called to the bar in 1777. In 1787 he became M.P. for Helston, Cornwall; and in 1789 was appointed under-secretary for Foreign Affairs. He about this date established the "Sun" evening newspaper, and for a time took an active share in conducting it. His contributions to this journal were signed "Alfred," and were collected into a volume in 1792. He was created a baronet in 1795, and was named for life knight-marshal of the royal household, and spent the residue of his life in literary pursuits, producing numerous works on the drama, poetry, politics, &c. In 1821 he was allowed to assume the name of Lamb, by which he was subsequently known. B. 1752; d. 1825.

LAMBALLE, Maria Theresa Louisa, of Savoy-Carignan, Princess de, lam'-bal, was married to the duke de Bourbon-Penthievre, but became a widow in the flower of youth and beauty. Being appointed, in 1774, superintendent of the household to Marie-Antoinette, queen of France, she became the particular favourite of that unfortunate princess. On the flight of Louis XVI. and his family, she came to England; her attachment, however, to the queen was so great that she returned to France, and entered the prison of the Temple with her royal friend. She was dragged thence to La Force, and lastly, in September, 1793, brought before a ferocious tribunal, where she was butchered with sabres, her head and breasts cut off and her heart taken out. These, borne on pikes, were carried about in savage triumph, and inhumanly taken to the king and his family. B. at Turin, 1749.

LAMBARDE, William, lam'-bard, an English lawyer and antiquary, who published a collection and translation of the Anglo-Saxon laws; and, in 1574, established an hospital for the poor at Greenwich. In 1579 he became justice of the peace for the county of Kent, and subsequently produced a work on the duties of his office, entitled "Eirenarcha." He also wrote "Archeion; or, a Discourse upon the High Courts of Justice in England," and collected materials for another work on Great Britain; but on finding that Camden was engaged upon a similar task, he abandoned his intention of publishing it. It was subsequently issued under the title of "Dictionarium Angliæ Topographiæ et Historiæ." B. 1535; d. 1601.

LAMBERT, John, major-general in the parliamentary army in the reign of Charles I., is stated to have been a student of law on the breaking out of the struggle between the King and the Parliament; but, joining the popular standard, he became a colonel, distinguished himself at the battle of Naseby and in Fife, and assisted Cromwell in his advancement to the Protectorate, but opposed his taking the title of king. For this, Cromwell deprived him of his commission, but, from prudential motives, granted him a pension of £2000 a year. Being divested of all employment, he withdrew into private life, but, on the death of the Protector, was chosen by the Rump Parliament to repress the royalist insurrection. A short time previously he took an active part in deposing Richard Cromwell; for which services he was appointed one of the council of state, and colonel of a regiment of horse. The Parliament, however, growing jealous of his influence with the army, directed him to resign his commission; this he absolutely refused to do, and, marching to London, dispersed the assembly by force, in October, 1659. He was then appointed major-general of the army, and sent to command the forces in the north; but General Monk having defeated him, and restored the Parliament, he was deserted by his army, submitted, and was committed to the Tower. At the Restoration he was tried and condemned, with Sir Harry Vane; but was pardoned, and banished to Jersey, where he remained during upwards of thirty years. B. about 1620; d. at Guernsey, 1692.

LAMBERT, John Henry, an eminent German mathematician, who wrote a "Treatise on the Orbits of Comets," a "Treatise on the Properties of Light," and other works. He was an estimable man, and profoundly versed in the mathematical sciences, as known during his time. b. at Mülhausen, Upper Alsatia, 1728; d. at Berlin, 1777.

LAMBESCO, Charles Eugène de Loraine, Prince de, lamb'-besk, was the relative of Marie-Antoinette, whom he accompanied to France, and became colonel-proprietor of the royal German regiment. A determined enemy of the revolution, he charged the mob assembled at the Tuileries, in 1789, and wounded several persons with his own hand. He was afterwards tried for the act, but obtained an acquittal. Upon this, he left France, served in the Austrian army, and reached the grade of lieutenant-field-marshal.

He left no issue, and was the last representative of one branch of the house of Loraine. b. 1754; d. at Vienna, 1825.

LAMBUN, Margaret, lamb'-brun, a Scotch heroine, was a servant of Mary Stuart, as was her husband, who died of grief for the death of that queen. Margaret resolved to avenge the death of her husband and mistress upon Elizabeth, and, to accomplish her purpose, assumed a man's habit, and repaired to the English court; but, as she was pushing through a crowd to get near the queen, she dropped one of her pistols. This being observed, she was seized and brought before Elizabeth, who examined her strictly, and Margaret replied, "Madam, though I appear in this habit, I am a woman. I was several years in the service of Queen Mary, whom you have unjustly put to death; you have also caused that of my husband, who died of grief to see his innocent queen perish so iniquitously."

this design, but in vain: I found myself necessitated to prove by experience the truth of the maxim, that reason nor force can hinder a woman from vengeance, when she is impelled by love." The queen calmly heard this discourse, and answered: "You are then persuaded that in this action you have done your duty, and satisfied the demands which your love for your mistress and your spouse required from you; but what think you is my duty to do to you?" Margaret asked if this question was put as a what assurance can you give," said the queen, "that you will not repeat the attempt?" "Madam," Lambun rejoined, "a favour which is given under restraints is no favour; and, in so doing, your majesty would act as a judge." The queen was so struck with her behaviour, that she gave her a pardon and a safe conduct out of the kingdom.

LAMENNAIS, Félicité Robert, Abbé de, la-men'-vai, a celebrated French divine, was the son of a shipowner at St. Malo, and was intended by his father to follow mercantile pursuits; but an unconquerable love of learning led him to acquire, almost unassisted, a considerable store of knowledge. In 1807 he became teacher of mathematics in the College of St. Malo, and, in the following year, produced his first work, entitled "Reflections on the State of the Church in France during the 18th Century." In 1811 he assumed the tonsure; in 1814 he went to Paris, where he wrote a pamphlet against Napoleon I., then in exile at Elba, for which he was forced to make his escape from the capital during the Hundred Days. He went to England, where he resided for some time as usher at a school in the vicinity of London. In 1816 he returned to France, and was ordained a priest. His remarkable "Essay on Indifference in matters of Religion" appeared the following year, and produced a profound impression. He visited Rome several years afterwards, and was offered a cardinal's hat by Leo XII., but declined the honour. During the French revolution of 1830 he warmly embraced the democratic cause, declaimed against the temporal abuses of the Church, and in "L'Avenir," with Lacordaire and Montalembert (see LACORDAIRE), while he defended the interests of the Roman Catholic Church, desired that religion should be "regenerated" by being brought home to the bosoms of the lower classes, since the educated people had grown indifferent to its truths. He advocated the separation of the temporal from the spiritual power of the Church. These views evoked a remonstrance from the Holy See; upon which the journal was suppressed. In 1834 he produced his "Paroles d'un Croquant," a work which completely shut him out from the ranks of the Roman Catholic clergy. The pope condemned the book, but the republican party accepted its author as an apostle of civil and religious liberty. In 1840, for his "Pays et le Gouvernement," he was sentenced to undergo a year's imprisonment. He subsequently wrote other works, all expressing his views with the old earnestness and eloquence. Before his death, every effort was made to cause him to retract, but without

to be printed according to their author's last wishes. b. at Saint Malo, 1782; d. 1854.

LAMI, Giovanni, la'-me, an Italian author, who wrote in defence of the Nicene creed against Leclerc and others. In 1732 he became librarian of the Riccardi collection, and professor of ecclesiastical history at the Florence Lyceum. In 1740 he commenced the publication of a literary journal, called "Novella Letteraria." He likewise made a selection of the incited works contained in the Riccardi Library, and published them under the title of "Bellellettratorum," in eighteen volumes. He had projected a History of the Eastern Churches from the Council of Florence, in 1439, but his death interrupted the plan. He was throughout life a warm opponent of the Jesuits. b. at Santa Croce, Tuscany, 1697; d. at Florence, 1770.

LAMORICIERE, Christophe Louis Juchault de, la-mo-riss'-e-air, a celebrated French general, was educated for his profession at the Polytechnic School, between the years 1824-26, after which he passed to the school of Metz. In 1830 he had reached the grade of lieutenant, and subsequently, in the African war, he rose with great rapidity. He was appointed captain of the Zouaves on the organization of that corps, and, in 1837, had risen to the rank of colonel. He was wounded by the explosion of a mine at the siege of Constantine; after a short sojourn at Paris, he returned to Africa, where he distinguished himself on several occasions. In 1844 he became commander of the Legion of Honour, and was appointed temporary governor of Algeria. Under Marshal Bugeaud, between the years 1841-45, he displayed the highest qualities of a commander, and terminated his career two years later, by skillfully surrounding Abd-el-Kader, and causing him to surrender himself prisoner to the duc d'Aumale. During the revolution of 1848, he rode amongst the insurgents in the costume of a colonel of the National Guard, proclaimed the abdication of Louis Philippe, and the regency of the duchess of Orleans; but his horse was killed and himself wounded, and he narrowly escaped death at the hands of the mob. The provisional government offered him the office of minister of war, which he refused. In the insurrection of June, he acted under Cavaignac, and fought against the insurgents at the Bastille, and elsewhere. At the time of the election of President, he was sitting in the Legislative Assembly, and offered no opposition to the new head of the nation. In 1849, on the Russian intervention in Hungary, he was dispatched on an extraordinary mission to the court of Russia, but did not arrive until after the Hungarians had been subdued. On again taking his seat in the Legislative Assembly, he became a strenuous opponent of the President and his party. On the coup d'état of December, 1851, he was arrested and at first conducted to Ham, but afterwards released, and conducted as far as Cologne by the agents of the police. He then took up his residence at Brussels, where he usually continued to live up to the year 1860, when Monsignor Merode, one of the pope's household, and formerly a soldier, sought him in his retreat, and induced him to undertake the chief command of the papal troops, a task he commenced with great zeal, but without accomplishing anything of note, the papal troops having been completely defeated and dispersed by Cialdini at Castelfidardo, Ancona, and elsewhere. B. at Nantes, 1806; D. 1865.

LA MOTTE, Antoine Houdar de, la-mot', a French author, was the son of a hatter, and was educated for the legal profession; but having a love for dramatic composition, resolved to devote himself entirely to the theatre. In 1693 he produced his first drama—"Les Originaux," which was unsuccessful. He subsequently wrote a number of comedies and tragedies, which obtained some success; only one of them, however, keeping possession of the stage—the tragedy of "Inez de Castro," praised by Voltaire. Lamotte became a member of the French Academy, and was appointed dramatic censor. But he is chiefly remarkable for his presumptuous attempt to translate the Iliad of Homer, without any knowledge of Greek. By way of improving that poem, he abridged it to twelve cantos, and added to it a discourse, in which he stated that the admiration for Homer and other ancient writers was only a prejudice of the time. About the age of 40 he became blind, and lost the use of his limbs. B. at Paris, 1672; D. 1731.

LAMOTTE, Jeanne de Valois, Countess de, a lady, who, becoming aware of the ridiculous passion of Cardinal Rohan for Queen Marie-Antoinette, suggested to the prelate the idea of purchasing for that princess a magnificent diamond necklace. She engaged herself to deliver the present to the queen, and to procure for the cardinal an interview with her. For this she was, in 1785, convicted of imposture and swindling, and was condemned to make honourable amends with a cord about her neck, to be whipped and branded, and to be confined in La Salpêtrière. She found means of making her escape, and took refuge in England, where she printed a book containing reflections on Queen Marie-Antoinette's moral character. B. at Bar-sur-Aube, 1757; D. in England, 1791.

LAMOTTE-FOUQUÉ, Frederick Henry Charles, Freiherr de, foo-kah', a celebrated German poet and novelist, whose family came originally from France, his grandfather having entered the service of Frederick the Great of Prussia. He himself entered the Prussian army in 1796, but after serving for some time, and attaining the rank of major, he resigned, in consequence of ill-health. Thereupon he retired to his estate of Nennhausen, near Rathedow, and devoted himself to literature. Under the pseudonym of Pollegrin, he published a translation of the "Numantia" of Cervantes, as well as several poems; the novel of "Alwin," and the "History of the noble Knight Galm and a beautiful Duchess from Brittany." He subsequently proceeded to write a succession of poems and novels of great freshness and power, chiefly in the style of the old German poets, or founded upon the olden Northern mythology. In 1813 he gave to the world his exquisite tale, "Undine," which has been reproduced in every European language, and has become an established favourite, in virtue of its feeling and fancy, and the decided originality of its construction. During the thirteen subsequent years he produced poems, dramas, and novels, all imbued with a romantic and chivalric feeling. In 1840 was published his "Tidings for the German Nobility," and, soon after his death, a work entitled "Apostasy and Repentance; or, the Looking-glass of the Soul." He edited a selection of his works, in twelve volumes, in 1841. B. at Brandenburg, 1777; D. at Berlin, 1843.

LAMOURBOUX, Jean Vincent, la-moo-roo, a French naturalist, who devoted himself to the study of marine productions, animal and vegetable, and was professor of natural history at Caen. He wrote many treatises for the "Classical Dictionary of Natural History," and composed a dictionary of Zoophytes for the "Encyclopédie Méthodique." In 1817 he described a new variety of wheat, which was afterwards cultivated with success in the northern provinces of France, under the name of blé lamma. B. at Agen, France, 1779; D. at Caen, 1825.

LAMPUGH, Thomas, lamp'-lu, an English prelate. He took part with the Presbyterians in the civil war, but conformed at the Restoration, and became D.D., principal of Alban Hall, and vicar of St. Martin-in-the-Fields. In 1676 he was ordained bishop of Exeter. When the Prince of Orange landed, the bishop made a speech to the clergy and gentry, exhorting them to be loyal to James, who gave him the archbishopric of York. Notwithstanding this, he took the oaths to William and Mary. B. in Yorkshire, 1615; D. at Thorp Castle, 1691.

historian of the 4th century, who wrote the lives of the emperors Commodus, Antoninus Diadumenus, Heliogabalus, and Alexander Severus, which were included in the "Historia Augusta."

LANA, Francis de, la-na, an Italian mathematician, who is stated to have been the first to conceive the idea of aërostation, and to have described the subject in a work called "Magisterium Naturæ et Artis," published at Brescia, in 1684. A particular dissertation on the subject, entitled "Navis Volans," tending to abate the claims of Montgolfier to this discovery was published, from Lana's work, at Naples, in 1784. a. at Brescia, 1631; p. 1687.

LANCASTER, Sir James, lân-käs-ter, an English navigator, who, in 1591, sailed as commander of a squadron to the East Indies, where he touched at Ceylon and Sumatra, and, after taking several vessels and losing some of his own, shaped his course for England; but in the voyage, meeting with adverse winds, he was driven on the coast of America. He landed on a small island, and the crew, taking advantage of his absence, cut the cable, and sailed for England. He afterwards obtained a passage on board a French ship, and arrived at Rye in 1594. He went out again with another fleet, with which he committed many depredations on the coast of Brazil, and took the town of Pernambuco, where he obtained immense treasure, which he brought to England in 1595. He next commanded the fleet sent out by the newly-established East India Company, and obtained the grant of a settlement at Acheen, and also at Bantam, after which he returned to England. He maintained the existence of a north-west passage, and encouraged many attempts to discover it during his lifetime, and was knighted by Queen Elizabeth for his services. p. 1620.

LANCASTER, Joseph, was the founder of the Lancasterian schools in most parts of the civilized world. Before he had attained his nineteenth year, he set up a school for poor children in a room lent him by his father, in the Borough-road, Southwark, and, in a short time, had ninety children under his charge. He continued his philanthropic effort of disseminating education among the lowest classes, and, in 1805, was honoured with an audience by George III., who said, "I wish that every poor child in my dominions may be able to read his Bible." The Established Church made him many overtures, which he, as a member of the Society of Friends, was constrained to decline. Almost unaided, he travelled over the United Kingdom, and lectured to upwards of 50,000 people on the system which he had organized: this system consisted in teaching the elements of education by mutual or monitorial instruction. Becoming insolvent, he emigrated to the United States in 1818, and pursued his educational efforts with much success in that country. He visited Canada in 1829, and obtained several grants from the Parliament of Lower Canada in furtherance of his educational projects. He became embarrassed in his means once more; but his friends subscribed to purchase a small annuity for him. a. in London, 1771; p. at New York, 1838. ^o

LANCE, George, lan-see, a modern English painter, celebrated for his fruit-pieces and still-life productions, studied high or historical art under Haydon; but it was not until he had discovered where his true powers lay that he made any marked progress. This he did accentally, by copying a group of fruit as a study of colour. Indeed, as a copyist, he was exceedingly skilful; a proof of which may be cited in his wonderful restoration of the "Boar Hunt," by Velasquez, now in the National Gallery, and which had been injured by a clumsy "restorer," to whom it had been intrusted to clean. Almost from the first moment of his bringing his skill to bear on the peculiar line of art for which he afterwards became distinguished Lauce proved that a great painter in an original line had appeared. For many years, he sent to the exhibitions of the British Institution and the Royal Academy productions marked by skilful composition, brilliant colour, and harmonious effects. His "Fruit," "Game," "Just Shot," "Fresh from the Lake," "Just Gathered," and a host of similar works, have charmed beholders, as splendid reproductions of grapes, melons, fruit, flowers, dead birds, game, or fish. The Vernon collection contains three good examples of his manner—"Fruit," 1832; "Fruit," 1848; and "Red-cap." a. at Little Easton, Essex, 1802; p. 1804.

LANCELOT, Dom Claude, lan-see-lot, a celebrated grammarian, who became professor at Port Royal in 1638, and composed for the use of the pupils a series of excellent works. He shared in the persecutions to which the establishment of Port Royal was subjected, on account of its attachment to Jansenism. He wrote "New Method of Learning the Latin Language," generally known as the Port Royal Latin Grammar; "Greek Grammar," "Greek Roots," "Italian Grammar," and other works. a. at Paris, 1615; p. at Quimperlé, 1695.

LANCISI, Giovanni Maria, lan-chee-se, a learned Italian, who studied medicine, chemistry, botany, and geometry with equal success. He was physician to popes Innocent XII. and Clement XI., and was the author of several valuable treatises on natural history, anatomy, &c. At his death, he left to the hospital of San Spirito, at Rome, a library of 20,000 volumes, on condition that it should be free to the public. a. at Rome, 1654; p. 1720.

LANCINCK, Prosper Henry, lan'-krink, a painter of the British school, though of Flemish birth. He was well educated, having been originally designed for the Church, but on indicating a love for art, was allowed to follow the bent of his genius. After studying under various masters in his own country, and making great progress, especially in landscape, where he took Titian and Salvator Rosa for his models, he went to England, and was employed by persons of distinction. He also assisted Sir Peter Lely in painting the accessories—such as grounds, landscapes, ornaments, draperies, &c.—in his principal pictures. Lancerick was particularly happy in his skies, and his landscapes were also much admired for the invention, and harmony and warmth of colour, they displayed. p. 1628; p. 1692.

LANDEN, James, lân-den, an English mathematician, was a self-taught genius, and acquired a profound knowledge of abstract mathematics. He wrote some curious papers in the "Philosophical Transactions," and in 1755 published a volume called "Mathematical Luccubrations." He was appointed agent to Earl Fitzwilliam, which position he held till within two years of his death. In 1766 he was chosen a fellow of the Royal Society. He published two volumes

LANDER, Richard and John, lan'-der, two brothers, whose names are associated with African discovery, were both apprenticed to a printer; but the elder abandoned his occupation to accompany Clapperton in his expedition to the Niger in 1825; and after his death, in 1827, returned to England, where he submitted to government a plan for exploring the Niger, which was adopted. Accompanied by his younger brother, he set out for Badagry in 1830, and, after encountering many dangers, they reached Kirree, but were taken prisoners at Eboe, and only, after the promise of a high ransom, succeeded in getting arrangements made for conveying them to the sea. This they reached by the channel called by the Portuguese Nun, and by the English Brass River; and thus solved one of the grandest problems in African geography. This important discovery, opening a water communication into the very heart of the African continent, made a great impression on the mercantile world; and soon after the brothers' arrival in England, an association was formed for making a settlement on the Upper Niger; but the expedition fitted out for this purpose at Liverpool, in 1832, proved a failure; and the Landers, together with nearly all that joined it, fell victims either to the unhealthiness of the climate, or in contests with the natives, in 1833. Richard was born in 1804, and John in 1806, in Cornwall.

LONDON, Letitia Elizabeth, län'-don, generally known as L. E. L., an English poetess, who at the early age of thirteen displayed a vivid and inventive imagination, and produced several small poems. Her father was an army agent, and resided at Brompton, where he had for a neighbour Mr. Jerdan, the editor of the "Literary Gazette." She submitted some of her poetical effusions to that gentleman, who published them in his journal, in 1820. These first efforts were soon followed by others in the same paper, and were received with a considerable amount of attention. Her father dying soon after, and leaving his family in reduced circumstances, Miss Landon devoted herself to literature, as a means of supporting herself and assisting her relatives. Her poems in the "Literary Gazette," signed L. E. L., were now eagerly looked for, and excited great admiration. She likewise wrote criticisms of poetry and works of fiction for the Gazette, and, as Mr. Jerdan afterwards stated, her labours for the print were little less than his own. With respect to her poems, "The Fate of Adelaide, a Swiss Romantic Tale," was published in 1821. This, her first collection, was followed by "The Improvisatore," "The Troubadour," "The Golden Violet," and others. At that period the annuals were popular, and to these L. E. L. contributed largely. She was less successful as a novelist than as a poet, for her three works of fiction, "Romance and Reality," "Francesca Carrara," and "Ethel Churchill," were soon forgotten. In 1838 she was married to Mr. George Maclean, the governor of Cape Coast Castle. She left England with her husband, and in little more than a year, was found lying on the floor of her apartment, dead. In her hand was a small phial that had contained prussic acid. At the inquest the jury discovered no cause for suspicion in her death, neither could it be thought that her end had been due to her own intentional act; for she had been in the habit of taking, according to her physician's advice, small doses of prussic acid, and she had, moreover, written to some female friends in London expressing herself perfectly happy and contented. As a poet she evinced a sentimental and melancholy cast of thought, but in private life she was of a lively and mirthful disposition. Her "Life and Literary Remains" were published by Laman Blanchard, in 1841. B. at Old Brompton, 1802; D. 1839.

LANDOR, Walter Savage, län'-dor, a modern English poet, essayist, and miscellaneous writer, was the son of Walter Landor, Esq., a wealthy landed proprietor, of ancient family. His mother was Miss Savage, a rich Warwickshire heiress. Walter Savage was educated at Rugby school and Trinity College, Oxford. The professions of the army and the law were successively proposed to him, and both in turn declined; he preferring to live an untrammelled life of literary ease on the income allowed him by his father. At the close of the last century, just as Burns, Wordsworth, Coleridge, Rogers, and other great writers, were appearing on the poetical arena, Walter Savage Landor published his first volume of poems. In 1802 he went to Paris, where he witnessed the accession of Bonaparte to the consulship for life. On succeeding to the family estates, by the death of his father, he began by expending vast sums in buildings and improvements thereon; but, in a few years, he suddenly sold off all his property, some of which had been in his family's possession during 700 years, and went abroad, intending to become a citizen of the world. During the struggle between the Spanish patriots and Napoleon I., he raised men, joined the former, and materially aided the Junta by gifts of money. He was appointed a colonel in the Spanish service; but, at a later period, when the restored king, Ferdinand, had overthrown the constitution which the Spaniards had obtained for themselves, he resigned his commission, declaring that though "willing to aid the Spanish people in the assertion of their liberties against the antagonist of Europe, he would have nothing to do with a perjurer and a traitor." He had married Miss Thuillier, a young lady of Swiss extraction, residing at Bath, in the year 1811; and, after the fall of Napoleon, he and his wife took up their residence at Florence, where he purchased some estates. Here, during thirty years, he lived, making only a few visits to England at wide intervals. It was while a resident at Florence that he composed his most important works. In 1820 he printed his "Idyllia Heroica," in Latin, at Pisa. Between the years 1824-29 he brought out, in London, his "Imaginary Conversations of Literary Men and Statesmen." In 1831 he republished "Gebir," a poem, first produced in English, but translated by himself into Latin in 1813. In 1836 he published "A Satire on Satirists, and Admonition to Detractors," and in the following year, "The Pentameron and the Pentologue." Besides these, he wrote many shorter and less important works; his dramas, "Andrew of Hungary" and "Giovanni of Naples," were first published in 1839. His latest productions were, "Last Fruit of an Old Tree," published in 1853, and "Letters of an American," first given to the world under the assumed name of Pottinger, in 1854.

THE DICTIONARY

Landseer

Altogether, Mr. Landor was one of the most remarkable English writers the nineteenth century produced. B. 1775; d. 1864.

LANGDALE, Lord. (See BICKERSTETH, Henry.)

LANDSEER, John, land-seer, an eminent English engraver, who was a pupil of Byrne, and in 1793 attracted some notice by his engravings of Louthborough's vignettes for Macleise's Bible.

engraver in the Royal Academy. Having considerable literary ability, he subsequently abandoned his profession to engage in controversy on art, and to deliver lectures. He started several publications, which met with only a short-lived success. Among others, he established "The Probe," in opposition to the "Art Journal." In 1831 he wrote a "Descriptive, Explanatory, and Critical Catalogue of the Earliest Pictures in the National Gallery," which contained some amusing matter, although the criticisms therein contained were of little value. His best engraving was from his celebrated son's "Dogs of Mount St. Bernard." Indeed Mr. Landseer is more remembered as the father of the greatest English animal-painter, than for any particular merits of his own. B. at Lincoln, 1769; d. 1852.

LANDSEER, Thomas, an English mezzotint engraver, and eldest son of the preceding. He is known as the engraver of Sir Edwin Landseer's pictures, and for his spirited etchings, called "Monkeyana." The most important of his later works was his engraving of Rosa Bonheur's "Horse Fair." B. near the end of the last century.

LANDSEER, Charles, R.A., a modern English painter, and brother of the preceding, painted many pictures of merit, chiefly illustrative of the works of popular poets and novelists. He was elected an academical in 1846, and six years afterwards became keeper of the Royal Academy. B. 1799.

LANDSEER, Sir Edwin, R.A., an illustrious member of the English school of artists, was the son of John Landseer and brother of the preceding. From his earliest years he evinced extraordinary skill as a draughtsman, and when only fourteen exhibited successful pictures of terriers, spaniels, horses, and other small subjects. Under his father's direction he was in the habit of sketching sheep, donkeys, and other animals, on Hampstead Heath; and to this early familiarity with nature we may attribute his wonderful skill and fidelity, as exhibited in his pictures during after-life. When he was 18, he painted "The Dogs of Mount St. Bernard," and from that time became the leading English animal-painter. Although so early successful, he never lost the habits of a student, but went on increasing in power year after year. He became a Royal Academician in 1830. Sir Edwin's pictures are familiar to thousands of his countrymen, through the medium of scores of engravings. To mention even the most important of his works would require a great deal of space; but a fair idea of his wonderful powers may be gathered by all who have visited the Brompton Museum, where hang the "Peace" and "War," "High Life" and "Low Life," "Highland Music" and the "Dying Stag." In almost every print-seller's window we may see "The Return from Deer-Stalking," "Jack in Office," "Bolton Abbey in the Olden Time," "Return from Hawking," "A Distinguished Member of the Royal Humane Society," "A Piper and a Pair of Nutcrackers," "Bottom and Titania," etc., etc. The colossal bronze lions at the foot of the Nelson Column in Trafalgar Square were modelled by Sir E. Landseer. B. 1802.

Langeland

LANE, Jane, lain, an English heroine, who was the principal instrument in effecting the escape of Charles II., after the battle of Worcester. That monarch, disguised in her father's livery, rode before her on horseback, from Bentley Hall, the seat of Mr. Lane, about twelve miles from Boscobel Wood, in which Charles had been concealed in an oak, to Mr. Norton's, near Bristol; and thence he went to Brighton, where he embarked for France. She was well rewarded at the Restoration, and married Sir Clement Fisher, a baronet of Warwickshire.

LANFRANC, län-fränk, archbishop of Canterbury, whose early manhood was spent as an advocate in the law courts of Pavia; after which he went to France, and established a school at Avranches, which was attended by students of the highest rank. On a journey to Rouen, he was robbed and left bound in a wood. Some peasants released him, and conveyed him to the abbey of Bee, where he was so kindly treated, that he became a monk therein, and, in three years, was chosen prior. William, duke of Normandy, gave him the abbey of St. Stephen, at Caen, and, after the conquest of England, advanced him to the archbishopric of Canterbury. In 1071 he went to Rome to receive the pallium from Pope Alexander II. He rebuilt the cathedral of Canterbury, and founded several churches and hospitals. He wrote against Berenger on the Eucharist, and other works, which were published at Paris, 1648. B. at Pavia, 1005; d. 1089.

LANGBAIN, Gerard, läng-bain, a learned divine, who rose from the position of servitor to be fellow of Queen's College, Oxford. He edited "Longinus," and several other learned works. In 1615 he was chosen provost of his college, which, with the office of keeper of the archives, he held till his death. He was esteemed by Selden, Usher, and other great men, his correspondence with whom has been printed. B. in Westmoreland, about 1603; d. 1653.—His son, Gerard Langbaine, made a collection of old plays, and published an "Appendix to the University Catalogue of Graduates," and "An Account of the English Dramatic Poets." B. at Oxford, 1656; d. 1693.

LANGEBECK, James, lang-bek, a learned Danish writer, who studied theology, and the modern languages, with much success. Frederick V. employed him to travel in Sweden, to collect information relative to Danish history. He was also made keeper of the archives of the realm, councillor of justice, and councillor of state. His most important work is the historical collection, entitled "Scriptores Rerum Danicarum," &c. B. 1710; d. 1774.

LANGDALE, Marmaduke, lang-dail, a gallant English gentleman, who, in the civil war, raised a troop in the king's service, gained some advantage over Fairfax, raised the siege of Pontefract Castle, and made himself master of Derwick and Carlisle. On the ruin of the royal cause, he went to Flanders, and was created, by Charles II., Lord Langdale. D. 1661.

LANGELAND, or LONGLAND, Robert, läng-länd, an old English poet, and one of the first disciples of Wicliffe, who distinguished himself

OF BIOGRAPHY.

Lannes

by a curious poem, entitled "The Visions of Piers Plowman," written about 1369, and intended as a satire on almost every description of men, but especially the clergy. It is written in blank verse, with wit and humour, in an alliterative measure. The latest edition is that issued by the Early English Text Society.

LANGHAM, Simon de, lång'-ham, an English prelate and cardinal, abbot of Westminster, and afterwards bishop of Ely, and lastly archbishop of Canterbury, in 1366. Edward III. made him treasurer of England, and Urban VIII. gave him a cardinalship, with the title of legate. b. at Avignon, 1376.

LANGHORNE, Dr. John, lång'-horn, an English divine and poet, who, on entering into orders, became tutor to the sons of a Lincolnshire gentleman, whose daughter he subsequently married. He wrote a poem entitled "Genius and Valour," in which he defended the Scotch against Churchill, and for which the university of Edinburgh bestowed upon him the degree of D.D., in 1766. He was a writer in the "Monthly Review," and published "Poems," "Letters of Theodosius and Constantia," "Solymon and Almena," a tale; five sermons; "Fables of Flora, in Verse," and a translation of Plutarch's "Lives." b. at Kirkby-Stephen, Westmoreland, 1735; d. 1779.

LANGLE, Louis Matthew, langl, a celebrated French orientalist, who particularly devoted himself to the study of the Manchou language, of which he published an alphabet, and a dictionary Manchou-Français. He also published specimens of Arabian, Persian, and other eastern authors, with translations. In 1793 he was named keeper of the Oriental MSS. in the royal library; and had barely entered on his office, when the mob demanded that all books relating to genealogy in his charge should be destroyed. Langle asked for time to look out the works indicated, and proceeded to conceal all the more valuable, and gave up to popular fury a large quantity of duplicate copies and other unimportant lumber, and thus saved upwards of five thousand volumes, besides sundry valuable documents illustrative of the national history. He afterwards organized a school for the living Oriental languages, in which he was professor of Persian; he was also a member of the Institute, and a memoir by him upon Egypt first suggested to Bonaparte an expedition to that country. Napoleon wished Langle to accompany him to the East, but this he declined to do, and thereby gave great offence to the First Consul. He published numerous works on Oriental subjects, besides new editions of the books of travellers and others connected with that region. b. 1763; d. 1824.

LANGLE, Jean Maximilien de, a French Protestant minister, who officiated in the reformed church at Rouen for twenty-five years. He wrote a "Defence of Charles I., King of England," two volumes of sermons, and translated from the English the "Whole Duty of Man." b. at Evreux, 1590; d. 1674.

LANGLE, Samuel de, son of the above, was minister of the Protestant church at Rouen, whence he removed to Charenton, where he was greatly esteemed for his learning and virtues. On the persecution breaking out against the Protestants, he went to England, and became a prebendary of Westminster. The university of Oxford conferred on him the degree of D.D. Bishop Stillingfleet printed a letter of his on the differences between the Church of England and the Dissenters. b. in London; d. 1690.

LANGLEY, Batty, lång'-le, an English architect, who published many useful practical books; such as the "Builder's Jewel," the "Builder's Price-Book," and other works for masons, bricklayers, and carpenters. d. 1757.

LANGTOFT, Peter, lång'-toft, an old English chronicler, who translated from the Latin, into French verse, Herbert Bosenham's "Life of Thomas à Becket," and also composed a chronicle in verse, which began with the Trojans and went down to Edward I. An English metrical translation of this was made by Robert de Brunne, and published at Oxford in 1725. A manuscript of the Chronicle is preserved in the Cottonian collection of the British Museum, and another is to be found in the Arundel MSS. contained in the Heralds' College. Langtoft lived at the end of the 13th and beginning of the 14th century.

LANGTON, Stephen, lång'-ton, archbishop of Canterbury, and cardinal of St. Chrysogonus, studied at, and became chancellor of, the university of Paris, and was created an archbishop by the pope, in opposition to King John and the clergy. John forbade Langton from entering England, and banished the monks of Canterbury, for which the kingdom was laid under the papal interdict. The king was afterwards excommunicated, and his subjects absolved from their allegiance; on which he made his submission, by complying with the papal terms, after which he received the papal absolution from Langton, who, however, refused the pope's bull of excommunication against the barons for league against John, at Runnymede, for which he was suspended at Rome, where he suffered also many mortifications. At length he purchased his pardon, and was permitted to return to England. He was a staunch adherent to the cause of national liberty. b. in England, in the earlier half of the 12th century; d. 1223. He composed some theological works.

LANGUET, Hubert, lan'-gai, minister of state to Augustus, elector of Saxony, was a native of France, and converted to the Protestant faith by Melancthon. He was at Paris during the massacre of St. Bartholomew, as ambassador from the elector, and narrowly escaped with his life, after saving that of Wichelus, a printer, in whose house he lodged, and also the famous De Mornay. He was employed in several other embassies; but being suspected of favouring the Zwinglians, he quitted the service of the elector, and entered into that of the Prince of Orange. He wrote a letter to Sir Philip Sidney, and other pieces. b. at Antwerp, 1531.

LANIERE, Nicholas, län'-e-ai, a painter, engraver, and musician, who was employed to collect pictures in foreign countries for Charles I. He placed a particular mark on all which he brought to England. Pepys says, in his Diary, "that Lanieri did, at the request of Mr. Hill, bring two or three of the finest prints for my wife to see that ever I did see in all my life." He was also chapel-master to Charles I., at a salary of £200 per annum. b. 1668; d. 1646.

LANNES, Jean, lan'-nes, duke of Montebello and marshal of France, was one of the most intrepid and skilful of Napoleon's generals, and was greatly esteemed by the emperor. Born of humble parents, he worked as a dyer in early life; but, joining a battalion of volunteers in 1792, he, by his courage, rapidly rose to the grade of major. In 1794 he attracted the notice of Bonaparte, who procured him a command in the army of Italy. At the battles of Montenotte and Millesimo he displayed considerable bravery, and became colonel in 1796. He was made general of brigade in the following year, and sustained a brilliant part at the taking of Mantua and at the battle of Arcola. He went with the French expedition to Egypt, and rose to the rank of general of division. The French victory at Aboukir was in part due to his bravery and coolness. At the siege of Acre he was severely wounded. He left Egypt with Bonaparte, and after returning to Paris, rendered good service to his chief during the revolution of the 18th Brumaire (9th November), 1799, for which Napoleon appointed him commander of the consular guard. After various employments, he commanded the advance guard of the French army crossing the Great St. Bernard into Italy, in 1800. At the great battle of Montebello, where the Austrians were completely beaten, Lannes displayed such great skill and bravery, that Napoleon gave him the title of Montebello when he raised him to a dukedom. He was no less distinguished at the battle of Marengo. On his return from Portugal in 1804, whither he had been sent as minister-plenipotentiary of France, Napoleon created him marshal of France, and afterwards duke of Montebello. In the German campaigns of 1805-6, he commanded the advance guard, and rendered the most signal service to his master at the battles of Austerlitz, Jena, Eylau, and Friedland. His last great exploit was the defence of the village of Essling, where, while resisting the fierce onslaught of the Austrians, a cannon-ball struck off his right leg, and the foot and ankle of the left. Napoleon evinced more emotion at the sight of his brave marshal's mortal wound than he had ever before been known to exhibit. Lannes, throughout his military career, evinced a constantly increasing knowledge of war. Long afterwards, Napoleon, speaking of this intrepid commander, thus expressed himself—"I found him a dwarf, and I lost him a giant."

He had great experience in war, having been in fifty-four battles and three hundred combats. He was cool in the midst of fire; possessed of a clear, penetrating eye, ready to take advantage of any opportunity that might present itself. Violent and hasty in his temper, even in my presence, he was ardently attached to me." His young widow, a beautiful and accomplished lady, was afterwards lady in waiting to the empress Maria Louisa. b. at Lectoure, Guienne, 1769; d. 1809.

LANSDOWNE, Henry Petty Fitzmaurice, third Marquis of, lan'-down, after receiving a preliminary course of education at Westminster school, went, in 1785, to study under Dugald Stewart at Edinburgh, where he formed the acquaintance of a small circle of young men, nearly all of whom subsequently became famous in one line or another. These young friends formed the celebrated Speculative Society, in which Brougham, Jeffrey, Sydney Smith, Horner, and others, first practised the art of debate. From Edinburgh he went to Cambridge, in 1801, and, after a continental tour, entered the House of Commons. As Lord Henry Petty he became a prominent member of the Whig party, and, on the death of Mr. Pitt, and the accession of the Whigs to power, he became chancellor of the Exchequer, and followed Pitt in the representation of the university of Cambridge. He succeeded to the peerage as marquis of Lansdowne, in 1809. In both Houses of Parliament he was a staunch advocate of the abolition of slavery, and some of his best oratorical efforts were made in furtherance of the repeal of the penal laws against Roman Catholics. In 1820 he proposed a measure in favour of the principle of free trade; and in 1822 sought to obtain an inquiry into the suffering condition of Ireland. After eighteen years' retirement from office, he became secretary of state for the Home department, under the premiership of George Canning, in 1828. He was in opposition during the Wellington administration of 1828-31, but, on becoming president of the Council in the latter year, he was an active participator in the measures taken to pass the Reform Act. He was the opposition leader of the House of Lords during Sir Robert Peel's rule, which commenced in 1841, and when his own party returned to power under Lord John Russell, in 1846, he once more led the peers from the ministerial benches. He finally resigned office with Lord John Russell, in 1852. b. 1780; d. 1863.

LANTIER, Stephen François de, lan'-te-ai, a French author, who produced some celebrated works of fictitious travel, similar to Barthélemy's "Anacharsis," but in no way copied from it. These were entitled, "The Travels of Antenor," "The Travellers in Switzerland," and "Travels in Spain." He also wrote some comedies, and other works. b. at Marseilles, 1734; d. 1826.

LANZI, Luigi, lan'-se, an Italian archaeologist and writer on art, who entered the Society of Jesuits at the age of 17, but on the suppression of the order, devoted himself to literary pursuits. He was appointed keeper of the cabinet of medals at Florence in 1775, and thenceforth produced works on archaeology and art, some of which have since been translated into every European language. His "History of the Painters" was translated by Thomas Roscoe, and republished in Bohn's "Standard Library." Lanzi composed many other works, the chief of which were "Saggio di Lingua Etrusca," and others on the ancient Etruscan vases. He was likewise a graceful poet. b. 1732; d. at Florence, 1810.

LAO-TSE, or LAO-TSEU, la-o-tse', a Chinese philosopher, who lived a short time before Confucius. He held the doctrine of the metempsychosis, or transmigration of souls, like Pythagoras (see PYTHAGORAS). He wrote a book which the Chinese place among the number of their sacred works, and founded a sect whose rivals in numbers that of Confucius. M. Stanislas Julien published a complete edition of his writings, at Paris, 1841. Lived about 600 b.

LAPARELLI, Francis, la'-pa-rail'-le, an eminent Italian architect and mechanician. His knowledge of the art of military engineering recommended him to Cosmo I., grand-duke of Tuscany, and Pope Pius IV. intrusted him with the construction of the defensive works of Civita Vecchia, which place he strongly fortified. Michael Angelo confided to him the execution of his designs for the church of St. Peter. In 1565 he was sent to fortify Malta against the attempts of Solymán, and there planned the city of Valetta. He afterwards engaged in the service of the Venetians. b. at Crotona, 1521; d. of the plague, at Candia, 1570.

OF BIOGRAPHY.

La Perouse

LA PEROUSE, J. F. Galaup de, pe-roose', a celebrated French navigator, who, after serving as captain in the French navy with much distinction, was sent by Louis XVI., in 1785, on a voyage of discovery. He sailed with two frigates from Brest, and visited the coasts of Tartary, of Japan, and of New Holland, when, in 1788, he ceased to be heard of. Several expeditions were dispatched to discover traces of him, but in vain. In 1827, however, the wreck of his vessel was observed by Captain Dillon, in one of the Vanikoro islands. In 1828, a French captain visited the place, and discovered that La Perouse and his men had been wrecked among the reefs surrounding the island. B. at Albi, in Languedoc, 1741.

LAPLACE, Pierre Simon, Marquis de, la-plass', a celebrated French mathematician and astronomer, who, as early as his 19th year, taught mathematics in a military school. He obtained letters of introduction to the celebrated philosopher D'Alembert, and went to Paris with the view of seeking an interview with him; but, finding no notice taken of his letters, he wrote a short paper on some points of mechanical philosophy, which immediately procured for him the attention to his claims that he desired. D'Alembert sent for him, and, about 1769, had him appointed professor of mathematics at the Paris Military School. By his treatises, memoirs, and larger works, Laplace rapidly obtained the reputation of the greatest living mathematician since Newton. Napoleon, when First Consul, appointed him minister of the Interior; but, as a politician, he was very unsuccessful, and was in a short time removed to the presidency of the Sénat Conservateur. Napoleon afterwards related of his minister, that "a mathematician of the highest rank, he lost not a moment in showing himself below mediocrity as a minister. He looked at no question in its true point of view. He was always searching after subtleties; all his ideas were problems, and he carried the spirit of the infinitesimal calculus into the management of business." He was created a count by Napoleon, and a marquis by Louis XVIII. His principal works were the "Mécanique Céleste," "Analytical Theory of Probabilities," and an "Essay on Probabilities." A complete edition of his writings was published by the French government in 1843. It is quite impossible, in any short notice of the life of Laplace, to convey a proper idea of the extent and value of the great "Mécanique Céleste." To enumerate the bare contents thereof would require several pages. That inestimable contribution to science contained 2000 quarto pages; and, it is said, might easily be expanded to thrice that number. The intention of the work was to deduce, from the discoveries of the great astronomers who had preceded Laplace, a complete and harmonious system, and to perfect the marvellous work commenced by Newton, in his discovery of the law of gravitation. He subsequently wrote his "Exposition du Système du Monde," as an explanation of what was abstruse in his "Mécanique." Dr. Bowditch, an American writer, translated, in part, the "Mécanique Céleste." The popular work of Mrs. Somerville is a selection from it; and no inconsiderable share of what was most attractive in the earlier portions of the popular "Vestiges of Creation" was based upon the same source. Few will refuse to admit that Laplace was the greatest astronomer since Newton. B. near Houlfleur, 1749; d. 1827.

LARDNER, Nathaniel, lard'-ner, a learned English dissenting divine, who, after receiving his academical education at London, went to Utrecht, and thence to Leyden, and, in 1703, returned to England. Soon afterwards, he became private chaplain to Lady Treby, in which situation he continued until her ladyship's death in 1729. He then became pastor of a congregation in Crutched Friars. He wrote an answer to Woolston on the Miracles, a "Letter on the Logos," and the "Credibility of the Gospel History," a work admirably executed. His writings abound in critical elucidations of the Scriptures and early ecclesiastical history, evincing profound learning and intense application. B. in Kent, 1684; d. 1768.

LARDNER, Dr. Dionysius, a modern mathematician and philosophical writer, was the son of a Dublin attorney, and, after receiving some education at school, was placed in his father's office. Evincing, however, a decided distaste for the profession of the law, he was entered at Trinity College, Dublin, and soon began to devote himself to scientific pursuits. It was speedily made apparent that he had chosen the right path in life, for he gained a great number of prizes in pure astronomy, in natural philosophy, and other branches of study. In 1817 he obtained a B.A. degree, and, during the ten following years, remained at the university, publishing, at first, treatises on mathematics, and subsequently on the steam-engine. He likewise delivered a course of lectures on the latter subject at the Royal Dublin Society, for which he received the gold medal of the society. His reputation being in a great measure established, he began to contribute to the "Edinburgh Encyclopedia" and the "Encyclopædia Metropolitana," for which he wrote elaborate treatises on pure mathematics as well as on the applied sciences. In 1828, on the establishment of the London University, he was appointed to the chair of natural philosophy and astronomy, and, removing to London, set on foot the scheme of the "Cabinet Cyclopædia," which he gradually perfected, obtaining the co-operation of many eminent men. Sir John Herschel wrote for the series a "Preliminary Discourse upon Natural Philosophy," and a "Treatise on Astronomy;" but most of the scientific works were due to Dr. Lardner himself. In 1840 certain domestic circumstances caused him to repair to Paris, after which he went to the United States, where he delivered, with considerable success, a course of lectures, which were afterwards several times reprinted. He subsequently devoted much time to railway economy, and wrote a good deal on that and other subjects. In 1854 he started his last important work, the "Museum of Science and Art." Few men did more than he towards extending scientific knowledge among the people, and none were more eminently qualified for the work. Not only were his acquirements of the profoundest nature, but he possessed, in a peculiarly high degree, the happy faculty of throwing into popular and graphic language the most elaborate theories of science, and leading minds unaccustomed to abstruse reasoning to an appreciation of truths which would have been altogether incomprehensible if involved in the obscurity of technical phraseology. B. at Dublin, 1793; d. at Paris, 1859.

THE DICTIONARY

La Rochefoucauld

LA ROCHEFOUCAULD, François, Duke de, roh-foo-kolt, a celebrated French author and statesman, was at first known as the Prince de Marsillac, and signalized himself on various occasions by his courage; but was chiefly remarkable for his profound knowledge of mankind, and for his intriguing spirit. Smitten with the duchess de Longueville, he, to please her, joined the ranks of the Fronde, but being afterwards restored to favour, was appointed, in 1661, chevalier of the king's commands, and next, governor of Poitou. He spent his old age in the society of Madame de la Fayette and Madame de Sévigné. He wrote "Memoirs of the Reign of Anne of Austria," and a book of maxims, first printed in 1665, under the title of "Reflections and Sentences, or Moral Maxims." This little work has made the author celebrated as much by the perfection of its style as by the boldness of its paradoxes. According to it, self-love is the sole motive of all human actions, which was an opinion sufficiently natural with a man who had dwelt all his life at court. An egotist, an intriguer, and loose liver, Rochefoucauld had only too frequently given practical effect to his own maxims. B. at Paris, 1613; D.

LA ROCHEFOUCAULD-LIANCOURT, François, Duke de, was grand-master of the wardrobe to Louis XV. and Louis XVI., and in 1780 deputy to the States-general. Although attached to the king, he showed himself zealous for the well-being of the people. He took part in the recall of Necker, after the fall of the Bastille. Named military commandant at Rouen after the closing of the Assembly, he offered an asylum to Louis XVI. Deprived of his rank in 1792, he visited the United States, but returned to France after a lapse of about six years. He earnestly devoted himself to philanthropic enterprises, established manufactures, founded a school of art and science, and materially contributed to the introduction of vaccination throughout his native country. He entered the Chamber of Peers in 1814; but his liberal opinions subsequently brought him under the displeasure of Charles X., whereupon he occupied himself with his philanthropic schemes. He was long known under the name of Liancourt only, but added to it that of Rochefoucauld upon the death of his cousin. He wrote, among other works, "The Prisons of Philadelphia," and "Travels in the United States." B. 1747; D. 1827.

LA ROCHEJAQUELEIN, Henri de, roh-shak-lä, a famous Vendean chieftain, who commanded at the battle of Fontenay in 1793, and preserved the Vendéans from total rout at the battle of Lugon. He likewise took part in the disastrous engagement at Chollet. On the death of Lescaire, he was, although only 23 years of age, proclaimed general-in-chief. He twice combated the republican troops near Antrain, and took possession of Laval, La Flèche, and Le Mans. Driven from the last city, he crossed the Loire, and intrenched himself in the forest of Vézin. He was slain in an engagement near Chollet, in 1794. His address to his soldiers, on being appointed to the chief command, was, "If I recoil, kill me; if I advance, follow me; if I fall, avenge me." B. 1772.

LARREY, Isaac de, lar'-rai, an historian, who went to Holland, where he was made historiographer to the States-general. His works are, "The History of Augustus," "The History of Eleanor, wife of Henry II., "History of England," 4 vols. folio; "History of the Seven Sages of Greece;" and "The History of France under Louis XIV." B. at Montvilliers, 1638; D. 1719.

Lascaris

LARREY, Dominique Jean, a celebrated French surgeon, who became surgeon-in-chief of the imperial army. After completing his education under his uncle, and at the hospital of Toulouse, he repaired to Paris, where he obtained employment as naval surgeon. In that capacity he visited North America; but, returning to Paris at the outbreak of the Revolution, he joined the French army of the Rhine in 1792. He first attracted the notice of his superiors by his invention of "flying ambulances," which enabled the wounded to be carried off the field, even under a warm fire. He first met Napoleon at the siege of Toulon, where the future emperor was at the time acting as lieutenant of artillery. After killing, for some time, the functions of professor of military surgery, he, in 1798, went with the French expeditionary army to Egypt, and on his return published his "Historical and Surgical Account of the Army of the East in Egypt and Syria." This work was written in 1803, and from that time Larrey's rise was very rapid, till, in 1812, he became baron of the empire and surgeon-in-chief. His numerous papers attest his profound theoretical knowledge, while his many bold and successful operations, conducted during Napoleon's wars, have established his fame as one of the first of modern surgeons. Napoleon said of him, that "he was the most virtuous man he had ever known." An instance of his courage and humanity occurred after the battles of Bautzen and Wurtzen. Among the wounded were some 12,000 men who, it was suspected, had voluntarily mutilated themselves. Napoleon ordered his surgeons to examine them, and declared that if found guilty they should be shot. Larrey, with some difficulty, obtained time to properly examine them, for, as none doubted the guilt of the men, their instant execution was called for. But after a time, Larrey drew up a report declaring that all the accused were innocent. The excellent man expected dismissal, but received, instead, a handsome present from Napoleon. B. in France, 1766; D. at Lyons, 1841.

LA SALLE, Count de, la-sal', a gallant soldier, who began his career, with the rank of officer, at eleven years of age, under Prince Maximilian, subsequently king of Bavaria, and, from his high birth and connexions, might have risen to the most prominent position; but he preferred to owe his promotion to merit alone, and accordingly threw up his commission, enlisted as a private soldier, and at length attained, after eight years' arduous and dangerous service, the same rank he had resigned. At the battle of Rivoli, he, by his decisive conduct, possessed himself of the colours, upon which the general commanding addressed him thus: "Rest yourself upon these flags; you have deserved them." He likewise distinguished himself in Egypt, and defeated the Prussians on the walls of Königsberg, and finally fell, in the midst of victory, on the field of Wagram. B. at Metz, 1775; killed, 1809.

LASCARIS, Theodore, las-kar'-is, emperor of Nicea, was the son-in-law of the emperor Alexius Angelus. After the taking of Constantinople by the crusaders, in 1204, he formed in Asia

Lascaris

Minor a new kingdom, comprising Bithynia, Lydia, and Phrygia, of which Nicea was the capital. He combatted simultaneously the Latin emperors and the sultan of Iconium; but nevertheless maintained his throne until his death in 1222. His successors were his son-in-law, John Ducas (see JOHN III.), and his grandson, Theodore Lascaris, called the Young, who reigned from 1255 to 1259. This latter was succeeded by John Lascaris. (See JOHN IV.)

LASCARIS, Constantine, a learned Greek, descended from the imperial Greek family of that name, who went to Italy on the taking of Constantinople by the Turks in 1453. He settled at Messina, where he taught Greek with reputation, and had a number of scholars. He wrote a Greek grammar, and other works, b. about the close of the 15th century.

LASCARIS, Andrew John, surnamed "Rhyn-dacenus," a learned Greek, of the same family as the preceding, who was employed by Lorenzo de Medici to collect books in Greece. On his return he was invited to France by Louis XII., who appointed him ambassador to Venice. When Leo X. ascended the papal chair, Lascaris went to Rome, and became director of the Greek college. He revived the use of the capital letters of the Greek alphabet, and wrote epigrams in that language. b. about 1445; d. 1535.

LAS CASES, Marin Joseph Emmanuel Auguste Dieudonné, Count de, la-kas'-at, at the outbreak of the French Revolution, 1789, was a lieutenant in the navy. He then emigrated, joined the army of Condé, and took part in the expedition to Quiberon, but returned to France after the 18th Brumaire. Having been long engaged in literary pursuits, he now published, under the name of Le Sage, an "Atlas Historique, Chronologique, et Géographique," which went through several editions. In 1809 he enrolled himself as a volunteer to resist the British attack upon Flushing; and from this time attracted the attention of Bonaparte, who soon afterwards made him his chamberlain, created him a member of the council of state, and intrusted him with various confidential missions. In 1814 Las Cases refused to vote in the council of state for the dethronement of the emperor, took up arms for him after his return from Elba in 1815, and was one of the four attendants who accompanied him to St. Helena. There he lived eighteen months with the ex-emperor, enjoying his intimacy, and noting down all that he said in a journal, subsequently published under the title of "Mémorial de Sainte Héleène." Having, however, become an object of suspicion to Sir Hudson Lowe, the governor, he was seized, and conveyed first to the Cape of Good Hope, and thence to England as a prisoner, and was not permitted to return to France till after Bonaparte's death. He was elected to the Chamber of Deputies in 1830, and acted with the opposition. b. 1766; d. 1842.

LASCZY, Peter, Count de, la'-sz, a native of Ireland, who, after the conquest of that country by William III., entered the French service, and was subsequently an officer in the Austrian, Polish, and Russian armies, in the latter of which he rose to the rank of field-marshal, and was appointed governor of Lithuania. b. 1678; d. 1751.

LASCZY, Joseph Francis Maurice, Count de, son of the preceding, entered the Austrian service, and obtained the rank of general, after having exhibited considerable military ability at the battles of Lowositz, Breslau, and Hochkirchen. In 1760 he penetrated to Berlin, at the head of 15,000 men; for which bold exploit he was made a commander of the order of Maria Theresa, and in 1762 received the baton of marshal. He was employed against the Turks in 1788, and remained in active service under the emperor Joseph II., during great part of the remainder of his life. b. at St. Petersburg, 1725; d. 1801.

LASSUS, las'-us, a dithyrambic poet, born at Hermione, in Peloponnesus, about 500 years b.c. He is particularly known by the answer he gave to a man who asked him—"What could best render life pleasant and comfortable?" "Experience."

LATHAM, John, M.D., F.R.S., &c., lai'-tham, an eminent ornithologist and antiquary, was the son of a surgeon and apothecary at Etham, in Kent. Dr. Latham for many years followed similar professional pursuits at Dartford, but subsequently removed to Romsey, and during the latter period of his life resided at Winchester. He wrote several professional works, besides treatises on subjects relating to medicine, antiquities, and natural history, which appeared in the "Philosophical Transactions," &c. Among his productions are, "A General Synopsis of Birds," "Index Ornithologicus," "Herald's Pharmacopœia Improved," and others; but his great work, which he commenced in his 82nd year, was "A General History of Birds," in 10 vols. 4to, the whole of the plates of which he designed, etched, and coloured himself. Notwithstanding his great age, Dr. Latham was active, cheerful, and in the possession of all his faculties up to the moment of his death. b. 1740; d. 1837.

LATHAM, Robert Gordon, an eminent modern philologist and ethnologist, who received his education at Eton and King's College, Cambridge, where, in 1833, he took the degree of B.A. He afterwards became fellow of his college, and took the M.D. degree. He displayed, even from the outset of his career, a profound acquaintance not only with the classical but also with the European languages. On being appointed professor of English literature at University College, shortly after its establishment, he commenced the publication of a series of works which have entitled him to the foremost place as a philosophical investigator of the English language. The chief of these works is his "English Language;" but he followed up the subject with his "History and Etymology of the English Language," and other smaller works. As an ethnologist, he laboured with distinguished success; the "Varieties of Mankind," "Ethnology of the British Colonies," "Ethnology of Europe," and "Man and his Migrations," having thrown immense light upon the relation between the languages and the races of mankind. After he ceased to fulfil the active duties of the medical profession, Dr. Latham held many important appointments in connexion therewith; he was fellow of the Royal College of Physicians, and officiated as assistant physician of Middlesex Hospital. The ethnological department of the Crystal Palace was arranged by him. In addition to the numerous works he has written on ethnology, he has edited a new and valuable edition of Johnson's Dictionary, in two large volumes, 4to. b. in Lincolnshire, 1812.

Cambridge, where, at the beginning of the Reformation, he was very zealous for popery; but on conversing with Bilney, the martyr, he renounced the Romish tenets, and became as ardent on the other side. He now laboured earnestly in preaching the gospel, and his fame reaching Henry VIII., he sent for him, and was so pleased with his discourses as to confer on him the bishopric of Worcester. But Latimer was no time-server; on the contrary, he expostulated with the king for his cruelties. He afterwards resigned his bishopric; and, on the fall of Lord Cromwell, his patron, was sent to the Tower, where he remained till the accession of Edward VI., who would have restored him to his diocese, but he refused. He then resided with Cramer, whom he assisted in framing the Homilies, and in completing the work of reformation. When Mary came to the throne, he was committed to the Tower, whence he was sent, with Ridley and Cramer, to Oxford, to hold a conference with some popish divines. In that dispute he argued with remarkable clearness and simplicity; and when it was over, sentence was passed upon him and Ridley, who were burnt at the same stake, 1555. Latimer, after recommending his soul to God, thus cheered his brother sufferer: "We shall this day, my lord, light such a candle in England as shall never be extinguished." His sermons have been often reprinted. b. in Leicestershire, about 1472.

LATIMER, William, a celebrated scholar of the 16th century, who taught Erasmus Greek, and was tutor to Reginald, afterwards Cardinal Pole. He was a prebendary of Salisbury, and held two livings in Gloucestershire. b. 1545.

LATOUCHÉ-TRÉVILLE, Louis de, la-toosh' tre-veel', a French admiral, who became captain in 1780, and, during the wars between the English and French, signalized himself by many acts of bravery. In 1789-1801 he commanded the flotilla collected at Boulogne, ostensibly for the invasion of England. b. at Rochefort, 1745; d. at Toulon, 1805.

LATOUR, General Count Theodore, la'-toor, an eminent Austrian officer, was educated at the Imperial Engineers' School, and early obtained distinction in the field by his zeal, merit, and courage. During the long peace that succeeded the campaigns of 1813-1815, his great administrative abilities were repeatedly called into action by his native government; and for many years he was president of the military board of the German Confederation. Shortly after the revolutionary outbreaks in 1848, he was nominated minister of war, the duties of which office he discharged with firmness and moderation; but being suspected of intriguing for the re-establishment of the absolute form of government overthrown in the spring of 1848, the populace, during the insurrection in Vienna in October of that year, broke into the War office, seized the minister of war, murdered him, and suspended his corpse upon a gibbet. b. 1780.

LA TOUR D'AUVERGNE. (See AUVERGNE.)

LATREILLE, Pierre André, la-trail', a celebrated French naturalist, who, from his earliest years, devoted himself to entomology, and ultimately became the most distinguished professor of that department of science in his native country. He contributed treatises thereon to the "Encyclopédie Méthodique," and to the proceedings of many learned bodies. The entomological portion of the "Animal Kingdom" was written by him, although published under the name of Cuvier. Of this part, Mr. Swainson says, "It is the most elaborate and the most perfect in its details that has yet been given to the world, and possesses the advantage of being founded on a consideration of the entire structure of these animals; and hence gives us the first example in theory of the natural principle of classification." Latreille wrote a general history of insects for an edition of Buffon; "Genera Crustaceorum et Insectorum;" and "General Considerations on the Natural Order of Animals composing the classes Crustacea, Arachnides, and Insects." He was a chevalier of the Legion of Honour, a member of the Academy of Sciences, and correspondent of the Linnean Society of London. b. at Brives, France, 1762; d. at Paris, 1833.

LAUDE, Henri Mazers de, la-tood', a Frenchman, who was confined in the Bastille and other prisons during 35 years. When about the age of 24, hoping to gain the patronage of Madame de Pompadour, mistress of Louis XV., he informed her of a plot against her life; but the intelligence proving to be an invention of his own, he was mercilessly condemned to the long incarceration he endured. He made his escape in 1784, and left behind him memoirs, containing many interesting details. b. in Languedoc, 1725; d. at Paris, 1825.

LAUD, William, laud', a celebrated English prelate, was the son of a clothier at Reading, in Berkshire, and received his early education at the grammar-school of his native town. In 1580 he entered at St. John's College, Oxford, of which he was elected fellow in 1593. While at the university, Laud showed himself "at him for a papist, or at least popishly inclined, that it was almost made an heresy (as I have heard from his own mouth) for any one to be seen in his company, and a misprision of heresy to give him a civil salutation as he walked in the streets." These are the words of his contemporary, Heylyn, who wrote his life. Laud's first preferment was the living of Stamford, in Northamptonshire. In 1608 he took the degree of D.D., and became chaplain to Neill, bishop of Rochester. In 1611 he was elected president of his college, and, in 1616, preferred to the deanery of Gloucester by the king, one of whose chaplains in ordinary he had previously become. The year following he attended King James to Scotland. In 1620 he was made a prebendary of Westminster, and, a year afterwards, was made bishop of St. David's. In 1622 he held his celebrated conference with Fisher, the Jesuit, in presence of the marquis of Buckingham. In 1626, he was made bishop of Bath and Wells, and also dean of the Chapel Royal. He succeeded archbishop Abbot, in 1633, in the see of Canterbury. At this time he had reached the height of power, and was generally regarded as the prime minister of Charles I. Laud's statesmanship began with a fierce persecution of the Puritans. Alexander Leighton, for having published a book entitled "Sion's Plea," was sentenced by the Star Chamber to have his ears cut off, his nose slit, and to be publicly whipped. Similar severities were subsequently practised upon Burton, Prynne, and others, for what Laud termed "libels against the hierarchy of the Church." The high-placed and zealous chman did not consider these sentences ciently severe, for he says in his diary, in , "I have received the copy of the sentence ast Paterson, and am verily of your lord-'s mind, that a little more quickness in the rnement would cure this itch of libelling, something that is amiss besides." The of his intolerable reign speedily arrived, ever: on the breaking out of the Revolu-, his palace was assaulted by the mob, and, 640, he was impeached by the House of mons, and sent to the Tower, but not ight to trial till three years afterwards, n he ably defended his conduct. Though reason was proved, the House of Commons ed an act of attainder against him, which Lords were compelled to affirm, and he was aded on Tower Hill, January 10, 1645. In ce to archbishop Laud, it must be said that as a man of piety, and was possessed of iderable learning; while his benefactions he university of Oxford proved him an nt supporter of learning. B. 1703; D. 1787.

AUDER, William, law'-der, a native of Scotland, a literary impostor, who acquired notoriety ideavouring to hold up Milton as a plagiarist. 747 he began an attack upon Milton in the ntleman's Magazine," which he followed y a pamphlet, entitled "An Essay on Mil-'s Use and Imitation of the Moderns in his idise Lost." His alleged quotations from tius, Massenius, and others, passed as ine for a time, until they were exposed by Douglas, bishop of Salisbury, which forced e the fabricator an acknowledgment of his eries. Yet after this he returned to the ge in a tract, with this title, "The Grand orator detected, or Milton convicted of For-' against Charles I." D. in Barbadoes, 1771.

AUDER, Sir Thomas Dick, a modern Scotch rater, who contributed to "Blackwood's azine," "Simon Roy, gardener, of Dum- l," and other papers. In 1830 he wrote interesting account of the great floods he province of Moray and the adjoining icts. He was likewise author of "High- l Rambles, with Long Tales to Shorten the r," "Legendary Tales of the Highlands," a emorial of the Royal Progress in Scotland 842," and other works. He was a fellow of Royal Society. B. 1784; D. near Edinburgh, AUDERDALE, John, Duke of, law'-der-dail, was of the commissioners charged by the Cove- ters to treat with Charles I. He subsequently ight under the royal standard; and when rles I. was beheaded, entered England with rles II., but was taken prisoner at the battle Worcester, and thrown into prison, where he ained during nine years. returned to Parliament for Newport in Cornwall, and subsequently for Malmesbury. As a member of the lower house he joined the party of Fox, and took an active part in opposing Lord North's administration, supported Mr. Fox's India Bill, and was one of the managers of the impeachment of Warren Hastings. In 1789 he succeeded to the title, and was in the following year elected to the House of Lords as one of the 16 Scottish representative peers. In 1792, residing in France for the benefit of his health, he witnessed the attack on the Tuileries, and the imprisonment of the royal family. In 1806 he was created a peer of the United Kingdom, sworn a privy councillor, and received the great seal of Scotland. In August of the same year he was sent as minister plenipotentiary to France, with powers to negotiate a peace. The short-lived administration of "all the talents" being broken up in 1807, Lauderdale had to resign the great seal of Scotland to its former custodian, the duke of Gordon. He subsequently held no office, but was, to a late period of his life, punctual and active in his parliamentary duties. B. 1759; D. 1839.

LAUDON, or LAUDON, Gideon Ernest, low'-done, an eminent German general, was of a noble family which came originally from Scotland. In 1731 he entered the Russian service; but although he behaved with great gallantry, he only obtained a lieutenancy; on this he went into the Austrian service in 1743, and obtained a captain's commission. After the peace, in 1743, he was raised to the rank of major. At the beginning of the Seven Years' War, he was appointed lieutenant-colonel of Croats, and displayed brilliant military talents against the king of Prussia. In 1757 he was made major-general, and the year following invested with the military order of Maria Theresa. The same year was gained the great battle of Hochkirchen, the merit of which is generally attributed to Laudon, who also gained the battle of Kunnersdorf, for which the empress Elizabeth of Russia presented him with a magnificent sword. He afterwards defeated the Prussians at Landshut, and took the town of Glatz. At the conclusion of the war, in 1763, he was rewarded with a pension and a barony. In 1766 he was nominated a member of the aulic council of war, and, in 1778, elevated to the dignity of field-marshal. In the Turkish war he served with additional reputation, and, in 1789, added Belgrade to the imperial dominions. Being seized with fever at his head-quarters in Moravia, in consequence of an operation he underwent for an obstruction in the urethra, his impatience under the medical applications, the impetuous ardour of his character, and the knowledge, above all, of his importance in the war, contributed to irritate his mind, and promote the violence of the disorder. He resisted the application of cataplasms, before and after the incisions were made, with a fatal obstinacy, which raised the inflammation to such a height that his death ensued. B. at Totzen, in Livonia, 1716; D. 1790.

LAURENCE, Dr. Richard, law'-rens, archbishop of Cashel, the son of a tradesman at Bath, was educated at Corpus Christi College, Oxford. As a theological writer and general scholar he had few equals in his day. His industry was prodigious, and he was equally distinguished for his zeal in upholding the rights and authority of the church, as well as its purity and attention to its duties. His "Doctrine of the Church of England upon the Efficacy of Baptism," and his sermon "On Singularity and Excess in Theological Literature," are valuable to theological students. b. 1761; d. 1839.

LAURENS, Henry, lou'-rens, a distinguished American statesman, who was chosen president of the Council of Safety in 1774; and, being elected a member of Congress, was selected to fill the presidential chair in that body. This office he resigned in 1779, was appointed minister plenipotentiary to Holland, but was captured by the British on his way thither, and committed to the Tower of London, where he remained for upwards of fourteen months, many ineffectual attempts being made during that time to shake his fidelity to the new republic. Shortly after his release, he was appointed by the Congress one of the commissioners for negotiating peace with Great Britain, and, in that capacity, signed the preliminaries at Paris, which eventuated in the recognition of American independence in 1783. b. at Charleston, S. Carolina, 1724; d. 1792.

LAUNEX, Bernard René Jourdan de, lon'-e, the last governor of the Bastille in Paris, which was erected in 1833, and destroyed July 14, 1789. He was a son of the former governor, and his residence in that abode had given to his character a bluntness of manner, and inflexibility of temper, which led to his destruction. Fifteen days before the attack, three individuals came disguised to the prison, and asked the governor how he purposed to act in case the Bastille was assailed. "My conduct is regulated by my duty; I shall defend it," was his reply. In fact, he resolved rather to set fire to the magazine, and perish in the ruins, than yield up his charge. He adhered to his intention as long as possible, but was at length overpowered, and sacrificed to the popular fury.

LAURISTON, James Alexander Bernard Law, Count de, lor'-res-tawing, a descendant of the brother of the famous projector, John Law, entered the French army at an early age, and became the favourite and aide-de-camp of Napoleon I., who enabled him to rise rapidly in his profession. He was employed by Bonaparte in several important missions, one of which was to bring to England the preliminaries of the peace of Amiens, on which occasion Lauriston met with a most enthusiastic reception from the people of London. He was engaged in every campaign of importance in Germany, Spain, and Russia, and, at the battle of Wagram, decided the victory by bringing up 100 pieces of artillery at full trot, which opened upon the enemy at a critical and important moment. After the final conclusion of peace, Lauriston received the grand cordon of the Legion of Honour from Louis XVIII., and subsequently attained the rank of marshal in the army. b. 1768; d. 1828.

LAUZON, Antoine, Duke de, lo'-zu(r)-n, a celebrated favourite of Louis XIV. The French king had already appointed him governor of Berri and marshal-de-camp, and promised him the grade of grand master of artillery; but the duke having been indiscreet enough to boast of the king's favour, the latter revoked his promise. Upon this the irritated Lauzun so far forgot himself as to break his sword before the king, declaring he would no longer serve a faithless monarch. He was thereupon incarcerated in the Bastille, but was released after a few days' confinement, restored to favour, and even promised the hand of the duchess de Montpensier, grand-daughter of Henry IV. A court intrigue broke off the marriage, but, according to some, it was secretly contracted. To recompense him for this disappointment, Louis XIV., in 1671, gave him the command of the French army in Flanders. Lauzun, however, soon afterwards gave offence to Madame de Montespan, then all-powerful, and was suddenly disgraced and thrown into prison, where he stayed for some years. He went to London in 1683, and was entrusted by James II. with escorting the queen of England to France. He afterwards appeared at court, but never regained his former high position. b. in France, about 1632; d. 1723.

LA VALLETTE, G. Parisot de, co'-let, the forty-eighth grand-master of the Knights of Malta, to which dignity he was elected in 1557. Under his command, Malta withstood the attacks of a force sent against it by Solyman II., consisting of 40,000 men and 200 vessels, during four months. He subsequently built the town called after his name, and rendered the island of Malta impregnable. b. 1494; d. 1568.

LAVALETTE, Marie Chamaus, Count de, was at first destined for the clerical profession; but when the revolution broke out, he became an officer of the national guards. Though concurring in the revolutionary movement, he displayed moderation, voting, by petition, against establishing the camp under the walls of Paris, and was prosecuted for leading his detachment of the national guards to the defence of the Tuileries. He joined the army of the Alps as a volunteer, and obtained promotion on several fields of battle in Italy and on the Rhine. In 1796, after the battle of Arcola, Bonaparte appointed him his aide-de-camp, and he was frequently charged by him with delicate missions. In 1797 Napoleon sent him to Paris, to judge of the state of public feeling previous to the memorable crisis of September. After the revolution, he returned to Bonaparte, with whom he arrived at Paris towards the end of the same year, and through whose friendship he was united in marriage to Emilie de Beauharnais, Josephine's niece. Lavalette accompanied Bonaparte to Egypt, and there acquired a still higher title to public estimation. On his return to France, he was first appointed a commissary, and subsequently director-general of the post-office, and councillor of state. After Napoleon became emperor, in 1804, Lavalette was created a count. In 1814 he was removed from the post-office; but on the 20th of March, 1815, by order from Napoleon, who entered Paris in the evening, he resumed his former duties, and stopped the departure of the journals, despatches, and travelling post-horses without signed orders. At the same time, he sent a courier to Napoleon, to inform him of the actual condition of the capital. On the 2nd of June he was nominated a peer. At the second restoration, in July, 1815, he was deprived of his functions, arrested by the sub-prefect of police, Decazes, and condemned to death as an accomplice in Bonaparte's treason against the royal authority. An appeal having been rejected, and Madame Lavalette's application for pardon being refused, his execution was fixed for the 21st of December. On the evening of the 20th, his wife, her daughter, twelve years of age, and her governess, were admitted to the prison as usual. A short time after the daughter and governess reappeared, supporting Madame Lavalette, apparently in great affliction. On the turnkey entering the cell shortly afterwards, Lavalette had disappeared—his wife, Madame Lavalette, having taken his place. The alarm being given, the carriage which brought the visitors was overtaken, but only the daughter found in it. Orders were issued to close the barriers, and descriptions of the person of the fugitive were despatched in all directions. Meanwhile Lavalette was engaged in devising the means of quitting Paris, and passing the frontiers. These were supplied by Sir Robert Wilson and Messrs. Bruce and Hutchinson. Dressed as a British officer, Lavalette went to the quarters of his English friends, and, starting with Sir Robert Wilson in a cabriolet at seven o'clock in the morning, passed the barriers without being detected, reached Mons, and there obtained permission to settle at Munich. The sentence of death was revoked five years afterwards, when he was permitted to return to his family in France. The wife of Lavalette was arrested on his escape becoming known, and, along with the governess, Sir Robert Wilson, and Messrs. Bruce and Hutchinson, was tried by the cour royale. The three latter were condemned to a short imprisonment, while Madame Lavalette and her governess were acquitted; but the shock her constitution and nerves had sustained was too great to be overcome, and a permanent disorder of her intellect was the consequence. Lavalette was b. 1769; and d. 1830.

LA VALLIÈRE, Louise Françoise de, val'-le-air, a favourite of Louis XIV., was sprung from a distinguished family, and became the French king's mistress in 1661. She was granted vast possessions, and was created a duchess. Her feeble nature had something of the religious in its composition, and in a freak of remorse she twice took refuge in a convent, whence the king each time recalled her to court. At length, after being neglected by Louis for Madame de Montespan, she, in 1674, finally took refuge in a Carmelite convent, and there passed the remainder of her life in the exercise of an austere piety. She left behind some pious reflections on the forgiveness of God. b. in Louvain, 1644; d. 1710.

LAVATER, John Gaspard Christian, la-ra'-ter, the author of the celebrated works on physiognomy, was a Swiss divine, and became pastor of the church of St. Peter, at Zurich. He cultivated letters, and produced a variety of works, religious and poetical, besides his famous writings on physiognomy. About the age of 25, Lavater began to study the faces of those whom he met, and sought to discover a corresponding resemblance between their minds and features. During several years he collected portraits of the people with whom he had become acquainted, made sketches of others, and after much observation, endeavoured to raise the rank of a science, by producing his works, entitled "Essays on Physiognomy," and the "Art of Knowing Mankind by Physiognomy." His books have been translated and reproduced in many forms, and are popular throughout the world. At first he hailed the French revolution with enthusiasm; but after the death of Louis XVI., his mind underwent a complete change, and when the French invaded Switzerland, Lavater preached against them, in the pulpit and other public places. Massena stormed Zurich in 1799, and Lavater, while encouraging his townsmen to repel the aggressors, was wounded by a grenadier, or, as some assert, by an assassin whom he knew, but whose name he would never divulge. Lavater was a pious man, of brilliant talents, mingled with a considerable share of mysticism. He died of the effects of his wound, 1801. b. at Zurich, 1741.

LAVOISIER, Antoine Laurent, la-vvoi'-se-ai, a celebrated French chemical philosopher, was the son of a wealthy man, and was educated with the greatest care at the Collège Mazarin, and became equally versed in mathematics, botany, astronomy, and chemistry. But the great discoveries recently made by Dr. Black and others in chemistry, induced him to devote himself to that branch of philosophical learning. In 1764, when only 21 years of age, he obtained the prize from the Academy for the best treatise on lighting the streets of Paris, so as to combine the several properties of economy, distinctness of vision, and facility of observation. Two years afterwards, he was chosen member of the Academy, to whose "Proceedings" he contributed a number of valuable scientific papers. In 1769 he became one of the farmers-general of the revenue, and was subsequently appointed superintendent of the saltpetre-works of France. He was the inventor, or rather compiler, of a new theory of chemistry, which was received with applause in Germany and France, though strenuously opposed by Dr. Priestley, whose "phlogistic" hypothesis it tended to overthrow. In 1789, he published his "Elements of Chemistry," a work of great value and importance. Besides this work, he wrote "Chemical and Philosophical Miscellanies," and a "Report of the Commissioners charged with the Examination of the Principles of Animal Magnetism." During the Reign of Terror he was, quite unjustly, accused of having mixed certain noxious ingredients with tobacco; and, notwithstanding his talents and virtues, was dragged before the revolutionary tribunal, who condemned him to death. He asked for time to complete some experiments with which he was engaged, but was informed that the republic did not want chemists. Brande, the celebrated English chemist, thus characterizes the French philosopher:—"He has in some measure suffered by the misguided zeal of some of his admiring commentators, who, not satisfied with allowing him due merit for the logical precision and sagacity of induction which he brought into chemistry, have represented him as having the experimental activity of Priestley and the laborious diligence of Scheele. But Lavoisier, though a great architect in the science, laboured but little in the quarry: his materials were chiefly shaped to his hand, and his skill was displayed in their arrangement and combination." b. at Paris, 1743; guillotined, 1794.

LAW, John, law, a famous projector of financial schemes, was the son of a goldsmith at Edinburgh, and having acquired a considerable knowledge of practical mathematics, and particularly excelling as an accountant, he was appointed to arrange the revenue accounts of Scotland, an employment which turned his mind towards finance. He was at first, however, only remarkable for his loose course of life, and for his talents as a gambler. Forced to quit England for having killed a person in a duel, he wandered over the continent of Europe, deriving his subsistence mainly from the gaming-table. In 1716 he went to Paris, and succeeded in gaining the confidence of the Regent Orleans, who authorized him to establish a bank, and appointed him manager of it. To this was soon afterwards added the Mississippi Company, a scheme which had for its objects the paying off the national debt, and the enriching of its subscribers. Ultimately, the Company was granted the entire monopoly of the trade of France, from the Cape of Good Hope eastward to all the other parts of Africa, to Persia, India, China, Japan, and the isles, even to the Straits of Magellan and Le Main. Finally, Law's establishment was created the Royal Bank in 1718, and, in 1720, he was nominated comptroller-general of finance. The project became extravagantly popular, and every one appeared anxious to convert his gold and silver into paper; but the bubble at length burst, and many thousands of families, once wealthy, were reduced to poverty. Law became the object of general execration, and was obliged to quit France. He wandered about Germany during several years, and died in indigence at Venice, in 1729. b. at Edinburgh, about 1681.

LAW, Edward, first Lord Ellenborough, a celebrated English judge, who, after completing his education at St. Peter's College, Cambridge, became a student of law at the Inner Temple. On being called to the bar, he rapidly rose to the first posts of his profession. Between the years 1788-95 he was engaged as the leading counsel in defence of Warren Hastings: in 1801 he became attorney-general, entered the House of Commons, and received the honour of knighthood. The following year he was created Lord Ellenborough, and was appointed lord chief justice of the Court of King's Bench. In 1813 he was one of the commissioners to investigate the conduct of the Princess of Wales: in 1814 he was one of the judges at the trial of Lord Cochrane (see DUNDONALD, Earl of), and, four years afterwards, acted in the same capacity at the trial of William Hone. (See HONE.) He retired from the bench in the same year. Lord Brougham thus describes him:—"The Term Reports bear ample testimony to the vigour of this eminent individual's capacity during the eighteen years that he filled the first place among the English common-law judges. . . . He was somewhat irascible, and even violent; but no one could accuse him of the least partiality. His honest and manly nature ever disdained as much to trample overbearingly on the humble, as to crouch meanly before the powerful. . . . He dispatched business with great celerity, and, for the most part, with success. But causes were not sifted before him with that closeness of scrutiny, and parties were not suffered to bring forward all they had to state with that fullness and freedom, which can alone prevent misdecision, and insure the due administration of justice." b. at Great Salkeld, Cumberland, 1750; d. in London, 1818.

LAWES, Henry, lawes, an English musician, who became a gentleman of the chapel royal, and one of the band of Charles I. In 1653 he published his "Ayres, Dialogues, &c." He set to music the "Comus" of Milton, with whom he was intimate. He also wrote music for the songs of Waller and other poets of his time, and composed the coronation anthem for Charles II. b. at Salisbury, 1600; d. 1662.—

His brother William was an excellent musician; he was commissary in the royal army, and was killed at the siege of Chester, 1645.

LAWRENCE, Stringer, law'-rence, an eminent general in the service of the East India Company, who, out of gratitude for his services, erected a monument to his memory in Westminster Abbey. b. 1697; d. 1775.

LAWRENCE, Thomas, a distinguished physician, was chosen anatomical reader at the university of Oxford, in 1740; elected fellow of the College of Physicians in 1744; became president in 1767, and was re-elected during the succeeding seven years. He was the author of "De Hydrope," and other medical productions, in Latin. b. 1711; d. 1783.

LAWRENCE, Dr. French, a native of Bristol, was educated at Winchester, and at Corpus Christi College, Oxford, and became eminent as a civilian and a man of letters. Among his writings are, "Remarks on the Apocalypse," and several beautiful poems. He edited and partly composed "The Rolliad" and "Probationary Odes;" and published an edition of the works of Edmund Burke, of whom he was the bosom friend and executor. b. 1809.

LAWRENCE, Sir Thomas, a celebrated English painter, was the son of an innkeeper, first established at Bristol, and afterwards at Devizes. The latter place, being on the road to Bath, was much frequented by the rich and fashionable. Young Thomas Lawrence, while yet in petticoats, drew likenesses with astonishing skill, and, as he was moreover possessed of great personal beauty, he soon attracted the notice of his father's customers. At the age of 13 he obtained a prize from the Society of Arts for a crayon copy of the Transfiguration. In 1787 his father went to London, and obtained an introduction for his son to Sir Joshua Reynolds, who liberally encouraged the young artist. In the same year he exhibited seven female portraits at Somerset House, and from that time his fame rapidly became established. After becoming associate of the Royal Academy, he was nominated principal painter in ordinary to George III., in 1792. George IV., when Prince-regent, commissioned him to paint the portraits of those sovereigns, warriors, and statesmen who had restored peace to Europe; and in 1814 he began his work with the portraits of the king of Prussia and Blücher. The whole collection is now exhibited in the Waterloo Hall of Windsor Castle. Of these portraits Dr. Waagen says: "All cannot be equal in merit. I was particularly pleased with those of the pope, Cardinal Gonsalvi, and the emperor of Austria. Besides the graceful and unaffected design, the clear and brilliant colouring, which are peculiar to Lawrence, these are distinguished by greater truth of character, and a more animated expression, than is generally met with in his pictures." In 1815 he was knighted, and from that time to his death he was the most popular portrait-painter in England. On the death of Benjamin West, he was chosen president of the Royal Academy. Three of his best works are in the National Gallery.—John Kemble, Mrs. Siddons, and Benjamin West. b. at Bristol, 1769; d. in London, 1830.

LAWRENCE, Sir Henry Montgomery, a distinguished British officer, was the eldest son of Lieutenant-Colonel Alexander William Lawrence, some time governor of Upnor Castle, who distinguished himself by his gallantry at Seringapatam. Having received his early education at the diocesan school of Londonderry, and afterwards at the Royal Military College at Addiscombe, he entered the military service of the Hon. East India Company, in 1821, as a cadet in the Bengal artillery. He soon acquired the reputation of being one of the most intelligent officers in the service: and, having seen some active service in the Cabul campaign in 1843, was raised to the rank of major. In the same year he became British resident at Nepaul. He afterwards played a distinguished part in the campaigns on the Sutlej, soon after which he was made a military companion of the Bath, and at the same time promoted to the rank of lieutenant-colonel. In 1846 he was appointed resident at Lahore. It was for his able services in the administration of this important office that he was made a K.C.B. (civil) in 1848. In the following year he was appointed by Lord Dalhousie president of the board for the reduction and government of the recently-annexed province of the Punjab, where his administrative talents were admirably proved. On the outbreak of the Indian mutiny, he was governor of Oude, and showed himself one of the firmest and most able officers in the Company's service. He fortified and defended Lucknow with great skill and bravery: but his valuable life was lost to his country when most required, he having been killed while commanding a sortie from the garrison. B. at Mattura, Ceylon, 1866; killed near Lucknow, 1857.

LAWRENCE, John Laird Mair, Baron, G.C.B., K.S.I., brother of the above, who has been described as the man who saved India during the mutiny, received his education in Londonderry and at the East India College, Haileybury. He went to India as a civil servant in 1829, and in 1831 became assistant to the Resident at Delhi. He subsequently filled a variety of offices, principally in connexion with the collection of the revenue, and in 1846 was appointed commissioner of the trans-Sutlej provinces, which had recently been annexed to the British empire in India. He here showed great powers of organization and administration. On the annexation of the Punjab after the final defeat of the Sikhs at Ferozepore and Gojjerat, Mr. Lawrence was appointed, along with his brother Sir Henry, one of the board of three named to conduct the affairs of that territory. Here he aided in organizing a comprehensive system of law and justice, and social and financial improvement; and so successful were these measures, and so thoroughly appreciated was British rule in the Punjab, that when the mutiny of 1857 broke out, the Sikhs adhered faithfully to the new government, and, by the supplies of men, materials, and provisions which Sir John Lawrence was enabled to send to the revolted districts, contributed largely to the restoration of order and the final suppression of the revolt. In 1856, Sir John was made a K.C.B., and in 1857 was advanced to the dignity of a G.C.B., in acknowledgment of his services in the critical period of the mutiny. He was made a baronet, 1859; succeeded Lord Elgin as viceroy of India in 1863; and on his return to England in 1869 was raised to the peerage as Baron Lawrence of the Punjab and Grately. B. 1810.

LAWSON, Sir John, law'-son, a brave English officer, who rose from the lowest station in the navy to the rank of admiral. He served the Parliament with great fidelity, but co-operated with Monk in effecting the Restoration for which he received the thanks of both Houses of Parliament. He served under the duke of York, as rear-admiral, and was killed in the engagement with the Dutch fleet in 1665.

LAYARD, Austen Henry, lai'-yard, a modern English politician and traveller, the greater portion of whose youth was spent at Florence, where he devoted himself to literature and the fine arts. He went to London, with the intention of becoming a student of the law, but, abandoning that idea, set out for the East, where he acquired the Turkish and Arabian languages, and adopted the dress and manners of the people with whom he sojourned. He subsequently went to Persia, with the intention of exploring the remains of Susa, and discovered the tomb of Daniel. About the year 1844 he began examining the ruins of Nimroud, and, under great difficulties, succeeded in excavating many sculptures, which have proved of the highest value in elucidating the history of Assyria and Babylonia. The immense remnants of antiquity now in the British Museum, were floated down the river Tigris upon rafts sustained by inflated skins, and were shipped for England at Bagdad. An account of his labours was afterwards narrated by him in his works, entitled "Nineveh and its Remains," "Monuments of Nineveh," and "Discoveries in the Ruins of Nineveh and Babylon." In 1848 he became attaché to the British embassy at Constantinople, and, in the following year, again examined the mounds at Nineveh. When it is remembered that, as Mr. Layard says, "Nineveh had been almost forgotten before history began," and that, until his discoveries, all that remained of that city, as well as of Babylon, might have been carried in "a little hand-box," we may conceive how great have been his services to the cause of historical investigation. In 1851 he acted for a short period as under-secretary of state for foreign affairs, and, in the year following, was returned to the House of Commons as member for Aylesbury. He became D.C.L. of the university of Oxford in 1843, and, in 1856, was elected lord rector of the university of Aberdeen. His visit to the Crimea, while the allied French and English armies were before Sebastopol, caused him to become one of the principal advocates for the commission of inquiry into the condition of the British army, that subsequently sat. He visited India in 1857-8, during the time of the mutiny. Since 1860 he has represented Southwark. From 1861 to 1866 he was under-secretary of state for foreign affairs under Lord Palmerston and Earl Russell, and, in 1868, took office as commissioner of works and public buildings under Mr. Gladstone. B. 1817.

LEAKE, Richard, leke, master-gunner of England, who distinguished himself in several naval actions, and particularly in the engagement with Van Tromp, in 1673. He was then on board the Royal Prince, which had lost all her masts; most of her guns were dismounted, and 400 of her men killed or wounded; notwithstanding which, Leake defended the ship against a superior force, and brought her to Chatham. He was afterwards made master-gunner of England, and storekeeper of the ordnance at Woolwich. B. at Harwich, 1629; D. 1686.

LEAKE, Sir John, an English admiral, son of the preceding, with whom he served in the action with Van Tromp. In 1703 he expelled the French from Newfoundland, and on his return was made rear-admiral of the blue. The year following he assisted admiral Rooke in taking Gibraltar, for which he was knighted. In 1705 he saved that important fortress from the combined attacks of France and Spain. The same year he was engaged in the reduction of Barcelona, and in 1706 so seasonably relieved that place, that Philip V. was obliged to raise the siege. On the death of Sir Cloudesley Shovel, he was appointed admiral of the white, and commander-in-chief of the fleet. He became a lord of the admiralty in 1709, but retired on a pension, on the accession of George I. b. at Rotherhithe, 1656; d. 1720.

LEBRUN, Charles, le-bru (v), a celebrated French painter, who went to Rome, where he studied under Poussin. On his return to France, he was presented by Cardinal Mazarin to Louis XIV., who appointed him court painter, and director of the Academy of Artists and of the Gobelins manufactory. His chief works were "The Battles of Alexander," he was likewise the author of several valuable works, the principal of which were "The Physiognomy of Men and Animals," and "On the Character of the Passions." b. at Paris, 1619; d. 1690.

LEBRUN, Charles François, Duke of Placentia, was born at Contances, in Normandy; at an early age went to Paris; and being nominated deputy to the States-general in 1789, occupied himself with affairs of police, finance, and domestic administration. In 1793 he was elected to the council of ancients, and became president in 1796. He was appointed third consul in December, 1799; nominated arch-treasurer of the empire in 1804; and, in 1805, was appointed governor-general of Liguria and created duke of Placentia. Having signed the constitution that recalled the house of Bourbon to the throne, he was created a peer of France by the king, and, in the beginning of July, was appointed president of the first bureau of the Chamber of Peers. After the return of Napoleon, he accepted a peerage from him, and likewise the place of grand-master of the university, a proceeding which rendered him incapable of sitting in the new Chamber of Peers, formed in August, 1815. In the early part of his life he translated the "Iliad" and "Odyssey," and Tasso's "Jerusalem." b. 1739; d. 1824.

LE CLERC, Sébastien, le(r)klayr, an eminent French artist. Pope Clement XI. knighted him, and Louis XIV. appointed him his engraver in ordinary. He engraved above three thousand pieces, and was the author of treatises on Geometry, Architecture, and Perspective. b. 1637; d. 1714.

LE CLERC, Jean, an eminent writer and critic, brother of the last-mentioned, was ordained a minister; but, having embraced the Arminian doctrines, he left his native country, and in 1682 went to London, where he officiated for some time in two French congregations. The climate of England not agreeing with his constitution, he went to Amsterdam, and became professor of philosophy, Hebrew, and belles lettres in the Remonstrant College. In 1686 he commenced a literary journal, entitled "Bibliothèque Universelle et Historique," which gained great celebrity, and was continued till 1693. From 1703 to 1713 he continued another, entitled "Bibliothèque Choisie," which was followed by his "Bibliothèque Ancienne et Moderne," from 1714 to 1729. He also published systems of Logic, Ontology, and Pneumatology. Besides these he published several miscellaneous pieces, editions of ancient and modern authors, a translation of the Bible into French, &c. He was, with all his learning and industry, a man of excessive vanity. b. at Geneva, 1657; d. at Amsterdam, 1736.

LECLERC, Charles Emmanuel, a distinguished French general, who obtained the hand of Pauline, sister of Bonaparte, whom he greatly assisted after his return from Egypt. In 1802 he was appointed commander-in-chief of the expedition to St. Domingo, where he fought against the negro general, Toussaint L'Ouverture, but fell a victim to the climate, in the same year. b. 1772.

LECOQ, Felix, le-komp', a famous French sculptor, who, having obtained a prize for a bas-relief of the Massacre of the Innocents while he was a pupil of Vassé, was sent to Rome as a pensionary of the French School of Arts. His statue of Phorbas preserving Oedipus procured him admission into the Academy; but the statue of Fénelon, in the hall of the National Institute, is considered his chef-d'œuvre. During the revolution he lived in retirement; but, at the restoration of the Bourbons, was nominated professor in the Academy of Sculpture. b. 1737; d. 1817.

LEDOU-ROLLIN, Philippe, led-roo rol-lä, a French politician and political writer, was educated for the profession of the law, and commenced practising as an advocate in 1832. From that year until 1845, he was extensively employed in defending political prisoners, and, both in his speeches and writings, proved himself one of the most vehement members of the ultra-liberal party in France. When the revolution of 1848 burst forth, his influence in the Chamber of Deputies became only second to that of Lamartine; and, on the establishment of the provisional government, he was nominated minister of the Interior, in which position he zealously endeavoured to republicinize his native country. On becoming a candidate for the presidency, his name was third on the list; Louis Napoleon and Cavaignac being first and second, and Lamartine last. Subsequently, he became a most violent opponent of Louis Napoleon's government, and, after stirring up the people of Paris into an insurrection, in June, 1849, he fled to England, where he afterwards resided. In 1850 he published a work called "The Decline of England," wherein he severely condemned the country whose hospitable laws shielded him from the resentment of the authorities then paramount in his native country, and from which he had fled. b. 1807.

LEDYARD, John, led-yard, an American, rendered remarkable by his adventures. His father dying while he was young, he was left poor and friendless. After spending some years among the Indians, he took passage from New York to London as a common sailor. In 1776 he went with Captain Cook on his third voyage, as corporal of marines; was with that great navigator when he was killed, and, some years afterwards, wrote an account of the voyage. Conceiving the daring idea of traversing the unexplored regions of America, from Nootka Sound to the eastern coast, he left England in 1786, to prosecute his journey, with only ten guineas in his pocket. He travelled through Denmark and Sweden, and after unsuccessfully attempting to cross the Gulf of Bothnia on the ice, passed round it, and arrived at St. Petersburg in 1787.

Lee

Lefebvre

He entered that city without money and almost without clothing, but contrived to obtain small sum, and permission to travel with convoy to Yakutsk, in Siberia. He had reached the latter place, in 1788, when he was suddenly arrested by order of the empress Catharine, escorted to the frontiers of Poland, and informed that he would be hanged were he again found in Russia. He arrived in England after undergoing the severest hardship, and very soon afterwards set out, under the auspices of the Society for Promoting African Discovery, to explore the regions of Africa. It is narrated that on being asked when he would be able to start, his reply was, "To-morrow morning." He left London in June, 1788, and two months afterwards reached Cairo, where, being attacked by a bilious disorder, he died at the beginning of the following year. n. at Groton, Connecticut, 1781; p. 1789.

Lux, Nathaniel, le, an English dramatic writer, was the son of a clergyman, and educated at Westminster school, whence he removed to Trinity College, Cambridge, where he took his bachelor's degree. Being disappointed of a fellowship, he went to London, and made an attempt as an actor, but without success, on which he turned tragic poet. His first piece was "Nero, Emperor of Rome," which came out in 1675, and had a favourable reception. He continued to write a play every year till 1681, when he began to show symptoms of insanity. These increasing, he was confined in Bedlam, whence he was discharged in 1683. He wrote two plays after this, but never entirely recovered his senses, and died in 1691, in consequence of a drunken frolic. Lee had some power in depicting the passions, but his language is rant and bombast. Of all his plays, "Alexander the Great" is the only one remembered. n. at Hatfield, Hertfordshire, about 1693.

LEE, Charles, a military officer, distinguished during the American War, was a native of North Wales. Entering the army at a very early age, he served under Burgoyne in America, and afterwards in Portugal. In the contest between the colonies and England, he wrote on the side of the former, and entered their service. In 1775 he received a commission from Congress, and, as a major-general, accompanied Washington to the camp before Boston. He was afterwards invested with the chief command in the southern department, where his conduct in the attack of the British upon Sullivan Island raised his military reputation. While marching through New Jersey to join Washington, Lee was made prisoner by the English, as he lay carelessly guarded, at a considerable distance from the main body, and carried to New York. Sir William Howe, affecting to regard him as a deserter from the British army, treated him in a manner unworthy of a generous enemy, until the surrender of Burgoyne; after which event he was exchanged. Lee was brave in action, and possessed military talents of a high order; but he was jealous of the power of Washington, and at the battle of Monmouth, in 1778, disobeyed that general's orders. For this he was tried by court-martial, and suspended for a year, on which he resigned his commission. n. 1731; p. 1782.

LEE, Henry, also an American general, was born in the state of Virginia, and commenced his military career as captain of one of the six companies of cavalry raised by his native state, after she had thrown off the authority of the mother country. Having exhibited both skill and energy on several occasions, Lee was raised to the rank of major, and intrusted with the command of a separate corps. In the retreat of Greene, before Cornwallis, into Virginia, Lee's legion formed the rear-guard of the American army, and repelled every attempt of the enemy to impede its march. From that time to the termination of the war, General Lee was constantly engaged, and performed many valuable services to the republic. When the independence of the United States was ratified, he was elected a member of the house of delegates, was made governor of Virginia in 1792, chosen a member of Congress in 1799, and retained his seat till the accession of Mr. Jefferson to the president's chair, when he retired into private life. n. 1756; p. 1818.

LEE, Robert Edmund, son of the preceding, was born in Virginia, and after graduating at West Point, entered the United States army in 1829. He served with distinction until 1861, when he resigned his commission in consequence of the secession of Virginia from the Union, and became commander-in-chief of the troops supplied by his state to the Confederate States army. His protracted defence of Richmond from 1862 to 1864, when he was compelled to evacuate that city and surrender to Grant, has placed him among the first generals of the 19th century. In 1865 he became president of Washington College, Virginia. n. 1808.

LEECH, John, leech, a modern English draughtsman, who gained great popularity by the effectiveness of his sketches, which appeared in "Punch" and other periodicals. He was educated at the Charterhouse school, and studied drawing at the Royal Academy. n. in London, 1817; p. 1864.

LEECHMAN, William, leech-man, a learned Scotch divine, particularly celebrated as a lecturer on theology, was educated at the university of Edinburgh. Elected professor of theology at Glasgow, he signalized himself by ably combating the reasonings of Voltaire, Bolingbroke, and Hume; and in 1761 was raised to the office of principal of the university. n. in Larkshire, 1706; p. 1785.

LEEVES, the Rev. William, leaves, rector of Wington, in Somersetshire, was the composer of the beautiful plaintive air of "Auld Robin Gray," which he wrote in 1770, but was not known to be the author until 1813. He also composed much sacred music, distinguished by considerable taste and feeling. n. 1749; p. '828.

LEFEBVRE, François Joseph, le(f)-fai'v', duke of Dantzie and marshal of France, was the son of a miller, and, on the outburst of the French revolution, had reached the grade of sergeant-major in the French guards. During the subsequent events, his rise was extremely rapid; in 1794 he became general of division. After distinguishing himself at Fleurus, at the passage of the Rhine, at the battles of Altenkirchen and of Stockach, he was made marshal in 1804. He fought at Jena, and took Dantzie, hitherto considered impregnable, in 1807. He performed signal services in Spain, in the Peninsular War, and in Austria, in 1813-14. Marshal Lefebvre was a staunch adherent to the fortunes of Napoleon, and while in command of the 17th military division, whose head-quarters were at Paris, greatly assisted him on the 18th LEFORT, Francis, le(r)-for', a general and admiral in the service of Russia, served at first in the French Swiss Guards, but afterwards went to Russia, where the czar, Theodore Alexievitch, gave him a captain's commission. On the death of that prince, he greatly assisted in obtaining the proclamation of Peter I., whose intimate friend and counsellor he became. The czar nominated him general of his troops, admiral of his navy, and viceroy of Novgorod. Lefort urged his master to carry out many important reforms, accompanied him in all his journeys, assisted him to civilize the Russians and to create a marine and an army. He likewise defeated the Turks, and organized a system of finance. On learning his death, Peter is reported to have said, "Alas! I have lost my best friend." n. at Geneva, 1656; p. at Moscow, 1669.

LEGENDRE, Louis, le(r)'-zhandr, a French historian, who was canon of Notre Dame, and abbot of Claire Fontaine, in the diocese of Chartres. His principal work (for he was the author of several) is a "History of France," 3 vols. folio; reprinted in 8 vols. 12mo. n. at Rouen, 1659; p. 1733.

LEGENDRE, Louis, one of the leading French revolutionists, after having made himself notorious by heading street processions, was employed by Marat, Danton, and other leaders of the popular party, to forward their schemes; and became one of the chiefs of the Jacobin club. In 1792, he was chosen a deputy from Paris to the National Convention, and voted for the death of the king. For a long time he figured as one of the most violent terrorists under Robespierre; but he afterwards joined Tallien and his party, in the destruction of his former leader; and signaled himself by dispersing the members of the Jacobin club, locking up their hall, and delivering the keys to the Convention. From this time he pretended to be the friend of moderation, declaimed against the sanguinary measures in which he had before participated; and when the Jacobins revolted against the Convention, put himself at the head of the troops who defended the legislative body, and contributed much to the defeat of his old associates. He ultimately became a member of the council of ancients, and died in 1797.

LEGENDRE, Adrien-Marie, a celebrated French mathematician, who, in 1787, was engaged with Cassini and Méchain in connecting the observatories of Greenwich and Paris by a chain of triangles. His whole life was devoted to teaching and enlarging the boundaries of mathematical science. His "Elements of Geometry" is a standard work, and has been translated into English by Sir David Brewster. His principal works, in addition to the preceding, were an "Essay on the Theory of Numbers," and "New Method for determining the Orbit of Comets." He was likewise an industrious contributor to the Memoirs of the Paris Academy of Sciences. n. at Paris, 1751; p. 1833.

LEGGE, George, Baron Dartmouth, leg, an eminent naval commander, was brought up under Admiral Spragge, and at the age of twenty obtained the command of a ship. In 1673 he was appointed governor of Portsmouth, master of the horse, and gentleman to the duke of York. In 1682 he was elevated to the peerage, and the year following sent to raze the fortifications of Tangier. James II. appointed him master of the horse, general of the ordnance, and constable of the Tower. He had also the command of the fleet when the Prince of Orange landed, but was prevented from acting by contrary winds. At the Revolution he was committed to the Tower, where he died in 1691. n. 1647.

LEIBNITZ, Gottfried Wilhelm, Baron von, lêl-nitz, a celebrated German philosopher, whose father was professor of jurisprudence in the university of Leipsic, but died when his son was six years old. At the age of fifteen, Gottfried began his studies at Leipsic, whence he removed to Jena. In 1664 he graduated at the former university, and about the same time applied himself to the study of the Greek philosophers; but, having chosen the law for his profession, took his doctor's degree at Altdorf, after which he obtained a post at the court of the elector of Mayence. In 1672 he was at Paris, where he formed an acquaintance with several mathematicians. He next visited London, where he was introduced to Newton, Boyle, and other eminent men. He subsequently engaged in a bitter dispute with Sir Isaac Newton, relative to the discovery of the method of fluxions, to the merit of which invention Leibnitz laid claim. The Royal Society of London, however, decided in favour of the English philosopher. The elector of Hanover, George I., employed Leibnitz in writing the "History of the House of Brunswick." In 1700 he was admitted a member of the Academy of Sciences at Paris, and on the erection of that of Berlin, was appointed perpetual president. In 1711 he was made aulic councillor to the emperor, and Peter the Great of Russia appointed him privy councillor of justice, with a pension. He was a profound mathematician and metaphysician, and a man of lively genius, but vain and avaricious. His works are, "Scriptores Rerum Brunsvicensium," "Codex Juris Gentium Diplomaticus," "Miscellaneous Questions of Philosophy and Mathematics," the "Essai de Theodicée," to shew that the world, as it is, is the best world possible, "Metaphysical Tracts," and "Poems," Latin and French. A complete edition of his works, in 6 vols., was published at Geneva in 1767. n. at Leipsic, 1646; p. at Hanover, 1716.

LEICESTER, Robert Dudley, Earl of, lêl-ter, was the son of John Dudley, duke of Northumberland, who was executed in 1553 for asserting the claims of his daughter-in-law, Lady Jane Grey, to the crown. Robert Dudley had been nominated master of the ordnance in the reign of Queen Mary, but on the accession of Elizabeth he rose rapidly into favour, and had numerous honours and places heaped upon him, and her majesty proposed him to Mary Queen of Scots for a husband. Dudley appears to have indulged the ambitious idea of sharing his sovereign's throne; and, to effect it, he is suspected to have murdered his own wife, the beautiful Amy, daughter of Sir John Robsart, whom he married at an early age. In 1560 this lady was found dead at Cumnor, but no positive proof of her being murdered has ever been adduced. The great novelist, Sir Walter Scott, in his "Kenilworth," has somewhat distorted the historical facts of the case; but his work has taken such a hold on common opinion, that she is generally believed to have been murdered at her husband's instigation. For many years Elizabeth's favourite remained single, but, in 1572, he is said to have privately married Lady Sheffield, although he never acknowledged her as his wife; however, he had by her a son called Robert, whom he called in his will his "base son." He afterwards married the countess dowager of Essex, and finding Lady Sheffield intractable to his proposals for a separation, is said to have taken her off by poison. In 1581 a book was printed, entitled "Leicester's Commonwealth," which was a severe attack upon his public and private character. The year following he was appointed governor of the Protestant Low Countries, at the request of the inhabitants; but his proceedings there did not satisfy the queen, and he returned to England the same year. In 1583 he was made lieutenant-general of the army assembled at Tilbury, and died the same year. b. about 1532.

LEICESTER OF HOLKHAM, Thomas William Coke, Earl of, hol'-kam, an eminent agriculturist and improver of land, who found his estates in Norfolk nearly a barren waste, and converted them, by judicious management, the granting of favourable leases to his tenants, and the example he himself set, into fertile and productive land. So eminently successful was he in the development of the resources of the soil, that his rent-roll, from being £2000 a year when he succeeded to the estate, rose to upwards of £20,000 before his death, and thus while the condition of almost every person living on the property had improved in a nearly equal ratio. It is stated that, shortly before his death, he and his family stood upon the decks of a ship built of oak, the acorns from which the timber composing it grew having been planted by himself. He succeeded his father as M.P. for Norfolk in 1776, and acted with the Whigs during the long period in which he held a seat in the Lower House—namely, till 1833, when he was raised to the peerage as earl Leicester of Holkham, although there was already a like title in the Ferrers family. He was twice married: first, in 1775, to Jane, daughter of James Lennox Dutton, Esq., who died in 1800, and by whom he had three daughters; and, second, to Anne Amelia Keppel, a daughter of the earl of Albemarle, the marriage taking place when the earl was seventy years of age, and the bride not quite nineteen. By her, however, he had five sons and a daughter. b. 1752; d. 1842.

LEIGH, lai, Charles, a physician and naturalist, who published the "Natural History of Lancashire, Cheshire, and Derby," a "History of Virginia," and "Exercitationes de Aquis Mineralibus." b. near the opening of the 18th century.

LEIGH, Sir Edward, a learned biblical critic and historian, was educated at Oxford, studied in the Middle Temple, and afterwards devoted several years to professional and literary researches. He was M.P. for Stafford, and colonel in the Parliamentary army; was expelled from the House in 1648, along with other Presbyterian members; and occupied himself, after the Restoration, in literary pursuits. His most important work is entitled "Critica Sacra." b. in Leicestershire, 1602; d. 1671.

LEIGHTON, Alexander, lai'-ton, a Scotch physician, who became noted for his sufferings on account of tracts which he published against Charles I. and the Church of England. For these his nose was slit, his ears cut off, and a public whipping was inflicted on him. In 1610; the Parliament appointed him keeper of Lambeth Palace, then converted into a state prison. He died insane in 1614. b. at Edinburgh, 1587.

LEIGHTON, Robert, archbishop of Glasgow, son of the preceding, was an exemplary parish priest, and the magistrates of Edinburgh chose him president of their college. Soon after the Restoration, Charles II. nominated him bishop of Down, which diocese he governed with great moderation. On account of the violent animosities between the Episcopalian and Presbyterian parties, he resigned his see, but the king constrained him to accept the archbishopric of Glasgow, in which station he made another effort at moderation, but in vain; on which he resigned his dignity. He then led a retired life in Sussex. His principal work is a "Commentary on St. Peter's Epistles." b. at Edinburgh, 1613; d. in London, 1681.

LEKEUX, John, le-ke', a celebrated architectural engraver, whose works on Gothic architecture were greatly instrumental in reviving the study of that style of art in England. His most important works were the engravings in Britton's "Architectural Antiquities of England," Pugin's "Architectural Antiquities of Normandy," Neale's "Westminster Abbey," and the "Memorials of Oxford and Cambridge." b. in London, 1781; d. 1846.

LELAND, John, le'-land, an eminent English antiquary, was educated at Christ's College, Cambridge, and All Souls College, Oxford. On entering into orders, he became chaplain to Henry VIII., who gave him the title of king's antiquary. By virtue of the royal commission, he searched various cathedrals and religious houses for curious records and other remains of antiquity; in which employment he spent six years, travelling over every part of the kingdom. In 1545 he presented his collections to the king, under the title of "A Newe Yeare's Gifte." This, however, was only the beginning of what he proposed to execute; but while he was intent on his studies, he became insane, in which state he continued till his death. His "Itinerary" and "Collectanea" were published by Hearne, in 1710. b. in London, at the beginning of the 16th century; d. 1552.

LELAND, John, a learned English divine, whose labours in defence of Christianity procured him the degree of D.D. from two universities in Scotland. His principal works were a "Defence of the Christian Religion" against Tindal, a "View of the Deistical Writers that have appeared in England," "The Advantage and Necessity of the Christian Revelation," and "Family Devotions." b. in England, 1691; d. 1768.

LELY, Dr. Thomas, a learned divine, who wrote a "History of Ireland," "The Life of Philip of Macedon," and "The Principles of Human Eloquence," which last was attacked by Warburton. He also translated the Orations of Demosthenes. b. at Dublin, 1722; d. 1785.

LELY, Sir Peter, le'-le, a famous painter, studied under Grobbler at Haarlem, after which he went to England, where he at first painted landscapes and historical subjects; but, finding more encouragement given to portrait-painting, turned his attention to that branch of his art, and became unrivalled in the graceful rendering of heads; the hands of his portraits were remarkably fine and elegantly turned. He was in great favour with Charles I. and Charles II., by the latter of whom he was knighted, and for whom he painted the voluptuous beauties of his court. This collection is now at Hampton Court. b. at Soest, Westphalia, 1617; b. in England, 1630.

LEMAIRE, James, lau'-mair, a Dutch navigator of the 17th century, was the son of a merchant of Egmont, in North Holland. He embarked on an expedition with Cornelius Schouten, and in 1616 discovered the strait which now bears his name. He also visited some hitherto unexplored islands in the South Seas, and died soon after his return, Dec. 31, 1616.

LEMERY, Nicolas, lew'-e-re, a celebrated French chemist, who, in 1683, visited England, being of the reformed religion, then violently persecuted in his own country. He was well received by Charles II., and great offers were made to induce him to continue there; but in 1686 he returned to France and turned Roman Catholic. In 1699 he was made associate chemist to the Royal Academy, and the same year became a pensionary. He wrote a "Course of Chemistry," which went through many editions; a "Universal Pharmacopæia," a "Treatise on Simple Drugs," and a "Treatise on Antimony." b. at Rouen, 1645; d. 1715.—His son Louis became physician to the king, and to the Hôtel Dieu at Paris. He was also a member of the Academy of Sciences, and the author of a "Treatise on Aliments," another on "Worms in the Human Body," and several papers in the Memoirs of the Academy. b. 1713.

LEMOINE, François, le(r)-mown, a French historical painter, whose principal work is the ceiling in the Hall of Hercules, at Versailles, the largest painting in Europe, containing 142 figures, and being 84 feet long and 51 broad, without being divided by any architectural interruptions. b. at Paris, 1653; committed suicide in a fit of insanity, 1737.

LEMON, George William, lew'-on, an English divine and lexicographer, who published, in 1789, an "Etymological English Dictionary," in 1 vol., which displayed considerable industry and learning. b. 1726; d. 1797.

LE MONNIER, Peter Charles, le(r)-mou'-ne-ai, a French astronomer, was member of the Academy of Sciences and of the National Institute, and accompanied Maupertuis in his journey towards the North Pole for measuring a degree of the meridian. His principal works were, "Astronomical Institutions," "Lunar Nautical Astronomy," and "Tables of the Sun, and Corrections for those of the Moon." b. at Paris, 1715; d. 1796.

LEMONTEY, Pierre Edouard, le(r)-mou'-tai, a French poet and jurist, who, during the deliberations on the fate of Louis XVI., and in the other extravagant measures of the revolutionists, advocated the cause of humanity and justice; but was obliged to save himself from the fury of the terrorists by precipitately quitting France for Switzerland, where he resided till after the overthrow of Robespierre's party. Deeply affected with the calamity which had involved Lyons, his native city, in ruin, he published the beautiful ode, "Les Ruines de Lyons." He afterwards travelled through Italy, and wrote various operas, romances, and poems; in 1804 was appointed one of the censors of the drama; and at the Restoration was invested with the order of the Legion of Honour, and appointed director-general of the book trade. Among his works, the most successful are the opera of "Palma, ou le Voyage en Grèce;" his

"Essai sur l'Établissement Monarchique de Louis XIV.," and a romance, entitled "La Famille de Jura, ou Irons-nous à Paris?" b. 1762; d. 1826.

LEMPRIERE, John, D.D., lew'-pre-er, an eminent classical scholar, was a native of Jersey; received his education at Reading, Winchester, and Pembroke College, Oxford; graduated at that university; was head-master of Abingdon grammar-school, and afterwards of the school at Exeter; and, on resigning the latter, was presented to the livings of Meuth and Newton Pettoek, in Devonshire, which he held till his death. His principal works are the well-known "Classical Dictionary," and a "Universal Biography." b. 1824.

L'ENCLOS, Ninon de, lau'-klo, a celebrated French lady, whose mother wanted to place her in a convent, but was prevented by her father, who was a man of gaiety. Ninon lost her parents at the age of 15, and possessing great charms and a lively temper, was followed by some of the greatest men, but would never unite herself in marriage. She was the friend of Molière and Fontenelle, and had a fine understanding; but it has been truly said of her, that though she thought like Epicurus, she lived like Laïs. She is, however, represented to have been perfectly unmercenary in her amours; and her wit and behaviour were such, and so low the moral tone of the time, that even virtuous ladies courted her acquaintance. She was held in great respect by men of genius, who consulted her upon their works. There are a few genuine letters by her in the works of St. Evremont, but those under her name, addressed to Villars, Le Sourd, &c. are fictitious. She is said to have succeeded by artificial means in preserving the youthful bloom of her features, long after the period at which female beauty usually fades; and in consequence numerous cosmetics and toilet articles have been called by her name. b. at Paris, 1616; d. 1706.

LENTANT, James, lent'-ant, a French Protestant divine, who was educated at Geneva, and became minister of the French church at Heidelberg; but on the invasion of the Palatinate, in 1685, by the French, retired to Berlin. He published histories of the Councils of Constance, Bâle, and Pisa; he likewise translated the New Testament into French, with notes and a learned introduction, in conjunction with Beausobre. He was also author of a History of Pope Joan; Sermons; "A Preservative against Uniting with the Church of Rome," &c. b. at Bazoche, France, 1661; d. at Berlin, 1724.

LENGLET DU FRESNOY, Nicholas, lent'-glui, a French writer, who became secretary to the French ambassador at Cologne, and librarian to Prince Eugene. His works are voluminous, but incorrect: the best is his "Method for Studying History," which has been translated into English. b. at Beauvais, 1674; d. 1755.

LENSOX, Charlotte, lent'-nor, a lady who was the intimate friend of Dr. Johnson and Richards on the novelist. She wrote a popular novel, entitled "The Female Quixote," which was followed by "Shakespeare Illustrated," in which she gave the novels and histories on which the plays of Shakspeare are founded. She likewise published some historical pieces and translations. b. at New York; d. 1801.

LENTHALL, William, lent'-ul, an English lawyer, and speaker of the Long Parliament. In 1639 he was elected to Parliament for Woodstock, and, in 1610, was chosen speaker; in which capacity he made a considerable fortune by joining the ruling party. He was also master of the rolls, a commissioner of the great seal, and chancellor of the duchy of Lancaster. He was removed from his office in 1653; but, the year following, became speaker of the Parliament called by Cromwell, and subsequently acted as speaker of the Rump Parliament. At the Restoration he was exempted from the act of indemnity, but obtained a pardon from the king. Several of his speeches and letters were published. n. at Henley-on-Thames, 1591; p. 1662.

EMPERORS OF THE EAST.

LEO I., or the Elder, le-a, emperor of the East, ascended the throne in 457. He was a Thracian, of obscure birth, but attained the highest military rank, and was proclaimed emperor by the soldiers in succession to Marcianus. He confirmed the decrees of the Council of Chalcedon against the Eutychians, and renewed the war against the Vandals; but was unfortunate, through the treachery of his general Aspar, whom he put to death with his family in 471. The Goths, to revenge the fate of Aspar, poured into the empire, which they ravaged to the walls of Constantinople. p. 474.

LEO II., or the Younger, was the son of Zeno and of Ariadne, daughter of Leo I. He succeeded his grandfather in 474, under the guardianship of his father, who caused himself to be proclaimed emperor a few months afterwards. LEO II. is said to have been put to death by his own father, after reigning for only ten months.

LEO III., was called the Isaurian, from the country of his birth, where his parents were poor mechanics. Leo entered the army, and became general-in-chief of the troops in Asia, under Justinian II. In 716 he marched against Theodosius III., who had been proclaimed emperor on the deposition of Justinian II.; and Theodosius resigned his crown to him in the following year. The Saracens, having ravaged Thrace, laid siege to Constantinople, which was bravely defended by Leo, who compelled them to retire. His reign, however, was tyrannical, and he drove the patriarch Germanus from his seat, in which he placed Anastasius. He was also guilty of burning the library at Constantinople, containing a quantity of medals and above 30,000 volumes. The popes Gregory II. and Gregory III. having excommunicated him, he prepared an armament to invade Italy; but the ships were destroyed by a storm. p. 741.

LEO IV., the son of Constantine Copronymus, and grandson of Leo III., succeeded his father in 775. In his time the controversy raged between the Iconoclasts, or image-breakers, and their adversaries, both of whom he protected by turns. He repulsed the Saracens in Asia. n. at Constantinople, 751; p. 781.

LEO V., or the Armenian, from the country of which he was a native, rose to the rank of general by his valour; but being accused of treason, the emperor Nicephorus disgraced him, and imprisoned him in a convent. Michael Rhangabius, on ascending the throne in 811, restored him to his rank; but Leo, profiting by the misfortune of his master, headed a military revolt, and was elected emperor by the troops in 813. He was one of the most violent of the Iconoclastic princes. Assassinated, 820.

LEO VI., styled the Philosopher, was the son and successor of Basilus the Macedonian, and ascended the throne in 886. The Hungarians, Saracens, and Bulgarians having united against the empire, he called to his assistance the Turks, who entered Bulgaria, which they ravaged with fire and sword. Leo drove the patriarch Photius from his seat; and Nicholas, one of the successors of Photius, excommunicated the emperor; for which Leo deposed him. He wrote some books, the most interesting of which is a treatise on Tactics, printed at Leyden in 1612. p. 865; p. 911.

POPES.

LEO I., Pope, surnamed the Great, was an Italian by birth, and had been employed by Celestin I. and Sixtus III. on several important missions. He succeeded the latter in 440, and distinguished himself by his zeal against the Manicheans, Pelagians, and Eutychians. In his time the Council of Chalcedon was called; and, while sitting in the East, Attila and the Huns ravaged the West, and advanced towards Rome. The emperor Valentinian applied to the pope, who went to meet Attila, and, by the power of his eloquence, prevailed with him to leave Italy. Genseric, however, sacked Rome in 455. He left behind many epistles and sermons, which have been printed. He was succeeded by Hilarius I. p. 461.

LEO II. was a native of Sicily, and succeeded Agathon in 682. He pretended to have an authority over the Eastern church, and was succeeded by Benedict III. p. 683.

LEO III. succeeded, in 795, Adrian I. In 800, he was attacked while riding in a religious procession, and almost killed; but he recovered, and retired to Germany. Charlemagne restored him to his seat, and he crowned that monarch emperor of the West. On the death of Charlemagne, a new plot was formed against the pope, who caused the conspirators to be put to death. p. 816.

LEO IV., a Roman, succeeded Sergius II. in 817. The Saracens having invaded the Ecclesiastical States, he marched against them and obtained a complete victory; after which he put the city of Rome into a state of defence, and founded the town of Leopolis. p. 855.

LEO V., a Benedictine monk, in 903 succeeded Benedict IV., but was deposed by his chaplain Christopher. The annals of the papacy during the tenth century are very confused, and there is no mention of Leo's subsequent life.

LEO VI. became pope in 923, in succession to John X. He is said to have been put to death by Marozia. (See MAROZIA.)

LEO VII. was elected in succession to John XI., son of Marozia, 937. He negotiated a peace between Hugo, king of Italy, and Alberic, duke of Rome, the son of the celebrated Marozia. He is said to have been an irreproachable man and zealous ecclesiastic, and was succeeded by Stephen VIII. p. 939.

LEO VIII. was elected pope on the deposition of John XII., in 963, under the patronage of the emperor Otto I. On Otto's withdrawal, John re-entered Rome, and drove away Leo; but John dying soon afterwards, Benedict V. was chosen pope. The emperor Otto subsequently took Rome, and, exiling Benedict, re-instated Leo VIII. p. about 965.

LEO IX., who bears the distinction of a saint in the Roman calendar, was born of an illustrious family.

trious family, became bishop of Toul, and, in 1049, was chosen pope. He convened several councils to reform the manners of the ecclesiastics and to condemn the errors of Berenger. The Normans having marched into Italy, in 1053, he went against them at the head of a German army; but was defeated, taken prisoner, and conducted to Benevento. Some sermons and letters of his are extant. D. 1054.

LEO X. Giovanni de' Medici, second son of Lorenzo the Magnificent (see MEDICI), at the age of 11, was made an archbishop by Louis XI., king of France, and, at 13, Julius II. invested him with the dignity of legate, and he served as such in the army which was defeated by the French, near Ravenna, in 1512. He was taken prisoner after that battle; but the soldiers showed the most superstitious veneration for his person, as the representative of the pope. He was elected to the papacy in 1513, and his coronation was celebrated with unusual pomp. Leo was fond of magnificence; but he had a taste for letters, and liberally patronized men of learning and genius, particularly poets. He terminated the disputes which subsisted between his predecessor and Louis XII. of France, concluded the Council of Laceran, and formed a splendid library, which he enriched with inestimable manuscripts. A conspiracy to murder him was discovered in 1516, and Cardinal Petrucci, the chief of it, was hanged. Leo formed two great projects; the one to effect a general association of the Christian powers against the Turks, and the other to complete the church of St. Peter. To aid these schemes, he issued plenary indulgences, by which the purchasers procured the pardon of their sins. These indulgences being carried into Germany, occasioned the secession from the church of Rome, or Reformation, commenced by Luther. (See LUTHER.) Leo, however, throughout his life took little notice of the great religious movement. A war also broke out between the emperor Charles V. and Francis I. of France, who both courted the alliance of the pope. If not an exemplary pope, he was at least a splendid and magnificent prince, and a noble patron of art and learning. He is the subject of Roscoe's fine biography, entitled the "Life and Pontificate of Leo X." D. 1521; p. 1521.

LEO XI. was of the family of the Medici, and was elected pope in 1605, at a very advanced age, and died in less than a month afterwards.

LEO XII. was of a noble family of the Roman, and became pope in 1823, in succession to Pius VII. He embellished Rome, encouraged letters, and enriched the library of the Vatican. He was succeeded by Pius VIII. D. 1829.

LEO, the name of six kings of Armenia, who reigned between the years 1123 and 1375. These princes were constantly at war either with the crusaders or with the Turks. The last of the name, Leo VI., was driven from his kingdom by the sultan of Egypt, and took refuge in France, where he died, 1393.

LEO, archbishop of Thessalonica, was one of the revivers of Greek literature and a good mathematician. Lived in the 9th century.

LEO, John, surnamed Africanus, a Moor of Granada, who wrote, in Arabic, a "Description of Africa," and the "Lives of the Arabian Philosophers." D. about 1526.

LEO, Leonardo, a celebrated Italian composer, who was the master of Piccini, Jomelli, and other famous musicians. His many operas are now unknown, but his masses and other sacred works are still regarded as masterpieces of church music. D. at Naples, 1694; p. 1755.

LEO ALLATIUS. (See ALLATIUS.)

LEO THE GRAMMARIAN, one of the authors of the "Byzantine History," lived in the 11th century.

LEONARDO BONACCI, lail-a-nar'-do, surnamed "of Pisa," a celebrated Italian mathematician, who first introduced in Europe the study of algebra. His work is preserved in manuscript at Rome. Lived at the beginning of the 13th century.

LEONARDO DA VINCI. (See VINCI.)

LEONI, Jacomo, lail'-o-ne, a Venetian architect, who settled in England, and there published, in 1724, an excellent edition of "Palladio's Architecture." D. 1746.

LEONICENUS, Nicholas, lail'-o-ni'-ce'-nus, professor of medicine at Ferrara, was the first who translated Galen's works, to which he added commentaries and illustrative notes. He likewise reproduced, in Italian, the "Aphorisms of Hippocrates," and other works. D. 1423; p. 1521.

LEONIDAS, le-on'-id-es, king of Sparta, a celebrated hero, who opposed Xerxes when he invaded Greece, and fought the whole Persian host at the Straits of Thermopylae with such bravery as to check the progress of the invader. At last a detachment of the Persians, led by Ephialtes the Trachinian, by a secret path up the mountains, came down on the rear of the Spartans, and obtained a complete victory. Out of the 300, only one man escaped, and he was treated with ignominy by his countrymen, for leaving so glorious a field, where death was more honourable than life. A monument was afterwards erected upon the spot, with this inscription: "Stranger, tell the Laedæmonians that we lie here, obeying their laws." This battle happened 480 B.C.

LEOPOLD I., le'-o-pold, emperor of Germany, was the second son of Ferdinand III. and of Mary Anne of Spain. He became king of Hungary in 1655, king of Bohemia in 1657, and emperor in 1658. He contended against France and the Turks, and suffered in his war with both; France took from him Alsace, and many frontier places of the empire; and the Turks would have captured Vienna, had they not been compelled to raise the siege by John Sobieski, king of Poland. In 1697, Prince Eugene of Savoy concluded the war by totally defeating the Turks at Zenta, in Hungary. D. 1705; p. 1705.

LEOPOLD II., the son of Maria Theresa of Austria and her husband, Francis of Lorraine, succeeded his father, in 1765, in the duchy of Tuscany, which he governed with great wisdom, and finally abolished the Inquisition in that country. In 1790 he succeeded the emperor Joseph II., and removed to Vienna, where, by his judicious and liberal measures, he consolidated the power of his empire. He concluded a peace with the Turks, and was preparing for a war with the French, when he was carried off by a fever. He was succeeded by his son Francis. (See FRANCIS II.) D. 1748; p. 1792.

LEOPOLD, duke of Lorraine, was the son of Charles, the fifth duke, and of Eleonora of Austria. He distinguished himself as a soldier, and after the peace of Ryswick, in 1697, was reinstated in his duchy, which had been taken from his father by the French. He restored his country to a flourishing condition, maintained the poor, and assisted the nobility who had been reduced. He founded a university at Cuneville, and was a liberal patron of the arts and sciences. b. 1679; d. 1729.

LEOPOLD, George Christian Frederick, king of the Belgians, was the third son of Francis Anthony Frederick, duke of Saxe-Saalfeld-Coburg, brother of the late duchess of Kent, and consequently uncle to her majesty Queen Victoria, as well as to her late consort, Prince Albert. In 1816, while Prince Leopold of Saxe-Coburg, he married the Princess Charlotte Augusta, only child of the Prince-regent, afterwards George IV. The highest hopes were formed of that union; and, as the husband of the heiress-apparent to the throne of Great Britain, Leopold obtained the highest esteem. After the sudden death of the Princess Charlotte, in 1817, he continued to live in retirement at Claremont, and was created by the king field-marshal and member of the privy council. In 1830, the Belgian provinces were lost to the crown of Holland, in consequence of the revolution of Brussels. A provisional government was formed, and the throne of Belgium was offered to the duke de Nemours, son of Louis Philippe. That prince declining it, Leopold was next solicited to accept the crown. After at first refusing, he was induced to ascend the throne of Belgium in 1831. Leopold promised, in his opening speech to the Belgian parliament, to encourage industry and to rule according to the principles of civil and religious liberty; a promise which he fully redeemed. In 1832 he contracted a matrimonial alliance with Louise-Marie-Thérèse, princess of Orleans, and eldest daughter of Louis Philippe; by whom he had issue the present (1869) king of the Belgians, Leopold II., the count of Flanders, and Charlotte, the widow of Maximilian, Emperor of Mexico. b. 1790; d. 1865.

LEOTAUD, Vincent, l'ai'-o-to, a distinguished French mathematician, who published a work entitled "Examen Circuli Quadraturæ," in which he proved the impossibility of demonstrating the quadrature of the circle. b. 1672.

LEPIDUS, Marcus Æmilins, lep'-i-dus, one of the triumvirs with Octavius and Mark Antony. He obtained Africa as his share of the empire; but was deprived of it by Augustus, whereupon he retired into private life. b. in obscurity 13 b.c.

LEPSIUS, Karl Richard, lep'-se-us, a German archaeologist, who published, in 1837, a short treatise on the hieroglyphics of Egypt, and other works. In 1842 he went to Egypt, as chief of a party of learned men, for the purpose of investigating the antiquities of that country. He discovered several monuments of the Pharaoh dynasty, and excavated the tombs of fifty of the Ethiopian kings of Egypt. He likewise contrived to obtain a ground-plan of the celebrated temple of the Memnonium. After his return, in 1846, he published many valuable works in connexion with his researches; among the rest, "Letters from Egypt," which have been translated into English; "The Chronology of Egypt," and the "Monuments of Egypt and Ethiopia." b. at Naumburg, 1813.

LEBREYERS, N. J., ler'-e-ber, a distinguished optical-instrument maker, who constructed most of the apparatus for the Paris Observatory. b. in France, 1762; d. at Paris, 1840.

LERMONTOV, Michael Ivanovitch, ler-mon-

tof, a Russian poet and novelist, served as an officer in the imperial guards until the year 1837, when, in consequence of a poem which he wrote upon the death of the Russian poet Pushkin, the emperor Nicholas sent him to the Caucasus. This poem was first printed in 1864, in Herzen's "Polar Star," a Russian periodical published in London. While serving with the army of the Caucasus, he wrote his novel, "A Hero of Our own Times," which was afterwards translated into English. He likewise produced many beautiful poems, the action of which is chiefly laid in the mountains of the Caucasus. Just as his fame was beginning to spread over Europe, the writer fell in a duel before he had attained his 30th year. His complete works were published in St. Petersburg in 1852, and were subsequently translated into German. In Russian literature, he takes rank immediately after Pushkin. b. 1811; d. 1841.

LE SAGE, Alain René, le(s)-aif, a celebrated French novelist, who, after completing his education at the Jesuits' college at Vannes, was engaged in a financial post in Brittany; but, in 1692, went to Paris, and devoted himself to literary pursuits. He commenced by translating and imitating several Spanish works, and, in 1707, produced his first dramatic work,—"Crispin the Rival of his Master." In the same year he published "The Devil on Two Sticks," the plot of which was borrowed from the Spanish author, Guevara. In 1708 he composed his comedy of "Turcaret," wherein he ridiculed the farmers-general, whose opposition nearly prevented the production of the piece upon the stage. In 1715 appeared the first part of his greatest work, "Gil Blas," but the conclusion was not made public until 1735. He was likewise the author of a considerable number of comedies and other humorous dramatic pieces. His fame, however, chiefly rests upon his "Gil Blas," which has appeared in numerous translations, and has been reprinted in a hundred different editions. An attempt was made to dispute the originality of the plot of this celebrated fiction; but it was never shown that Le Sage was not the true inventor of it. One of his sons became a celebrated actor, under the name of Montemil. b. at Sarzeau, 1663; d. 1747.

LESLEY, John, les'-le, bishop of Ross, in Scotland, accompanied Queen Mary from France to Scotland, and soon after became to meet at York to consider the complaints made against Mary by her subjects, Lesley appeared on behalf of his mistress, whose cause he pleaded with great ability. He also tried many expedients to procure her liberty, for which he was committed to the Tower; but, in 1573, recovered his liberty, on condition of quitting the kingdom. When abroad, he endeavoured to interest many foreign princes in the cause of Mary, and wrote several pieces in her defence. Being appointed vicar-general by the bishop of Rome, he was, while visiting that diocese, seized by the Huguenots, who would have sent him to England; but he recovered his liberty by paying a ransom. He afterwards obtained the bishopric of Constance. His principal work is a history of Scotland, entitled, "De Origine, Moribus, et Rebus gestis Scotorum." b. 1527; d. 1596.

Leslie

LESLIE, John, les-le, bishop of Clogher, whose first episcopal preferment was the bishopric of the Orkneys, whence he removed to Raphoe, in Ireland, where he built a stately palace, in which he endured a long siege by Cromwell, but was at last forced to surrender. In 1681 he was translated to Clogher. b. 1671, aged above 100 years.

LESLIE, Charles, a theological controversialist, who, after receiving his education at Trinity College, Dublin, went, in 1671, to England, where he commenced the study of the law. A few years afterwards, he entered upon holy orders, and became chancellor of Clogher, in Ireland. Although a fervent Protestant, he throughout his life manifested the greatest devotion to the cause of the Stuarts, and accompanied the Pretender both in France and in Italy. In his old age, he sought permission to return to his native land. George I. acceded to his request, and he thereupon took up his residence at Glaslough, in Ireland. His theological writings excited much attention in his time; and one of them, entitled "A Short and Easy Method with Deists," is still regarded as of considerable value. In addition to pamphlets against Hoadey, Lock, and Burnet, he published controversial pieces antagonistic to Quakers, Jews, Socinians, Deists, Presbyterians, and Roman Catholics. His own views were those of a zealous Protestant, combined with an advocacy of high moral principles. b. in Ireland, about 1655; d. there, 1722.

LESLIE, Sir John, an eminent natural philosopher, who, after completing his education at the universities of Glasgow and Edinburgh, and travelling as tutor in the United States, returned to Scotland, and, obtaining letters of introduction to individuals of literary and scientific celebrity, set out for London, where he for some time gained a subsistence by translating and compiling scientific works. In 1805 he became professor of mathematics in the university of Edinburgh, not without considerable opposition on the part of the clergy, who objected to the appointment on account of Leslie's referring to Hume in a laudatory manner in one of his treatises. In 1809 he obtained the chair of natural philosophy, upon the death of Professor Playfair; and from that period until his death, produced a succession of valuable works on subjects connected with natural philosophy. In 1832 he was knighted. He contributed treatises on Achromatic Glasses, Acoustics, Climate, Cold, Dew, Meteorology, &c., to the "Encyclopedia Britannica," and also furnished the "Edinburgh Review" and the "Edinburgh Transactions" with many excellent papers. Among his larger works may be cited "The Elements of Geometry," "Elements of Natural Philosophy," and an "Account of Experiments and Instruments depending on the relation of Heat to Moisture." He was also the inventor of the differential thermometer. b. at Largo, Fifeshire, 1766; d. in Scotland, 1832.

LESLIE, Charles Robert, R.A., a distinguished artist, has been claimed as an American citizen, but was in reality born in London, where his parents were staying at the time. His father and mother were both born in America; but the ancestors of his father settled originally in America about the year 1745. When six years of age he was taken to Philadelphia, and was there sent to school, and subsequently apprenticed to a bookseller. Having shown considerable talents for design, he was sent to London in 1813, with letters of introduction to Benjamin West, at that time president of the Academy. As a student of the Royal Academy, he evinced great industry, and in the year 1820 exhibited his first picture, "Anne Page and Master Slender." He became an R.A. in 1826. In 1833, to the surprise of his friends, he accepted the post of drawing-master to the United States Military Academy; but he soon returned to England. As an illustrator of the productions of Shakspeare, Pope, Goldsmith, Addison, and Cervantes, he achieved great triumphs. His delineation of Sancho Panza has never been equalled. Of his best pictures, it will be sufficient to enumerate "Uncle Toby and the Widow" and "Sancho Panza and the Duchess," both of which are in the national collection at the South-Kensington Museum. Leslie's technical skill was exceedingly great, and his refined and graceful humour admirably fitted him to give pictorial reproductions of situations in the comedies of Shakspeare and Molière. He was also a clear and pleasant writer, and wrote "Memoirs of the Life of John Constable" and a "Handbook for Young Painters." n. in London, 1791; d. 1850.

LESSEPS, Ferdinand de, les-sep, an eminent French engineer and diplomatist, who represented the interests of his native country, as vice-consul and consul, in Spain, Portugal, Cairo, and other places. In 1855 he formed the project of cutting a canal through the Isthmus of Suez; and although Robert Stephenson, and other eminent engineers, English and continental, pronounced the idea to be impracticable, M. de Lesseps energetically defended his plan, and commenced the work under the auspices of the Egyptian government in 1859. In ten years the works were so far completed as to admit of the passage of steamers along almost the whole of the water-way. n. at Versailles, 1805.

LESSING, Gotthold Ephraim, les-sing, an eminent German poet and general writer, who, after studying at Leipzig, went to Berlin, where he made himself known by the publication of his celebrated fables. He subsequently produced his "Letters on Literature," which greatly contributed to improve the taste of his countrymen. In 1760 he accepted the post of secretary to the governor of Breslau; in 1770 he was appointed keeper of the Wolfenbüttel library, and soon afterwards produced his famous tragedy, "Emilia Galotti." He enriched the literature of Germany with masterpieces of different kinds, especially in the departments of biography, archaeology, and the drama. n. at Kamentz, in Upper Lusatia, 1729; d. 1781.—His brother, Karl Gotthelf, and his nephew Karl Friedrich, were both distinguished in the world of letters.

L'ESTRANGE, Sir Roger, le-strain', an English writer, who received a liberal education, and, in 1639, attended Charles I. in his expedition to Scotland. He adhered to the royal cause, and, in 1644, was condemned as a spy; but, after remaining in confinement four years, made his escape, and endeavoured to stir up an insurrection in Kent, which failed; whereupon he went abroad. In 1653 he returned to England, under shelter of Cromwell's act of indemnity. After the Restoration he was appointed censor of the press; he also set up a newspaper, called the "Public Intelligencer," which was discontinued on the publication of the "London Gazette," in 1655. In 1679 he commenced another paper, called the "Observer," designed to vindicate the court measures; this procured him the honour of knighthood. He was an industrious writer, and besides his own pamphlets, which were numerous, he published translations of several books, particularly Josephus, from the French version of D'Audifly, Seneca's "Morals," Erasmus's "Colloquies," and Quesado's "Visions." n. in Norfolk, 1616; p. 170 k.

Le Sueur

LE STEUR, Eustache, le-sud-er, a celebrated French artist, surnamed the "Raphael of France," studied under Vouet, and, early in life, attracted the notice of Poussin. Displaying great disregard of court patronage, he worked only for private individuals and for religious establishments, and, while still young, retired to a cloister. He was the first painter in France during the reign of Louis XIV., and surpassed Lebrun, his rival, in grace and vigour. Among the most important of his works were the "Life of St. Bruno," in twenty-two subjects; "St. Paul preaching at Ephesus," and "The Martyrdom of St. Lawrence." n. at Paris, 1616; p. 1655.

LE SUEUR, Jean François, an eminent French composer, who became chapel-master to several cathedrals in France, and subsequently professor at the Conservatoire de Musique. He composed five grand operas, the most successful of which were "The Cavern" and "Paul and Virginia." He also wrote a treatise on Ancient Music, which is highly esteemed, as casting new light upon the obscure subject of the art of music among the Greeks. The emperor Napoleon I. created him a knight of the Legion of Honour, and appointed him his director of music. n. near Abbeville, 1766; p. 1837.

LETTI, Gregory, let-te, an Italian historian, who, after studying at Rome, went to Geneva, where he abjured the Catholic religion, and afterwards resided in England. While there he was known to be collecting materials for a history of the court of Charles II., and the king seeing him one day at his levee, told him to take care that his history did not give offence. To which Letti replied, "I will do what I can; but if a man were as wise as Solomon, he would hardly be able to avoid giving some offence." "Why then," retorted Charles, "be as wise as Solomon; write proverbs, and let history alone." Letti, however, did not take this advice. The history appeared, under the title of "Teatro Britannico;" and the author, as Charles had foreseen, did give offence, and was ordered to quit the kingdom, when he went to Amsterdam. Among his works are, Lives of "Sixtus V.," "Charles V.," "Queen Elizabeth," "Oliver Cromwell," the "History of Geneva," and a "History of the Cardinals." But the whole are so full of error and fiction, that they may be regarded rather as romances than authentic histories. n. at Milan, 1630; p. at Amsterdam, 1701.

LETOURNEUR, Pierre, le-tour-noor, a French author, who was the first to make the works of Shakespeare known to his countrymen, through the aid of a translation. He also translated the poems of Young and Ossian, and the novel of "Clarissa Harlowe." n. at Valognes, 1736; p. at Paris, 1784.

LETTICE, John, let-tis, a clergyman, poet, and miscellaneous writer, was educated at Sidney Sussex College, Cambridge, of which he was a fellow and public tutor. In 1768 he abandoned college life, and became secretary to the British embassy at Copenhagen. He subsequently engaged as private tutor in some families of distinction; was presented to the living of Peasemarch, in Sussex, in 1785; and was also a prebendary in Chichester Cathedral. His works consist of "Fables for the Fireside," "Strictures on Elocution," "A Tour through various Parts of Scotland," and "Miscellaneous Pieces on Sacred Subjects," besides sermons, tracts, and poems; a translation of Holberg's "Parallel Lives of Famous Ladies," and, in conjunction with Professor Martyr, "The Antiquities of Herculaneum." n. in Northamptonshire, 1737; p. 1532.

Leverrier

LEUCIPPUS, leu-sip-pus, a philosopher of Elea, was the pupil of Zeno, the master of Democritus, and the originator of the atomic system of physics. According to this theory, Leucippus and his disciples, by ascribing a sensible power to the particles of matter, and setting them in motion, accounted for the origin of the universe without the interposition of divine agency. Descartes borrowed from him his hypothesis of "Vortices," and Kepler also availed himself of the speculations of Leucippus. Lived in the 5th century B.C.

LEUWENHOEK, Anthony van, lof-ven-he(r)k, a celebrated microscopical observer, who acquired a great reputation by his experiments and discoveries. To the Royal Society of London, of which he was a member, he forwarded about one hundred papers on the blood, blood-vessels, muscles, the eye, the brain, &c. His other writings were collected and published in 1699; of these an English version was produced in 1800. n. at Delft, Holland, 1632; p. 1723.

LEVER, Charles James, le-ver, a modern novelist, distinguished for his fictions illustrative of Irish life and character, and for the vigour and variety of his incidents. He studied at Trinity College, Dublin, and afterwards took the M.D. degree at Göttingen. After being attached to the British legation at Brussels, and spending some time in the practice of his profession, he abandoned it for literature. At the outset of his career in this latter employment, he was, perhaps, the most popular author of the day; his "Hurly Burly," "Charles O'Malley," "Tom Burke," &c., were in every one's possession, and "Synne" is an example of this. His latest novels are "Sir Brooke Fosbrooke," "The Brambleighs of Bishop's Folly," &c. Under the pseudonym of "Cornelius O'Dowd," he has for some time contributed a series of brilliant essays on the topics of the day to "Blackwood's Magazine." n. at Dublin, 1809.

LEVERNIER, Urbain Jean Joseph, le-ver-ne-ai, a modern French astronomer, celebrated for his discovery of the planet Neptune. His first scientific labours were in chemistry; for, in 1837, he published two treatises on the combination of phosphorus, as well as taking some part in the chemical department of the "Dictionary of Conversation;" but in the year 1846, he had acquired sufficient celebrity as an astronomer to obtain admission to the Paris Academy of Sciences, and, a few months later, made known his great discovery. The same results had been attained by the English astronomer Adams. (See ADAMS.) Each, however, had laboured in ignorance of the other's pursuits; but the French astronomer was the first to publish the discovery. Leverrier soon rose to the highest honours which his country bestows upon scientific men; he was made officer of the Legion of Honour, director of the Board of Longitude, and professor of the Faculty of Sciences. The Royal Society of England likewise awarded to him, as well as to Adams, its Copley medal, the highest honour in its power to bestow, electing him a member at the same time. b. at St. Lo, France, 1811.

LEVI, David, le-ve, a London Jew, of considerable acquirements, though of humble birth and occupations. He was first a shoemaker, and afterwards a hatter, but his works evince great research and ability. In 1787 he entered into a polemical controversy with Dr. Priestley, whose "Letters to the Jews" he answered in two series of epistolary essays. He was also the author of a volume on the rites and ceremonies of the Jews; "Lingua Sacra, or a Hebrew and English Dictionary," "The Pentateuch in Hebrew and English," a translation of the Hebrew Liturgy, "Dissertations on the Prophecies," and some other works. b. 1740; d. 1789.

LEVIS, Pierre Marc Gaston, Duke de, lai-ve', an able French nobleman, who at the beginning of the revolution was chosen a deputy to the States-general by the nobility of Dijon: but, though friendly to a reform of abuses in government, he opposed the destruction of the monarchy, and in 1792 became an emigrant, and joined the royalist army. Being wounded in the engagement at Quiberon Bay, he went to England, where he resided till the establishment of the consular government, when he returned to France, but passed his time in retirement and literary pursuits. On the restoration of Louis XVIII. he was raised to the peerage, and admitted a member of the Academy. His works consist of "Maxims and Reflexions," "The Travels of Kanghi, or New Chinese Letters," "Recollections and Portraits," and "England at the Beginning of the Nineteenth Century." b. 1830.

LEVINGSTON, James, Earl of Callendar, lev-ing-ston, a famous soldier of Scotland, was gentleman of the bedchamber of Charles I., who created him Lord Levingston of Almont in 1633, and afterwards earl of Callendar. In the civil war, he at first joined the Parliament; but afterwards distinguished himself by his activity in the king's service. He took Carlisle, where he found a considerable supply of ammunition, and endeavoured to rescue Charles from his confinement in the Isle of Wight. b. 1672.

LEVIZAC, Jean Pons Victor Lecoutz de, lev-e-zac, a French grammarian, who, for many years, taught his native language in England. Among several excellent works, may be named his "French Grammar," first published in 1797; "French and English Dictionary," and "Dictionary of Synonymes." b. in London, 1813.

LEWES, George Henry, loo-es, a modern English littérateur, and an industrious and excellent contributor to the "Edinburgh," "Westminster," Blackwood's and Fraser's Magazines, and to the "Morning Chronicle" and other newspapers. On the establishment of the "Leader" newspaper, in 1849, he became its literary editor; but ceased to have any connexion with the print in the year 1854. He distinguished himself in historical, philosophical, and scientific literature. We have space to mention only his most popular works in each of these departments. "The Life and Works of Göthe," and "The Life of Maximilien Robespierre," are at the head of the first; the "Biographical History of Philosophy," the "Exposition of Comte's Positive Philosophy," and a popular treatise on Physiology, being his most important productions in the two latter walks. His play called "The Game of Speculation," was produced under the pseudonym of Slingsby Lawrence. a. in London, 1817.

LEWIS, John, loo-es, a learned divine and antiquary, who wrote "The Life of Wickliffe," "Wickliffe's Translation of the New Testament," "The History and Antiquities of the Isle of Thanet," "The History of the Abbey and Church of Feversham," the "Life of William Caxton," &c. b. 1675; d. 1716.

LEWIS, Meriwether, an American officer employed by the government of the United States, with Clarke, to make discoveries in the northern parts of the American continent, with a view to the extension of commerce to the Pacific Ocean. In 1805 they undertook a journey for the purpose of discovering the sources of the Missouri; and passed the winter in an icy region, 500 leagues beyond its confluence. Lewis was afterwards elected governor of Louisiana, while his comrade Clarke became a general of its militia, and agent of the United States for Indian affairs. Lewis was born 1774; and died in 1809.

LEWIS, Matthew Gregory, an English novelist, was the son of a wealthy man, who was under-secretary for war. After studying at Christchurch, he went to Germany, where he became acquainted with Göthe, and imbibed a taste for the mysterious and the fragile. The best known of his romances is the "Monk," first published in 1794; a work charged with horrors and libertinism of spirit. He was nevertheless a kind and charitable man, as was evidenced by his treatment of the slaves upon the Jamaica estates he inherited from his father. He was a fluent versifier, and his "Alonzo the Brave" and "Bill Jones" are still found to contain interest. In 1812 he produced a drama entitled "Timour the Tartar," and subsequently a work called "Residence in the West Indies," since reprinted in Murray's Home and Colonial Library. b. in London, 1775; d. at sea, 1818.

LEWIS, Sir George Cornewall, Bart., M.P., a modern English statesman and historian, studied at Eton and Christchurch, Oxford, and was called to the bar in 1831, although he never practised. After filling various subordinate posts under the government, he was appointed poor-law commissioner in 1839, secretary of the Board of Control in 1847, under-secretary of the Home department in 1848, and secretary of the Treasury in 1850. Three years previously, he had been elected M.P. for Herefordshire, but lost his seat in 1852. He was again returned to Parliament for Radnor in 1855, and was soon afterwards made chancellor of the Exchequer under Lord Palmerston, an office he vacated in 1858. He resumed office in 1859 as Home secretary, and in 1861 was transferred to the War department on the retirement of Lord Herbert of Lea. His first important literary production was a translation of Müller's "History and Antiquities of the Doric Race," which, together with the "Inquiry into the Credibility of Early Roman History," may be considered the most profound of his historical efforts. Among his political works, the following are the best: "On the Use and Abuse of Political Terms," "Treatise on the Method of Reasoning in Politics," and the "Government of Dependancies." In 1851 he became editor of the "Edinburgh Review," a post he resigned upon taking office as chancellor of the Exchequer. In politics, as well as in literature, he exhibited a liberal and painstaking, rather than a brilliant and original turn of mind. b. 1800; d. 1865.

LEWIS, John Frederick, R.A., a distinguished modern artist, and president of the Society of Painters in Water-colours, who in early life painted both in oil and water, and engraved his works himself. He achieved the greatest success in both Spanish and Eastern subjects. His Spanish pictures were exhibited during the years 1835-40; the best of them being—"A Fiesta in the South of Spain," "The Death of the Bull," and "The Suburbs of a Spanish City." After the year 1840, he almost exclusively painted scenes of Arab and Turkish life, a task for which he qualified himself by a long sojourn in the East. The "Halt in the Desert," the "Arab Scribe," and "Armenian Lady," afford examples of his great power of drawing and brilliant colouring. In 1855 he was elected president of the Society of Painters in Water-colours. In 1859 he was chosen A.R.A., and R.A. in 1863. b. 1805.

LEWIS, JOHN OF. (See DOCCOLD.)

LEWIS, Lucas van, li'-den, a Dutch painter in oil, distemper, and on glass; also an eminent engraver. His picture of the "History of St. Hubert" procured him a great reputation. Many of his works are contained in the galleries of English connoisseurs. b. at Leyden, 1494; d. 1533.

LEWIS, John, ley'-den, a physician, but more distinguished as a poet and oriental scholar, was a native of Roxburghshire, Scotland, and was the son of a small farmer. Displaying in early youth an eager desire for acquiring knowledge, his parents contrived to send him to a college at Edinburgh, where he first studied theology, but relinquished it for medicine, and, in addition to the learned languages, acquired French, Spanish, Italian, German, Arabic, and Persian. In 1801 he assisted Sir Walter Scott in procuring materials and illustrations for his "Minstrelsy of the Scottish Border," and republished "The Complaint of Scotland," with a learned preliminary dissertation, notes, and a glossary. His passion for reading was enormous, his memory most retentive, and when he met with a work that interested him he forgot everything else, and would continue its perusal until it was either finished or he was interrupted. This trait in his character is said to have suggested the idea of Don Quixote to Sir Walter Scott. Having obtained a doctor's degree, Leyden was appointed assistant surgeon on the Madras establishment; after which he was made professor of the native dialects in the Bengal College; from which situation, however, he was removed, to be judge of the 24 Pergunnahs of Calcutta. His power of acquiring languages was truly wonderful, and during his residence in India he devoted himself to the study of oriental literature; but he did not long survive the influence of the climate. His "Poetical Remains" were published in 1810. b. 1775; d. 1811.

LEWIS, Edward, thio'-cul, a Welsh antiquary, who employed a considerable part of his life in searching into the Welsh antiquities, in the execution of which task he perused or collected a great deal of ancient and valuable matter from their MSS.; transcribed all the old charters of the monasteries that he could meet with; travelled several times over Wales, Cornwall, Scotland, Ireland, Armorica, Bretagne, countries inhabited by the same people; compared their antiquities, and made observations upon the whole. Many of his observations were inserted in Gibson's edition of Camden's "Britannia." He also published, in 1707, the "Archæologia Britannica; or, an Account of the Languages, Histories, and Customs of the Original Inhabitants of Great Britain, &c." folio. He left in manuscript an Irish-English dictionary, and other proofs of his learning and industry. b. about 1670; d. 1700.

LIBANIUS, li-bai'-ne-us, an ancient sophist, who became so eminent a teacher at Constantinople, that some other professors procured his banishment, on the charge of practising magic. He then went to Nicomedia, where he obtained a great number of disciples; amongst whom was Julian, afterwards called the Apostate. His "Remains" were published at Paris in 1603, and in 1627. b. at Antioch, Syria, 314; d. about 396.

LICINIUS, Caius, li-sin'-e-us, a Roman tribune, of a plebeian family, who rose to the rank of tribune, when he obtained the surname of Stolo, or Useless Sprout, on account of the law which he enacted forbidding any one to possess more than 500 acres of land; alleging as his reason, that when they cultivated more, they could not pull up the useless shoots (stolones) which grew from the roots of trees. He also made another law, which allowed the plebeians to share the consular dignity with the patricians; and he himself became one of the first plebeian consuls, B.C. 362.

LICINIUS, Marius Valerianus, emperor of the East, was the son of a Dacian peasant. He became a soldier in the Roman army, and Maximianus subsequently made him his confidant in the empire, and gave him the government of Pannonia and Thracia. Constantine had a great esteem for him, and bestowed his sister on him in marriage; but afterwards a serious difference broke out between the two emperors, which ended in the death of Licinius, after several battles, A.D. 324.

LIEBIG, Justus, Baron von, le'-big, a distinguished German chemist, who in early life served in an apothecary's establishment, but was afterwards sent to the university of Bonn, and still later, to Erlangen, where he took the degree of M.D. In 1823 he went to Paris, where he devoted himself to the study of chemistry. The first result of this labour was the composition of a paper on "Fulminates," which on being read, in 1824, at the Institute of France, brought the young chemist under the notice of Baron Humboldt, who was then residing at Paris. Through Humboldt's influence, Liebig was soon after appointed extraordinary professor of chemistry at Giessen, where, in 1826, he founded a laboratory for teaching practical chemistry. This was the famous Giessen establishment, in which the best chemists of Germany and England have been educated. With the assistance of Hoffmann, Will, Fresenius, and others, Liebig there originated or tested almost every theory of importance in chemical science. To him the department of organic chemistry is greatly indebted for numerous discoveries of the highest importance. As he is a clear and elegant writer, the result of his profound labours has been made palpable to the mind of

has done more to popularize the study of chemistry than any other single book ever written. Liebig's great talents and distinguished services have been appreciated very extensively. In 1815 he was made a baron by the grand-duke of Hesse Darmstadt; in 1810 he became fellow of the Royal Society of England, and was also requested to fill several professorships; which offers he refused. He was a fellow of almost every learned body on the continent of Europe and in America; and, in 1851, a subscription, amounting to £1000, was raised in Europe for the purpose of presenting him with five pieces of plate. Although we have only quoted those works of Liebig which have been reproduced in England, he has been the author of a large number of others. n. at Darmstadt, 1803.

LIPIUS, Quintus, li-gair'-e-us, proconsul in Africa, who conducted himself so well in that station, that, at the desire of the people, he was appointed perpetual governor. He opposed Caesar, who pardoned him after the defeat of Scipio. Not thinking his life safe, he absented himself from Rome, on which account Tubero accused him; but Ligarius was defended by Cicero and acquitted. He was one of the conspirators with Brutus and Cassius against Caesar.

LY, John, lile'-foot, a learned English divine, was born at Stoke-upon-Trent, in Staffordshire, and educated at Christ's College, Cambridge. He made great progress in the Greek and Latin languages, and applied himself to Hebrew with assiduity and success. In 1629 he printed his first work, entitled "Erebi-him; or, Miscellanies, Christian and Judaical." He distinguished himself as a zealous promoter of the Polyglot Bible, and, at the Restoration, was one of the assistants at the Savoy conference, and became vice-chancellor of Cambridge. The works of Lightfoot, who, for biblical learning, has had few equals, were printed in 2 vols. folio, and his "Remains" were published by Strype, in 1700. n. 1602; n. 1675.

LYGNE, Charles Joseph, Prince de leen, a celebrated general in the service of Austria, famous for his wit, the graces of his person, and for his military talents. He distinguished himself under the Austrian standard during the Seven Years' War and in the subsequent campaigns, becoming, in 1771, lieutenant-general. He was a favourite with Maria Theresa, and particularly with Joseph II., who, in 1782, sent him to Russia on a mission to Catharine II. He became the intimate friend of Catharine, and was charged to participate with the Russian general Potemkin in acting against the Turks. In 1789 he greatly contributed to the taking of Belgrade. He subsequently fell under the displeasure of the successors of Joseph II., but was nevertheless created field-marshal by LILBURN, John, lil'-burn, an enthusiast, who, in 1636, became assistant to Dr. Bastwick, and was employed by him in circulating his seditious pamphlets, for which Lilburne was whipped, pilloried, and imprisoned. In his confinement he wrote several virulent tracts against the church; but in 1640 he regained his liberty, and was rewarded by Parliament with a grant of £2000, out of the estates of the royalists. He then entered the army, and became a colonel, in which capacity he behaved gallantly at the battle of Marston Moor; but, publishing a libel against the earl of Manchester, was confined in the Tower. In 1643 he was released and remunerated; but he still continued writing libels, particularly against Parliament, for which he was heavily fined and banished. Lilburne withdrew privately to Holland, where he joined the royalists, and proposed to restore the king for £10,000, which offer was treated with contempt. n. at Durham, 1611; n. 1657.

LILLO, George, li'-lo, an English tragic writer, who carried on the business of a jeweller during many years with great success. His plays, founded on common incidents, are constructed with the purpose of showing how easy is the advance from small to greater crimes. His last play is "Fatal Curiosity." His "George Barnwell" was usually acted on box-day-night, it having been held to convey a useful lesson to young men; but the custom may be said to have died out. n. 1680; n. 1739.

LILLY, John, lil'-le, an early English dramatic and general author, who published "Euphues," a description of different characters, and also wrote some plays which were acted before queen Elizabeth. He likewise produced "The Maid's Metamorphosis," "The Woman in the Moon," &c. n. in Kent about 1553; n. about 1600.

LILLY, William, an English astrologer, after receiving some education, went to London, and became book-keeper to the master of the Salters' Company, on whose death he married his widow. In 1632 he became the pupil of Evans the astrologer, and soon excelled his master. He was employed by both parties during the civil wars, and even Charles I. is said to have made use of him. Lilly was certainly consulted respecting the king's projected escape from Carisbrook castle. He, however, gained more from the Parliament party; and the predictions contained in his almanacks had a wonderful effect upon the soldiers and common people. After the Restoration, he was examined respecting the king's executioner, who, he affirmed, was Cornet Joyce. His principal works are, "Christian Astrology;" "A Collection of Nativities;" "Observations on the Life and Death of Charles, late King of England;" "Annus Tenebrosus, or the Black Year." n. at Diseworth, Leicestershire, 1603; n. 1691.

Lily

LILY, William, an eminent English grammarian, who, after completing his education at Oxford, went to visit the Holy Land. In this journey he learned the Greek language at Rhodes. He returned to England in 1506, and in 1512 he was appointed master of St. Paul's school; which trust he discharged with great reputation, and educated many eminent scholars. Some parts of his "Latin Grammar," which was ordered by royal authority to be used in all schools, were written by Erasmus and Colet. b. at Odiham, Hants, about 1463; d. in London, of the plague, 1523.

LINACRE, or LYNACER, Thomas, lin'-a-ker, an eminent English physician, who, after completing his academical studies, went to Italy, where he studied under the same preceptor with the sons of Lorenzo de Medici, and, acquiring the Greek language, was enabled to peruse the works of Aristotle and Galen in the original, being, it is said, the first English physician who had done so. On his return, he took his doctor's degree, and was made professor of physic at Oxford. Henry VII. appointed him preceptor to Prince Arthur; he also became physician to the king, and to Henry VIII. He founded two medical lectures at Oxford, and one at Cambridge, and may be considered the first founder of the College of Physicians in London. Anxious to improve the practice of physic in England, he applied to Cardinal Wolsey, and obtained a patent, by which the physicians of London were incorporated, that "illiterate and ignorant mediocsters might no longer be allowed to practise the art of healing." Linacre was the first president, and held the office as long as he lived. In 1509 he entered into orders, and obtained the preceptorship of York, which he resigned on being made prebendary of Westminster. He was a man of great natural sagacity, a skilful physician, and one of the best Greek and Latin scholars of his time. b. at Canterbury, about 1460; d. 1524.

LINCOLN, Abraham, lin'-un, the son of a Kentucky farmer, who in early life was a boatman on the Mississippi and a woodcutler. Having educated himself, he became, in 1834, a member of the Illinois legislature, and soon after began to practice at the bar. Owing to his uncompromising opposition to slavery, he was elected president of the United States by the Republican and Abolitionist party in 1860. His election led to the immediate secession of the Southern States, and the civil war which followed. The result was the abolition of slavery. He was re-elected president in 1864, but, on April 14, was shot in a theatre at Washington by a fanatic named Wilkes Booth. b. 1809.

LINN, JENNY. (See GOLDBACHMIDT, Madame.)

LINDLEY, John, LL.D., lin'-le, a distinguished English botanist, was the son of a nursery-garden proprietor at Norwich, and from his earliest years evinced a great inclination for the study of botany. After translating Richard's "Analyse du Fruit" from the French, and contributing some valuable papers on botany to the "Transactions" of the Linnæan Society, he went to London, where he was engaged by Mr. Loudon to assist in the production of the "Encyclopædia of Plants." His first work of importance was published in 1832. This was the "Introduction to Systematic and Physiological Botany." For more than a quarter of a century, Dr. Lindley filled the chair of botany at University College, London, and contributed to the literature of the science of which he was an untiring exponent a great number of exceedingly important works. "The Ladies' Botany," written upon the model of Rousseau's "Botanical Letters," proved one of the most popular books on science ever brought out in England. Of a similar character are his "School Botany" and the "Botany" which he wrote for the "Library of Useful Knowledge." b. at Catton, Norfolk, 1769; d. 1865.

LINDSAY, Sir David, lin'-sai, a Scotch poet, who in 1512 became gentleman-usher to the young prince, afterwards James V., who subsequently appointed him master of the heralds' office. He wrote several poems, some of which have been printed, particularly his satires on the clergy. b. about the end of the 15th century; d. about 1568.

LINDSEY, Rev. Theophilus, an English divine, who, in 1772, abandoned all his benefices in the Established Church to found a congregation of Unitarians at London. He was the pastor of this congregation during twenty years, and wrote several excellent works, the chief of which were, "An Historical View of the State of the Unitarian Doctrine and Worship, from the Reformation to our own time," and a Vindication of his friend Dr. Priestley. b. 1733; d. in London, 1808.

LINGARD, Rev. John, D.D. LL.D., lin'-gard, an eminent English historian, was a priest of the Roman Catholic Church, and was educated in France. He held appointments in the Roman Catholic College at Ushaw, near Durham, and commenced authorship in 1805, by contributing to the Newcastle Courant a series of letters, which were afterwards republished under the title of "Catholic Loyalty Vindicated." Besides several controversial works, he wrote a "History of the Antiquities of the Anglo-Saxon Church," and made a translation of the New Testament into English. His great work was the "History of England from the first Invasion by the Romans to the Accession of William and Mary, in 1688." This has passed through many editions, and is generally allowed to be a work of great learning and research. The theological views of the writer colour many of his statements, as was to be expected; nevertheless his religious opinions are never put forth in an abusive manner. For his services to literature he was granted a pension of £300 per annum by the queen. The last years of his life were spent in retirement at Hornby, near Lancaster. b. at Winchester, 1771; d. 1851.

LINLEY, Thomas, lin'-le, an English musical composer, who set the music to Sheridan's opera, the "Duenna," and wrote the accompaniments to the airs in the "Beggars' Opera," which are still in use. His "Twelve Ballads," though now neglected, are exquisite melodies. Together with his son-in-law, Sheridan, and Dr. Ford, he was during many years engaged in the management of Drury-lane Theatre. b. at Wells, about 1725; d. 1795.

LINLEY, William, son of the preceding, wrote two comic operas, and compiled "The Dramatic Songs of Shakespeare," an excellent work. He likewise composed a large number of glee, characterized by grace and feeling. b. about 1767; d. 1835.

he afterwards studied law, and became a barrister; but was expelled from the bar, in consequence of some dispute with his professional brethren, then turned political writer, and having given offence to the ruling powers, was sent to the Bastille. On obtaining his liberty, he published an account of his imprisonment, a work which produced a strong sensation, and is said to have prepared the way for subsequent events. He retired to Brussels in 1787, and there published his "Annales Politiques," for which he was rewarded by the emperor Joseph II. with a present of 1000 ducats. He then returned to France, took an active part in the revolution, and closed his career on the guillotine, at Paris, in 1794. b. 1736.

LINNELL, John, lin'-nel, an eminent English landscape and portrait painter, commenced life as a pupil of John Varley, the father of the existing school of Water-colour Painting, and first exhibited at the Academy in 1807,—two small landscapes; at the British Institution, in 1808,—“Fishermen, a Scene from Nature;” at the Academy again in 1821,—Landscape and Portraits. During the interval, many a view “in Wales” and elsewhere, “Morning” or “Evening” effect, or “Moonlight,” or rustic scene of “Milking,” &c., were painted. From 1818 to 1820 he exhibited with the Society in Spring Gardens. Throughout the earlier and greater part of Linnell’s career, portraits far outnumbered landscapes. By portraits, miniatures, engraving—by indefatigable industry, in short, in doing whatever he could get to do—the energetic artist subsisted, until, comparatively late in his career, a fair demand came, with high prices, and conferred upon him fame and wealth. At the Academy, his landscapes were for twenty-five years the rare exceptions; at the British Institution they were more numerous. Occasionally an incident from Scripture history was introduced as a loftier key-note, to which the prevailing sentiment of studies from Nature was attuned. His portraits were works of art, and in a unique style: small in size, but deeply studied in character: simple and real. Among Linnell’s numerous portraits, may be mentioned as specimens of his best style:—a “Family Group—the Artist’s Children,” a miniature on ivory; portraits of fellow-artists,—Calcott, Mulready, Phillips, Collins; of such men as Malthus, Emrys, Warren, Whately, the elder Sterling, and Thomas Carlyle; of political notables,—Sir Robert Peel, Lord Lansdowne, &c. Among his best specimens of landscape, we may enumerate, “The Windmill,” “A Wood Scene,” “Eve of the Deluge,” “The Return of Ulysses,” “Christ and the Woman of Samaria at the Well,” “The Disobedient Prophet,” “The Last Gleam before the Storm,” “Crossing the Brook,” “The Timber Wagon,” “Barley Harvest,” “Under the Hawthorn,” &c. b. 1752.

LINNEUS, or VON LINNÉ, Carl, lin'-ne-us, a celebrated Swedish naturalist, was the son of a clergyman. After struggling with poverty during several years, he succeeded in gaining the notice of Professor Rudbeck, of the university of Upsal. That botanist took him into his house, and made him his assistant lecturer, giving him the use of a fine library and garden. In 1732 he went on his celebrated journey to botany in the university of Upsal. He also became physician to the king, who created him a knight of the Polar Star, and conferred on him a pension, with a patent of nobility. He was the founder and first president of the Academy at Stockholm, and a member of several foreign Societies. Linneus travelled into Norway, Dalecarlia, Finland, Lapland, Germany, Holland, France, and England, in eager pursuit of his favourite science. He invented a new method of dividing plants into classes, and extended the same to animals. The ardour of Linneus’s passion for the study of nature, and the uncommon application which he bestowed upon it, gave him a most comprehensive view both of its pleasures and usefulness. Availing himself of the advantages which he derived from a large share of eloquence and an animated style, he never failed to display, in a lively and convincing manner, the relation subsisting between the study of nature and the public good, and to incite the great to countenance and protect it. Under his culture, botany raised itself in Sweden to a state of perfection unknown elsewhere, and was thence disseminated throughout Europe. Linneus’s system of classification first gave to botany a clear and precise language; and, although his system was an artificial one, it yet paved the way for other discoverers, and undoubtedly led to the natural system of Jussieu. His chief works were:—“Systema Naturæ,” “Bibliotheca Botanica,” “Hortus Cliffortianus,” “Critica Botanica,” “Flora Laponica,” “Genera Plantarum,” “Amanitates Academicæ,” and “Materia Medica.” b. in the province of Smaland, Sweden, 1707; d. 1778.—His son Charles was professor of botany at Upsal. b. 1733; d. 1783.

LIPPI, Fra Filippo, lip'-pe, a celebrated Italian painter, whose life was a most romantic one. He was captured by a pirate, and carried to Africa, but was released by his master for having executed his portrait in chalk on a wall. He worked for Alfonso I. at Naples, and was employed by Cosmo de Medici at Florence. His greatest picture was the “Adoration of the Virgin.” b. at Florence, 1412; d. 1469.

LIRSUS, Justus, lip'-sus, a learned critic, who studied civil law at Louvain, and, in 1567, became secretary to Cardinal Granvelle, at Rome. In 1570 he became a professor of history at Leyden. b. 1517; d. 1606. His changes in religion were remarkable; being a Roman Catholic, then a Lutheran, afterwards a Calvinist, and lastly a Catholic again. His learning was great, but his superstition intense, attributing some of his pieces to the inspiration of the Virgin Mary. His works were published at Antwerp, in 6 volumes folio, 1637. The principal were, a “Commentary on Tacitus,” “Saturalia,” “De Militia Romanæ,” “Electorum,” “Satira Menippæa,” “De Amphitheatris,” “De Rectâ Pronunciatione Lingue Latine.”

LISLE, Sir George, lile, a gallant English officer, was the son of a bookseller in London; but on the breaking out of the civil wars, he entered into the royal army, where he behaved so well as to rise to a command. At the battle of Newbury, when it grew so dark that his men could not distinguish him, he put his shirt over his clothes, that they might be encouraged by his presence and example. He bravely held the town of Colchester a long time against the Parliamentary forces, and surrendered as prisoner of war, but was put to death by the victors, in 1848.

LISLE, Joseph Nicholas de. (See DELISLE.)

LIST, Frederick, list, a German political economist, who was long a member of the Parliament of Wirtemberg, but was expelled in consequence of the boldness of his opinions. In 1819 he originated the Zollverein, or German customs union, which was afterwards adopted by nearly all the German States. He established a newspaper, in which he promulgated his opinions, and also published a number of useful works on economic science. Numerous disappointments, however, preying upon his mind, it became uninged, and he put a period to his life in a fit of insanity in 1846, when not quite fifty-seven years of age.

LISTON, Robert, lis'-ton, a surgeon of great celebrity, was born at the manse of Ecclesmachan near Linlithgow, of which parish his father was the minister. After completing his studies at college, he took up his residence in Edinburgh, where he speedily rose to the highest eminence both as a lecturer and operator. In 1834 he was appointed surgeon to the North London Hospital; and subsequently became professor of clinical surgery in University College, and continued until his death one of the brightest ornaments of that institution. In 1846 he was appointed one of the examiners of the Royal College of Surgeons. His practice had become very extensive, and was steadily increasing; his name was familiar in every medical school throughout the world; a rich harvest of honour and wealth lay before him; but in the zenith of his manhood and his reputation, he was struck down by sudden death. His chief work was his "Principles of Surgery," the first edition of which appeared in 1833; but his fame rests mainly on his accurate anatomical knowledge, and the extraordinary facility with which he performed the most difficult operations. b. 1794; d. 1848.

LISTON, John, a very popular actor of low comedy, whose natural humour and peculiar drolleries afforded many a rich treat to the playgoers of London, was born in St. Anne's parish, Soho, and in the early period of his life was a teacher in a day-school. Forsaking the drudgery of a school-room, and fancying he possessed the necessary ability for the stage, he formed an acquaintance with Charles Mathews the elder, along with whom Liston often appeared as an amateur performer, preferring, like Mathews, the heroes of tragedy to the less exalted but more congenial characters of comedy. Having made sundry provincial trips, he was at length seen at Newcastle by Mr. C. Kemble, who recommended him to Mr. Colman, and in 1805 he appeared before a London audience at the Haymarket. He also obtained an engagement at Covent Garden, where he remained, increasing in public favour, till 1823, when Elliston having offered him £40 a week, he transferred his services to Drury Lane, and continued there till 1831; but the enormous salary of £100 a week tempted him to enlist under the banners of Madame Vestris at the Olympic Theatre, where he performed six seasons, and may be said to have closed his theatrical career, having accumulated a considerable fortune. b. 1777; d. March 22, 1846.

LITHGOW, William, lit'-go, an extraordinary Scotch traveller, who went through various parts of Europe and the East on foot, and in his travels experienced many singular adventures. At Malaga, he was seized by the Inquisition, and put to the torture; but escaped with his life, and on his arrival in England was presented to James I. on a feather-bed, being so mangled as to be incapable of standing. On his recovery, he applied to Count Gondomar, the Spanish ambassador, who promised him a reparation, but deceived him, which so provoked Lithgow, that he assaulted him at court, for which he was sent to the Marshalsea, where he remained a prisoner nine months. He published a curious account of his travels. b. 1640.

LITTLE, William, lit'-tel, an ancient English historian, known also by the name of Gulielmus Neubrigensis. He was a monk of the Abbey of Newborough, in Yorkshire, where, in his advanced years, he composed a "History of England, from the Norman Conquest to 1197," in five books. b. about 1136; d. after 1220.

LITTLETON, or LYTLETON, Thomas, lit'-el-ton, a celebrated English judge. His family name, Westcote, was changed by him, in compliance with the wishes of his maternal grandfather. After receiving a liberal education, he entered at the Inner Temple. His abilities procured him the place of steward of the court to Henry VI., and, in 1455, he went the northern circuit as a judge. Edward IV. appointed him one of the judges of the Court of Common Pleas, and, in 1475, he was created knight of the Bath. He compiled his famous book on "Tenures," according to Sir Edward Coke, while he was judge; but it was not printed until after his death. His third son, Thomas, was knighted by Henry VII., for apprehending Lambert Simnel. The eldest son, Sir William, died at his seat in Worcestershire, in 1503. Sir Thomas Littleton's book of "Tenures" still remains an indispensable text-book of the law: it is generally printed with Sir Edward Coke's Commentary. b. about 1421; d. 1491.

LITTLETON, Edward, was also an English judge of ability. He was made chief justice of the Common Pleas in 1639, and next year became keeper of the privy seal, and was made a peer, by the title of Lord Littleton. b. 1559; d. 1645.

LIVERPOOL, Charles Jenkinson, earl of, liv'-er-pool, the eldest son of Colonel Jenkinson, was educated at the Charterhouse, London, and at University College, Oxford. In 1761, he entered Parliament, and shortly after became under-secretary of state; he was made a lord of the Admiralty in 1766, vice-treasurer of Ireland in 1773, secretary-at-war in 1778, and president of the Board of Trade in 1784. He was a great favourite with George III., and was accused, and apparently with truth, of being one of the secret and unconstitutional advisers of that monarch. He was created Baron Hawkesbury in 1786, and Earl of Liverpool in 1796. b. 1727; d. 1808.

LIVERPOOL, Robert Banks Jenkinson, earl of, son of the preceding, received his education at the same seminaries of learning as his father. On quitting college, he spent some time in foreign travel; was in Paris during the destruction of the Bastille, and rendered himself useful at that period to the English government by the information he furnished to Mr. Pitt. He was elected M.P. for Rye in 1790, but did not take his seat for a year, being at the time of his election under the age required for members of the House. In 1796, his father being created earl of Liverpool, he became Lord Hawkesbury, and was made a commissioner of Indian affairs. In 1801 he was appointed secretary of state for foreign affairs; which office, four years after, he exchanged for that of the home department. This he resigned on the dissolution of the Addington administration; and, at the death of Mr. Pitt, succeeded him as lord warden of the Cinque Ports. In 1807 he was again minister for the home department; and on the death of his father, in the year following, succeeded to the title of earl of Liverpool. After the assassination of Mr. Perceval, in 1812, Lord Liverpool was raised to the premiership, and held that elevated station till 1827, when an apoplectic and paralytic attack rendered him incapable of public business. His opposition to reform, and the prosecution of the friends of change between 1817 and 1820, rendered him exceedingly unpopular, especially in Scotland, where his name, along with those of Lords Sidmouth and Castlereagh, was hated with a perfect hatred. b. 1770; d. 1828.

LIVIA, liv'-i-a, a celebrated Roman lady, wife of Tiberius Claudius Nero, by whom she had the emperor Tiberius and Drusus Germanicus. Augustus fell in love with her, and married her while she was pregnant. She prevailed on Augustus to adopt her children by Drusus; but she was suspected of poisoning the emperor to procure the throne for her son Tiberius, who treated her with ingratitude, and when she died, a.d. 29, refused her funeral honours.

LIVINGSTON, William, liv'-ing-ston, an American statesman, who was also an author, filled several important situations at New York, and, after the establishment of the native government, was chosen governor of New Jersey. He was a zealous advocate of American independence: wrote "A Review of the Military Operations in North America, from 1733 to 1763," "Philosophical Solitude," a poem; and several other works. b. 1723; d. 1790.

LIVINGSTON, Robert, an eminent American politician, was a native of New York, in which city he practised the law with great success. He was one of the committee named to prepare the declaration of independence; was appointed secretary of foreign affairs in 1780; and, throughout the war of the revolution, signalized himself by his zeal and efficiency in the cause. He was afterwards chancellor of the state of New York; and, in 1801, was appointed by President Jefferson, minister plenipotentiary to France, where, during a residence of several years, he was treated with marked attention by Bonaparte, who, on his quitting Paris, presented to him a splendid snuff-box, with a miniature likeness of himself, painted by Isabey. b. 1746; d. 1813.

LIVINGSTONE, David, liv'-ing-stone, a distinguished African traveller, who, under considerable difficulties, continued to pursue the studies of medicine and theology while engaged in a cotton factory at Glasgow. He subsequently requested to be sent as a missionary to China; but England being at the time at war with that country, he embarked, in 1840, for Africa. After residing some time at the Cape of Good Hope, in order to acquire the dialects spoken in the interior, he entered upon his religious labours, and lived chiefly with the Bechuannas, to whose customs he accommodated himself, and to whom he preached the doctrines of Christianity. In 1849 he set out, and succeeded in verifying the existence of Lake Ngami. He undertook a second expedition in the following year, but was arrested by illness. In 1851 he penetrated beyond the chief city of the Makololo tribe, and found a vast country, fertile, with navigable rivers, and rich in mineral wealth, and, at the same time, inhabited by a friendly and industrious people. After undergoing the severest hardships, he reached the Portuguese station of St. Paul, on the west coast of Africa. He afterwards set out to traverse the continent towards the south, and reached Quilimane in 1853. Returning to England, he was rewarded with the gold medals of the Geographical Societies of London and Paris. He published, in 1837, a narrative of his labours and adventures, under the title, "Missionary Travels and Researches in South Africa," a work which excited considerable interest. In 1853 he left England, provided with a steam-yacht of light draught, to ascend the African rivers, and with scientific apparatus to enable him to accurately determine his observations. From this time to 1863, he explored a great part of the country through which the Zambesi runs, and visited Lake Nyassa. In 1861 he once more returned to England, but started to make fresh explorations in Africa in 1865. In this expedition he went northward to lake Tanganyika, to determine, if possible, whether this or lake Albert Nyanza was the most southern reservoir of the Nile. No news of the traveller reached England for several months, when in March, 1867, it was reported that he had been killed in a skirmish with the natives. An expedition sent out the same year to inquire into the truth of this rumour, proved it to be without foundation; and, in 1868, news was received from the traveller himself of his safety, and that he was exploring the eastern parts of equatorial Africa, between the equator and the northern limits of lake Tanganyika. b. 1817.

LIVY, Titus, liv'-i-us (LIVY, liv'-e), an illustrious Roman historian, of whose life very little is known. He appears to have resided at Rome, and to have been on intimate terms with Augustus, who made him tutor to his grandson Claudius. His history was originally produced in 142 books; but out of that number only 35 are now extant; the rest are irretrievably lost. It began with the foundation of Rome, and ended with the death of Drusus, in Germany, b.c. 9. The work is popular on account of its beautiful style; but its author was deficient in "that love of truth, diligence, and care in consulting authorities," which are the first requisites of a truly great historian. The best German translation is that by Wagner; Baker's is, perhaps, the best English reproduction. A literal translation has been published in Bohn's Classical Library. b. at Patavium (Padua), b.c. 59; d. a.d. 17.

LLORD, David, a biographical writer, was a native of Merionethshire, and was ordained at Oxford. He became reader at the Charterhouse, London, and then prebendary of St. Asaph. His most important works are—"Memoirs of the Statesmen and Favourites of England," "Memoirs of Persons who suffered for their Loyalty," a "History of Plots and Conspiracies," &c. b. 1625; d. 1691.

while in that situation published a poem called the "Aeolus." On account of his irregularities, he was obliged to resign his place in the school, after which he subsisted almost entirely on charity, particularly that afforded by his friend Churchill. He was the author of the "Capricious Lover," a comic opera, and other dramatic works. p. 176*k*.

LLOYD, William, a learned English prelate, was educated at Oxford; obtained a prebend in the collegiate church of Ripon soon after the Restoration; was appointed chaplain to the king in 1666; made a prebendary of Salisbury the year following; and, in 1680, was raised to the bishopric of St. Asaph, when he joined Archbishop Sancroft and other prelates in presenting a petition to James II. deprecating his assumed power of suspending the laws against popery. After the Revolution he was made almoner to king William; was promoted to the see of Lichfield in 1692, and subsequently to that of Worcester. His writings relate to divinity and history, and among them are, "A Dissertation upon Daniel's Prophecy of the Seventy Weeks," "An Account of the Life of Pythagoras," "The History of the Government of the Church," &c. p. 1627; p. 1717.

LLOYD, Humphry, an eminent military officer and writer on tactics, served with great reputation in the Austrian, Prussian, and Russian armies, and rose to the rank of general. On his return to England he surveyed the coasts, wrote a memoir on the "Invasion and Defence of Great Britain," "The History of the Seven Years' War," and other military treatises. p. in Wales, 1729; p. 1783.

LLEWELYN AP GRIFFITH, Iolo-ol-in, the last prince of North Wales, who reigned from 1216 to 1242. He was a brave prince, and resisted the ambition of Edward I., king of England, a long time; but at last fell, and with him the independence of the Welsh as a distinct nation.

LLEWELYN AP ITHYLLT, a Welsh prince, who succeeded to the principalities of South Wales and Powys, in 903. In 1021, Anlaff, at the head of a Scotch army, invaded his territories, and was joined by Hywel and Meredydd, sons of Edwin ap Rhys. Llewelyn marched against them, and defeated them, but fell in the battle.

LOBAN, Count, lo'-ban, a distinguished French soldier, whose name was Mouton, was, at the breaking out of the revolution, employed as a journeyman baker in Phalsburg, Meurthe. On entering the army he signalized himself by acts of bravery, which obtained for him various steps of promotion, until, in 1804, at the camp of Boulogne, Napoleon, amid the applause of the whole army, made him his aide-de-camp, and gave him the command of the third regiment of the line. In the campaign of 1805 his gallantry obtained him the rank of general of brigade, and in 1807 that of general of division. In the campaign of 1809 he defended the little island of Lobau (from which he subsequently took his title) against the Austrians, completely beat them off, and conducted his troops, comparatively uninjured, across the Danube. In 1812 he was made aide-major of the imperial guard; in 1813, commander of the first corps of the grand army; and, in 1814, a chevalier of St. Louis. During the "hundred days" he joined Napoleon, and was made commandant of the first military division, and a member of the Chamber of Peers. In the brief campaign of 1815, he commanded the sixth corps of the army of the north, and defeated the Prussians on the 8th of June, but was wounded and taken prisoner at Waterloo. He remained in England till 1818; he was then permitted to return to France, and in 1823 was chosen deputy for the Meurthe, and took his seat on the opposition benches. He took an active part in the revolution of 1830; and when Lafayette resigned the command of the national guard, Count Loban was appointed his successor. Shortly afterwards he received the bâton of a marshal from Louis Philippe, by whom he was greatly respected. p. 1770; p. 1730.

LOBEIRA, Vasco, lo'-beer'-a, author of the celebrated romance of "Amadis de Gaul," was a native of Porto, in Portugal. In 1386 he was knighted by John I. on the field of battle at Aljubarotta. Sonthey translated Lobeira's work, and proved it to be an original, and not a translation from the French, as many had previously imagined. p. 1403.

LOBO, Jerome, lo'-bo, a Portuguese Jesuit, who travelled through Abyssinia as a missionary, and published a curious account of that country, which was rendered into French by Legrand, whence it was translated into English by Dr. Samuel Johnson. p. at Lisbon, 1678.

LOCK, Matthew, lok, an eminent English composer, who set the music to "Macbeth," the instrumental music to the "Tempest," and wrote many other excellent pieces. He is also stated to have composed the music for the public entry of Charles II. into London. p. at Exeter, about 1635; p. 1677.

LOCKE, John, a celebrated English philosopher, who was educated at Christ Church, Oxford. After taking his degree in arts, he entered on the study of physic; but, making the acquaintance of Lord Ashley, afterwards earl of Shaftesbury, who became his patron, and urged him to apply to the study of politics, Locke followed his advice, and rendered himself serviceable to his lordship and his party, who, having obtained the grant of Carolina, employed him in drawing up the constitution for the government of that province. Lord Shaftesbury being appointed chancellor in 1673, made Locke secretary of presentations, which place he lost the year following, when his patron was deprived of the great seal. He continued, however, his secretaryship of the Board of Trade, of which Lord Shaftesbury was president. In 1674 that commission was dissolved, and Locke, being apprehensive of consumption, went to Montpellier, and continued abroad till 1679, when he was sent for by Lord Shaftesbury, who was appointed president of the council; but, in 1682, that nobleman, to avoid a prosecution for high treason, withdrew to Holland, and was accompanied by his friend. In 1684, Mr. Locke was removed from his student's place at Christ Church, by the king's command; and, the year following, the English envoy demanded him of the States of Holland, on suspicion of his being concerned in Monmouth's rebellion, which occasioned him to keep private several months, during which he was employed in finishing his "Essay on the Human Understanding," which, however, was not published till after the revolution of 1688, when he returned to England. He spent the latter years of his life at Oates, in Essex, the seat of Sir Francis Masham, who invited him to reside in his family. His "Letters on Toleration" were published to promote a scheme which King William had much at heart,—that of reconciling all sects of Christians. In his retirement he also wrote several of his works. His principal works are an "Essay on the Human Understanding," "Letters on Toleration," "Treatise on Civil Government," "Thoughts concerning Education," and letters and miscellaneous pieces. B. at Wrington, near Bristol, 1632; D. 1704.

LOCKE, Joseph, an English civil engineer, studied under George Stephenson, the eminent railway engineer, and acted as one of his assistants during the construction of the Manchester and Liverpool Railway. He was subsequently extensively employed as engineer of various railways, both in England and on the continent of Europe. The Paris and Rouen, Rouen and Havre, Paris and Lyons, Caen and Cherbourg, Barcelona and Mattaro, the Dutch, Rhenish, and several other lines, were constructed under his auspices. In 1817 he was returned to Parliament as member for Moniton; whereupon he took his place among the liberals. He was a fellow of the Royal Society, and vice-president of the Institution of Civil Engineers. B. at Attercliffe, near Sheffield, 1805; D. 1860.

LOCKHART, John Gibson, lok'-hart, a modern English writer, author of the "Life of Sir Walter Scott," and other valuable contributions to literature, was the son of a minister of the Presbyterian Church of Scotland, and was educated at Glasgow University, and afterwards at Balliol College, Oxford. After a short sojourn in Germany, he went to Edinburgh in 1816, intending to practise the law at the Scottish bar. He soon, however, became a prominent member of a small band of Scotch writers, whose chief was Wilson. In 1817, on the establishment of "Blackwood's Magazine," Lockhart was one of its principal writers. The Toryism of the new periodical, and of its writers, caused both to become especial favourites with Sir Walter Scott, whose political views were of the same nature. Lockhart, in a short time, became an intimate friend of the great novelist, who advanced his interests on every occasion. In 1820 he married Sophia, eldest daughter of Scott, and went to live near Abbotsford. During the succeeding five years he worked with great industry and success in literature. He produced, among others, "Valerius, a Roman story," "Adam Blair, a story of Scottish Life," the "Life of Burns;" the "Life of Napoleon;" and published his translations of the Spanish Ballads. In 1826 he became editor of the "Quarterly Review," and retained the appointment until 1853. In biography and biographical sketches he was particularly excellent, as is attested by his "Life of Scott," and the smaller piece, entitled "Theodore Hook." His health becoming delicate, he resigned the editorship of the "Quarterly Review," and went to Rome in 1853; but, after a short stay, he took up his residence in Scotland. B. at Cambusnethan, Scotland, 1794; D. at Abbotsford, 1854.

LOCKMAN, John, lok'-man, an English author, who wrote "Rosalinda," a musical drama; "David's Lamentations," an oratorio; and was one of the compilers of the great "Historical Dictionary." D. 1771.

LONG, Thomas, lodj, an English author of the 16th century. The records of his life are very obscure, but he is believed to have been, in turn, lawyer, soldier, physician, and author. He was an industrious writer, and translated the works of Josephus and Seneca. Two of his plays have been preserved in Dodsley's Collection. In 1840 Mr. Collier, in his book entitled "Shakspeare's Library," reprinted his novel "Rosalinde;" whence it was seen that many of its leading incidents were identical with those in Shakspeare's "As you Like it," the great poet, and not the obscure novelist, being, however, the borrower. B. about 1556; D., it is supposed of the plague, 1625.

LONG, Edmund, Clarendon king-at-arms, K.H. and F.S.A., wrote "Lives of Illustrious Personages of Great Britain," "Illustrations of British History," "Life of Julius Cæsar," several papers in the "Quarterly Review," and originated "Lodge's Peerage." He had in early life been a cornet of dragoons. B. 1756; D. 1839.

LOFT, Capel, loft, a barrister, and the author of several works in polite literature, was educated at Eton and Cambridge; called to the bar in 1775; and, on succeeding to the Capel estates, in 1781, removed to Troston, in Suffolk, and became an active magistrate of the county till 1800; when, for having too zealously exerted himself as under-sheriff to delay the execution of a young woman who had received sentence of death, he was removed from the commission. Mr. Loft was a very considerable contributor to most of the magazines of the day; and it was to his active patronage of Robert Bloomfield that the public was indebted for the "Farmer's Boy," and other poems by that author. B. 1751; D. 1824.

LOFTUS, Dudley, loft'-us, an oriental scholar, who studied at Trinity College, Dublin, and at Oxford; and became vicar-general and judge of the Prerogative Court in Ireland. Among his writings are, a "History of the Eastern and Western Churches," "The History of our Saviour, taken from the Greek, Syriac, and other Oriental Authors," "A Translation of the Ethiopic New Testament into Latin," &c. B. near Dublin, 1618; D. 1696.

LOGAN, John, log'-an, a Scotch divine and poet, who, in 1781, published the "Philosophy of History," which he had delivered as lectures at Edinburgh. The same year he printed his poems in one volume. His last publication was a pamphlet, entitled "A Review of the Principal Charges against Mr. Hastings," for which the publisher was tried and acquitted. B. in Scotland, 1748; D. in London, 1788.

LOGGAN, David, log'-gan, an eminent line-engraver, who went to London during the Commonwealth, and settling there, was extensively employed. His plates of the colleges of Oxford and Cambridge were excellent specimens of art. During the reign of Charles II. he engraved nearly all the illustrious personages of the time. B. at Dentzie, 1635; D. in London, 1693.

LOKMAN, lok'-man, an Abyssinian philosopher, of whom hardly any authentic particulars are known. He appears to have been of humble origin, and some say he was a slave. It is related that he obtained his liberty on the following occasion. His master having given him a bitter melon to eat, he ate it all. Surprised at his exact obedience, his master asked how it was possible for him to eat such a nauseous fruit? The slave replied, that he had received so many favours from the kindness of his master, that it could be no wonder if, once in his life, he ate a bitter melon from his hand. This generous answer immediately procured him his liberty. There are so many circumstances related of him that agree with what is said of Æsop, and their fables are so much alike, that both are conjectured to have been one and the same person. Lokman's Fables were printed in a collection by Galland, at Paris, in 1724.

LOLLARD, Walter, lol'-lard, the founder of a religious sect in Germany, about 1315. His followers were the pioneers of the Reformation. The term "lollard" was applied in England to Wickliffe and his adherents. They were said by the monks to have been grossly licentious and heretical; but as to this we have only the testimony of their enemies. Lollard himself was burnt at Cologne in 1322.

LOMBARD, John Louis, lom'-bar, an eminent French writer on military tactics, was educated for the legal profession, but quitted it to become professor of artillery, first at Metz, and afterwards at the military school of Auxonne. He translated into French "Robin's Principles of Gunnery," and wrote, "Aide Mémoire," for the use of French artillery officers; "Treatise on the Flight of Projectiles," &c. b. at Strasbourg, 1723; d. 1794.

LOMONOSOV, Michael Vasilievitch, lol'-mo-nosoff, the father of modern Russian literature, was son of a fisherman, and, having fled from his father, took refuge in a monastery, where he received his education, which he afterwards improved at a German university. In 1741 he returned to his native country, and became member of the Academy of Petersburg, and professor of chemistry. In 1760 he was made rector of the university and gymnasium. The odds of Lomonosov are greatly admired for originality of invention, sublimity of sentiment, and energy of language; and compensate for the turgid style which, in some instances, has been imputed to them, by that spirit and fire which are the principal characteristics in this species of composition. Pindar was his great model. He enriched his native language with various kinds of metre. His works, in 3 vols. 8vo, consist of pieces in verse and prose, the last being chiefly philosophical dissertations. b. near Kholmogor, Russia, 1711; d. 1765.

LONDONDERRY, Robert Stewart, second Marquis of, lon'-don-der'-re, a celebrated English diplomatist and minister, more generally known as Lord Castlereagh, first entered the British Parliament in 1791, but did not make his maiden speech until the following year. In 1798 he became Viscount Castlereagh, and, in the first Parliament after the Union, sat for the county of Down. During the Pitt and Addington administrations, he was in office as either privy councillor, president of the board of control, or secretary of state for war and the colonies. In 1807 he joined the Portland ministry, and being generally believed to be answerable for the conduct of the war, became, after the disastrous Walcheren expedition, perhaps the most unpopular of public men. His policy led to a duel between himself and Mr. Canning, at that time secretary for foreign affairs, in which the latter was severely wounded. He resigned shortly afterwards, and remained out of office until 1812, when he received the appointment of secretary of state for the foreign department, and on the death of Mr. Perceval became ministerial leader of the House of Commons. At the peace of Paris, May, 1814, he represented the king of England, as he also did at the congress of Vienna some months later, and again, in 1815, after the battle of Waterloo. For these duties his dignified person and manners peculiarly fitted him. In 1818 he was created knight of the Garter, and on the death of his father, three years afterwards, became marquis of Londonderry. As a statesman, his views were narrow and unphilosophical; his oratory was unequal, sometimes approaching brilliancy, but often inelegant and involved; but his great talents for business, combined with his firmness and charm of manner, caused him to achieve higher things than more richly-gifted men. b. in Ireland, 1769; d. by his own hand, 1822.

LONDONDERRY, Charles William Vane, Marquis of, son of Robert, first marquis of Londonderry, and half-brother of the famous Viscount Castlereagh, when little more than fourteen years of age entered the army as an ensign in the 103th Foot, accompanied the earl of Moira in his expedition to Holland in 1794, was attached to Colonel Crawford's mission to the Austrian armies from 1795 to 1797, and was severely wounded at the battle of Dornwerth. On his return home he was appointed aide-de-camp to his uncle, earl Camden, then lord-lieutenant of Ireland; and after rising through the various grades of his profession, he joined Sir John Moore in the Peninsula, as brigadier-general, and distinguished himself in the field. He subsequently held the post of adjutant-general to the army under Sir Arthur Wellesley from 1809 to 1813. During the pursuit of Marshal Soult's army across the Douro, he led two squadrons of the 16th and 20th Dragoons, which charged the enemy most gallantly, and took numerous prisoners; and on other occasions his name was honourably mentioned, particularly in the affair at El Bodon. For these services he received the thanks of the House of Commons, and was created a knight of the Bath and of various foreign orders. In 1813 he went to Berlin as ambassador; and during the summer, acted as military commissioner to the armies of the allied sovereigns, and was especially charged with the supervision of Bernadotte, the Swedish king, who had armed his troops by the help of subsidies from England, and was at that time wavering in his policy. Next year he was raised to the peerage by the title of Baron Stewart, was appointed ambassador to Austria, and one of the plenipotentiaries at the congress of Vienna in 1814 and 1815. In 1822 he succeeded his brother in the Irish marquisate; and the year following was made earl Vane and viscount Seaham in the peerage of the United Kingdom, with special remainder to his children by his second wife, in right of whom he had previously assumed the name of Vane. Besides attending regularly to his Parliamentary duties, Lord Londonderry displayed great energy in developing the resources of the vast possessions which he had acquired through his wife; and among other works with which his name will be connected, was the construction of Seaham Harbour, a private enterprise almost unprecedented in its magnitude and importance. In politics he was attached to the Tory party, and consequently unpopular; but he was a man of generous impulses, and his exertions to mitigate the rigour of Louis Napoleon's imprisonment in the fortress of Ham, and subsequently, when the change in fortune's wheel had made him prince-president of France, to obtain from him the liberation of Abd-el-Kader, gained for Lord Londonderry the favourable regard even of his political opponents. In 1843 he obtained the command of the 2nd Life Guards; and in 1853 succeeded the duke of Wellington in the insignia of the Garter. Lord Londonderry was also known as an author, and among his works may be mentioned, "A Steam Voyage to Constantinople;" "Story of the Peninsular War" (which has gone through many editions); "A Tour in the North of Europe;" and his latest service to literature was his publication of the correspondence of his brother, the second marquis of Londonderry. b. 1778; d. 1854.

LONG, Thomas, long, a nonjuring divine, received his education at Exeter College, Oxford, and was made prebend of Exeter after the Restoration, but was deposed at the Revolution for refusing the oaths. He wrote "Calvinus Redivivus;" "History of the Donatists;" "History of Popish and Fanatical Plots;" "Vindication of King Charles's claim to the authorship of 'Eikon Basilike,'" "Vindication of the Primitive Christians in Point of Obedience," &c. b. 1621; d. 1700.

LONG, Roger, an English divine, eminent as an astronomer and a mathematician, received his education at Pembroke Hall, Cambridge, of which college he became master in 1733. He was Lowndes's professor of astronomy; held livings in Huntingdonshire and Essex; and was the author of a "Treatise on Astronomy," and constructed, at Pembroke Hall, a hollow sphere, 18 feet in diameter, on the interior surface of which were represented the stars, constellations, &c., the whole being moved by means of machinery. b. 1679; d. 1770.

LONGBEARD, William, long-beerd, a priest in the reign of Richard I., who excited an insurrection about 1196; and, by his eloquence, irritated the people against the government, for which he was torn in pieces by horses, with some of his companions.

LONGFELLOW, Henry Wadsworth, long-fel-to, an eminent American poet, who, while at Bowdoin College, wrote verse for the United States "Literary Gazette;" and, although intended for the law, his tastes were from the earliest period decidedly literary. Accordingly, he eagerly embraced the proposal of making him professor of modern languages in his college, and set out for Europe in order to qualify himself for the post. He travelled in France, Germany, Italy, Spain, Holland, and England, and studied the language and literature of each country. He returned to his native country in 1829, and entered upon his duties; commencing his literary career about the same period, by contributing biography and criticism to the "North American Review." His first important prose work was produced in 1835, with the title, "Outre-Mer, or a Pilgrimage beyond the Sea." On the resignation of Mr. Ticknor, the professorial chair of modern languages and literature in Harvard University was offered to him; upon which he again visited Germany, and, on this occasion, extended his travels to Denmark, Sweden, and Switzerland. In 1838 he entered upon his duties at Harvard University, and soon afterwards gave to the world those works upon which his reputation chiefly rests. His prose romance "Hyperion" was published in 1840; "Kavanagh," a poetico-philosophical tale, in 1840. His poems were published in the 1851; "The Song of Hiawatha," 1855; "Miles Standish," 1858; "Tales of a Wayside Inn," 1863; and "Flower de Luce." His most important work is a translation of the "Divina Commedia" of the Italian poet Dante, published 1867. Götthe, Jean-Paul, and other German authors have had an especially marked influence on his writings. b. at Portland, Maine, U.S., 1807.

LONGINUS, Dionysius, lon-jî-nus, a celebrated Athenian philosopher and rhetorician, was related to Plutarch, and spent the early part of his life in travelling, after which he settled at Athens, where he taught the Platonic philosophy and rhetoric with great reputation; but was called thence by Zenobia, queen of Palmyra, to be tutor to her children. The queen was then at war with the emperor Aurelian, and, being defeated by him near Antioch, was compelled to shut herself up in Palmyra. The emperor summoned her to surrender and she returned an answer, drawn up by Longinus, which filled him with anger; he laid siege to the city, which was surrendered to him a.d. 273. The queen and Longinus endeavoured to fly to Persia, but were overtaken and made prisoners. The queen, intimidated, laid the blame of vindicating the liberty of her country on its true author, and the brave Longinus was carried away to immediate execution. He composed critical remarks on the ancient Greek authors; but only a part of his inestimable "Treatise on the Sublime" exists.

LOPES, Fernao, lo-pai, a Portuguese historian, who wrote a work, the "Chronicle of Joam," describing the great struggle between Portugal and Castile, towards the close of the 11th century, which, as a picture of manners, has been compared to that of Froissart for accurate and dramatic reality. Lopes is the oldest of the Portuguese chroniclers.

LOPEZ, Don Francisco Solano, lo-pes, succeeded his father, Don Carlos Lopez, as president of Paraguay in 1862. He declared war against Brazil in 1865, and maintained his ground against the allied troops of Brazil, Uruguay, and the Argentine Republic until 1869, when he was compelled to quit the country, and seek safety in flight. Not content with causing the death of thousands of his countrymen by hunger, privation, the bullet, and the sword during the war, he maltreated and executed every one whom he suspected of opposition to his views, causing even his own brother to be almost cut to pieces by the lash of the executioner, and then shot. b. 1827.—After his flight from Paraguay he was closely pursued by Colonel Martinez, the husband of one of his victims, who had sworn to kill him wherever he might find him.

LORiot, Anthony Joseph, lo-ré-o, an excellent French mechanician, who, in 1753, presented to the Academy of Sciences a machine, by means of which a child might raise a weight of several thousand pounds. He afterwards constructed machines for the naval service, and for working the mines of Pompeau; claimed the merit of inventing a kind of cement used in building, called "mortier Lorient," and a hydraulic machine for raising water. b. 1716; d. 1782.

OF BIOGRAPHY.

Lothaire

was eldest son of Louis-le-Débonnaire, and was associated with him in the empire in 817, and named king of the Lombards in 820. He afterwards dethroned his father, and imprisoned him in a monastery; upon which his brothers Louis and Charles joined their forces against him, and defeated him at Fontenay, in 841. Two years afterwards, a treaty was concluded between the three brothers, by which Lothaire retained the title of emperor, with Italy and some French provinces beyond the Rhine and the Rhone. Louis had a tract of country bordering on the Rhine, and Charles became king of France. n. 855.

LOTHAIRE II., emperor of Germany and duke of Saxony, between 1125 and 1137, died in Italy, on his return from an expedition against Roger, king of Sicily.

LOTHAIRE, king of France, was the son of Louis IV., whom he succeeded in 954. He made war against the emperor Otto II. p. 984.

LOTHAR, king of Lorraine, was son of the emperor Lothaire I. n. 869.

LOUNOX, John Claudius, lou'-don, a writer of considerable celebrity on agricultural and botanical subjects. Between the years 1820-43 he produced a number of works of the highest importance to the scientific farmer, the gardener, and the botanist. The Encyclopædias of Gardening, Agriculture, Plants, Cottage and Villa Architecture, may be quoted as examples of his great industry and usefulness. n. at Can-buslang, Lanarkshire, 1783; p. 1813.

LONDON, Mrs., wife of the preceding, wrote several valuable works, chiefly connected with botany; such as "The Ladies' Flower Garden," "Botany for Ladies," "The Ladies' Country Companion," &c. n. 1800; p. 1858.

LOUIS I., surnamed le Débonnaire, loo'-e, emperor of the West, and king of France, succeeded his father Charlemagne in 814. In 817 he associated his eldest son, Lothaire, with himself in the empire, and gave to his other two sons, Pepin and Louis, the kingdoms of Aquitaine and Bavaria. This division gave such offence to Bernard, king of Italy, the illegitimate son of Pepin, eldest son of Charlemagne, that he raised an army against the emperor, who put himself at the head of his troops, and marched into Italy. Bernard, deserted by his troops, was taken prisoner and deprived of sight. The reign of Louis was troubled by continual rebellions of his sons. In 839, Louis of Bavaria, who thought he had not got a large enough share of his father's possessions, invaded Suabia. The emperor marched against him, but died on his way, on an island of the Rhine, near Mayence, 840.

LOUIS II., surnamed the Young, was only son of Lothaire I., and was created king of Italy in 844, and ascended the imperial throne in 855. n. about 822; p. 875.

LOUIS III., called the Blind, was the son of Boson, king of Provence, and Ermengarde, daughter of the emperor Louis the Young. He succeeded his father at the age of 10, and in 900 contested the imperial throne with Berenger, who, having surprised him at Verona, deprived him of his eyes. n. about 923.

LOUIS IV., was the son of the emperor Arnulphus, whom he succeeded. The empire was a scene of desolation during his reign, being constantly ravaged by the Hungarians. n. 911.—He was the last prince in Germany of the Carolingian race.

LOUIS V., commonly called Louis of Bavaria, was the son of Louis the Severe, duke of Bavaria. He was elected emperor in 1314, and at the same time Frederick le Bel was chosen at Cologne by another party of electors, which occasioned a war between them. Frederick was taken prisoner, but gained his liberty by renouncing his claim in favour of his rival. Pope John XXII. being opposed to that arrangement, in 1322 issued his bull of deposition against Louis, who, in return, appealed to a general council, and marched into Italy, where he procured the election of Peter de Corbiere (Nicholas V.), and by whom he was crowned at Rome. Five electors, on the other hand, chose Charles of Luxembourg to be emperor; on which the civil war was about to be renewed, when Louis was killed by a fall from his horse, in 1347.

LOUIS I., king of France. (See LOUIS I., emperor of the West.)

LOUIS II., the Stammerer, so called from a defect in his speech, the son of Charles the Bald, was crowned king of Aquitaine in 867, and succeeded his father as king of France in 877. He was obliged to deliver up Provence to Boson, by whom it was erected into a kingdom. His children were Louis and Carloman, who divided the kingdom between them, and a posthumous son, who was afterwards Charles the Simple. n. 846; p. at Compiègne, 870.

LOUIS III., the son of the preceding, and brother of Carloman, enjoyed the kingdom with his brother. He defeated Hugh the Bastard, son of Lothaire, marched against Boson, king of Provence, and opposed the progress of the Normans. He died without issue, 882.

LOUIS IV., was the son of Charles the Simple, and ascended the throne in 936. He invaded Normandy, but was defeated and taken prisoner in 944. He regained his liberty the following year, after being obliged to cede Normandy to Richard, son of Duke William, and Laon to Hugh, father of Hugh Capet. He afterwards recovered the latter territory, and died of a fall from his horse, 954.

LOUIS V., surnamed Painless, or Do-Nothing, succeeded his father Lotharius in 956, and soon after took the city of Rheims. He was preparing to march to the assistance of the count of Barcelona, who was pressed by the Saracens, when he is said to have been poisoned by his queen, 957. After his death, the crown devolved by right to his uncle, Charles, duke of Lower Lorraine, but that prince being disliked by the French, it was conferred on Hugh Capet.

LOUIS VI., called the Fat, the son of Philip I., succeeded to the throne in 1103. His reign was disturbed by wars with the Normans, and also by feuds among his vassals. He also quarrelled with Henry I. of England, and thus was commenced the war between the English and French which lasted during three centuries. He was a good and wise monarch, and was ably supported by his minister, the Abbé Suger. n. 1137.

LOUIS VII. was the son and successor of the preceding. He had a dispute with Pope Innocent II. on the right of presenting to benefices, and was excommunicated by that pontiff, who also laid his kingdom under interdict. Thibault, king of Champagne, being devoted to the pope, Louis declared war against him, and ravaged his country. A reconciliation afterwards took place between them, and Louis, by the persuasions of St. Bernard, engaged in a crusade, but was defeated by Saladin, and, on his return to Europe, was taken at sea by the Greeks, but delivered by the general of Roger, king of Sicily. Having divorced his queen, Eleanor, she married Henry of Normandy, afterwards Henry II. of England, to whom she brought, as her dower, the provinces of Poitou and Guicenne. This produced a new war between England and France, which lasted, with little intermission, twenty-one years. n. 1120; p. 1180.

Louis VIII., surnamed Cœur-de-Lion, was the son of Philip Augustus. He signalized himself in several expeditions during the lifetime of his father, and ascended the throne in 1223. He took Avignon, and wrested Rochelle and several other places from the English; but died of a pestilential disease in his camp at Montpensier, in Auvergne, in 1226. n. 1187.

Louis IX., called Saint Louis, the son of the preceding, by Blanche of Castile, ascended the throne in 1226. He maintained a successful war against Henry III., king of England, which ended in a peace favourable to Louis, who, having been seized with a dangerous illness, made a vow that, if he recovered, he would take the cross for the purpose of regaining the Holy Land from the infidels. Being restored to health, he spent four years in preparing for this expedition, and, in 1248, embarked for the East with a great force, leaving his kingdom to the care of his mother. After taking Damietta, he passed the Nile, and obtained two great victories over the Saracens. At length famine and disease attacked his army, and the king, with his nobles, fell into the hands of the infidels. Louis, to recover his liberty, consented to pay a large ransom, to deliver up Damietta, and to conclude a truce for ten years. After spending four years in Palestine, he returned to France. In 1270 he undertook another expedition against the infidels, but died in his camp before Tunis, in Africa, the same year. He was canonized in 1297. n. at Poissy, 1215.

Louis X., surnamed Hutin, an old French term for "quarrelsome," succeeded Philip the Fair, his father, in 1314, having before been king of Navarre, in right of his mother. He recalled the Jews to his kingdom, and made a successful war against the count of Flanders. n. at Paris, 1289; n. at Vincennes, 1316.

Louis XI., son of Charles VII., distinguished himself by his valour in his youth, particularly against the English, whom he compelled to raise the siege of Dieppe, in 1443; but the glory he hereby acquired was tarnished by his rebelling against his father, who died of a broken heart in 1461. Louis, on ascending the throne, treated France as a conquered country, for which several of the nobility formed a league against him, and some of his own family joined the malcontents. After a severe but indecisive battle at Montheri, in 1465, a peace was concluded, by which Louis gave to the leaguers all their demands; but not fulfilling his engagements, the war was rekindled, and he was made prisoner by the duke of Burgundy, who compelled him to make a peace still more disadvantageous than the former. In 1474, the dukes of Burgundy and Brittany formed a league with Edward IV., king of England, against Louis, who, however, contrived to disengage the English monarch from the alliance, by a treaty concluded at Amiens in 1475. The duke of Burgundy was in consequence obliged to conclude a peace nine years. Louis was a singular compound of firmness and superstition. His most prominent trait was, however, duplicity of disposition; his constant maxim being, "He who cannot dissemble knows not how to reign." But, by protecting the middle classes and favouring industry, he was a benefactor of his country. n. 1423; p. 1483.

Louis XII., surnamed the Father of his People, was the son of Charles, duke of Orleans. He succeeded Charles VIII. in 1493, and took Milan, Genoa, and Naples; but, after ravaging Italy, the French were expelled in 1513. Henry VIII. of England, the Venetians, and the Swiss attacked Louis in his own dominions, and he was obliged to sue for peace. p. 1516.

Louis XIII. was the son of Henry IV. Being only nine years old at the death of his father, the kingdom was placed under the regency of his mother, Mary de Medici. The Marshal d'Ancre had an uncontrolled sway at court till 1617, when he was assassinated, with the king's consent, and his wife condemned to death as a sorceress. Vitri, the perpetrator of this act, was made a marshal of France; the bishop of Luçon, afterwards Cardinal Richelieu, became prime minister. Rochelle, the stronghold of the French Protestants, was taken by the Cardinal, after a long siege, in 1628. After this event, so fatal to the Protestant interest in France, Louis assisted the duke of Mantua against the duke of Savoy, and entered on the campaign in person, in which he showed skill and bravery. In 1631 a treaty was concluded, by which the duke was confirmed in his estates. The year following, Gaston of Orleans, only brother of the king, revolted, out of dislike to Richelieu, and was assisted by the duke de Montmorency, who, being wounded and taken prisoner in 1632, was beheaded at Toulouse. Gaston took refuge with the duke of Lorraine, who, for protecting him, lost his whole dominions. This was followed by a war with Spain, which lasted twenty-five years, and was attended with various success; but it greatly impoverished the nation, and discontented the people. Louis and his minister the cardinal were attacked with a mortal disease nearly together; the latter died in 1642, and the king in the following year.

Louis XIV., son of the preceding, being only five years old on the death of his father, the regency was intrusted to the hands of the queen-mother, Anne of Austria, under whom Mazarin acted as prime minister. The nation was then involved in a war with Spain and the emperor of Germany, which was maintained with glory to the French arms by the prince of Condé and the famous Turenne. France pushed her conquests into Flanders, Artois, Lorraine, and Catalonia. The Swedes, who were in alliance with Louis, gained a great victory over the imperialists in Bohemia; Turenne took Treves and re-established the elector; Condé gained the battle of Nördlingen, took Furnes and Dunkirk, and defeated the archduke on the plains of Senz, in 1618, after reducing Ypres. The Spanish fleet was defeated on the coast of Italy by the French. This year a separate peace was made between Louis, Ferdinand III., Christina, queen of Sweden, and the states of the empire. By this treaty, Metz, Toul, Verdun, and Alsace were attached to France; but while Louis was successful abroad, his kingdom was distracted by internal divisions: the Parisians, irritated against Mazarin and the queen-mother, and headed by the duke de

Beaufort and the prince of Condé, took up arms. During this revolt, known as the civil war of La Fronde, the king, his mother, and the cardinal were obliged to fly. The Spaniards, profiting by these troubles, made several conquests in Champagne, Lorraine, and Italy. In 1651, the king assumed the government; but Mazarin returning to power the year following, the civil war was renewed. Condé headed the malecontents, and defeated the Marshal d'Hocquincourt at Bieneau, but soon afterwards he was attacked by the royal army and made prisoner. In the meanwhile, the archduke Leopold took from the French Gravelines and Dunkirk, and Don John of Austria made himself master of Barcelona; but domestic tranquillity being restored, these losses were repaired. Turenne gained several battles, and took a number of places, which produced a peace between France and Spain in 1659. The principal article in this treaty was the marriage of the king with the infanta Maria Theresa. The minister of Finance, Fouquet, being condemned to banishment for peculation, was succeeded by Colbert, one of the ablest ministers and financiers that ever lived: arts and commerce were cherished and flourished; foreign colonies were established; and at home was founded the Academy of Sciences and another of painting and sculpture. On the war breaking out between England and Holland, Louis joined with the latter; but after a few naval actions, peace was concluded in 1667. On the death of Philip IV., father of the queen, Louis laid claim to the vacant throne, and marched into the Low Countries, where he took a number of towns, particularly Lisle. His progress caused such alarm, that a treaty was entered into between England, Holland, and Sweden, to check his ambition; but, just as the treaty was completed, peace was restored between Louis and Spain. In 1672 the French king made an attack on Holland, and reduced some of the provinces in a few weeks. This invasion produced a new confederacy against Louis, between the emperor of Germany, Spain, and the elector of Brandenburg, in which all the allies were unsuccessful, and which terminated, in 1678, by the treaty of Nimègue. Amidst all his glory, Louis committed an act of impolitic cruelty by the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, granted by Henry IV. in favour of the Protestants. This measure drove from France a vast number of ingenious mechanics and others, who settled in England and Holland. About this time another league was formed against France by the prince of Orange, the duke of Savoy, and the electors of Bavaria and Brandenburg. To this league were afterwards added the emperor of Germany and the king of Spain. The dauphin had the command of the French army, and opened the campaign by taking Philipsburg, in October, 1688; but he was soon forced to retreat before a superior force. In 1690 the French were more successful; but were defeated in the naval action of La Hogue, by Admiral Russell, in 1692. Louis, in person, took Namur, and Marshal Luxembourg gained the battles of Steenkirk and Neerwinden. In 1696, Savoy made a separate peace with France, which was followed by a general one at Ryswick, in 1697. The tranquillity of Europe, however, was again broken by the death of Charles II., king of Spain, in 1700. He left his crown to Philip of France, duke of Anjou, who assumed the title of Philip

V. In opposition to him, the archduke Charles laid claim to the throne, and was supported by the emperor of Germany, by Holland, and England. Prince Eugene had the command of the imperial forces, with which he took Cremona. In 1704, Eugene and Marlborough gained the battle of Blenheim: the year following, Nice and Villa-Francia were taken by the French, who also gained a dearly-bought victory at Cassano over Eugene; on the other hand, Barcelona surrendered to the archduke, and Gironne declared in his favour: the battle of Ramillies was gained by the duke of Marlborough, and Prince Eugene saved Turin by defeating the duke of Orleans. In 1708, Lisle was retaken by the allies, who also gained the battle of Oudenarde, and the imperialists made themselves masters of Naples. The year following, the French lost Tournay, and suffered a defeat at Malplaquet. In 1713, a treaty of peace was signed at Utrecht by France, Spain, England, Savoy, Portugal, Prussia, and Holland; and the next year peace was concluded with the emperor at Radstadt. Louis, by his first wife, had issue one son, Louis, Dauphin of France, who died in 1711, leaving three sons, Louis, Philip, and Gaston. Louis XIV. had several illegitimate children by his mistresses. Without forgetting the intolerance and cruelty of Louis towards those of a different religion from himself, it must be allowed that he was a remarkable and able man. One great fact stands forth prominently during his reign,—he was well served. But when we perceive how uniformly gracious he was towards those under his command; how quick at discovering merit; how unwilling to change the agents of his will; we may cease to wonder that a stern man and absolute monarch should find even great intellects to obey his behests with zeal and devotion. His reign of 72 years was a brilliant epoch. It gave birth to Condé, Turenne, and Vauban; to Colbert and Louvois; to Corneille, Racine, Molière, La Fontaine, Boileau, Bossuet, Fénelon, Lebrun, and Perrault. The most celebrated of Louis's many mistresses were Mesdames de la Vallière, de Montespan, Fontanges, and de Maintenon; with the latter of whom, he, at the close of his life, when he had become serious and devout, engaged in a secret marriage. The best works to consult relative to this remarkable reign, are Voltaire's "Le Siècle de Louis XIV.," some pieces of the king, published in 1806, under the title of "Works of Louis XIV.," the "Memoirs of De Retz," and those of Saint-Simon. An abridged translation of the latter was produced by Mr. Bayle St. John in 1857. Louis XIV. was b. 1638; d. 1715.

Louis XV. was the great-grandson of the preceding, and succeeded him in 1715, at the age of five years, under the regency of Philip, duke of Orleans. In 1723 he was declared of age. The beginning of his reign was troubled by the Mississippi scheme of the famous Law, which ruined thousands of people. (See LAW.) On the death of the duke of Orleans, in 1723, he was succeeded, as prime minister, by the Duke of Bourbon, who was displaced in 1726, when Cardinal Fleury entered upon that station. The same year the king married the daughter of the king of Poland. On the death of the last-mentioned monarch, in 1733, Louis supported the election of his queen's relation Stanislaus against the elector of Saxony, which occasioned a war, known as the War of the Polish Succession, between France, Austria, and Russia. Stanislaus, however, was forced to abandon the throne; but the French were successful in Italy, on which a peace was concluded in 1738. On the death of the emperor Charles VI., in 1740, the succession of the house of Austria was disputed by four persons, and Louis declared himself against Maria Theresa, daughter of the late emperor, contrary to his own engagements. He supported the pretensions of the elector of Bavaria, who called himself Charles VII. That prince took Prague, where he was crowned king of Bohemia; but, in 1742, the city was retaken, and the allies, with the king of Great Britain at their head, gained the battle of Dettingen. In 1744, Louis took the field in person, and captured Courtray, Mœn, and Ypres; he was also present at the battles of Fontenoy and Lawfeld. These advantages were accompanied by the taking of Ghent, Ostend, Brussels, Bergen-op-Zoom, and other places. On the other hand, the troops of the duke of Saxony and of the queen of Hungary ravaged Provence, and the English completely ruined the French commerce at sea; which induced the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle in 1748. In 1755 a new war broke out between France and England, in which the latter power had Prussia for an ally, while Austria leagueed with France. At first the French were very successful, by taking Port Mahon, defeating the duke of Cumberland at Hastenbeck, and forcing the English general and his army to capitulate at Closterseven. The electorate of Hanover was conquered; but, in 1757, the French and Austrians were defeated at Rosbach: this was followed by other losses, both by land and sea, particularly of Canada. Nor was the face of affairs altered for the better by the famous family compact in 1761, by which all the families of the house of Bourbon allied as in a common cause. A treaty of peace was signed at Paris in 1763. The year following, the order of the Jesuits was abolished in France. Louis was a debauched and feeble-minded monarch, and to his acts was chiefly due the storm that broke over the head of his unfortunate successor. b. at Fontainebleau, 1710; d. 1774.

LOUIS XVI., was the son of Louis the Dauphin and of Maria Josephine, daughter of Frederick Augustus, king of Poland. On the death of his father, in 1763, he became heir to the throne, and, in 1770, married Marie Antoinette, archduchess of Austria. In 1774 he succeeded to the crown of France. At that period the finances were in an exhausted state, commerce was nearly ruined, the marine dismantled, and the national debt enormous. To repair the condition of public affairs, Vergennes was made secretary of state, and Turgot had the direction of the finances; Malcherbes was appointed a member of the council, Sartine had the management of the marine department, and Maurepas was placed at the head of the administration. The first act of Louis was very popular; he dispensed with the customary tax paid by the people at the beginning of every new reign. In 1774 the parliament was assembled, and affairs began to assume a favourable aspect, when, unfortunately, the French government, always jealous of England, took part with the revolted Americans, and a ruinous war ensued between the two countries, which, though it terminated in the loss of the colonies to the English, brought about a bloody revolution in France. The finances of the latter country were completely exhausted, and the Cardinal de Brienne, who had succeeded Calonne as minister, framed imposts which laid such intolerable burdens upon the people, that the parliament refused to register them. For this the members were exiled to Troyes, but were afterwards recalled by Louis, who, at their request, convened the States-General of three orders,—clergy, nobility, and commons. This assembly met in May, 1789. The public mind became violently agitated; the people of Paris rose, and, on the 14th of July of that year, stormed the Bastille. In October, the armed mob, with a prodigious number of women, marched to Versailles, which palace they forced, murdered the guards, and searched in vain for the queen, who would have shared the same fate had she not escaped from her bed. The result of this insurrection was the leading of the king and his family in triumph to Paris, amidst all the insults of a lawless rabble. In February, 1790, Louis was forced to accept the new constitution; but, notwithstanding all his concessions, finding himself a mere prisoner at Paris, and exposed daily to new injuries, he resolved to escape. Accordingly, in the night of June 21, 1791, he and his family quitted the Tuileries; but, at Varennes, his person was recognised, and he was conducted back to Paris, where he became a prisoner in his own palace, and suffered the vilest insult. War was declared against France by the emperor and the king of Prussia, and the duke of Brunswick marched into the country, but was forced to retreat. In the mean time, the people were wrought up to a pitch of savage ferocity by factious leaders, and assailed the Tuileries. The king and family sought refuge in the National Assembly, who ordered them to be sent to the Temple. The Legislative Assembly gave way to the National Convention, which brought Louis to a mock trial. His defence was conducted by Malcherbes, Tronchet, and Desèze; and his own department was, as it had uniformly been during his confinement, firm and modest, dignified and resigned. In January, 1793, he was adjudged to death for conspiring against the public good, and, on the 21st of the same month, ascended the scaffold on the Place Louis XV., and would have addressed the people, but was prevented by the beating of drums purposely placed there. Louis XVI. had all the virtues that adorn private life; but he was deficient in firmness, and, perhaps, even singleness of purpose. He was an accomplished prince, and was fond of mechanics; as a lock-smith, he was particularly skilful. d. 1793; guillotined 1793.

LOUIS XVII., second son of the preceding, was at first styled duc de Normandie, and after the death of his elder brother, Louis-Joseph, in 1788, became dauphin of France. Imprisoned in the Temple with his relatives, he was, after his father's death, styled monarch by the royalists and foreign powers. A cobbler, named Simon, was appointed his gaoler, with the derisive title of tutor. He died in 1795, it is suspected of poison, but it is more probable that his life was brought to a premature close by the harsh treatment to which he had been subjected in prison. Many impostors sought to pass for the veritable Louis XVII., but succeeded in obtaining but a small number of dupes. This prince was born in 1765.

period of the Revolution, shown a liberal disposition, and voted both in the Assembly of Notables and in the States-General against the government of his brother. Observing, however, the violent tendencies of the Jacobins, he resolved to quit France, and took his departure shortly after Louis XVI., in June, 1791. More fortunate than his brother, he succeeded in effecting his escape out of France, and reached Brussels. In 1792, he placed himself at the head of 6000 men, and joined the Prussian army that was marching on France; but the defeat of Valmy destroyed all his hopes. On the death of Louis XVII., in 1795, the count of Provence assumed the title of king, as Louis XVIII., and was recognised by the foreign powers. After residing at various places on the continent of Europe, he went to England, and lived at Hartwell, in Buckinghamshire, until the events of 1814. On the fall of Napoleon I., in May of that year, Louis was placed on the throne of France by the allies. His first act was to declare himself a constitutional and not an absolute monarch. In June, 1814, he laid before the legislature a charter, which afterwards became the base of the law of the kingdom. The sudden return of Napoleon from Elba, in March, caused Louis to be abandoned by the army and a considerable portion of the nation. At this juncture he fled, and took refuge at Ghent; but after the battle of Waterloo, in June, 1815, was once more placed upon the throne, which he retained till his death. Louis XVIII. was, for a Bourbon, a tolerably enlightened and liberal prince: he was a witty and cultivated man. He left no children, and was succeeded by his brother, Charles X. b. 1755; d. 1824.

LOUIS-PHILIPPE, king of the French, was eldest son of Louis-Philippe-Joseph, duc d'Orléans, styled Philippe-Egalité. Louis-Philippe bore the title of duc de Chartres until the death of his father, in 1793, after which he was usually styled duc d'Orléans. Between the years 1790 and 1792, he served in the French revolutionary army, and signaled himself at Valmy and Jemappes. Being cited, together with his faithful friend General Dumouriez, to appear before the Committee of Public Safety, and well knowing the sanguinary nature of that tribunal, which had, seven months before, sent his father to the guillotine, he fled across the Belgian frontier, and took refuge in the Netherlands, then under the sway of Austria. He was cordially received by the latter power, and a commission was offered to him, but he refused to fight against his native country. After travelling through Germany in disguise, he went to Switzerland, and at Zurich met his sister Adelaide, known as Mademoiselle d'Orléans, whom he shortly afterwards placed with Madame de Genlis, in a convent near Baumgarten. His funds being now exhausted, he sought and obtained the post of professor in the college of Reichenau, where, under the assumed name of Chabaud, he taught mathematics and geography during eight months. Thence he went to Baumgarten; but, being discovered by the French authorities, he set out for Hamburg, in the hope of obtaining a passage to America. Disappointed in this expectation, he travelled on foot through Norway, Sweden, and Finland, as far as the North Cape. The Directory having offered to release his two brothers, the duc de Montpensier and the count de Beaujolais, if Louis would consent to emigrate to America, he went on board a vessel, and sailed for the United States in 1796. After an adventurous life in the New World, the three Orleans princes returned to Europe in 1800, and took up their residence in England. The duc de Montpensier died at Twickenham in 1807, and his brother, the count de Beaujolais, in the following year at Malta, whither he had been accompanied by the duc d'Orléans. In the same year Louis went to reside with his mother and sister at Palermo, at which place the king of Naples and Sicily was dwelling, under British protection, Murat occupying the throne of Naples. In 1809 he married the king's daughter, the Princess Amélie. With the exception of a visit to Spain, in 1810, he continued to live at Palermo till 1814, when, on hearing the news of Napoleon's fall, he immediately set out for Paris. On Napoleon's return from Elba, Louis Philippe sent his family to England, and himself for a time joined the Army of the North, in obedience to the command of Louis XVIII. He next went again to Twickenham, and remained there during the Hundred Days, but was recalled to Paris to take his seat in the Chamber of Peers. Being regarded with peculiar jealousy by Louis XVIII., he quitted Paris, and did not return to France until 1827, when he went to reside at Neuilly, where he lived in seclusion till he was summoned to the throne as king of the French, in 1830. During seventeen years he enjoyed his elective throne, France, in the mean while, growing wealthy and tranquil. He maintained peace with Europe, and added the colony of Algeria to France. But although he had obtained and earned the title of the "Napoleon of Peace," his rule was characterized by an insincere policy towards his allies,—the marriage of his son the duc de Montpensier to a Spanish princess being a notable instance; while at home, his restless subjects, tired of what Lamartine termed his government of "vulgar tidity," and harassed by illiberal restrictions, burst out into a revolution in 1848. Had Louis-Philippe been inclined to turn the bayonets of his soldiery upon the people, it may be doubted whether he would have lost his throne. He fled from Paris in disguise, however, and reached Newhaven in March, 1848. The queen of England assigned Claremont as his residence, and there he continued to dwell till his death in 1850. b. at Paris, 1773.

LOUIS, dauphin of France, was the son of Louis XV. and Maria Leszinska. He was father of Louis XVI., Louis XVIII., and Charles X. b. 1729; d. 1765.

LOUTHERBOURG, Philip James de, loo'-fair-boury, an eminent landscape-painter, who, after obtaining considerable success in his profession at Paris, went to London, in 1771, and was for some time engaged as scene-painter at the opera-house; a branch of art in which he is said to have been without a rival. b. at Strasburg, 1740; d. in London, 1812.

L'OUVRETURE, Toussaint, loo'-vair-toor, a negro, who, in 1795, assisted the French general Laveaux in driving the English and Spanish from the island of St. Domingo. He subsequently became commander-in-chief of the army of St. Domingo, and, in 1800, caused himself to be named president. In 1802 he refused to recognise General Leclerc, who was sent to re-establish French authority, but was compelled to capitulate and was transported to France, LOUVET DE COUVRAY, Jean Baptiste, lou'-vai de(r) koo'-rai, a French writer, and one of the members of the National Convention. He had the courage to oppose Robespierre when at the height of his power, and yet escaped the vengeance of the tyrant. He wrote a romance, entitled the "Amours of the Chevalier Faublas," a political journal called the "Sentinel," a "Justification of Paris," and an account of himself, and the dangers which he passed through. n. at Paris, 1764; n. 1797.

Louvois, François Michel Lotellier, Marquis de, lo'-voo', prime minister to Louis XIV. To him are principally attributable the devastation of the Palatinate and the revocation of the Edict of Nantes. After having served the "Grand Monarque" during 26 years, he fell under his displeasure, and was only saved from disgrace by sudden death. He was one of those men whose talents we may admire, while we abhor his acts. The Hôtel des Invalides was founded by him. n. at Paris, 1641; n. 1661.

LOVAT, Simon Fraser, Lord, luv'-at, a Scottish chieftain, who, in 1715, took Inverness from the rebels; but, on the breaking out of the second rebellion in 1745, declared for the Pretender, for which he was taken prisoner and sent to London, where, in 1747, he was tried, found guilty, and beheaded. n. near Inverness, 1663.

LOVER, Samuel, luv'-er, poet, novelist, and painter, the son of a member of the Dublin stock exchange, first made himself known to fame as an artist, especially in the department of miniature portraits, in which he became famous, and was elected a member of the Royal Hibernian Society of Arts. While practising art, he found time to contribute to a periodical a series of "Legends and Tales Illustrative of Irish Character," which procured for him the entrée to the best society in the Irish capital. He removed to London about 1827, where he found profitable employment for his pencil, if not for his pen. His engagements as an artist, however, did not prevent him from continuing his Irish sketches in a second volume. He now became an extensive contributor to magazine literature, and produced a series of very charming songs illustrative of the popular superstitions of his native country: "Angels' Whispers," "True Love can ne'er Forget," "Molly Bawn," "The May Dew," "The Four-leaved Shamrock," "Molly Carew," "Rory O'More," &c., and soon afterwards he published his songs in a collected form, as well as the novels of "Rory O'More," "Handy Andy," and the "Treasure Trove." He was also the author of several operas founded upon his own works, among which are "Rory O'More," "The White Horse of the Peppers," "The Happy Man," &c. Finding that his sight was becoming impaired by his unremitting devotion to pencil and pen, Mr. Lover decided on making his public appearance in London in a monologue interspersed with his own songs and recitations. This experiment he commenced in 1844, with perfect success, and continued the entertainment, varied and changed from time to time, at various periods, both in Great Britain and in America. After his return from the New World in 1843, he illustrated his transatlantic experiences in a second entertainment, which was equally successful with the former. In 1859, he published an illustrated volume of poems, which contained some fine passages, but did not attract very much attention. He for several years enjoyed a pension for his literary services from the crown. n. 1797; n. 1868.

LOWE, Rt. Hon. Robert, lo, was educated at Winchester and University College, Oxford, and was called to the bar in 1842. He was a member of the council of New South Wales from 1843 to 1850. In 1851 he returned to England, and after holding various minor appointments, was vice-president of the Council of Education from 1850 to 1861. Although holding advanced opinions, he opposed the reform bills of Mr. Gladstone and Mr. Disraeli of 1866 and 1867; but, notwithstanding this, he took office under the former in 1868 as Chancellor of the Exchequer. n. 1811.

LOWENDAL, Ulrich Frederic Woldemar, Marshal, lo'-v-dal, a famous military officer and engineer, began his military career in Poland in 1713; but entered the Danish service during the war with Sweden. He afterwards served in Hungary, and next took part in the wars of Naples and Sicily. He returned to Poland in 1721, and was made colonel of infantry and commander of the royal horse guards. During the peace he studied gunnery and engineering, and was made field-marshal and inspector-general of the Saxon infantry in the service of Augustus, king of Poland. In 1734 and 1735 he was in the Austrian service; and subsequently entered that of Russia. He accepted the commission of lieutenant-general in the French army in 1743, and distinguished himself at the sieges of Menin, Ypres, Frilburg, &c., and also at the battle of Fontenoy. In 1747 he took Bergen-op-Zoom by storm, which, till then, had been deemed impregnable; for which and his other services he was created marshal of France. His knowledge of engineering and military tactics in general was of first-rate order; he spoke all the European languages with fluency; and with these accomplishments combined modesty and amiable manners. n. at Hamburg, 1700; n. 1755.

LOWRY, Wilson, F.R.S., lo'-re, an English engraver, was the son of Mr. Strickland Lowry, a portrait painter, at Whitehaven. Wilson Lowry was the inventor of a ruling-machine, capable of ruling successive lines, either equidistant or in just gradations, from the greatest required width to the nearest possible approximation; also of one capable of drawing lines to a point, and of forming concentric circles; he likewise introduced the use of diamond points for etching, and many other useful improvements in the art; and was the first who succeeded in what is technically termed "biting in" well upon steel. For thirty years before his death he was engaged by eminent publishers on illustrated works; and attained to the highest rank in his peculiar branch of art. n. 1702; n. 1820.

LOWTH, William, louth, a learned English divine, who wrote "Commentaries on the Four Greater Prophets," "Directions for the Profitable Reading of the Holy Scriptures," "A Vindication of the Divine Authority and Inspiration of the Old and New Testaments," in answer to Leclerc, and other important works. n. in London, 1661; n. 1732.

professor of poetry at Oxford, and in that capacity delivered his admirable lectures, which were printed at Oxford in 1753, under the title of "Sacred Poetry of the Hebrews." After passing through various minor grades of the church, he became bishop of London in 1777. Besides the above work, Bishop Lowth published a translation of Isaiah from the Hebrew, an English Grammar, the "Life of William of Wykeham," the Life of his father, in the "Biographia Britannica," a Poem on the Genealogy of Christ, some controversial letters with Bishop Warburton, and sermons on public occasions. n. 1710; p. 1787.

LOYOLA, Ignatius, loi'-o-la, founder of the order of Jesuits, the youngest son of a Spanish nobleman of high birth, was brought up to the military profession, and obtained a commission in the Spanish army; but, breaking his leg at the siege of Pampeluna, he made a vow to the Virgin, that if he recovered he would go on a pilgrimage to Jerusalem, and devote himself to a religious course of life, which resolution he fulfilled. After studying Latin a short time at Barcelona, he commenced preaching, and began to gather disciples, for which he was imprisoned; but still persevered in adding to the number of the brethren of the Order of Jesus, as they were called, and for which, at length, he obtained a confirmation by Pope Paul III. This order increased prodigiously during the lifetime of Loyola, who, however, was not the author of the pernicious maxims which afterwards disgraced it. n. 1491; p. 1556.

LUCANUS, Marcus Annæus, Lucan, lu-kai'-nus, a Latin poet. Going at an early age to Rome, his verses caused him to become the favourite of the emperor Nero; but being foolish enough to enter into competition with his imperial patron, who was desirous of being considered the first poet of his time, he was forbidden to publish any more poetry. He was subsequently condemned to death for conspiring against the life of Nero. The only poem of his at present extant is the "Pharsalia," which describes the war from the commencement to Caesar's meeting with Cleopatra in Egypt. n. In Spain, 33; p. 65.

LUCIAN, lu'-she-an, a celebrated Greek writer. His father, who was poor, placed him with a sculptor; but, disliking that business, he studied law, which profession he also abandoned, and devoted himself to philosophy and eloquence. Marcus Aurelius had a great esteem for his talents, and appointed him registrar of Egypt. His works, which are written in the Attic dialect, consist mostly of satirical dialogues, abounding with witticisms, but profane and obscene. The best editions of Lucian are those of Leumann and Dindorf. Tooke, Bloor, and Francklin have given English translations of his writings. n. at an advanced age, about 200.

LUCILLUS, Caius, lu-sil'-e-us, a Roman satirist, who served under Scipio in his expedition against the Numantians. He is considered by some as the author of a poetical satire; but only a few of his verses remain, which are in the "Corpus Poetarum" of Mattaire. n. 148 B.C.; p., it is supposed, in 103 B.C.

LUCIUS I., Pope, lu'-she-us, succeeded Cornelius in 252, and was martyred the year following.

LUCIUS II., a native of Bologna, succeeded Celestin II. in 1144, and died in 1145, of a blow which he received in a popular commotion.

Lucullus

LUCIUS III. succeeded Alexander III. in 1181. The Roman people having risen against him, he retired to Verona, but afterwards returned to Rome, and, by the help of the Italian princes, subdued his enemies. A new commotion compelled him, however, to retire again. He made a constitution for the extirpation of heresies, which laid the foundation of the Inquisition. p. at Verona, 1185.

LUCRETIA, lu-kre'-she-a, a celebrated Roman lady, was the daughter of Lucretius, governor of Rome, and the wife of Collatinus, a relation of Tarquin. Her husband being at the siege of Ardea, a conversation took place one evening at supper, between him and the three sons of Tarquin, respecting the prudence of their wives. At length it was agreed upon to ride to Rome and see how the ladies were employed. The daughters-in-law of Tarquin were regaling with some companions of their own age, while Lucretia was engaged with her maidens in working upon wool. The dispute having terminated in her favour, the young men returned to the camp; but Sextus, the eldest of the king's sons, conceived a violent passion for Lucretia, which he was determined to gratify, without any regard to the principles of honour. Accordingly, some days after, he secretly left the camp and visited Lucretia, who treated him with the civility due to his rank. After supper he was conducted to his chamber; and, when he thought that the family were asleep, he stole softly, with a sword in his hand, to Lucretia's room, and made use of every effort to prevail over her virtue. Finding his artifices fruitless, he threatened that, after slaying her, he would kill a slave, and lay the body by hers; then report that, having caught them together, he had slain them both. This menace succeeded; for the dread of dishonourable reproach prevailed over Lucretia, and the base seducer returned in the morning to the camp. Lucretia, the next day, sent for her father and her husband, to whom she related the shocking circumstance. They endeavoured to console her, but in vain, for, drawing forth a dagger, she plunged it into her breast. Lucretia's death occasioned the liberty of the Romans, who, excited by Brutus, expelled the Tarquins from their city. Sextus fled to a town of the Gabii, where he soon after perished. Lucretia died 609 B.C.

LUCRETIUS, Titus Carus, lu-kre'-she-us, a Roman poet and philosopher, was born of a good family, and educated under Zeno of Sidon, and Phædrus, both of the Epicurean sect. Cicero commends him for his learning and eloquence. His poem "On the Nature of Things" is elegant, but is founded on the doctrines of Epicurus. The writings of Lucretius have been translated into English, with notes, by Creech, and published in Bolin's "Classical Library." n. 95 B.C.; p. 52 B.C.

LUCULLUS, Lucius Licinius, lu-kul'-lus, a celebrated Roman general and consul, who gained a great victory over Mithridates, on the borders of the Granicus, B.C. 74, and conquered Bithynia. He also defeated Tigranes, king of Armenia, father-in-law of Mithridates, and took his capital; but the severity of Lucullus to his soldiers gave such offence, that he was recalled, and the command given to Pompey. On his return to Rome, he obtained a triumph, and then retired to private life, possessed of immense riches. He collected a prodigious library, and patronized learned men. n. about 115 B.C.; p. 49 B.C.

Ludlow

LUDLOW, Edmund, lud'-lo, an English Parliamentary general, who studied first at Oxford, and afterwards in the Temple; but the civil wars breaking out, he quitted the law for the army, and served under the earl of Essex. He was a firm republican, and was one of the members of the high court of justice which sentenced Charles I. to the scaffold. On the death of Ireton, he had the command of the army in Ireland; but was deprived of it for opposing the usurpation of Cromwell. In the parliament under Richard Cromwell, he obtained a seat, and was restored to his command in Ireland, but was again recalled. Just before the restoration of the king, he went to Vevey, in Switzerland, where he resided till 1698, when he ventured to return to England; but the House of Commons applying to King William to cause him to be apprehended, he withdrew again to Vevey, where he died in 1693. n. about 1621. His memoirs, which are curious and accurate, were printed after his death.

LUITFRAND, lue'-fran, a Lombard historian, was secretary to Berengar, regent of the kingdom of Italy, who also employed him as his ambassador to Constantinople. He also became bishop of Cremona, and was sent, in 962, by Otto I., emperor and king of Italy, on a mission to Rome. In 963 he went on an embassy to Constantinople, where he was thrown into prison by the orders of Nicophorus Phocas, for his zeal in defending the interest of his master. After remaining in confinement some months, he returned to Italy. He wrote the History of the Affairs of Europe in his time, and other works valuable for their historical information. n. at Pavia, early in the 10th century; n. about 970.

LUTZ, Raymond, lud'-le, was called, according to the custom of his age, the Enlightened Doctor. In early life he was a soldier, but, quitting the army, he retired to a lonely spot, where he remained in solitude, pretending to have visions, in which he was directed to convert the Moors to Christianity. After long years of preparation by study, he went on a mission into Mauritania, where he was nearly stoned to death by the natives. His works on theology, physics, philosophy, chemistry, and law, have been frequently printed, but are very obscure. n. at Palma, Majorca, 1234; n. 1315.

LULLY, Jean-Baptiste, a celebrated musician, who became page to Mademoiselle de Montpensier, niece of Louis XIV., who caused him to be taught music, in which he attained such excellence as to be made superintendent of music to that king. Lully composed a number of operas and the music of several of Molière's plays. n. at Florence, 1633; n. at Paris, 1687.

LUMSDEN, Matthew, lu'-d, lu'-us'-dra, professor of Persian and Arabic in the college of Fort William, Calcutta, was author of two grammars of those languages. In 1825 he relinquished the service of the East India Company, and returned to England. n. 1777; n. 1835.

LUSIGNAN, Guy de, loo'-seer'-yanng, a celebrated French nobleman, who went to the Holy Land in the time of the crusades, and espoused Sibylla, daughter of Amaury, king of Jerusalem. He succeeded Baldwin V. in 1186, but he afterwards resigned his kingdom to Richard I., king of England, and received the isle of Cyprus in return. n. 1194.

LUSSAN, Margaret de, loo'-sa, a French authoress of considerable talents, was the daughter of one of Cardinal Fleury's coachmen.

Luther

Among her most esteemed productions are, "La Comtesse de Gondez," "Auecdotes de Philippe Auguste," "Auecdotes de Francis I.," "La Vie de St. Grillon," and "Histoire de Charles VI." n. 1682; time of death uncertain.

LUTHER, Martin, loo'-ther, the great religious reformer, was the son of Hans Luther, a miner and metal-worker. In 1501 he was sent to the university of Erfurt, where he studied philosophy and the civil law; but walking one day in the fields with a fellow-student, his companion was struck dead by lightning, which so affected Luther, that he determined to retire from the world. He accordingly entered a monastery of the order of St. Augustine, where he led a pious and studious life; and there happening to meet with a Latin Bible, he read it with the utmost care and avidity, and was struck with the manifest difference between the doctrines of the gospel and the practices of the Roman church. This impression became deeper in 1510, when he went to Rome on some business connected with his monastery. On his return he was created B.D., and became professor of divinity at the university of Wittenberg, then founded by Frederick, elector of Saxony. In 1517, Leo X. published the famous bull offering plenary indulgences, the purchasers of which obtained forgiveness of all sins committed by them. These pardons were sold in Germany by the Dominicans, in the most shameless manner, and gave offence to all religious persons, and to Luther in particular, who published a "Thesis on Indulgences," at Wittenberg, in which he exposed, in the strongest manner, the baseness of the traffic. The propositions of Luther's thesis were opposed by Tetzel, the papal agent; but the people at large were convinced that the truth lay on the side of Luther. The dispute growing serious throughout Germany, the emperor earnestly pressed the pope to exert his influence to put a stop to it; and, accordingly, Luther was cited to appear at Rome, which he prudently declined. Leo also commanded the elector Frederick to deliver Luther up to the papal legate, which he refused, at the same time requesting that the cause might be heard in Germany. To this the pope consented, and Luther appeared before Cardinal Caietano, at Augsburg, to whom he gave a full account of his faith; but being required to make an implicit submission to the decrees of the pope, he positively refused. On this, Leo issued a bull, threatening to excommunicate all who should presume to deny his power to grant plenary indulgences. Luther, on the other hand, appealed, in a public declaration, from the pope to a general council. The followers of Luther increased rapidly; Erasmus approved of his conduct in a great measure, and corresponded with him, but had not the courage to declare himself fully. The learned and amiable Melancthon attached himself firmly to Luther, and, by his prudence and moderation, rendered him essential service. In 1518, Luther had a dispute at Leipzig, with Eckius, professor of divinity at Ingolstadt. In 1520 the pope issued a formal condemnation of Luther, which was immediately termed, by the reformer, "the execrable bull of Antichrist;" and, calling the students of Wittenberg together, he flung the pope's bull and decretals into the fire. The year following, he attended the diet of Worms, by virtue of a safe-conduct from the emperor Charles V.; and when his friends endeavoured to dissuade him from going, by urging the fate of Huss, he said, that "if there were as many devils at Worms as tiles upon the houses, he would go." He was here required to retract his opinions, and to promise submission to the pope, both which he resolutely refused. On his return through a wood, he was seized by a party of horse, who conveyed him to a castle belonging to the elector of Saxony, where he was so secretly kept, that no one knew what was become of him, except the persons concerned in the affair. In the mean time, the emperor published an edict against him, and put under the ban of the empire those who should defend him. Luther, however, was secure in his retreat, which he called his Hermitage and his Patmos; and employed his time in conferences with his chosen friends, and in writing books. After an absence of ten months, he again made his appearance at Wittenberg, where he wrote a severe reply to Henry VIII. of England, who had published a book against him on the doctrine of the Eucharist. About this time he published a translation of the New Testament into German, which was universally read, though proscribed by imperial authority. In 1523, Erasmus was prevailed on to write against Luther, and chose for his subject the freedom of the human will, which he defended against the reformer, who replied in a treatise entitled "De servo Arbitrio," which was answered by Erasmus in another, called "Hyperaspistes." In 1525, Luther married Catherine von Bora, a nun, who had escaped from a convent; on which his enemies accused him of immorality and impiety; but Luther defended his act on spiritual grounds. In 1529 the emperor convened a diet at Spire, to procure aid from the German princes against the Turks, and to devise means for allaying religious disputes. In this assembly it was ordered that the mass should be universally observed throughout the empire. Against this decree the electors of Saxony and Brandenburg, and other princes, entered their protest; on which account the reformed party acquired the name of Protestants. These princes then entered into a league for their mutual defence against the emperor. In 1530 was drawn up by Melancthon the Confession of Augsburg, which was received as the standard of the Protestant faith in Germany. In 1534, Luther's translation of the Bible into German was published. In 1537, Luther was attacked with a dangerous illness, but recovered, and went on writing books, and labouring to promote the great work of reformation. The mind of Luther was ardent and impetuous, but honest, and earnestly bent on the discovery and propagation of religious truth. His manner: were becoming his profession, and his whole life evinced a zeal for the glory of God and the welfare of man. He was a multifarious and voluminous writer: a complete edition of his works, in 26 vols., was published at Erlangen in 1833. A translation of Luther's "Table Talk" was published in London, in 1810. In 1868 a monument was erected to the great reformer at Worms by the Protestant princes and people of Germany. n. at Eisenach, Saxony. 118.

 a. Francis Henry de Montmorency, duke of, look'-en-boory, a famous general and marshal of France, was the posthumous son of Francis de Montmorency, count of Bouteville, beheaded under Louis XIII. for fighting a duel. At the age of 15, he was at the battle of Rocroi, under the great Condé. He served as lieutenant-general at the taking of Franche-Comté, in 1663, and in the Dutch campaign of 1672, about which time he effected a famous retreat with an army of 20,000 men against 70,000. In 1674 he was made marshal of France. In 1690 he gained the battle of Fleurus, which was followed by the victories of Lensen, Steenkirk, and Neerwinden. b. 1628; d. 1695.

LYCORON, lik'-o'-ron, a poet and grammarian, who lived at the court of Ptolemy Philadelphus, and formed one of the seven poets known as the Plietas. He was a voluminous writer, but only one of his poems has come down to our times,—that entitled "Casandra," which is a long and enigmatical work that has been much commented on by the Greek grammarians. Ovid states that he was killed by an arrow. Lived in the third century B.C.

LYCURGUS, li-ku'-gus, the famous Spartan lawgiver. The records of his birth and of the period of his existence are very obscure; but he is stated to have been the son of Eunomus, king of Sparta, and brother of Polydectes, who succeeded his father. After the death of Polydectes, his widow offered the crown to Lyeurgus, though she was then with child; but he refused, and faithfully discharged the duty of regent and guardian during the minority of his nephew Charilans. When the young prince came of age, Lyeurgus left Sparta, and travelled into several countries to observe their laws and manners. On his return home he found the kingdom in a state of confusion; the king endeavoured to reign despotically, and the people would not obey. Lyeurgus undertook to reform the government, and introduced the most rigorous laws, yet such as were admirably adapted to civilize a disordered people. After this he quitted Sparta, and is supposed to have died in Crete, at an advanced age, about 570 B.C.

LYCURGUS, an Athenian orator, who is said to have studied philosophy under Plato, and rhetoric under Isocrates. He was the friend of Demosthenes, and a zealous advocate of liberty. One of his orations is included in Reiske's collection of Greek orators. d. about 323 B.C.

LYDEATE, John, lid'-gait, an Augustinian monk of Bury St. Edmunds, in the reign of Henry VI., was a poet and the successor of Chaucer, and a most versatile and prolific writer. His son, in his "Bibliographia Poetica," has enumerated no fewer than 251 short works by him. The "History of Troy," "Story of Thebes," and "Fall of Princes," are his best poems. He is also said to have been a good mathematician and an accomplished scholar. b. about 1375; d. about 1461.

LYDIAT, Thomas, a learned English divine, chronologer, and mathematician, who was rector of Okerton, and wrote in twelve years more than six hundred sermons on the harmony of the Gospels. Having become surety for a friend's debt, he was cast into prison, and remained there till the debt was discharged by Bishop Laud and some others. In the civil war he adhered to the king, suffered severely in consequence, and died in indigence in 1610. b. 1572. His works, which were mostly composed in Latin, were very numerous. His hard lot is referred to by Dr. Johnson in the following lines:—

"If dreams yet flatter, once again attend; Hear Lydiat's fate, and Galileo's end."

Lydus

LYDUS, Joannes Laurentius, lî-dus, a celebrated Greek writer, who, during forty years, filled several important posts at the court of the emperor Justinian. Three of his works have survived; these being treatises on the "Magistrates of the Roman Republic," on "The Months," and on "Omens and Prodigies," all of which were included in Bekker's "Corpus Scriptorum Historiæ Byzantinæ," published at Bonn, 1837. B. about 490; D. about 560.

LYE, Edward, lî, an English clergyman, who devoted himself, with the greatest success, to the study of the Saxon and Gothic languages and literature. Besides other important works, he gave to the world a "Dictionary of the Anglo-Saxon and Gothic Languages," which was published in 1772, a few years after the compiler's death. B. at Totnes, 1704; D. 1767.

LYELL, Sir Charles, lî-el, a distinguished modern geologist, was educated at Exeter College, Oxford, and ultimately commenced practice at the bar; but his private means making him independent of his profession, he gave himself exclusively to the study of geology. In 1832 he was named professor of geology at King's College, London; but this appointment he soon afterwards resigned. From the commencement of the publication of the Geological Society's "Transactions," he was a regular and valuable contributor. In 1830 appeared the first volume of his great work, "The Principles of Geology." This was completed in 1831, passed through many editions, and attracted the attention of the whole geological world. Another extraordinary book by him was produced in 1833, entitled "Elements of Geology." These two works have exercised the most marked influence upon geological inquiry since the date of their first publication. Sir Charles Lyell made two visits to the United States of America, and published many memoirs relative to the geology of the New World. The continent of Europe was also travelled over, and its geological facts described by him. A general account of his journeys in America was published by Sir Charles under the title of "Travels in North America," and "A Second Visit to the United States." His scientific observations, both in the New World and on the continent of Europe, were produced in the "Transactions" of the Geological Society, reports of the British Association, and in English and American scientific journals. His great services to the cause of geological science obtained for him, in 1848, the honour of knighthood. He was twice elected president of the Geological Society, and in 1855 his university conferred upon him the title of D.C.L. B. at Kimbury, Herefordshire, 1797.

LYNDHURST, John Singleton Copley, Lord, lînd-hurst, a celebrated modern English judge and statesman, whose father, an eminent painter, had emigrated to America, and there the future English peer first saw the light. When about two years of age, his father took him to England, where he was ultimately educated, first by a private tutor, and afterwards at Trinity College, Cambridge. He was elected fellow of his college, and received the appointment of "travelling bachelor," upon which he visited the United States. On his return to England, he commenced the study of the law, and in 1797 was called to the bar. Although his great abilities were generally admitted amongst the members of his own profession, still he was almost unknown to the general public till the year 1817, when he assisted Sir Charles Wetherell in defending Watson and Thistlewood on their trial for high treason. His singular talents, as displayed on this occasion, recommended him to the governing party of the time; and, although he had hitherto evinced liberal views in politics, he embraced the offers made to him by the Tory party. In 1818 he became chief justice of the county palatine of Chester; and soon afterwards entered Parliament for the borough of Yarmouth, in the Isle of Wight. In 1819 he rose to the grade of king's serjeant, and was in the same year knighted and appointed solicitor-general. In the following year he conducted the prosecution in two great trials—those of the Cato-street conspirators, and of Queen Caroline in the House of Lords. He became attorney-general in 1824, and in 1826 was made master of the Rolls. When the question of Roman Catholic emancipation came before the House of Commons, in 1827, he energetically opposed the measure; but two years afterwards strenuously supported it, declaring that he "felt no apprehension for the safety of the church." He had previously accepted the chancellorship, and had been created Lord Lyndhurst. In 1830 he was appointed chief baron of the Exchequer, and in that capacity earned the highest distinction as an acute and impartial judge. During the proceedings consequent upon the introduction of the Reform Bill into the House of Lords, so strenuous was his opposition, that he was regarded as the head of the Conservative party in the Upper House. At one period it was actually proposed to him to form a new ministry, in conjunction with the duke of Wellington; a project which fell to the ground on account of the refusal of Sir Robert Peel and other moderate Conservatives to join his cabinet. In 1834, the great seal was confided to him under the Peel administration; but he retired with his party a short time afterwards. In 1841, however, Sir Robert Peel returned to power; whereupon Lord Lyndhurst, for the third time, accepted the chancellorship, and retained it until the retirement of his chief, in 1846. From that period, his speeches in the House of Lords became fewer in number, but carried no less weight with his hearers. When past the great age of 80 years, he delivered remarkable speeches relative to the war with Russia, on Cambridge University reform, life peerages, and the defences of the country. B. at Boston, United States, 1772; D. 1863.

LYNEDECH, Thomas Graham, Lord, lîn-dok, a celebrated British general, did not enter the army until he was in his 45th year, and did so then in consequence of the loss of a beloved wife. To alleviate his grief and restore his impaired health, he was recommended to travel; and it was during his sojourn at Gibraltar that he fell into the society of the officers of the garrison, and thenceforth determined on devoting himself to the profession of arms. He first served as a volunteer at the siege of Toulon, under Lord Mulgrave, and on his return raised from among his countrymen a battalion of the 90th regiment, of which he was appointed colonel-commandant. He then accompanied his regiment to Gibraltar; but soon growing tired of the idleness inseparable from garrison duty there, he obtained permission to join the Austrian army, where he found ample opportunities of studying the art of war, while he was enabled to take advantage of his position in sending to the British government intelligence of the military operations and diplomatic measures adopted by the commanders and sovereigns of the Continent. In 1797 he returned to England, and having joined his regiment, was appointed to act with Sir Charles Stewart in the reduction of the island of Minorca, after which he was employed two years in the blockade of Malta. In 1808 he proceeded with Sir John Moore to Sweden, and afterwards served in Spain with that gallant officer during the campaign which ended in the battle and death of Moore at Corunna. Next year, General Graham led a division at the siege of Flushing; in 1810 he commanded the British troops at Cadiz; and in 1811 fought and won the memorable battle of Barossa. After this he joined Lord Wellington, and was present at the siege of Ciudad Rodrigo; but ill-health rendered it necessary for him to revisit England for a short period. Early in 1813, however, he returned to the Peninsula, led the left wing at the battle of Vittoria, reduced the town and citadel of St. Sebastian, crossed the Bidassoa, and, after a severe contest, established the British army on the territory of France. On the 3rd of May, 1814, Sir Thomas Graham was created a peer by the title of Baron Lynedoch of Balgowan, on which occasion he refused a grant of £2000 per annum, to himself and heirs, which was intended to accompany his elevation. In 1826 he was appointed to the governorship of Dumbarton Castle. "Never," said Sheridan, "was there seated a loftier spirit in a braver heart." D. 1750; p. 1813.

LYON, George Francis, Né-on, a captain in the British navy, but more eminent as a traveller and explorer, entered the service in 1800, and was for several years engaged in the active duties of his profession, and was present at the battle of Algiers. His career as a traveller began in 1818, when he accompanied Mr. Ritchie in an expedition into the interior of Africa, which proved most disastrous. The adventurers suffered terribly from privation and disease, to which the leader of the enterprise, Mr. Ritchie, fell a victim at Mourzouk, the capital of Fezzan. Mr. Lyon, however, returned to England, and published an account of the expedition, under the title of a "Narrative of Travels in Northern Africa, accompanied by Geographical Notes of Soudan, and of the course of the Niger." He now embarked in explorations in a widely different scene, having, in 1821, in command of the Hecla, accompanied Captain Parry's expedition to the Polar Seas. Of this expedition he published an account in a "Private Journal." He was made post-captain in 1823, and in the Griper gun-brig, made another voyage of discovery in the Polar regions, during which he and his crew encountered great perils, and were compelled to come home without effecting the object of the expedition. Captain Lyon subsequently visited Mexico as one of the commissioners of the Real del Monte Mining Company. He suffered shipwreck, on his return in 1827, near Holyhead, losing everything belonging to him; and after a second time visiting South America died on the homeward passage, in 1832. B. a Chichester, 1795. The life of Captain Lyon was a continued series of adversities and misfortunes, to which few parallels can be found.

LYONS, Israel, Né-on, an astronomer, botanist, and mathematician, the son of a Polish Jew, who was a Hebrew teacher at Cambridge, was Sir Joseph Banks's instructor in botany, and accompanied Captain Phipps, afterwards Lord Mulgrave, as astronomer, in his voyage towards the North Pole. He was one of the calculators of the "Nautical Almanack," and wrote a "Treatise on Fluxions," &c. B. 1739; p. 1775.

LYONS, Edmund, Lord, a distinguished British admiral, was sent, at a very early age, to Hyde Abbey School, near Winchester; but little time was spent in a merely school education, as he entered the navy as a volunteer of the first class in 1800, when but ten years and a half old. He was first sent on board the Royal Charlotte yacht, and, after seeing some service in the Mediterranean, accompanying Sir John Duckworth's expedition to the Dardanelles, and assisting at the demolition of the redoubt on Point Péques, on the Adriatic shore, he returned to England in 1807. In the mean time the battle of Trafalgar had been fought. The same year he went to the East Indies, where he remained for the next five years, and where he attained the rank of lieutenant. In the Indian seas he gained considerable distinction, obtaining honourable mention as among the first to scale the castle of Belgica, in the island of Banda Neira, in 1810. For this he was appointed flag-lieutenant to Rear-Admiral Drury. But his most important service was the storming of Fort Marrack, which he took with scarcely any loss. Returning home in ill health, he was promoted to the command of the Rinaldo, 10, which vessel formed one of the squadron which, in 1813, escorted Louis XVIII. to France, and the allied sovereigns to England. In 1823 he assisted at the blockade of Navarino, and superintended the naval expedition sent to co-operate with the French in the reduction of the castle of Morea, the last remnant of the Ottoman power in the Peloponnesus. He was afterwards employed in cruising about the Mediterranean, and on one celebrated occasion entering the Black Sea in the first British man-of-war that had ever passed the Bosphorus, and actually visited the scene of his future labours—Sebastopol. In 1835, Captain Lyons, who had in the mean time received the honour of knighthood and the investiture of several orders, exchanged the naval which post he filled from 1835 until 1840. In 1819 he was appointed British minister to the Swiss confederation, and, in 1851, was sent to Stockholm in a similar capacity. There he remained until, in November, 1853, war being then imminent, he was appointed second in command of the Mediterranean fleet. If at the outset only second in command, Sir Edmund Lyons was from the first the ruling spirit of the British fleet, and to him was due, in an eminent degree, the success which attended the English arms on the shores of the Euxine. He it was who organized and conducted the expedition to the Crimea, prepared the means of landing, and superintended all so closely, that, "in his eagerness, he left but six inches between the keel of his noble ship and the ground below it." Not only in this matter of the transport of the troops, but also in every subsequent stage of the expedition, Sir Edmund Lyons gave the most valuable assistance to Lord

Raglan and his successors. At the battle of the Alma, he supported the French army by bringing the guns of his ship to bear on the left flank of the Russians. On the first bombardment of Sebastopol, his ship, the Agamemnon, was nearest to the Russian batteries. He was present at Balaklava and at Inkermann. It was he who, having conveyed the English soldiers to the Crimea, saved them from being compelled to leave it—battled, if not vanquished. A day or two after the battle of Balaklava, he learnt, to his astonishment, that orders had been issued to the naval brigade to embark as many guns as possible during the day, for Balaklava was to be evacuated at night,—of course surrendering to the enemy the greater portion of the guns. On his own responsibility the admiral at once put a stop to the execution of this order, and went in search of Lord Raglan, who, it appears, had come to the resolution of abandoning Balaklava, in consequence of the opinion expressed by the engineers, that, after the loss of the redoubts in the rear, previously held by the Turks, the English strength ought to be concentrated on the plateau. Sir Edmund Lyons strongly opposed these views, and having shown to Lord Raglan that the engineers had been mistaken once, he argued they might be insufficiency of Kame allied navies, and that the abandonment of Balaklava meant the evacuation of the Crimea in a week. After some conversation, Lord Raglan said, "Well, you were right before, and this time I will act upon your advice." Sir Edmund obtained leave to countermand the orders which had been issued; Balaklava was maintained as the basis of operations, and the army was saved from what might have proved an inglorious defeat, if not a terrible disaster. This was, perhaps, the most important of all the services rendered by the admiral, and he well deserved the peerage which it earned for him. After a short command in the Mediterranean, he was summoned to escort her majesty to Cherbourg,—the last public duty he fulfilled. b. near Christchurch, Hants, 1790; d. 1853.

LYSANDER, li-sân-der, a famous Spartan commander in the Peloponnesian war. He prevailed on Ephesus to withdraw from its alliance with Athens, and entered into a league with Cyrus the Younger. He also defeated the Athenian fleet, after which the city itself fell into his hands; and thus terminated the Peloponnesian war, which had lasted 27 years. Lysander overturned the democracy, and restored the government of the Archons. After this he endeavoured to seat himself on the throne of Sparta, but was unsuccessful. He was slain, fighting against the Thebans, 395 B.C.

LYSIAS, li-sae-ds, a justly celebrated Athenian orator. He assisted Thrasylbulus against the Thirty Tyrants. Plutarch mentions 425 of his orations; but of these only 35 remain, with fragments of some others. Editions of his orations have been published in English, by Taylor and others. b. at Athens, 458 B.C.; d. about 378 B.C.

LYSIAS, general of Antiochus Epiphanes, king of Syria, who sent him against Judas Maccabæus, by whom he was surprised and defeated, with the loss of 5000 men. Lysias saved himself by flight, and, after the death of Epiphanes, returned to power, as regent, under Antiochus Eupator. He laid siege to Jerusalem; but learning that Philip, who disputed the reignty with him, had taken possession of the capital of Syria, he raised the siege, marched against Philip, and defeated him. Both Eupator and himself were subsequently abandoned by their partisans, and slain by their guards, B.C. 162.

LYSIMACHUS, li-sim'-a-kus, one of the generals of Alexander the Great, after whose death he made himself master of Thrace, where he built a town called by his own name. He afterwards seized Macedonia, and expelled Pyrrhus from the throne. He was killed in battle by Seleucus, 282 B.C.

LYSIPPIUS, li-sip'-pus, a celebrated Grecian sculptor, who is said to have been a self-taught artist. His greatest works were the statue of a man wiping and anointing himself, after bathing, which was placed before Asdrippa's baths at Rome, and a statue of the sun, represented in a char drawn by four horses, at Rhodes. Flourished in the 4th century B.C.

LYTTLETON, Edward, Lord, lit'-l-ton, keeper of the great seal in the reign of Charles I. In 1611 he was made colonel of a regiment in the king's army at York. d. 1615.

LYTTLETON, George, Lord, an English writer, who was educated at Eton and Christ Church, Oxford. On his return from travel on the continent, he obtained a seat in Parliament, where he distinguished himself as a frequent speaker on the side of the opposition; on which account he became secretary to Frederick, Prince of Wales, who adhered to that party. In 1744, on the resignation of Sir Robert Walpole, he was made one of the lords of the Treasury. In 1756 he became chancellor of the exchequer; his qualifications for which office seem to have been somewhat in arrears, as he is said to have been unable to master the simplest rules of arithmetic. He was raised to the peerage in 1750, and soon afterwards devoted himself exclusively to literature. His principal works are "Observations on the Conversion of St. Paul," "Dialogues of the Dead," "History of Henry II.," and "Poetical Works." Dr. Johnson has included his life amongst those of the English poets written by him. He was a great patron of the modern system of landscape gardening. b. 1709; d. 1773.

LYTTLETON, Thomas, Lord, son of the preceding, was a young nobleman of promising talents, but of dissipated manners. His death is said to have been preceded by a very extraordinary circumstance. He saw in a dream, or otherwise, a young woman dressed in white, who warned him of his dissolution in three days from that time. On the third day, his lordship had a party to spend the evening with him, and about the time predicted said, he "believed he should jockey the ghost;" but a few minutes afterwards, he became faint, and was carried to bed, whence he rose no more. d. 1779. The "Quarterly Review," in 1852, endeavoured to set up a claim for this young nobleman to be considered the author of the "Letters of Junius" (see JUNIUS); but the hypothesis was soon abandoned.

LYTTON, Edward George Earle Lytton Bulwer, Baron, lit'-ton, a celebrated novelist and dramatic writer, who, after leaving the university of Cambridge, in 1826, commenced his literary career by the publication of a volume of poems, entitled, "Weeds and Wild Flowers." His first novel, "Falkland," was ; anonymously in the following year, and was followed, in 1828, by "Pelham," a witty and brilliant work of fiction, the success of which decided its author to continue his labours in the same path, and he accordingly produced a series of the finest novels in the language. As a poet, Sir Edward displayed grace, feeling, and musical versification; while, as a playwright, he was the author, among other similar productions, of the most popular play of modern days,—"The Lady of Lyons." In 1831 he entered Parliament as member for St. Ives, and attached himself to the Whig party. After a long absence from the House of Commons, he was returned as representative for Hertis in 1852, whereupon he became an adherent of the political views of Lord Derby, and, on the accession of the Conservatives to power, formed a member of the ministry, as colonial secretary. A man of prodigious industry, he showed himself equal to the highest efforts in literature; fiction, poetry, the drama, all were enriched by his labours. As a politician, he could scarcely be included in the first rank, and his oratory, though sufficiently fluent and impressive, could not be deemed of the highest order. In 1844 he succeeded, on the death of his mother, to the Knebworth estates, worth £12,000 a year, and, on that occasion, obtained the royal license to take his mother's maiden name, Lytton, for his surname, and became henceforth known as Sir Edward Bulwer-Lytton. During the Melbourne administration of 1835, he was created a baronet, and, in 1856, was chosen lord rector of the Glasgow University. Both the wife and son of Sir Edward have distinguished themselves in literature; the first as the authoress of several fashionable novels, written in a sarcastic style, and the latter as the writer of several volumes of poems, produced under the pseudonym of "Owen Meredith." In 1840 Sir Edward was raised to the peerage as Baron Lytton. n. 1895.

MABILLON, Jean, ma'-be-gyung, a learned French writer, who assisted Father D'Achéry in compiling his "Spicilegium." The congregation of St. Maur appointed him to superintend their edition of the works of St. Bernard. He afterwards published the "Acts of the Saints of the Order of the Benedictines." Colbert sent him to Germany, in 1683, to search for manuscripts and other works tending to illustrate the history of France. Mabillon returned with several valuable literary treasures, of which he published an account in a relation of his journey; he afterwards went to Italy for the same purpose. Though his learning and acquisitions were immense, he was extremely modest and diffident. n. 1632; n. at Paris, 1707.

a celebrated artist, whose real name was John Gossaert, was employed by Henry VIII., whose children he painted. n. at Maubeuge, Hainault, 1499; n. it is supposed, 1552.

MACABER, mak-ai'-ber, an early German poet, author of a work entitled "The Dance of Death," consisting of a series of dialogues between Death and a number of personages belonging to various ranks of society. Latin, English, and French versions of it have been printed; and Holbein's celebrated paintings have contributed much to spread the author's fame.

MACADAM, John London, mak-ād'-am, a Scotch surveyor, who invented the system of road-making called after his name. His system was made known in two works, entitled respectively "A Practical Essay on the Scientific Repair and Preservation of Public Roads," and "Remarks on the Present State of Road-making." According to this system, excellent roads are formed by laying down layers of broken granite or other hard stone, which become hardened into a solid mass by the traffic passing over them. For this invention, Macadam was in 1827 granted a sum of £10,000 by the government, and offered a baronetcy, which honour he declined. In the same year he was appointed general surveyor to the commissioners intrusted with the management of the metropolitan roads. n. in Scotland, 1756; . 1836.

MACARTNEY, Sir Charles, mak-kar'-the, a brave but unfortunate officer, who, after attaining the rank of lieutenant-colonel, was appointed to the royal African corps in 1821, and while making preparations to attack the Ashantees, received a message from their king to the effect that he (the king) would soon have the head of Sir Charles as an ornament for his drum. Hostilities began in 1823; a battle was fought in 1824, when Sir Charles, being deserted by his native allies, was defeated, captured, and the savage threat of the Ashantee king literally carried out, on the 21st of January, 1824. The ghastly trophy was afterwards recovered by the British, and delivered to Sir Charles's relatives.

MACARTNEY, George Macartney, Earl, mak-kar'-ne, a distinguished British nobleman, who, after receiving a liberal education, and travelling on the continent, was, in 1764, appointed envoy extraordinary to the empress of Russia. In 1767 he was constituted ambassador extraordinary to the same court, but soon afterwards returned, and was employed as secretary to Lord Townshend, viceroy of Ireland. In 1768 he represented Cocker mouth in Parliament; and in 1772 was nominated a knight of the Bath. In 1775 he went out as governor to the island of Grenada; and, in 1776, was created an Irish peer, by the title of Lord Macartney. He continued in Grenada till 1779, when, on the capture of those islands by the French, he was made prisoner and sent to France. In 1780 he was appointed governor of Madras, where his conduct obtained such universal approbation that, in 1785, he was nominated governor-general of Bengal; but this office he declined accepting, and returned to England. In 1786 he received a flattering testimony of respect from the Court of Directors, who granted him an annuity of £1500 for life. The same year he fought a duel with Major-general Stuart, whom he had superseded in India: in this affair his lordship was slightly wounded. In 1792 he was selected to proceed on his most remarkable employment, namely, the embassy to the emperor of China, which mission occupied nearly three years. After his return, he was created an earl of Great Britain. He wrote a "Sketch of the Political History of Ireland," and a "Journal of the Embassy to China." n. near Belfast, 1737; p. at Chiswick, 1806.

MACAULAY, Catherine, ma-kaw'-tai, an English historian, whose principal works were, "The History of England from James I. to the Accession of the House of Hanover," once very popular, but now considered worthless; "The History of England from the Revolution;" "Letters on Education;" and "Observations on the Reflections of Mr. Burke on the French Revolution." n. in Kent, 1733; p. 1791.

MACAULAY, Zachary, F.R.S., a zealous co-operator with Mr. Wilberforce and other philanthropists in the abolition of slavery in the British colonies; to which end he devoted his eminent talents and best energies for upwards of forty years. He was the father of Lord Macaulay. n. 1768; p. 1838.

MACAULAY, Thomas Babington, Lord, a celebrated English historian, orator, essayist, and poet, was the son of Zachary Macaulay, mentioned above. His mother, whose maiden name was Mills, was the daughter of a Quaker, had been a schoolmistress at Bristol, and been trained under the care of the celebrated Hannah More. His father's sister, having been the wife of Thomas Babington, a merchant, the future historian received those names at the baptismal font. From his birth he exhibited signs of superiority and genius, and, more especially, of that power of memory which startled every one by its quickness, flexibility, and range. While he was yet a boy, he was in incessant request to "tell books" to his youthful companions; and at that early date he was in the habit of repenting and declaiming the longest "Arabian Night" as fluently as Scheherazade herself. A little later, he would recite one of Scott's novels, story, characters, and scenery, almost as well as though the book were in his hands. His household books were, however, the Bible and the "Pilgrim's Progress;" and many a strong passage in his works of description or vituperation, sprinkled with biblical words, shows how familiar he had been with scriptural phraseology in early youth. From school he went to the university of Cambridge, where he earned reputation by his verses and his oratory, and by his youthful contributions to Charles Knight's "Quarterly Magazine." He graduated B.A. in 1822, and M.A. in 1826. He had already entered himself at Lincoln's Inn, and been called to the bar. His real entry into literature was through the gates of the "Edinburgh Review," his first effort being a brilliant essay on Milton. During twenty years this first contribution was followed by many others, some upon books, some upon lives of eminent men, of which the best were those on Hastings and Clive, original efforts of his genius working on new material, the gathering of his own eye and ear in the country which they so splendidly describe. His political career was commenced in 1830, under the auspices of Lord Lansdowne, who, seeing an article on the ballot by the young barrister, at once sought him out, and introduced him to Parliament as member for Calne. The government made him secretary of the Board of Control for India, and thus secured his talents for the service of the Whigs. In 1834 he went to India as a member of the Supreme Council; and having, in two years and a half made a considerable addition to his fortune, he came back to England to acquire fame. For a few years he pursued both politics and letters, representing Edinburgh in the House of Commons, and writing articles for the "Edinburgh Review." A quarrel with his constituents broke his connexion with the House of Commons, and restored him to literature. It is true, the citizens of Edinburgh again chose him as their representative in 1852; but he was little more than a nominal member, for he only spoke once or twice, and then on questions of no public moment. During the last twelve years of his life, his time had been almost solely occupied with the "History of England," four volumes of which were completed and published, and a fifth left partly ready for the press, and which afterwards appeared. Although he was generally believed to be closely engaged with the continuation of his History, he frequently turned aside for other literary tasks; such as the memoirs of Oliver Goldsmith, William Pitt, and others, given—literally given, to Mr. Black for his edition of the "Encyclopædia Britannica." Besides the "History" and the "Essays," he wrote a collection of beautiful ballads, including the well-known "Lays of Ancient Rome." His parliamentary and miscellaneous speeches have also been given to the world in a more accessible form than in the pages of Hansard. In 1849 he was elected lord rector of the University of Glasgow; and about the same time became a bencher of Lincoln's Inn. In 1850 he was appointed honorary professor of ancient history in the Royal Academy; three years later, he was rewarded with the Prussian order of Merit, and, in 1857, his honours culminated in his elevation to the peerage as Baron Macaulay. n. at Rothley Temple, Leicestershire, 1800; p. 1850, when his remains were consigned to the companionship of the glorious dead in Westminster Abbey.

MACAULEY, Elizabeth Wright, a lady who, in the several walks of actress, lecturer, and preacher of the gospel, was long well known both in London and the provinces. She quitted the stage on the plea of ill-health, and became the preacher at a chapel in the metropolis; she also occasionally entertained audiences with dramatic recitations; and delivered lectures on "Domestic Philosophy" in various parts of England. n. 1745; p. 1837.

MACBETH, mak'-beth, a usurper and tyrant of Scotland, in the 11th century, who murdered his kinsman Duncan at Inverness, and then seized upon the throne. He also put to death MacGill and Banquo, the most powerful men in his dominions. Macduff next becoming the object of his suspicions, he escaped into England; but the inhuman tyrant wreaked his vengeance on his wife and children, whom he caused to be butchered. Macduff and Malcolm, son of Duncan, having obtained assistance from the English, entered Scotland and forced Macbeth to retreat into the Highlands, where he was soon afterwards slain in battle by Macduff. The above incidents are closely followed in Shakespeare's famous tragedy.

1749, when he settled in Dublin. In 1764, he published "Experimental Essays," which immediately attracted the attention of the faculty, and procured for the author a doctor's degree from the university of Glasgow. His most extensive publication, however, was a "Methodical Introduction to the Theory and Practice of Medicine." This work was translated into Latin, and published at Utrecht. n. 1727; d. 1778.

MACCLELLAN, George, māk-klel-lan, a famous American general, who acquired considerable celebrity in the Civil War of 1861-4 between the Northern and Southern sections of the United States. He was educated at the American military academy of West Point, and served with distinction in the Mexican War of 1846-3. He was a member of the military commission sent by the United States government to the Crimea in 1855-6. He quitted the army in 1857, but received a commission as major-general of volunteers at the commencement of the civil war. He succeeded General MacDowell in the command of the army of the Potomac in July, 1861, and was appointed in the following November commander-in-chief in room of General Scott. Failing to take Richmond, which was defended with consummate skill by General Robert Lee, he was superseded by General Halleck. Soon after the drawn battle of Antietam, MacClellan gave up the command of the army of the Potomac to General Burnside. He was nominated for the presidency in opposition to Abraham Lincoln in 1864, and soon after, in the same year, again resigned his commission. n. at Philadelphia, 1826.

MACCINTOCK, Sir Francis Leopold, māk-kin-tok, a distinguished officer of the British navy, who was knighted for his services in the Arctic regions, where, in 1857, he discovered the remains of the expedition sent out under Sir John Franklin. He was made a post-captain in 1854. n. at Dundalk, Ireland, 1819.

MACCLURE, Sir Robert John Le Mesurier, māk-klure, the discoverer of the north-west passage, was, at an early age, appointed midshipman on board the Victory. Having attained the rank of lieutenant in 1836, he volunteered to serve in the exploring expedition then about to be sent to the Arctic seas. In 1848 he was made first lieutenant in Sir John Ross's expedition in search of Sir John Franklin and his crew, and, on returning to England in 1849, was promoted to the grade of commander. In 1850 he again set out in search of Franklin, being appointed second in command of the expedition under Captain Collinson. The Investigator, MacClure's ship, parted from the Enterprise, commanded by Captain Collinson, in a gale, in the Straits of Magellan, and they never met again. The Enterprise was unable to enter Behring's Straits, and bore away to Hong-Kong to pass the winter; but MacClure succeeded in getting through, and reached Kotzebue Sound. Beset by ice, he struggled onward, doubled Capes Bathurst and Parry, and, finally, sailing up Prince of Wales Straits, penetrated into Barrow Straits: that is to say, into the Atlantic Ocean: thus discovering, in 1850, the long-sought north-west passage. On his return to England, he was knighted, and received a reward of £5,000 for his services. n. at Wexford, Ireland, 1807.

MACCARY, Thomas, māk-kare, a Scottish writer on ecclesiastical history and polemics, who, after completing his education, was licensed as a clergyman by the presbytery of Kelso, and was at once chosen as pastor by a congregation at Edinburgh. In 1812 he produced his "Life of John Knox," a work popular with the educated, no less than the uneducated classes of Scotland, marked as it is by great learning and research. He also wrote the "Life of Andrew Melville" and a "History of the Reformation in Italy in the 16th Century." n. in Berwickshire, 1773; d. 1835.

MACCULLOCH, John Ramsay, māk-kul'-lok, an eminent statistical writer, who, soon after the commencement of the Edinburgh "Scotsman" newspaper, was employed upon its staff, and ultimately became editor of the same print. He likewise contributed a series of valuable articles to the "Edinburgh Review." His most important labours were, however, the compilation of his Dictionaries of Commerce and Geography, and the publication of several works relative to political economy. For his services to literature, he received a pension of £200 per annum, and was appointed comptroller of the Stationery office. The titles of his best works are: "A Dictionary, Practical, Theoretical, and Historical, of Commerce, and Commercial Navigation;" "A Statistical Account of the British Empire;" "A Dictionary, Geographical, Statistical, and Historical, of the various Countries, Places, and Principal Natural Objects in the World;" and a new edition of Adam Smith's "Wealth of Nations." n. in Scotland, about 1790; d. 1834.

MACCULLOCH, Horatio, R.S.A., an eminent Scottish landscape painter, was named after Horatio Lord Nelson. He studied his art in Glasgow and at Edinburgh, and first exhibited, in 1829, a "View on the Clyde." In 1834 he had in the Exhibition of the Scottish Academy no fewer than nine pictures. In misty and rainy moor scenes he excels more especially. In 1836 he was elected an associate of the Scottish Academy, and the following year removed to Hamilton, to study the scenery of Cadzow-wood in that neighbourhood. While residing there he painted two of his most celebrated pieces, the "Highland Loch," and "Loch-an-Eilan." In 1838, in which year he was elected a member of the Scottish Academy, he exhibited a "View in Cadzow Forest," which was universally admired. In 1833 he went to reside at Edinburgh; and after that time produced, among many other works, "Dream of the Highlands," "Misty Countries," "Loch Achray," "Mist Rising off Mountains," "Edinburgh from Dalmeny Park," &c. n. in Glasgow, 1806; d. 1867.

MACDONALD, John, F.R.S., māk-don'-ald, only son of the celebrated Flora Macdonald, who so materially assisted in the escape of Charles Edward Stuart in 1746, passed many years in the service of the East India Company, and attained the rank of captain in the corps of engineers on the Bengal establishment. On his return home, he was appointed Lieutenant-colonel of the royal Clan Alpine regiment, and commandant of the royal Edinburgh artillery. He was a voluminous writer on military science, his productions on that subject, however, being chiefly translations from the French. They include "The Experienced Officer," "Rules and Regulations for the Field Exercise and Manœuvres of Infantry," "Instructions for the Conduct of Infantry on Actual Service," &c. Besides these he produced, in 1808, a "Treatise

MACDONALD, Etienne, Duke of Tarentum and Marshal of France, who was descended from a Scotch family long settled in France, distinguished himself at the battle of Gemappes, and served under General Pichegru in the Low Countries. He crossed the Waal on the ice, under a severe fire, a signal feat of bravery, which resulted in the capture of the Dutch fleet. He was then appointed general of division. In 1798 he was named governor of Rome; subsequently he made a clever retreat before the superior forces of Suwarrow. Having fallen into disgrace for his defence of General Moreau, he remained for a long time without employment; but in 1809 Napoleon I. gave him the command of a division. He performed signal service at the battle of Wagram, and was honoured with the grade of marshal of the empire, and subsequently became duke of Tarentum. He also fought at Lutzen, Bautzen, and Leipsic. After the abdication of Napoleon, he was nominated a member of the Chamber of Peers. In 1816 he became grand chancellor of the Legion of Honour. b. 1765; d. 1840.

MACDOWELL, Irvin, măk-dow-ell, a general of the United States army, who was defeated at Bull Run by the Confederate general, Beauregard, in 1861. b. in Ohio, about 1818.

MACDOWELL, Patrick, R.A., an Irish sculptor of considerable eminence, who, in his youth, was apprenticed to a coachbuilder, but ultimately turned his attention to making models of the human figure. He soon obtained many commissions for busts. His first work that brought him prominently into notice was the "Girl Reading," executed in marble and exhibited in 1838. Shortly after this he became an A.E.A., and was made R.A. in 1846. Among his later works is the group of Europa, for the Albert Memorial in Hyde Park. b. in Belfast, Ireland, 1799.

MACGILLIVRAY, William, măk-gil-liv-ray, an eminent Scotch naturalist, who rose to be professor of civil and natural history in Marischal College, Aberdeen. Among the principal of his larger works may be mentioned "History of British Birds," "History of British Quadrupeds," and "Natural History of Dee-side." b. at Aberdeen, 1852.

MACHIAVELLI, Niccolo, măk-s-a-vail-le, a celebrated Italian politician and writer, who came of a poor but old family of the Florentine republic, and became secretary and historiographer of the republic of Florence, an office he lost in 1512, when the Medici family re-entered the city. A year afterwards he was accused of being concerned in a conspiracy against the Medici, and was put to the torture. He, however, declared that he had nothing to confess, and was subsequently released, according to a pardon sent from Rome by Leo X. He resided during several years in privacy, and occupied himself with the composition of most of his many works. In 1521 he was employed by the Medici on several important missions. He wrote, among other works, a political treatise, entitled "The Prince." b. at Florence, 1469; d. 1527.

MACX, Charles, Baron von mak, a celebrated Austrian general, who served with distinction in the Low Countries against the 1792-93. In 1798 he was dispatched to command the Neapolitan army against the French, being defeated by Macdonald and taken prisoner, he was sent to Paris, whence he made his escape, and returned to Austria. In 1805 he assumed command in Bavaria, but was compelled to surrender, with his army of 30,000 men, to Napoleon. For this he was condemned to death; but the sentence was commuted to imprisonment in the fortress of Spielberg, where he remained during two years. b. in Francenia, 1752; d. at Vienna, 1820.

MACKENZIE, Sir George, mak-en-ze, an eminent Scottish lawyer and man of letters, studied at the universities of Aberdeen and St. Andrews, and subsequently at Bourges, where he specially devoted himself to mastering the principles of civil law. On his return to his native country, he was called to the bar, speedily rose into position as a pleader, at the same time paying attention to literature, and in 1660 published his "Arcadia; or, The Serious Romance," exhibiting a gay and luxuriant fancy. In 1661, he defended the Marquis of Argyll, who had been arraigned for high treason, in so bold and free a manner as to evoke a rebuke from the bench, on which he retorted that "it was impossible to plead for a traitor without speaking treason." He was shortly afterwards raised to the bench, however; and in 1663, published his "Religio Laici; or, Short Discourses upon several Divine and Moral Subjects, with a Friendly Address to the Fanatics of all Sorts;" which was followed, in 1665, by an essay in praise of Solitude. His subsequent works were—"Moral Gallantry," in which he maintained that men should be virtuous on the point of honour, apart from all other considerations, as there is nothing so mean and unworthy of a gentleman as vice; "Moral History of Frugality;" and "Reason," an essay. He was also the author of a play, and of a poem called "Cælia's Counting-house and Closet," some passages of which were imitated by Pope. He was returned to Parliament for Ross-shire about 1670; in 1674 was made king's advocate, became one of the lords of the privy council in Scotland, and was knighted. Sir George resigned on the abrogation of the penal laws by James II., but was shortly afterwards restored to his post, which he continued to hold till the Revolution, when he gave up all his public employments, and went to England, where he devoted himself to study, at Oxford and in London. Besides the works already mentioned, Sir George was the author of several books on legal subjects, all held in high estimation in their day, but which it is unnecessary to enumerate here. b. at Dundee, 1630; d. in London, 1691. In his judicial capacity, he was rigid and severe in administering the law, and in enforcing the doctrine of passive obedience, and in consequence obtained from the Covenanters the epithets of the "Bloodthirsty advocate," and "Persecutor of the saints of God."

MACKENZIE, Sir Alexander, a celebrated mak-en-ze, who emigrated to Canada when a mak-en-ze, and resided for eight years at the mak-en-ze of the Athabasca Lake, to the west of Hudson's Bay. He was afterwards dispatched on an exploring expedition, discovered the great river known by his name, and reached the Northern Ocean in lat. 66°. In 1792, he again set out on a journey, the object of which was to reach the Pacific. He succeeded in this enterprise, and returned in safety. A narrative of his expeditions was published by himself, in 1801, under the title of "Voyages from Montreal on the River St. Lawrence, through the Continent of North America, to the Frozen and Pacific Oceans." For his services he was knighted about the year 1802. B. in Scotland, about 1700; D. 1820.

MACKENZIE, Henry, a Scottish writer, was one of the attorneys of the Scottish Court of Exchequer. He afterwards went to London, where, in 1771, he published his first and best novel, "The Man of Feeling." He subsequently wrote "The Man of the World," and "Julia de Ronbigny," and edited, in succession, two papers on the model of the "Spectator," called the "Mirror" and the "Lounger." He likewise produced several plays, and a volume of dramatic works translated from the German. In 1801 he obtained the appointment of comptroller of taxes for Scotland, in recognition of his services to the Tory party. In the later years of his long life, he contributed nothing to literature. B. at Edinburgh, 1745; D. 1831.

MACKINTOSH, Sir James, măk-in-tosh, an eminent lawyer and writer, at first studied medicine, and obtained his diploma as physician; but having a most decided inclination towards politics and the law, he acted for some time as foreign correspondent of the "Oracle" newspaper, and afterwards set to work vigorously to qualify himself for practice at the bar. In 1791 he completed his "Vindicia Gallica," wherein he defended the principles of the French revolution against Burke. This work, which was highly successful, led to his becoming acquainted with Fox, Sheridan, and other leading Whigs; but although he gave much of his time to politics, he did not neglect his legal studies. In 1795 he was called to the bar. In 1799 he produced his "Introductory Discourse," relative to international law, a work which attracted towards him the notice of the highest men in the kingdom. About the same time he was granted the use of Lincoln's Inn Hall, for the purpose of delivering therein a course of lectures "On the Law of Nature and Nations." His success was triumphant; he obtained "an auditory such as was never seen on a similar occasion. All classes were there represented; lawyers, members of Parliament, men of letters, and country gentlemen, crowded to hear him." His political opinions next underwent considerable modification, and, applying himself more energetically to his profession, he soon began to acquire the reputation of an eloquent counsel. His speech during the action brought against M. Peltier, a French royalist, for a libel on Bonaparte, excited the greatest admiration, and, despite the efforts of the First Consul, was extensively read in France, in a translation made by Madame de Staël. In 1804 he went to India, having received the recordership of Bombay, and been knighted on the occasion. As an Indian judge, his administration was characterized by humanity and wisdom. While in the East Indies, he founded the Literary Society of Bombay, and produced a plan for forming a comparative vocabulary of the Indian languages. On his return to England, he was offered a seat in Parliament, with a prospect of high employment, by Mr. Perceval; a proposal which, together with those made later by Canning and Lord Liverpool, he respectfully declined. In 1813, however, he entered the House of Commons, where, though not eminent as a parliamentary debater, he nevertheless distinguished himself by several great oratorical efforts, on important and special questions, such as Roman Catholic emancipation, the abolition of slavery, municipal and parliamentary reform, and the amelioration of the criminal code. In 1818 he became professor of law and general politics at the East India College, Haileybury, an appointment he retained with much advantage to the students until the year 1824. It was expected that when the Whigs came into power, in 1830, Sir James Mackintosh would be appointed to an important office; but, like Burke and Sheridan, he was destined to experience the slight which that party so often puts upon merely able men, who have no "connexions" of a patrician nature. The only appointment his party could give him was that of "Commissioner for the Affairs of India," a post which, 18 years before, he had declined at the hands of the Tories. On the Reform Bill he made an extraordinary speech, but, his health failing, he never again took a prominent part in debate. For many years he had entertained the intention of writing a History of England; and after his return from India, commenced the preliminary labour of collecting materials for the great task. But his political employments, combined with his love of social enjoyment, left him no time to carry out his project. His Essays in the "Edinburgh Review," indeed, appear to have been a species of compromise made with his own conscience, for abandoning a duty he had imposed upon himself. After his death, his "History of the Revolution in England in 1688" was published. It was but a fragment of the great work, but a fine philosophical one, nevertheless. He also wrote a brief survey of English literature, and a life of Sir Thomas More, for Lardner's "Cyclopædia;" and a "Dissertation on the Progress of Ethical Philosophy," for the "Encyclopædia Britannica." His "Miscellaneous Works" were published in 3 vols. B. at Aldourie, near Inverness, 1765; D. 1832.

MACKLIN, Charles, măk-lin, a comedian and dramatic writer, whose real name was MacLaughlin, which he altered to Macklin. He became a performer in the Lincoln's Inn company in 1725, and not long after was tried for killing another player in a quarrel, and found guilty of manslaughter. His features were so strongly marked, that Quin exclaimed, "If God writes a legible hand, that fellow's a villain." His greatest character was Shylock, his performance of which drew from Mr. Pope this remarkable compliment:—

"This is the Jew

That Shakspeare drew."

Macklin wrote ten plays, two of which "Love à la Mode," and "The Man of the World," possess considerable merit, and were frequently performed. B., it is said, in 1690; D. 1797.

MACKNIGHT, James, măk-nite, a learned Scottish divine, was born at Irvine, in Ayrshire, and was ordained minister of Maybole, where he composed his "Harmony of the Gospels," and his "New Translation of the Epistles." In 1772 he became one of the ministers of Edinburgh. He was occupied nearly thirty years in the execution of his "New Translation from the Greek of all the Apostolical Epistles," with commentaries and notes. B. 1721; D. 1800.

Scottish mathematician, who received his education at the university of Glasgow, where he applied himself to the study of mathematics. In 1717 he obtained the mathematical professorship in Marischal College, Aberdeen, and, two years afterwards, became a fellow of the Royal Society of London. In 1725 he was chosen assistant-professor of mathematics at Edinburgh. In 1742 he published his "System of Fluxions," the most important of his works. In 1745, having taken an active part in fortifying Edinburgh against the Pretender and the rebels, he was compelled to fly, on which he took refuge with Archbishop Herring, at York. Maclaurin was a good as well as great man: his peculiar merit as a philosopher being, that all his studies were conducive to general utility. Besides the above work, he wrote several papers in the "Philosophical Transactions," "Geometria Organica," "On the Percussion of Bodies," "A Treatise of Algebra," and an "Account of Sir Isaac Newton's Philosophical Discoveries." B. at Kilmoddan, Argyleshire, 1698; D. 1746.

MACLISE, Daniel, ma-kleez', an eminent modern painter, who, from his earliest years, evinced a decided predilection for art, and, although placed in a banking house at Cork, quitted it at the age of sixteen, and gave himself up to the study of drawing and painting, maintaining himself the while by selling sketches and portraits. He went to London in 1828, and entered the Royal Academy, where he rapidly advanced in his studies, and carried off the medals for drawing from the antique, for drawing from the life, and for painting the best historical picture. After spending several months in Paris, he exhibited his first picture at the British Institution in 1833, after which period he acquired, with extraordinary rapidity, the highest reputation. In 1835 he became A.R.A., and five years later he was elected a Royal Academician. His range of subjects has been very large, as the enumeration of a few of his best pictures will show. "Robin Hood and Richard Cœur de Lion," "Chivalrous Vow of the Ladies and the Peacock," "Banquet Scene in 'Macbeth,'" "The Sleeping Beauty," and "The Play Scene in 'Hamlet,'" which last, despite its defects of mannerism and disagreeable colour, is unquestionably the production of a master. It may be seen in the British collection at the South Kensington Museum. Maclise has likewise been extensively employed as a portrait-painter, particularly by the intellectual classes. His portraits of Sir Edward Bulwer Lytton, Dickens, Ainsworth, and Macready, are well known. B. 1811.

MACMAHON, Marie-Patrick-Maurice, Count de, marshal of France, măk-măi'-hon, descended from an Irish family, which, after living with distinction for many centuries in Ireland, risked all for the last of the Stuart kings. The Macmahons, carrying their national traditions and historic name to France, mingled their blood by marriage with the old nobility of their adopted country, and obtained, with the hand of an heiress, the magnificent castle and extensive estates of Sully. The marshal's father, the Count de Macmahon, who was an officer of high rank, a peer of France, a Grand Cross of the order of St. Louis, and a personal friend of Charles X., espoused a lady of the ducal house of Caraman, and left four sons and four daughters. Of that numerous family, the youngest was the hero of the Malakhoof and of Magenta. Macmahon entered the military school at St. Cyr, on leaving which, in 1825, he entered the French military service, and in 1830 joined the army of Algeria, where he soon distinguished himself alike by his gallantry and his intelligence. After the combat of the Col de Terebia, in which he was aide-de-camp to General Achard, the latter said to him, "Can you carry to Colonel Rullières, at Blidah, the order to change his march? As the mission is dangerous, I will give you a squadron of light dragons as an escort." The young officer refused the escort, declaring that it was either too little or too much, and preferred going alone. On arriving at about half a mile from Blidah, he saw groups of the enemy's horsemen on each side, as well as behind him; but he went firmly on, knowing that a deep precipice, called the ravine of Blidah, was a little way in front of him. He there drove his horse, a high-blooded animal, at the tremendous chace, and the animal, without hesitation, sprang into mid-air. The rider held his seat immovably, and escaped unhurt, but was obliged to abandon his charger, which had its fore-legs broken. Not one of the Arabs ventured to take the desperate leap, and the young officer reached Blidah in safety. He rose rapidly through the different grades, and attained that of general of brigade in 1848. For a time he filled the position of governor of the province of Oran, and afterwards of Constantine; and in 1852 became general of division. In 1855, when General Canrobert left the Crimea, General Macmahon was selected by the emperor to succeed him in the command of a division; and when the chiefs of the allied armies resolved on assaulting Sebastopol, he had assigned to him the honourable and perilous post of carrying the works of the Malakhoof. This task he successfully performed; for which service he received the grand cross of the Legion of Honour, and was nominated a knight grand-cross of the British order of the Bath. In the war in Italy in 1859, he commanded a division of the French army, and signally distinguished himself at the battle of Magenta, where, although he had received no orders to do so, he pressed forward and arrived in time to secure the victory to the French, a piece of service which gained him the highest rank in the French army, and the title duke of Magenta. After filling various military posts at home, he was made Governor-General of Algeria, in room of Prince Napoleon, in 1864. B. 1808.

MACMURDO, William, C.B., măk-mur'-do, a Colonel in the British army, who, after a series of brilliant services in India under the late Sir Charles Napier, and in the Crimea, became, in 1869, Inspector-General of the Volunteer Forces, a post which he held until 1864. B. about 1819.

MACNISH, Robert, M.D., LL.D., măk'-neesh, a native of Glasgow, who, while enjoying a considerable medical practice, devoted his leisure hours to literary pursuits, and produced his "Anatomy of Drunkenness," "Philosophy of Sleep," "Book of Aphorisms," and "Metempsychosis," &c., which gave him a prominent place among writers and thinkers. He likewise contributed to various magazines, under the signature of the "Modern Pythagorean," by which designation he was long most generally known. B. 1802; D. 1837.

OF BIOGRAPHY.

Macpherson

ERSON, James, mak'-fer'-son, a Scotch poet, whose first work, and that which brought him mostly into notice, was a translation of poems attributed by him to Ossian. These poems possess great beauty; but their authenticity was disputed by Dr. Johnson and other writers, and as zealously maintained by the editor and Dr. Blair: it is now, however, generally admitted that Ossian's poems are a forgery. In 1773 Macpherson published a translation of the "Iliad" into heroic prose, a work of little value. He was also the author of an "Introduction to the History of Great Britain and Ireland," "A History of Great Britain, from 1660 to the Accession of the House of Hanover," and of some political pamphlets in defence of Lord North's administration, for which he obtained a place and a seat in the House of Commons. b. in Inverness-shire, 1738; d. 1796.

MACREADY, William Charles, mak'-reed'-e, a celebrated English tragedian, was the son of the manager of a provincial theatrical company, and lessee of several houses; but, desiring a different profession for his son, sent the future actor to Rugby. At this celebrated school he acquired considerable reputation by his classical attainments, and gave promise of future celebrity at the bar, for which he was at that time destined by his parents. In his seventeenth year, whilst expecting to proceed to the university of Oxford, his father's affairs became deeply embarrassed, and the son resolved to aid his father with those talents which the latter had made sacrifices to improve. He exchanged the quiet of the school for the excitement of the theatre, and in June, 1810, made his first appearance at Birmingham in the character of Romeo. Having industry as well as talents, he was soon recognised as a valuable actor, and saw his exertions in behalf of his father crowned with success. Till Christmas, 1814, Mr. Macready remained with his father's company as a leading actor and stage-director; and in the two following years visited the capitals of Ireland and Scotland, increasing his reputation, which was now thought sufficient to warrant him in making his appearance on the London stage. Accordingly, on the 16th of September, 1816, he came before a Covent Garden audience as Orestes in the "Distressed Mother." His début caused much excitement in the theatrical world, and Kean, among other eminent actors, witnessed and applauded his performance. Notwithstanding this favourable début, Macready had a hard battle to fight for many years. Kean, Kemble, and Young were the great favourites of the town; and the monopoly which limited the representation of Shakspeare's dramas to the two patent theatres narrowed the arena of competition. Under these circumstances, Macready was compelled to refrain from assuming a number of Shakspearian characters in which he afterwards became a favourite with the play-going public. His Virginian and Rob Roy were pronounced very masterly personations. After his triumph in the first, he speedily took his place as a Shakspearian actor. On removing from Covent Garden to Drury Lane, he became the original representative of the respective heroes of Mr. Sheridan Knowles's "Caius Gracchus" and "William Tell." He reappeared at Drury Lane in 1828, and from that time continued to hold a high place in public estimation. Mr. Macready undertook in turn the management of the two patent theatres, and sustained considerable pecuniary loss in his endeavour to elevate the character of dramatic amusements. In 1826 he went to America, and in 1828 visited Paris, where he was enthusiastically received. In 1849 he paid a second visit to New York, where the jealousy of Forrest, an American actor, led to a riot, in which the Astor Opera-house, in which Macready was performing, was attacked by a mob, and the English actor barely escaped with his life. Mr. Macready returned to England shortly afterwards, where he was warmly welcomed by his friends. He commenced his final engagement at the Theatre Royal, Haymarket, in the autumn of 1849 (Oct. 8), of which he was obliged to relinquish the completion, when about half fulfilled, on account of ill health; he resumed it in the autumn of the following year (October 28, 1850), and brought it to a conclusion, Feb. 3, 1851, and a banquet to him took place directly afterwards. He then retired from public life, living principally at Sherborne, Dorsetshire, and at Cheltenham, occupying himself with schemes for the education of the poorer classes. b. in London, March 3, 1793.

MACRO, Eneius Nevius Sertorius, māk'-ro, a favourite of the emperors Tiberius and Caligula, famous for his intrigues, perfidy, and cruelty. He destroyed Sejanus, raised himself on his ruin, was accessory to the murder of Tiberius, and obtained the goodwill of Caligula, but soon became unpopular, and was compelled by Caligula to kill himself, together with his wife, 38 A.D.

MACROBIUS, Ambrosius Aurelius Theodosius, ma-kro'-be-us, a Latin writer of the 5th century, is supposed to have been a Greek, but whether a Christian or pagan is unknown. He wrote a commentary on Cicero's "Dream of Scipio;" and also "Saturnalia, or Miscellanies."

MADAN, Martin, mai'-dan, an English divine, was educated for the bar, but took orders, and became a popular preacher at the Lock chapel, till, by publishing an apology for polygamy, in a work entitled "Thelyphthora," he lost his popularity, and retired from the pulpit. He was also the author of "A Commentary on the Articles of the Church of England," a "Treatise on the Christian Faith," and translated Juvenal and Persius. b. 1726; d. 1790.

MADDEN, Sir Frederick, mād'-den, an eminent antiquarian writer, who, in 1826, entered the library of the British Museum, and was entrusted with the post of keeper of the department of manuscripts in 1837. Both alone and in conjunction with other learned gentlemen, he produced many valuable works, the chief of which are an edition of the earliest English version of the Bible, made by Wycliffe and his followers; an abridged translation of M. Silvestre's "Universal Palæography," and several of the old metrical romances of the 18th century. He became a knight of the Hanoverian order in 1832. b. at Portsmouth, 1801.

MADISON, James, mad'-i-son, President of the United States of America, who commenced his political career in 1776. He was a member of the first congress after the amendment of the constitution in 1789, and became president in 1809, an office he filled during two terms. b. in Virginia, 1751; d. 1836.

MADOC, ma'-doc, the son of Owain Gwynedd, a Welsh prince, who is said to have gone to sea in ten ships with 300 men, in 1170, after which no tidings were ever heard of him. It is supposed that Madoc reached the American continent, as it is said there was a tribe of white Indians on the northern branches of the Missouri river who spoke the Welsh language.

MADOX, Thomas, mid-ox, an English antiquary and historiographer royal, who published, in 1702, a "Collection of Ancient Charters and Instruments of divers kinds, taken from the Originals, from the Conquest to the Reign of Henry VIII." In 1711 appeared his "History and Antiquities of the Exchequer," which was reprinted in 1769. His last work was the "Firma Burgi; or, Historical Essay concerning the Cities, Towns, and Boroughs of England."

MÆCENAS, Caius Cilnius, me-sel-nas, the intimate friend of Augustus, and so liberal a patron of men of letters, that his name has been immortalised in consequence; and it was chiefly through him that Virgil and Horace were enabled to devote themselves to poetry. According to Horace, he was descended from the ancient kings of Etruria. Augustus, one day, being engaged in the administration of justice, and exhibiting an inclination to be over-severe in his judgments, Mæcenas threw him a paper on which were the words: "Come down from the tribunal, thou butcher!" with which admonition the emperor was so struck, that he at once quitted the judgment-seat without passing on the criminals before him the sentence of death he had intended. Virgil and Horace have both immortalised Mæcenas in their works. He distinguished himself also in the field, particularly at the battles of Modona and Philippi. When Augustus and Agrippa went to Sicily, Mæcenas had the administration of the government. He wrote some tragedies and other works, which are lost. D. S. B. C.

MAGALHANS, commonly, but erroneously, called MAGELLAN, Ferdinand, ma-gel-lan, a famous Portuguese navigator. In 1510 he served under Albuquerque, and distinguished himself by his bravery, and by his exact knowledge of the Indian seas. On his return to Portugal he aspired to the rank of commander, but, being disappointed, entered the service of the emperor Charles V., who gave him the command of a fleet, with which, in 1520, he discovered the straits called by his name, at the extremity of South America; after which he took possession of the Philippine islands, in the name of the king of Spain. He was slain at those islands in a skirmish with the natives, in 1521. Of this expedition, only one vessel, with eighteen men, returned to Europe.

MAGEE, William, ma-gee, a learned Irish prelate and theological writer, was born in humble life, and admitted as sizar at Dublin university. He was soon distinguished for his scholastic attainments; and in 1803 became a senior fellow of Trinity College, and professor of mathematics. In 1801 he published "Discourses on the Scriptural Doctrines of the Atonement and Sacrifice," a work directed against the tenets of the Unitarians. In 1818 he was advanced to the deanery of Cork; in 1819 was consecrated bishop of Raphoe; and, in 1823, translated to the see of Dublin. B. 1767; D. 1831.

MAGENDIE, François, ma-ahon-de, a celebrated French physician and physiologist, who, after a brilliant career as a student, became, in 1818, a physician to the Hôtel Dieu. He was elected member of the Academy of Sciences in 1819; and, in 1821, obtained the appointment of or of anatomy in the College of France.

Magnentius

His contributions to science were very numerous: his "Elements of Physiology" was a standard text-book, during many years, in France, Germany, and England. He pointed out that non-nitrogenous substances were devoid of nutrition; proved that the veins were organs of absorption; that strychnia acts upon the spinal cord, and destroys the nerves of respiration by paralysis; that prussic acid was a remedy for certain forms of cough; and finally, like Sir Charles Bell, demonstrated the precise functions of the spinal nerves. He wrote and contributed to various medical works. B. 1783; D. 1855.

MAGENTA, DUKE OF. (See MACMAHON.)

MAGINN, William, LL.D., ma'-gin, one of the most fertile and versatile writers of modern times, under the tuition of his father, made such rapid progress that he was enabled to enter Trinity College, Dublin, when only ten years of age. Having tried his powers as an author by contributing various papers to the "Literary Gazette," and, under a feigned name, to "Blackwood's Magazine," he settled for nearly three years in Edinburgh; and continued to enrich the pages of "Blackwood" with much wit, eloquence, learning, and fun, under the pseudonym of "Sir Morgan O'Doherty." He visited London for the first time in 1823, and settling there, wrote so much, and for such a variety of works, that an enumeration of his productions is impossible here. Besides his labours as a contributor to periodicals of various kinds, he devoted a considerable part of his time to politics, and, about the year 1822, he became sub-editor of the "Standard," in which his newspaper talents and learning made him a formidable antagonist to the Liberals, and gave a proportionate degree of influence. While thus engaged, and while writing numerous light papers for publications, he also contributed voluminously to "Fraser's Magazine," in which he wrote a caustic review of a "fashionable" novel, entitled "Berkeley Castle." The author, the Hon. Granville Berkeley, took offence, and, in company with a friend, committed a violent assault upon Mr. Fraser. Aroused by this ill-treatment of his friend and publisher, Dr. Maginn offered the offended author satisfaction, and a hostile meeting took place accordingly. The duel proved a bloodless one, but it was very near having a different result, as the doctor was hit on the heel of his boot, and his opponent on the collar of his coat. In the later years of his life, Dr. Maginn was involved in serious pecuniary difficulties, which arose, however, not, as is affirmed, from self-indulgence, but from his indiscriminate kindness to others. Learned among the learned, witty among the witty, gentle and unassuming as a child among men of ability, Maginn was crushing in his sarcastic scorn against all whom he deemed enemies of the constitution. B. at Cork, 1793; D. 1842.

MAGLIABECCHI, Antonio, mag'-ya-a-baik'-ke, a learned Italian, who acquired such a store of knowledge as to be appointed librarian to the grand-duke of Tuscany. He corresponded with most of the learned men in Europe; and astonishing things, bordering on the marvellous, are told of his memory. His delight was wholly in books and manuscripts, and he refused preferment and riches. An old cloak served him for a garment by day and a covering by night. He had one straw chair for his table, and another to sleep on. B. at Florence, 1658; D. 1714.

MAGNENTUS, mag-nent'-shus, a German, who rose from being a private soldier, to the first employments in the empire. The emperor Constantine had a great esteem for him, and, in a mutiny among the troops, delivered him from the fury of the soldiers, by covering him with his robe. Magnentius murdered his benefactor in 350, and assumed the title of emperor; but Constantius II. avenged the death of his brother, and, after a bloody battle, Magnentius was defeated; whereupon he killed himself, 353.

MAGNUS, Albertus. (See ALBERTUS MAGNUS.)

MAHMOUD, ma'-mood, the founder of the Gasnevide dynasty, succeeded to the sovereignty of Khorassan and Bokhara in 997. He extended his territories by conquest, and formed a vast kingdom, extending from the banks of the Ganges to the Caspian Sea. He held his court at Balkh and Ghisni, and was the first eastern potentate who took the title of sultan (emperor) instead of emir (commander), which had been previously borne by his predecessors. D. 1030.

MAHMOUD I., sometimes called Mahomet V., sultan of the Ottoman Turks, was son of Mustapha II., and ascended the throne at Constantinople in 1730. He interfered but little in the government of his kingdom, choosing rather to live a life of luxury, while the cares of state devolved upon his ministers. D. 1696; D. 1751.

MAHMOUD II., sultan of Turkey, was placed upon the throne by Mustapha Bairaktar, chief of the janissaries, in 1808. Under his reign, despite his greatest exertions, the decadence of Turkey was greatly accelerated. In 1812, Bessarabia was ceded to Russia by the peace of Bucharest. Between the years 1812 and 1817, Servia, Moldavia, and Wallachia were evacuated, and the Ionian islands proclaimed their independence. In 1820, Greece broke out into insurrection, and, after a struggle of eight years, threw off the Turkish yoke. A fresh war next broke out between Turkey and Russia, and the latter power was only prevented from taking possession of Constantinople by the intervention of the European powers, which brought about the peace of Adrianople, in 1829. During this time, Ali, pacha of Janina, had defied the sultan, and Mehemet Ali, pacha of Egypt, had rendered himself independent. The extermination of the janissaries in 1826, and the introduction of some details of civilization, weakened the Turkish power, but did not benefit Mahmoud. In 1833 he was thrice defeated by the Egyptians, and the treaty of Unklar-Skelessi left him at the mercy of Russia. He was about to engage in a new war with Mehemet Ali, when his death took place. D. 1785; D. 1839.—He was succeeded by his eldest son, Abdul-Mejid. (See ABDUL-MEJID.)

MAHOMET. (See MOHAMMED.)

MAHOMET I., ma'i-ho-met, emperor of the Turks, was the son of Bajazet I., and succeeded his brother Mousa in 1413. He re-established the glory of the Ottoman empire, which had been ravaged by Tamerlane, and fixed the seat of government at Adrianople, where he died in 1421, aged 47.

MAHOMET II. succeeded his father, Amurath II., in 1451. He made many conquests, and was the first who assumed the title of Grand Seigneur. After a long and victorious career, he died as he was about to lead an attack against the Knights of St. John, at Rhodes. Mahomet is said to have been a freethinker, and to have ridiculed throughout the religion in which he was brought up. His letters, translated into Latin, were published in 1520. D. 1429; D. 1481.

MAHOMET III. succeeded his father, Amurath III., in 1595. He commenced his reign by strangling nineteen of his brothers, and drowning ten of his father's wives. He entered Hungary, took Agram by capitulation, and then massacred the whole garrison. The archduke Maximilian marched against him, and nearly obtained a complete victory, when Mahomet, who had made a false retreat, suddenly returned to the charge, and routed the imperialists. He was afterwards less successful, and obliged to sue for peace to the Christian princes whose states he had ravaged. D. 1603.

MAHOMET IV. became emperor in 1619, after the tragical death of his father, Ibrahim I. The Turks were at this time engaged in a war with the Venetians, and made themselves masters of the isle of Candia in 1669, after losing 100,000 men. Mahomet marched in person against Poland, and, having taken several places, made peace with that country, on condition of an annual tribute being paid to him. John Sobieski, irritated at this treaty, raised an army, and the year following defeated the Turks near Choczim. He also obtained a number of other advantages over them, and a peace was concluded, favourable to Poland, in 1676. In 1683 the Turks laid siege to Vienna, on which Sobieski marched to its relief, and routed the besiegers. The year following, a league was entered into against the Turks, between the emperor, the king of Poland, and the Venetians. The janissaries, attributing their misfortunes to the indolence of the sultan, deposed him in 1697, and gave the sceptre to his brother Solyman III., who sent him to the same prison whence he had himself been taken. Mahomet died there, 1691.

MAHOMET V. (See MAHMOUD I.)

MAR, Cardinal Angelo, ma'-e, uneminent Italian scholar, who, after having lived obscurely in a Jesuit convent, was promoted to the charge of the Ambrosian Library at Milan in 1813. In 1819 he was called to Rome, where his researches in the Vatican library brought to light many ancient works and fragments till then lost to the world. The most important of these were "The Republic" of Cicero, discovered in 1822, nearly in a perfect condition, and the letters of Fronto, the tutor of the Roman emperor Marcus Aurelius. His valuable labours were rewarded with high distinction in the Church. He was created a cardinal in 1838, and subsequently became chief librarian of the Vatican, which office he held till his death. D. at Bergamo, 1782; D. 1854.

MAILLET, Benedict de, mail-lai, a whimsical but ingenious French writer, who successively became consul at Egypt and Leghorn. His principal work, "Tellamed" (his name read backwards), contains a singular system of cosmogony, in which he maintains that all the land of the globe was originally covered with water, and that every species of animal, man included, owes its origin to the sea. D. 1656; D. 1738.

MAIMBOURG, Louis, maim'-boorg, a celebrated French ecclesiastical historian, who entered into the society of Jesuits; but having written a treatise in defence of the rights of the Gallican church against the see of Rome, was expelled the order. Louis XIV., however, made him amends by giving him a pension. His chief works are, "A History of Arianism," "A History of Iconoclasts," "A History of the Crusades," and "Histories of Calvinism and Lutheranism." b. 1610; d. 1658.

MAIMONIDES, Moses, mai-mon-i-dæ, or Moses Ben MAIMON, a celebrated Jewish rabbi. He is commonly called Moses Ægyptus, because he lived in that country as physician to the sultan. He was versed in several languages and sciences, but particularly mathematics and medicine. He was also learned in theology, and the Jews account him as second only to Moses the legislator. He wrote a "Commentary upon the Old Testament," a "Digest of the Hebrew Laws," and other valuable works. b. at Cordova, Spain, about 1133; d. 1204.

MAINTENON, Frances d'Aubigné, Marchioness de, main-te-naeng, the mistress, and afterwards wife, of Louis XIV. In 1651 she married the celebrated comic poet Scarron, who taught her the Latin, Spanish, and Italian languages. In 1660 she became a widow in very narrow circumstances; but the queen allowed her a pension, with which she retired to a convent at Paris. The death of her patron deprived her of her pension, and reduced her to great difficulties; but, by means of her old friend Madame de Montespan, the king's mistress, she obtained the renewal of her pension. By the command of his majesty she undertook the education of the children he had by Madame de Montespan, which trust she discharged with great fidelity. In this situation she acquired an ascendancy over the mind of the king, who, in 1674, purchased for her the estate of Maintenon, which name she assumed. In 1685 the king made her his wife; but the marriage was never publicly avowed. On the death of Louis, she retired to St. Cyr, an institution she had herself founded for poor girls of good family. b. 1635; d. 1719.

MAINZER, Joseph, main'-zair, a distinguished musician, and introducer of the system of teaching that is known by his name, began life as apprentice to mining engineering in the coal-field of Dutweiler and Sultzbach, but was obliged to quit this pursuit from ill-health. He then devoted himself to the study of music, for which he had always had a predilection, and after studying under various masters, and in different parts of the world, returned to Trèves, his native place, and turned his attention to the development of his new system of teaching music, which he had long before conceived, and which soon began to attract attention in Germany. In 1830, he went to Paris, then in all the excitement of the second revolution, where he soon found a field for his plan of teaching and popularizing music; but the police became jealous of his popularity, and invited him to close his school, an invitation which he could not safely decline. During his residence in Paris, Mainzer was a constant contributor to the "Revue des Deux Mondes," the "Revue du Nord," "La Balance," published by Böerne, and for six years was the rédauteur of the musical department of the "National." In 1844 he went to England, where his scheme of teaching singing to the masses was well received. Soon afterwards he established himself in Scotland; and in 1848 definitively took up his abode in Manchester, where he laboured with great assiduity and success till his death. He left a great number of works in almost every style of composition. b. 1801; d. 1851.

MAIRE, James Lx, le(r)-mair, a Dutch navigator, who sailed from the Texel in 1615, with two vessels. In the following year he discovered the strait which bears his name, in South America. After visiting New Guinea, he sailed to Batavia, where he was made prisoner, and the only vessel he had left was confiscated, under the pretence of his having infringed on the rights of the Dutch East India Company. d. on his passage to Europe, in 1616.

MAITLAND, Sir Richard, maif'-land, an early Scottish poet, distinguished also as a lawyer and a statesman, held the office of a lord of session, and in that capacity took the title of Lord Lethington, from his estate. He was appointed keeper of the privy seal in the reign of Queen Mary; which office, as well as his judicial seat, he resigned a few years after, and died in 1598. b. 1496. He wrote several poems, some of which are in Allan Ramsay's "Evergreen."—William Maitland of Lethington, the eldest son of Sir Richard, was secretary of state to Mary Queen of Scots.—John Maitland, second son of Sir Richard, succeeded his father in the office of lord privy seal, and lost it through his attachment to the interests of the queen. He was afterwards secretary to James VI., and at length chancellor of Scotland. In 1589 he attended the king on his voyage to Norway, where his bride, the Princess of Denmark, was detained by contrary winds. The marriage was immediately consummated, and they returned with the queen to Copenhagen, where they spent the ensuing winter. In 1590 Maitland was created Lord Maitland of Thurstane. Towards the end of the year 1592, the chancellor incurred the queen's displeasure for refusing to relinquish his lordship of Munsellburgh, which she claimed as being a part of that of Dunfermline. He absented himself for some time from court, but was at length restored to favour. Besides his Scottish poetry in the Maitland collection, he wrote several Latin epigrams, &c., to be found in the "Delicia Pæctarum Sæclorum." d. 1595.

MAITLAND, John. (See LAUDERDALE, Duke of.) MAITLAND, William, a native of Brechin, Forfarshire, was originally a travelling hair-merchant, but turning his attention to literature, gained a competency, and was elected a member of the Royal and Antiquarian Societies. He wrote a "History of Edinburgh," a "History of London," and "The History and Antiquities of Scotland." b. about 1603; d. 1757.

MAITLAND, Rear-Admiral Sir Frederick Lewis, the third son of a rear-admiral, commenced his naval career at a very early age. Passing over the earlier part of his career, in the course of which he saw much service, and greatly distinguished himself, we find Captain Maitland commanding the armed launches employed to cover the landing of Sir Ralph Abercromby's army in Egypt in 1801, for which he received the thanks of the naval and military commanders-in-chief. His subsequent successes while cruising in the Mediterranean as captain of the Loire, of 46 guns, brought him into general notice, and in 1813 he was appointed to the command of the Goliath, and subsequently to the Bellerophon, of 74 guns, in which ship he was sent to watch the French coast off Rochefort. While there, Napoleon, after the events which followed the battle of Waterloo, resolved to throw himself on the generosity of "the most powerful, the most constant, and the most generous of his enemies;" and accordingly surrendered unconditionally to Captain Maitland on the 16th July, 1815. captivity on board, proceeded to Plymouth, off which port he was removed to the Northumberland on the 7th of August, having previously offered to present Captain Maitland with his portrait set with diamonds, of the value of 3000 guineas, which offer was politely declined. Maitland was subsequently appointed to the command of the Feugue, of 71 guns; afterwards attained to the rank of rear-admiral; and was appointed commander-in-chief in the East Indies, where he died, after several years' service, Dec. 30, 1830.

MALATESTA, MALATESTI, Lords of Rimini, mal-tes-tai-ta, a great Italian family during the middle ages, and the head of the Guelph party at Rimini. The tragedy which occurred in the household of one of this family forms one of the finest episodes in Dante's "Inferno." After being despoiled of their possessions by Pope Clement VIII., in 1523, the family retired to Venice, and their names were afterwards recorded in the annals of that republic.

MALCOLM, mal'-kom, the name of four kings of Scotland, who reigned between the 10th and 12th centuries. The most celebrated was Malcolm III., son of that Duncan immortalized in Shakspeare's "Macbeth." After the murder of his father, he took refuge in England; but, upon the fall of Macbeth, in 1057, he recovered possession of the Scottish crown. He afterwards engaged in a war with William Rufus, and was slain fighting against the English, 1093.

MALCOLM, James Peller, an artist and antiquary, was a native of America, studied painting in England, and eventually became an engraver. He was the author of "Londinium Redivivum," "Anecdotes of the Manners and Customs of London," "First Impressions," &c. D. 1815.

MALCOLM, Sir John, a celebrated British officer, and author of the "History of Persia," went to India at the age of thirteen, and, after serving with distinction in both political and military capacities, was appointed, in 1807, minister plenipotentiary to Persia. On his return to England, in 1812, he was knighted, and three years afterwards published his "History of Persia," a most valuable contribution to literature, derived from native sources. He returned to India in 1817, and acted as second in command in the campaigns against the Mahrattas and Pindarees. On the conclusion of this war, he was nominated to the civil and military command of Central India, which, during his administration, became tranquilized and prosperous. He returned to England in 1821, but again went out to the East in 1827, as governor of Bombay. He finally left India in 1830, and soon afterwards entered Parliament. He was the author of a "Life of Lord Clive," "Political History of India," and a "Memoir on Central India." D. in Scotland, 1769; D. 1833.

MALBRANCHÉ, Nicholas, mal'-branch, one of the most illustrious disciples of Des Cartes, whose philosophy he devoted his life to propagate and explain. His works were numerous, and of the highest excellence. D. at Paris, 1694; D. 1715.

MALSSINGUES, Chrétien Guillaume Lamoignon, mal'-si-nyon, an eminent French lawyer, whose talents procured him the place of president of the Court of Aids in 1750, which post he held with great reputation for upwards of twenty years, and then retired to his paternal estate. In 1775 he was recalled from his retreat, and made minister of state for the interior. Under his administration, prisons were visited, and numerous abuses removed, but the year following he resigned. At the beginning of the Revolution he conceived a hope that it would have been productive of good, but the illusion soon vanished. He voluntarily pleaded the cause of the unfortunate Louis XVI., and defended him with all the ardour of conscious rectitude. This excellent man was condemned to death, with his daughter and grand-daughter, by the revolutionary tribunal in 1794. He wrote some treatises on natural history and agriculture, and a work entitled "Memoire sur la Liberté de la Presse." D. 1721.

MALIBRAN DE BERIOT, Maria Felicita, mal'-i-brä dai bai'-re-o, a celebrated vocal performer, was the eldest daughter of Manuel Garcia, a well-known tenor singer of the Italian Opera. She was taken to London by her parents when eight years old, devoted her unceasing attention to the study of music, and made her début in 1825, when only sixteen years of age, as prima donna at the opera. In the succeeding year she accompanied her father to America, where her union with M. Malibran, an elderly French merchant at New York, took place. Shortly after their marriage her husband failed, and was thrown into prison; and Madame Malibran, believing she had been deceived, separated from him, and returned to Europe. Intense study, the love of her art, and the motives she had for exertion, had already made her a performer of unrivalled excellence. The Parisian audiences were perfectly enraptured, and every night she concluded her performance amidst a thunder of applause and a shower of flowers. From Paris she went to London, where she shone with increased lustre, through the season of 1829, in the characters of Rosina, Tamerlino, Desdemona, Semiramide, Zerlina, and Ninetta. Her reputation now extended over the whole of Europe; and after travelling great distances to fulfil different engagements, and receiving vast sums for her performances, she revisited England in 1835, and made her first appearance at Covent Garden, in an English version of "La Sonnambula," on the 18th of May, and at once entranced her audiences with her marvellous powers of vocalization; not only in the theatre, but also at numerous royal and noble entertainments to which she was invited, and at the concerts of professors. After almost incredible exertions, in the evening, she often rose by five o'clock in the morning, and practised for several hours those wonderful passages by which audiences were again to be electrified. In March, 1836, Madame Malibran, while in Paris, having been freed, by the French courts, from her union with Monsieur Malibran, was married to Monsieur de Beriot, a Belgian, whose ability as a violinist had placed him in the highest rank of his profession. In May following, she resumed her performances at Drury Lane Theatre; and, at the close of the season, accompanied her husband to Brussels, and other cities on the Continent. But the close of her career was at hand. Having been engaged for the Manchester grand musical festival, she arrived in that town on the 11th of September, and, though indisposed, commenced her arduous task the next day. Her illness rapidly increased; and, though she endeavoured to conceal it, by sustaining her part with the apparent vigour of health and unusual energy, she sank under the effort. On Wednesday, the 14th, her last notes

MALINS, Sir Richard, ma'-line, an eminent Chancery barrister, who was appointed Vice-Chancellor of the Court of Chancery in December, 1806. He graduated at Cambridge, and was called to the bar at the Inner Temple in 1830. He represented Wallingford in the Conservative interest from 1852 to 1865, when he lost his seat in the general election of that year. He received the honour of Knighthood in 1847, shortly after his appointment as Vice-Cham-

MALLET, David, mal'-let, a Scotch poet, was tutor to the sons of the duke of Montrose, with whom he travelled, and on his return settled in London, where he was called to the bar by profession. In 1710 he published a "Life of Lord Bacon," which is a very insignificant and totally unworthy of the duchess of Marlborough left him a legacy of £1000 to write the life of her husband; which it was observed, that as he had forged Bacon was a philosopher, so he would probably omit to notice Marlborough as a general: of this life, however, he never wrote a line. Frederick Prince of Wales appointed him his under-secretary. Lord Bolingbroke left him his philosophical works, which he published after the author's death. His poetical works were collected and published by himself in 1759. n. in Perthshire about 1700; n. 1763.

MALMESBURY, William of, mal'm-ber-ee, an old English historian, whose father was a Norman, his mother being an Englishwoman, was early in his life placed in the monastery whose name he is known by, and became its librarian. He wrote "The History of the Kings of England," "The History of the Prelates of England," and many less important works. His "History of the Kings" terminates at the year 1142: it has been reprinted in Bohn's Antiquarian Library. He is regarded as one of the most truthful and impartial of the early historians. n. it is supposed in Somersetshire, about 1095; n. about 1180.

MALMESBURY, James Harris, first Earl of, an English diplomatist, was son of the celebrated James Harris, author of "Hermes." (See HARRIS, James.) He was appointed ambassador to the court of Frederick II. of Prussia in 1772, and subsequently filled the same post in Russia and at the Hague. In 1794 he negotiated the marriage between the Prince of Wales and Caroline of Brunswick; and many valuable details of the mission were afterwards published by him in his "Diary." His last employments were in 1796-7, at Paris and Lille, for the purpose of obtaining a treaty of peace with the French republic. His "Diaries and Correspondence" were published in 1844. n. at Salisbury, 1746; n. 1820.

MALONE, Edmund, mal'-lone, an Irish lawyer, who devoted his life to literature, and became celebrated for his commentaries and editions of Shakspeare's works. n. 1741; n. 1812.

MALTE-BRUN, Conrad, mal'-te-brun, a celebrated Danish geographer, commenced life by writing poems and treatises in favour of liberty, for which he was banished in 1736. After causing refuge in Sweden for a short time, he went to Paris in 1800, where he was engaged as foreign editor of the "Journal de Debat," and published a number of highly important geographical works, the chief of which are "Geography, Mathematical, Physical, and Political," "Summary of Universal Geography," and "Annals of Voyages and Travels." n. in Juland, 1775; n. at Paris, 1827.

MALTHUS, Rev. Thomas Robert, mal'-thus, an English clergyman of the established church, who wrote several works on population and on political economy, which have attracted considerable attention. In the famous "Essay on Population," the proposition developed by Mr. Malthus was, that the population, when unchecked, doubles itself every twenty-five years, or increases in a geometrical ratio; the means of subsistence, on the other hand, could not be made to increase faster than in an arithmetical ratio. He then proceeded to show that the natural check for this was necessary, which, either with less, destroys human life. Mr. Malthus is said to have been much misapprehended; he was not so plentifully abused for his seemingly exploded theories; it is clear, however, that his political and philosophic man. He has been, however, as mentioned, he wrote a number of essays on the same subjects. n. in Surrey, 1768; n. at Bath, 1831.

MALUS, Etienne Louis, mal'-us, a French experimental philosopher and mathematician, professor in the Polytechnic school, and afterwards served as an officer of engineers, both on the Rhine in 1797, and in Egypt under Bonaparte. He then devoted himself to philosophy, particularly studying had the good fortune to discover the polarization of light, for which he was elected a member of the Institute. The gold medal of the Royal Society, and honours from all quarters, were bestowed upon him, and he ultimately became director of the Polytechnic School, and superintendent of fortifications. n. at Paris, 1775; n. 1812.

MANCO-CAPAC, man'-ko ka'-pak, founder and first monarch of the empire of Peru, civilized and reunited the different tribes of Peruvians, to whom he pretended that he was born of the sun. After his death, he was worshipped as a deity. He is said to have flourished about 1025. His dynasty endured 600 years, but became extinct soon after the conquest of Peru by Pizarro.

MANDVILLE, Sir John, man'-de-vel, an English traveller, who spent thirty-four years in travelling through various countries, including Palestine, Egypt, and a large portion of Asia. He lived for three years at Pekin, and on his return published a narrative of his voyages, which abounds in much curious matter, but blended with the most extravagant fictions. The first English edition of his travels was printed by Wynkyn de Worde, at Westminster, in 1490. n. at St. Albans, about 1300; n. at London, 1372.

MANETHO, mai-ne'-tho, an Egyptian historian, who flourished in the time of Ptolemy Philadelphus. at Mendes, or Heliopolis.

MANETHO, a Greek, who composed, in Greek, a History of Egypt, of which a fragment only has come down to us; there is, however, a Latin work by him on the same subject.

OF BIOGRAPHY.

Manfred

MANFRED, măn'-fred, king of Naples and Sicily, was a natural son of the emperor Frederick II. After the death of his brother Conrad, he became regent of the kingdom, during the minority of Conradino, his nephew. Pope Innocent IV. exciting a revolt against him, he was driven from his kingdom; but he reconquered it a year afterwards, and caused himself to be crowned in 1258. Pope Urban IV. excommunicated him, and offered his kingdom to Charles of Anjou. Manfred perished in a desperate battle with the latter near Benevento, 1266.

MANI, or MANICHEUS, mă'-ne, an heresiarch of the 3rd century, a Persian, who taught that there were two principles of all things, co-eternal and co-equal; that all good proceeded from the former, and all evil from the latter; that the good being was the author of the New Testament, and the bad of the Old; the one the creator of the body, and the other of the soul. His followers became numerous, and were denominated Manicheans. Mani was exiled by order of Sapor, king of Persia, for failing to cure his son, and was subsequently flayed alive by Hormisdas, successor of Sapor, in 274.

MANILIUS, Marcus, măn'-il-ee-us, a Roman poet, who flourished in the Augustan era. He undertook a didactic poem, of which we have but five books, entitled "Astronomica." It is valuable chiefly as a work of science, but contains, however, a few beautiful passages, particularly in the introductions.

MANIN, Daniel, mă'-ni, an illustrious Italian patriot, formerly president of the Venetian republic. The son of a distinguished advocate, young Manin was educated for the profession of the law. About 1825 he married, and went to reside at Mestre, a small town near Venice. There he practised as an advocate, and occupied his leisure with historical studies, taking no part in the discussions or proceedings of the secret societies then existing in Italy, but hating Austrian rule, and hoping for the independence of Venice with the whole force of his nature. That such a man should come into collision with the Austrian government was perfectly natural; and, at the beginning of 1848, he was imprisoned for the liberal opinions expressed by him as advocate during several trials. A few months later, the Austrians were driven from Milan; the insurrection quickly spread throughout the Italian peninsula, and at Venice, Count Zichy, the Austrian governor, was forced to surrender. Manin here stepped forth, and exhorted his countrymen to act like men who were worthy of freedom. He organized a government, at the head of which he was placed, with Tomaseo; formed a committee of defence, created ten battalions of garde mobile, and improvised a corps of artillery. When Charles Albert took the field against the Austrians, in the name of Italy, the Venetians agreed to a fusion with Lombardy and Piedmont, under the name of the kingdom of Northern Italy. The defeat of the Piedmontese, however, destroyed that compact, and left Venice to defend herself alone against Austria; thereupon a republic was proclaimed, Manin being named chief triumvir, and the military command confided to the Neapolitan general Pepe. Venice was besieged by the Austrians in August, 1848, but held out heroically until the end of the same month in the following year, and did not surrender before it had been subjected to a fearful bombardment. According to the terms of capitulation, Manin was permitted to go into exile, and thereupon retired to Paris, where he supported himself by giving lessons in Italian. B. at Venice, 1804; d. at Paris, 1857.

ILEX, Mary de la Riviere, măn'-le, the daughter of Sir Roger Manley, governor of Guernsey, a gentleman who suffered much for his adherence to Charles I., and also distinguished himself as a writer. She was left to the care of a cousin, who seduced her under the mask of a pretended marriage, and then abandoned her. Being thus dependent on her own exertions for support, she became a dramatic and political writer. Her first effort was "The Royal Mistress," a tragedy, which was successful. She then composed "The New Atalanta," in which, under feigned names, and with much warmth and freedom, she relates the amours and adventures, real and supposed, of many distinguished persons of the day. For the libels contained in this work she was committed to the custody of a messenger, but afterwards admitted to bail; and a Tory administration succeeding, she lived in high reputation and gaiety. She was also employed in writing for Queen Anne's ministry; and when Swift relinquished the "Examiner," she continued it for a considerable time with great spirit. Besides the works before mentioned, she wrote "Lucius," a tragedy; "The Lost Lover," a comedy; "Memoirs of Europe towards the Close of the Eighteenth Century," "Court Intrigues," "Adventures of Rivelles," &c. D. 1724.

MANLIUS CAPITOLINUS, Marcus, kăp'-to-l'-us, a celebrated Roman consul and commander, who, when Rome was taken by the Gauls, retired into the Capitol, and preserved it from a sudden attack made upon it in the night. The dogs which were kept in the Capitol made no noise; but the geese, by their cries, awoke Manlius, who had just time to repel the enemy. Geese from that period were always held sacred among the Romans, and Manlius was honoured with the surname of Capitolineus. He afterwards endeavoured to obtain the sovereignty of Rome, for which he was thrown from the Tarpeian rock, 381 B.C.

MANLIUS TORQUATUS, tor-kwă'-tus, a famous Roman, who displayed great courage in his youth as military tribune. In a war against the Gauls he accepted a challenge given by one of the enemy, and having slain him, took his chain (torques) from his neck; on which account he assumed the name of Torquatus. He was the first Roman advanced to the dictatorship without being previously a consul. But he tarnished his glory by putting his son to death for engaging in single combat with an enemy contrary to his order. This greatly disgusted the Romans, and, on account of his severity in his government, all edicts of extreme rigour were called "Manilian Edicts." He flourished 340 B.C.

MANSFIELD, măns'-field, William Murray, Earl of, an illustrious lawyer, received his education at Westminster School, whence he was elected student of Christ Church, Oxford, in 1723. After taking his degree as M.A., he went abroad, and on his return, entered of Lincoln's Inn, where he was called to the bar. His eloquence and legal acquirements soon gained him an extensive practice, and when he pleaded, the court was crowded. Pope, with whom he was intimate, complimented him with the appellation of "silver-tongued Murray." In 1743 he became solicitor-general, and was elected member of Parliament. In 1754 he was made attorney-general, and in 1756 chief justice of the King's Bench; soon after which he was created Baron Mansfield. In 1776 his lordship was created an earl. His conduct on the bench at the trials of the publisher of Junius's Letters, and of Wilkes, caused him to become very unpopular, and during the famous riots of 1780 his house in Bloomsbury-square was burnt down by the mob, who also threatened his life. By that disaster, he lost a prodigious number of valuable manuscripts and books; yet, when the House of Commons voted him a compensation for the injury, he refused to accept it. After filling his high office with great dignity many years, he resigned it on account of his infirmities, in 1788. His reputation is that of a great lawyer, an upright man, and an elegant scholar. His remains were interred in Westminster Abbey. n. at Perth, 1704; n. 1793.

MANT, Right Rev. Richard, mant, Bishop of Down, Connor, and Dromore, was educated at Winchester and Oxford, where he gained the chancellor's prize for an English essay "On Commerce," 1790; and, after taking his degree of M.A., travelled for some time on the continent; on his return he became successively curate at Buriton and Sparsholt in Hampshire. In 1810 he was presented to the vicarage of Great Coggeshall, in Essex; and the sermons which he preached at the Bampton Lecture, in 1812, having attracted general attention, he rose rapidly in the church. In 1815 he became rector of St. Botolph's, Bishopsgate-street, and, three years later, vicar of East Horsley, Surrey. In 1820 he was consecrated bishop of Killaloe, and translated to the see of Down and Connor in 1823, and the care of the diocese of Dromore devolved upon him in 1842. During his long life, Dr. Mant was constantly engaged in authorship, chiefly on subjects connected with his professional duties. Of his numerous writings, those which have gained him greatest celebrity are, probably, the edition of the Bible with notes and commentaries, which he prepared in conjunction with Dr. D'Oyley, and tracts printed by the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, such as "A Step in the Temple," &c., "Romanism and Holy Scripture Compared," "The Churches of Rome and England Compared." n. 1776; n. 1818.

MANTELL, Gideon Algernon, man'-tel, a distinguished English geologist, who, while pursuing his profession as surgeon at Lewes, studied the geological formations of Sussex with the greatest assiduity and success. His works written upon the science of geology are peculiarly attractive to the general reader, in consequence of the elegant and lucid style in which the information is conveyed. The first of these works was published in 1822, and was entitled "The Fossils of the South Downs," which was followed by "Illustrations of the Geology of Sussex." For his great discoveries of the iguanodon and its colossal allies, the Geological Society, in 1835, awarded him the Wollaston medal and fund. In 1825 he was elected a fellow of the Royal Society, and this learned body also marked its sense of his discovery of the iguanodon by awarding him the royal medal. In 1839 he went to reside at

Manutius

Clapham. About the same time the trustees of the British Museum purchased his collection of fossils for £5000. His well-spent life had two phases—original discovery and popular teaching. At the former we have glanced in mentioning his discovery of the gigantic fossil; and in proof of his labours in the latter direction, we may mention the delightful "Wonders of Geology," and "The Medals of Creation," works long and deservedly held in the highest esteem by the general reader. Dr. Mantell was also an industrious contributor to scientific Transactions; and in the "Zoology and Geology" of Agassiz and Strickland no less than sixty-seven articles have been attributed to him. n. at Lewes, Sussex, about 1790; n. 1852.

MANUEL COMNENUS, man'-n-el, emperor of the East, was the son of John Comnenus, whom he succeeded in 1143, to the prejudice of Isaac, his elder brother, whom his father had disinherited. Roger, king of Sicily, invaded the empire in his reign; but Manuel expelled him, and then turned his arms against Dalmatia and Hungary with various success. He also marched into Egypt, which country he would have conquered, had he not been betrayed by Amauri I., king of Jerusalem, his ally. n. 1120; n. 1190.

MANUEL PALÆOLOGUS, emperor of Constantinople, was the son and successor of John Palæologus I. The Turks having invaded his dominions, he applied to the Latins for succour, but without effect, on which he resigned his sceptre to John Palæologus II., his son, and took a religious habit. n. 1314; n. 1325.

MANUEL, Jacques Antoine, entered the republican army as a volunteer in 1793, and rose to the rank of captain. After the peace of Campo Formio, he quitted the army, studied law, was admitted to the bar at Aix, and soon acquired a high reputation for talent. In 1815 he was elected to the chamber of deputies which was convoked by Napoleon, and after the abdication of that monarch, Manuel strenuously contended for the rights of his son. In 1818 he was elected a member of the chamber of deputies by three departments, and became one of the most formidable opponents of the ministers. He was fervid and ardent in the cause of the party to which he had attached himself; but having used some violent expressions in his first speech, in the session of 1823, on the subject of the Spanish war, his expulsion was loudly demanded; the result of which was that a body of the gendarmérie was introduced to arrest him; but he was again chosen to the chamber of deputies in 1824. n. 1775; n. 1827.

MANUTIUS, Aldus, man'-oo'-sha-us, or Manuzio, Aldo, a celebrated Italian printer and author, of the 15th and 16th centuries, was born at Bassano, in 1447; became tutor to Alberto Pio, prince of Carpi; and in 1488 established a printing office at Venice. He printed numerous valuable editions of Greek and Latin classics; compiled a Greek and Latin Dictionary and Grammar; and was the inventor of the Italic character, hence called Aldine, for the exclusive use of which, for a term of years, he obtained a patent. n. 1615.—Paolo Manuzio, son of the preceding, distinguished as a classic scholar, no less than as a printer, was born at Venice, in 1613, and died in 1674.—Aldo Manuzio, the younger, was a son of Paolo, and equally celebrated as his father and grandfather. b. 1547; d. 1597; and with him expired the glory of the Aldine press.

MANZONI, Alessandro, man-zo'-ne, a celebrated Italian poet and novelist, who, after completing his education at Milan and Pavia, went to Paris in 1803. While in the French capital, he produced a poem in blank verse, of strongly deistical opinions, but after his return to Italy, in 1807, he became a zealous Roman Catholic, and his subsequent poetical works were imbued with a devotional feeling. He is known throughout Europe as the author of a fine historical novel, called "The Betrothed Lovers," which has been translated into English, French, and German, and is allowed to be worthy of taking rank with the best productions of Sir Walter Scott. After the death of his first wife, in 1833, Manzoni continued to live in retirement near Milan. b. 1781.

MAPES, or MAR, Walter, maips, an old English poet, who was chaplain to Henry II., by whom he was despatched on a mission to the court of Louis VII. of France. He wrote some satirical and convivial poems, in Latin, which were edited and published by Thomas Wright, in 1841. He was also the author of several prose works, both in Latin and Norman-French, from which a large portion of the romance of the Round Table is said to be taken. Mapes rose to high posts in the church; but, after he became archdeacon of Oxford, in 1190, no further mention is made of him. b. probably in Herefordshire, about the middle of the 12th century.

MARADT, James Philip, ma-rail'-de, a celebrated Italian mathematician and astronomer, who was employed under Cassini in constructing the great meridian through France. He left behind a valuable catalogue of the fixed stars, and a body of important "Observations." b. at Nice, 1665; d. 1729.

MARAT, Jean Paul, ma'-ra, a notorious demagogue, who went to Paris, where he studied physic, and set up as an empiric, selling his nostrums at an extravagant price. On the first outbreak of the Revolution, in 1789, he became a leader among the most violent of the revolutionary factions. In his first journal, the "Publiciste Parisien," he attacked Necker, and other eminent men. This was followed by his "Friend of the People," in which he excited the troops against their generals, the people at large against their king, and declared in print that France could never become happy until 270,000 heads had been struck off by the guillotine. Named deputy for the department of Paris in the Convention, he appeared there armed with pistols. The most atrocious murders were committed by his means, and he appeared to delight in nothing but the effusion of blood, when he was assassinated, in the midst of his career, while taking a bath, by Charlotte Corday. (See CORDAY.) Marat published a work on Man, or "Principles of the Reciprocal Influence of the Soul and Body," and Tracts on Electricity and Light, in which he attacked the Newtonian system. b. near Neuchâtel, 1744; assassinated, 1793.

MARATTI, Carlo, ma-rat'-te, an eminent Italian painter, who became the pupil of Andrea Sacchi, and chiefly applied himself to painting female saints. Pope Clement IX. gave him a pension, and conferred on him the order of to Louis XIV. b. at Camerino, in the March of Ancona, 1625; d. at Rome, 1713.

MARNOK, John, mar'-jek, a musician of the 16th century, who is believed to have been the first composer of the cathedral service of the Anglican church. He held the office of organist at St. George's Chapel, Windsor, and wrote a "Concordance of the Bible," "Lives of the Saints, Prophets, and Patriarchs," &c.

MARCBAT, François Severin Desgraviere, mar-so, a distinguished French general, eminent equally for his military skill and courage, and for his virtue and humanity. These qualities he displayed in La Vendée, at Fleurus, and on the Rhine. He was killed at Hochsteinbach, and when buried in the entrenched camp at Coblenz, so high was the respect in which he was held, that both the French and the Austrian armies fired volleys of artillery in honour of the ceremony. b. at Chartres, 1769; killed, 1796.

MARCELLINUS, mar-sel'-lin-us, a pope and saint, succeeded Caius in 296. He signalized himself by his courage in a severe persecution. The Donatists charged him with having sacrificed to idols; from which he was vindicated by Augustine. d. 304.

MARCELLO, Benedict, mar-sail'-lo, an eminent composer, denominated in Italy the Prince of Music. This highly-gifted man was equally eminent as a poet, philosopher, and musician. His compositions in music were numerous. His principal prose work was his "Teatro alla Moda" (the Fashionable Stage), intended as a ludicrous criticism on modern operas. b. at Venice, 1686; d. 1739.

MARCELLUS, Marcus Claudius, mar-sel'-lus, a famous Roman general, who, after the first Punic war, had the command of an expedition against the Gauls, where he obtained the spolia opima, by killing with his own hand Viridomarus, the king of the enemy. Soon after he was intrusted to oppose Hannibal in Italy, and was the first Roman who obtained any advantage over him. Marcellus, in his third consulship, was sent with a powerful force against Syracuse. He attacked it by sea and land, but his operations proved ineffectual, the inventions of the philosopher Archimedes baffling all the efforts and destroying all the great and stupendous military engines of the Romans, during three successive years. (See ARCHIMEDES.) The perseverance of Marcellus at last gave him the victory. After the conquest of Syracuse, Marcellus was called upon to oppose Hannibal a second time. He displayed great military talents in his operations against this general, but was not, however, sufficiently vigilant against the snares of his adversary. He imprudently separated himself from his camp, and was killed in an ambuscade, b.c. 208.

MARCELLUS I., Pope, succeeded Marcellinus. The emperor Maximian banished him from Rome for excommunicating an apostate. d. 310.

MARCELLUS II. was secretary to Paul III., who made him a cardinal, and one of the presidents at the council of Trent. He succeeded Julius III. in 1555, but died a few weeks after his election.

MARCARIAN, mar-shi-ai'-nus, a Thracian of obscure family, who obtained the imperial throne on the death of Theodosius II., in 450. His reign, though it lasted little more than six years, was marked by peaceful and energetic measures. b. about the end of the 4th century; d. 457.

MARCO POLO. (See POLO.)

MANDONIUS, mar-do-ni-us, a famous Persian general, a son of the satrap Gobryas, and a cousin of Xerxes. When Darius determined to invade Greece, the command of the immense army and fleet that was raised to crush that power was entrusted to him; but a storm destroyed his ships off Mount Athos, while his army was beaten in Macedonia. He accompanied Xerxes in his invasion of Greece, some years after, in 480 B.C., and was left in occupation of Athens, which he held for some months after the return of Xerxes to Asia. He was defeated and slain by Pausanias, at the battle of Plataea, September 22, 479 B.C.

MARGARET, mar'-gu-ret, daughter of Waldemar III., king of Denmark, and wife of Hacon VII., king of Norway, was placed on the throne of both kingdoms, on the death of her son, Olaf IV., in 1387. The Swedes, dissatisfied with their king Albert, offered their crown to Margaret, who accepted it, and defeated Albert in 1394. Three years afterwards, the states of Denmark, Sweden, and Norway passed a law, known by the name of the Union of Calmar, by which the three kingdoms were united, and the monarchy limited. Margaret, however, violated the conditions of the Union, and was called the Semiramis of the North. n. 1353; d. 1411.

MARGARET, daughter of René of Anjou, king of Sicily, and wife of Henry VI., king of England. In the civil wars between the houses of York and Lancaster, she displayed the character of a heroine. Her husband being taken prisoner, in 1455, by the earl of Warwick, she braved furies, set Henry at liberty, and entered London in triumph. But, in 1460, her army was defeated at Northampton, and Henry again became a prisoner; the queen, however, escaped into Scotland, and collected another army, with which she marched against the duke of York, who fell in the battle of Wakefield. She next defeated Warwick at the second battle of St. Albans; but was routed, after a bloody contest, at Towton, on which she fled to France, to implore succour from Louis XI., who refused her any assistance. This intrepid woman then returned to England, where she was joined by several of her party, but was defeated at Hexham. In 1471 she sustained a final defeat at Tewkesbury, where she and her son were taken prisoners. In 1475, her brother Louis XI. of France purchased her liberty by a large ransom. She then retired to France, where she died in 1482. n. about 1425.

MARGARET, Countess of Richmond and Derby. (See BEAUFORT, Margaret.)

MARGARET of Valois, queen of Navarre, and sister to Francis I., king of France, was the daughter of Charles of Orleans, duke of Angoulême. In 1509 she married Charles, duke of Alençon, two years after whose death she became the wife of Henry d'Albret, king of Navarre, by whom she had Jeanne d'Albret, mother of Henry IV. Margaret assisted her husband in improving his dominions, and greatly encouraged the Protestants. Besides other works, she wrote the "Heptameron," a collection of tales after the manner, and with more than the license, of Boccaccio. n. 1492; d. 1549.

MARGARET of France, queen of Navarre, daughter of Henry II., ranked as one of the greatest beauties of her age, with talents and accomplishments corresponding to the charms of her person. She married Henry, then prince of Béarn, but afterwards king of France. On his accession to that throne, he proposed to dissolve their marriage, to which she consented, on condition of receiving a suitable pension; and, having returned to Paris, lived in great splendour and dissipation till her death in 1615. n. 1552. Some very agreeable poems by her are extant, and her "Mémoires" are curious.

MARIA LEZINSKI, ma-ri'-a lek-zins'-ki, daughter of Stanislas, king of Poland, married Louis XV. of France in 1725. d. 1768.

MARIA THERESA, tai-rai'-sa, archduchess of Austria, queen of Hungary and Bohemia, and empress of Germany, was the daughter of the emperor Charles VI. and of Elizabeth Christina, of Brunswick-Wolfenbützel. Her father having lost his only son, the archduke Leopold, constituted Maria Theresa the heiress of his estates. In 1713 was framed the famous Pragmatic Sanction, by which, in default of male issue, the succession passed to the eldest of Charles's daughters. She married, in 1736, Francis Stephen of Lorraine, afterwards emperor by the name of Francis I. In 1740 her father died, which event plunged Europe into war. Frederick of Prussia invaded Silesia, to which conquest he added Moravia. The elector of Bavaria aspired to the crowns of Bohemia and the empire; was supported by France in violation of the Pragmatic Sanction; and was crowned emperor at Frankfurt, in 1742. Meanwhile, Maria Theresa threw herself upon the support of her Hungarian subjects, to whom, with her child in her arms, she made this pathetic address:—"Abandoned by my friends, persecuted by my enemies, attacked by my nearest relations, I have no other resource than in your fidelity, in your courage, and constancy: I commit to your hands the child of your kings." At this spectacle, the warlike Hungarians drew their sabres, and exclaimed, as with one voice, "Morianus pro rege nostro Maria Theresa." (We will die for our sovereign Maria Theresa.) A powerful army was formed, with Kevenhüller at its head, which recovered several important places. Maria formed a treaty with England, which supplied her with money and troops, and, what was of greater consequence, detached the king of Prussia from the league, on condition of his retaining Silesia and Gratz. Maria Theresa was crowned queen of Bohemia, at Prague, in 1743; and, in June of the same year, the king of England and his son, the duke of Cumberland, gained a great victory at Dettingen. The king of Sardinia now declared himself for the queen of Hungary, who in 1745, had placed the imperial crown on the head of her husband, at Frankfurt. After eight years of war, a peace was concluded at Aix-la-Chapelle, by which Maria Theresa was secured in her rights. (See FREDERICK II.) She employed the interval of peace in organizing armies, repairing or constructing forti- regulat- ing and encouraging commerce, military schools, and in erecting colleges of learning; she also caused observatories to be built at Vienna, Gratz, and Tyrum, which she supplied with the best instruments. The wounded and infirm soldiers found an asylum in hospitals, and the widows and children of officers were liberally provided for. In 1757 this calm was disturbed by the king of Prussia, who marched into Saxony and Bohemia; Count Daun, however, eventually forced the Prussians to raise the siege, by gaining the victory of Kollin (1757.) On this Maria Theresa instituted the military order called by her name. After many engagements, peace was concluded in 1763, leaving Austria and Prussia with the same boundaries as before the war. Her husband died in 1765, and she never put off her mourning attire till her death. In 1773 she, somewhat unwillingly, joined the king of Prussia and the empress Catharine in the dismemberment of Poland. On the death of Maximilian Joseph, elector of Bavaria, in 1777, war was rekindled between Austria and Prussia, but was terminated in 1779 by the peace of Teschen, which added to the former state a small portion of Bavaria. Maria Theresa was one of the most energetic and noble of rulers; and so well and wisely had she governed her people, that she earned, and fully merited, the name of mother of her country. b. 1717; d. at Vienna, 1780.

MARIA LOUISA, mā-rī-a loo-ē-sa, ex-empress of the French, and second wife of Napoleon Bonaparte, was the eldest daughter of Francis I., emperor of Austria (who must not be confounded with Francis I., emperor of Germany). In 1810 she was married to Napoleon I., then in the zenith of his power; in 1811 she presented her husband with a son—afterwards called king of Rome—to the great joy of the French nation; and, in 1813, on his departure to the army, she was nominated regent. In 1814 she refused to accompany Napoleon to Elba on the plea of ill-health; and having obtained, by treaty with the allied powers, the duchies of Parma and Placentia, &c., she repaired thither with her chamberlain, Count Neipperg, for whom she had conceived an attachment, and whom she subsequently married. Maria Louisa was endowed with considerable talents, which she had cultivated with some care. Her mar-quit the court. A reconciliation was, however, effected between them by Richelieu. That minister subsequently forced her to leave France. The remainder of her life was spent in exile, in England, Belgium, and Germany. In 1842 her death took place at Cologne, where she was almost without the common necessities of life. b. at Florence, 1753.

MARIE ANTOINETTE, mā-re an-twōi-net, queen of France and archduchess of Austria, was the daughter of the emperor Francis I. and of Maria Theresa. In 1770 she married the dauphin of France, afterwards Louis XVI. At the celebration of the ceremony, in May of that year, two tremendous thunderstorms happened; and at the fête given by the city of Paris, a few weeks afterwards, above 1200 persons perished by the falling of a building erected for letting off fireworks, and a great number of spectators fell into the Seine and were drowned. The dauphiness, on that melancholy occasion, sent all the money she possessed to the lieutenant of police, for the relief of the distressed. At the death of a monarch in France, it was the custom for the people to pay a tax to the new queen; this she caused to be dispensed with, when, by the demise of Louis XV., she ascended the throne. When the Revolution burst forth, in 1789, the public fury was directed against her; but she supported herself, amidst the vilest indignities and brutal scenes, with unshaken fortitude. On the famous 8th of October, when the frantic mob led the royal family in triumph from Versailles to Paris, and uttered dreadful exclamations against the queen, she presented herself before them alone, with her intrepid air for a period disarmed their malice, and turned their menaces into applause. On that memorable journey the mob carried before the carriage the heads of two of the king's guard on pikes. The courage of the queen, after being arrested at Varennes and conducted back to the Tuilleries, remained unshaken. In the Temple her behaviour was marked by heroic fortitude. When apprised of the condemnation of her husband, she felicitated him on the termination of his sufferings, and upon his approach to an immortal crown. (See Louis XVI.) In July, 1793, she was separated from her son, which excited in her the most affecting grief, and in August she was conducted in the night to the Conciergerie, where she was confined in a dark and damp dungeon. In October she was brought to trial on the charge of having embezzled the public property, corresponded with foreign enemies, and transmitted large sums to the emperor. Accusations of crimes the most unnatural were also produced; to which she opposed the spirit and resolution of conscious innocence. Though nothing was proved, sentence of condemnation was passed against her, which she heard with triumph. On the 16th of the same month she was conducted to the guillotine, where, after elevating her eyes to heaven, she suffered the fatal stroke. Her body was thrown into a grave and consumed by quicklime. Her misfortunes had made great ravages in her beautiful countenance, and altered the colour of her hair. Marie Antoinette possessed an accomplished mind; she spoke the French language with purity, and the Italian as her own tongue. She understood Latin, and had a perfect knowledge of geography and history. She was kind-hearted and honest; thoughtlessness was perhaps the affliction of her esteem: but she is still liable to the charge of selfishness of character and coldness of heart, which the difficulties of her position may perhaps extenuate, but cannot justify. b. 1791; d. December 18, 1847.

MARIANA, Juan, ma-re-a-na, a celebrated Spanish historian, who at the age of 17 entered the order of the Jesuits. He distinguished himself by a famous book, entitled "De Rege et Regis Institutione," in which he justified the assassination of heretical princes: it was burnt the above, and several other learned works, he wrote a "Treatise on Weights and Measures," and another on the "Faults of Government and Society," in Spanish. b. at Talavera, 1636; d. 1683.

MARIE DU' MEDICIS, ma-dē-che, daughter of Francis I., grand-duke of Tuscany, married Henry IV. of France, in 1600. The union was rendered unhappy in consequence of the jealous, obstinate, and violent character of the queen; but, although she was constantly quarrelling with Henry, the most reliable historians acquit her of the odious charge with which some writers have sought to brand her,—that of being privy to the king's murder. On the death of Henry IV., in 1610, she was named regent; but her administration was disgraced by the countenance she afforded to unworthy favourites. She even quarrelled with her son, afterwards Louis XIII., who was compelled to greatest vice that could be attributed to her; and it caused her to be most unjustly slandered on several occasions. She left a son, who died in prison. (See LOUIS XVII.) n. at Vienna, 1755; guillotined 1793.

MARIGNANO, John James Medichino, mar'-e(l)-nan, Marquis de, a celebrated commander, born at Milan, in the beginning of the 16th century. Francis Sforza, duke of Milan, employed him and another officer to murder Visconti, a Milanese nobleman; after which he determined to sacrifice the two instruments, lest he should be discovered as the author of the assassination. The one perished, but Medichino escaped, and obtained the government of Musso. In 1528 he entered into the service of the emperor, and exchanged Musso for Marignano. In 1544 he defeated the French, commanded by Marshal Strozzi, in Tuscany, and took the city of Siena, where he committed horrible cruelties. n. 1761.

MARINO, John Baptist, ma'-ri'-no, an Italian poet. His father having discarded him for refusing to study the law, he became secretary to the grand admiral of Naples, after which he went to Rome, where he was patronized by Cardinal Aldobrandino. His principal poem was entitled "Adonis," dedicated to Louis XIII. at the time when Marino was at Paris, whither he had been invited by Marie de' Medici. He afterwards retired to his native city. n. at Naples, 1560; d. 1625.

MARINO FALIERI. (See FALIERI.)

MARIOTTE, Edme, ma'-ri'-ot, an eminent mathematician, who was admitted a member of the Academy of Sciences at Paris, in 1666. He distinguished himself by his hydraulic experiments. His principal works are, "A Treatise on Philosophy," "On the Motion of Waters," "On the Movement of Pendulums," "Experiments on Colours," "Treatise on Levels." The whole were published in a collected form at Leyden, in 1717. n. 1684.

MARIUS, Cnins, ma'-ri'-us, a celebrated Roman, who was seven times consul. He was of obscure origin, and in his youth was a husbandman; which employment he quitted for the army, and became a lieutenant under Scipio, who, when asked one night at supper where as good a general as himself might be found when he was dead, replied, placing his hand on the shoulders of Marius, "Here, perhaps." Marius ended the war with Jugurtha, whom he conducted in triumph to Rome. After this, he served against the Cimbri and other barbarous nations who had invaded Italy; but tarnished the glory of his victories by the basest cruelties to the vanquished, especially the women. Plutarch reports that, having experienced some disadvantages in contending with the Cimbri, he was warned, in a dream, to avert the wrath of the gods by sacrificing his daughter Calpurnia, which inhuman direction he obeyed. In his sixth consulate he had Sylla for his rival, who marched to Rome with his army, and obliged Marius to quit the city. After wandering some time, he was recalled to Rome by Cinna, with whom he was chosen consul, b.c. 86, in which year he died from excessive drinking. n. at Or near Arpinum, about 157 n.c.—His son, Marius the Younger, had all the ferocious characteristics of his father. He usurped the consular dignity 82 n.c.; but was defeated by Sylla, and slew himself at Praeneste.

MARIUS, Marcus Aurelius, a smith and common soldier in the reign of Valerianus Gallienus, who attained to supreme command in the army, and, on the death of the former, seized the imperial throne, but was shortly afterwards killed by a soldier. n. about 260.

MARIVAUX, Pierre Carlet de Chamblain de, ma'-re-ro, a celebrated French writer, whose comedies and romances are distinguished by their moral tendency. His best works are, "The Poor Philosopher," "Marianne," "Le Paysan Parvenu," "Pharsamon." He also wrote a work entitled "The French Spectator." n. at Paris, 1688; d. 1763.

MARK, a pope and saint, succeeded Sylvester I. in 336, and died the next year. There passes under his name an epistle addressed to St. Athanasius.

MARK ANTONY. (See ANTONIUS, Mareus.)

MARKLAND, Jeremiah, mark'-land, a learned critic, who in 1723 distinguished himself by his "Epistola Critica," after which he published "Remarks on the Epistles of Cicero to Brutus, and of Brutus to Cicero; with a Dissertation on Four Orations ascribed to Cicero." He wrote several other works, and assisted many learned men in their labours. n. in Lancashire, 1693; d. near Dorking, Surrey, 1778.

MARLBOROUGH, John Churchill, Duke of, marl'-bur-o, an illustrious English general and statesman. He received but an indifferent education, for his father, Sir Winston Churchill, a royalist gentleman of ancient family, took him to court at the age of 12 years, where he became page to the duke of York, and, in 1686, obtained a commission in the guards. His first service was at the siege of Taucier, against the Moors, and on his return to England, he became the favourite of the duchess of Cleveland, who gave him £5000, with which he purchased an annuity for life. He served afterwards under the great Turenne, who was so pleased with his person and bravery, as to call him the "Handsome Englishman," and further declared that he would one day prove a master in the art of war. He distinguished himself so gallantly at the siege of Maestricht, that the king of France publicly thanked him at the head of the regiment. On his return to England he was made lieutenant-colonel, gentleman of the bedchamber, and master of the robes to the duke of York. He attended that prince to Holland and Scotland, and about this time married Miss Sarah Jennings, maid of honour to Princess, afterwards Queen Anne. In 1682 he was shipwrecked with the duke of York, in their passage to Scotland, on which occasion his royal highness expressed the utmost anxiety to save his favourite. The same year he was made a peer, by the title of Baron Eymouth, in Scotland; and when James came to the crown, was sent to France to notify the event. In 1685, he was created Lord Churchill of Sandridge, and, soon afterwards, materially assisted in suppressing Monmouth's rebellion. He continued to serve King James with great fidelity till the arrival of William of Orange; whereupon he went over to that prince, an act of treachery which has been stigmatized by several writers, and not unjustly, as fraught with base ingratitude. His own apology was a regard for the religion and constitution of his country. King William created him earl of Marlborough in 1689, and appointed him commander-in-chief of the English army in the Low Countries. He next served in Ireland, and reduced Cork, with other strong places. But in 1692 he was suddenly dismissed from his employments, and committed to the Tower; whence, however, he was soon released. After the death of Queen Mary, he was restored to favour; and at the close of William's reign he had the command of the English forces in Holland, and was appointed ambassador extraordinary to the States, who chose him captain-general of their forces. On the commencement of Queen Anne's reign, he recommended a war with France and Spain, which advice was adopted. In the first campaign of 1702 he took a number of strong towns, particularly Liège. He returned to England the following winter, and received the thanks of both Houses, and the honour of a dukedom from the queen. In 1704 he joined Prince Eugene, with whom he fought the French and Bavarians at Blenheim and obtained a complete victory, taking Marshal Tallard prisoner. Just before this event, he had been created a prince of the empire. In the winter he returned to England, bringing with him Marshal Tallard, and 26 other officers of rank, 121 standards, and 179 colours. He again received the thanks of Parliament, and the grant of the crown lands at Woodstock, a village near Oxford. In 1706 he fought the famous battle of Ramillies, in which his life was frequently in the most imminent danger, a cannon-shot taking off the head of Colonel Blinly as he was helping the duke to remount. This victory accelerated the fall of Louvain, Brussels, and other important places. He arrived in England in November, and received fresh honours and grants from the Queen and Parliament. A bill was passed to settle the titles upon the male and female issue of his daughters; and Blenheim House was ordered to be built to perpetuate his gallant services. He had also a pension of £5000 a year granted him. The following campaign presented nothing worth recording; but the ensuing one was pushed with such vigour—being distinguished by the victory at Oudenarde, followed by the passage of the Scheldt and the capture of the fortress of Lisle—that the French king was glad to enter into a negotiation for peace, which, however, had no result. In 1709, Marlborough defeated Marshal Villars at Malplaquet; for which victory a general thanksgiving was solemnized. In the winter of 1711 he returned to England, having added considerably to his laurels; but soon after was dismissed from his employments. To add to this disgrace, a prosecution was commenced against him for applying the public money to his private purposes. Thereupon he went into voluntary banishment, accompanied by his duchess, and remained abroad till 1714, when he landed at Dover, amidst the acclamations of the people. Queen Anne was just dead, and her successor restored the duke to his military appointments; but his infirmities increasing, he retired from public employment, having survived his intellectual faculties. B. in Devonshire, 1850; D. 1722, and his remains were interred with great pomp in Westminster Abbey.

MARLBOROUGH, Sarah, Duchess of, wife of the preceding, was a lady of strong mind, but overbearing passions. For a long time she exercised over the weak and easy nature of Queen Anne a most commanding influence. The queen threw off all royal etiquette when corresponding with the haughty duchess. In their letters, Queen Anne was simple "Mrs. Morley," while the duchess was addressed as "dear Mrs. Freeman." In the end, however, the queen felt her yoke to be intolerable, and after a long struggle for power, the duchess was dismissed the court, the duke, her husband, sharing in her disgrace. She outlived the duke several years. D. 1744.

MARLOWE, Christopher, mar'-lo, an English dramatic writer, who studied at the university of Cambridge, and took his degree as M.A. in 1587. It is said he subsequently became a writer for the stage, and, perhaps, an actor. His course of life appears to have been very bad, and he met his death in a disgraceful quarrel. The plays which have been attributed to him are, "Dr. Faustus;" "Edward the Second;" "The Jew of Malta;" "Tamburlaine the Great;" "Lust's Dominion;" "Dido, Queen of Carthage;" and "Massacre at Paris." All these works have reached our times in a very imperfect condition, owing to the carelessness of the printers; but they convey, nevertheless, abundant proof of the great power their author possessed of drawing characters more than human in their intense malignity and terrible depth of villany. Marlowe's productions were the link between the plays of Shakespeare and the old "Moralities." B. about 1564; killed, 1593.

MARLONTE, Marshal. (See RAGUSA, duke of.) MARMONTEL, Jean François, mar'-mon-tel, a celebrated French writer, who in early life was professor of philosophy at Toulouise. In 1743 he went to Paris, and obtained the friendship of Voltaire. His talents and virtues procured him a pension and the place of historiographer of the royal buildings, and also the management of a journal called the "Mercure;" but, having written a satire against a nobleman of distinction, he was sent to the Bastille. On obtaining his release, he recommenced his literary career, and wrote some tragedies and an opera; but his fame rests principally, if not wholly, upon his "Moral Tales," a work universally known and esteemed. The French Academy appointed him perpetual secretary in 1789. During the Revolution he led a retired life, and though reduced to destitution, remained secure amidst all the violent scenes of that event. In 1797 he was chosen deputy of the Council of Ancients by the department of Eure. Besides his dramatic pieces and "Moral Tales," he wrote the romance of "Belisarius," "The Literary Observer," "The Charms of Study," an epistle; a French translation of Lucan's "Pharsalia," "Poétique Française," "The Incas; or, the Destruction of the Empire of Peru," "Essay on the Revolutions of Music," "Elements of Literature," and several articles in the French "Encyclopédie." B. in France, 1733; D. 1799.

MARMORA, Alfonso, Marquis della, mar'-no-ra, a modern Italian general, who received his education in the military school at Turin. In 1823 he entered the artillery as Lieutenant, and rose, during the ensuing twenty-five years, through the intermediate grades, till, at the latter period, he attained the rank of major-general. During the struggle between Piedmont and Austria, in 1848, he held office as minister of war; and on the abdication of Carlo Alberto, he was appointed to reorganize the shattered army. In 1855 he went out to the Crimea, as commander-in-chief of the Piedmontese army of 15,000 men, which had been sent thither to co-operate with the English and French against the Russians, and, with his troops, took an active part in the defeat of the Russians on the Tchernaya. At the conclusion of peace Della Marmora resumed office under Cavour as minister of war. He was not engaged in the field during the Italian war of 1859; but in 1861 became commander-in-chief of the Italian army, and in 1862 was viceroy in the Neapolitan provinces. During the years 1864-66 he was twice premier of Italy, and in the last-named year took an active part in the brief war between Italy and Austria. b. 1814.

MAROCCHETTI, Charles, Baron, mar-o-ket-te, an eminent modern sculptor, who, having commenced the practice of his profession at Turin, went to Paris, and afterwards to London, where he remained, constantly employed by the most fashionable circles. The English public became acquainted with him during the Great Exhibition of 1861, when he contributed his colossal model of Richard Cœur-de-Lion, which was placed in the open air at the western end of the Crystal Palace. He was afterwards extensively employed by the royal family and the highest nobility to carve busts, &c. In 1856, he produced a bust of her Majesty in stained marble, and two years before he executed a colossal equestrian statue of the queen, for the citizens of Glasgow. One of his last works was a bust of Sir Edwin Landseer, exhibited in 1867, and another, a statue of Lord Clyde, which was completed in the same year. b. at Turin, of French parents, 1805; d. 1867.

MARZIA, mar-o-zé-a, a Roman lady, who married, about 908, Alberic, count of Tusculum and marquis of Camerino. Becoming a widow while still young, she exercised, by her beauty and intriguing spirit, great influence over the most powerful nobles of Rome, and during many years set up or deposed popes almost at her mere whim. She made herself mistress of the city, and caused, in succession, the election of Sergius III. in 904, Anastasius III. in 911, and Lando in 913. In 928 she deposed John X., who had been elected through the influence of Theodora, her sister and rival, and put him to death, with the assistance of Guido, duke of Tuscany, her second husband. In 931 she seated in the pontifical chair her son, under the title of John XI. (See John XI.) In the following year she married her third husband, Hugh of Provence, who became king of Italy; but that monarch having struck Alberic, eldest son of Marozia, he, out of revenge, roused the Roman youths, and massacred the guards of his father-in-law, who sought safety in flight. Marozia was imprisoned in the castle of St. Angelo, where she died.

MARRAGE, Frederic William, mar'-poorg, an eminent German writer on the theory of music. Of his personal history scarcely anything authentic is known, further than that he was either counsellor of war to Frederick II., or secretary to one of his ministers. His "Manual of Harmony and Composition" is so correct and sound that it has earned the title of the "Musical Euclid." Dr. Burney remarks of Marriage, that "he was the first German theorist who could patiently be read by persons of taste, so addicted were former writers to prolixity and pedantry." b. in Prussia, 1718; d. 1796.

MARRAST, Armand, mar'-rast, an eminent French political writer, who, after completing his education, went to Paris, where he soon distinguished himself by his brilliant attacks upon the government of Charles X. In 1830 he started "La Tribune," in which Louis Philippe and his ministry were subjected to an unceasing flow of the most pungent satire. Phases and law expenses, however, put an end to that remarkable journal, and at one time its former editor was compelled to seek refuge in England. He subsequently became sub-editor of "Le National," then under the guidance of the unfortunate Armand Carrel. (See CARREL.) When the latter fell, in a duel with Girardin, Marrast succeeded to the editorship in chief of "Le National," and therein contributed, in no slight degree, to bring the government of Louis Philippe into contempt, as well as to produce the great crisis of 1848, which resulted in the loss of his throne by the old monarch. After the fall of the Lamartine administration, Marrast retired into private life. b. 1802; d. 1852.

MARRAT, Frederick, mar'-re-ét, a celebrated English novelist, who, before he had commenced the first line of his first novel, had proved himself a man of heroic mould in many desperate conflicts. After receiving some education at various schools in the vicinity of London, he entered the navy at the age of fourteen. His first ship was the famous Impéruse, 44 guns, commanded by that brilliant seaman, Lord Cochrane, afterwards Earl of Dundonald. Under this celebrated chief, the young sailor fought in upwards of fifty engagements, between the years 1806 and 1809. The reputation for bravery and skill which he had acquired under his first commander, was continued and increased during his after-career. On five occasions he rescued sailors from drowning by leaping overboard to their assistance. After various services, he was gazetted commander in 1815; in 1823 he sailed in command of the Larne, 18 guns, to the East Indies, where he co-operated in the attack on Rangoon. For his services he received the thanks of the governor-general, and, after his return home, became C.B.; a further honour was bestowed upon him by the Royal Humane Society, which awarded its gold medal to him, in recognition of his efforts at saving seamen's lives. He sailed with the Channel fleet during the years 1824, 1829, and 1830. At the age of forty he produced, in the novelist's pen, and produced, in rapid succession, a series of excellent works of fiction, most of them depicting life at sea. To enumerate a few of them will suffice for the present purpose:—"Peter Simple," "Jacob Faithful," "The King's Own," "Japhet in Search of a Father," "Midshipman Easy," "Rattlin the Reefer," "Poor Jack," the "Pirate and the Three Cutters," "Masterman Ready." The preceding are his best novels, but almost everything he wrote was excellent. In 1837 he produced a most valuable work, entitled "A Code of Signals for the use of vessels employed in the merchant service," for which Louis Philippe bestowed upon him the cross of the Legion of Honour. The code is now in use both in the English and foreign navies. For several years before his death he was incapacitated from literary labour by shattered health. It must be mentioned that the sole reason why this bold and skilful seaman did not rise in his profession, was that he had given free utterance to his opinions against the practice of impressment. He was a fellow of the Royal Society. b. in London, 1793; d. in Norfolk, 1848.

comedian, made her début at the early age of thirteen, and enjoyed the rare privilege of retaining the public favour till an advanced age, having kept the boards of the Théâtre Français at Paris, where she had gained innumerable triumphs, till 1841, when she retired in her 63rd year. b. 1779; d. 1847.

MARSDEN, William, mars'-den, a distinguished Orientalist, who was educated at various schools in Dublin, with the view of proceeding to Trinity College, and entering the church. His father was, however, induced to send him out to India when he had attained his sixteenth year. He reached Benecoolen in 1771, and entered the civil service of the government. While fulfilling the duties of secretary, he mastered the Malay language, and acquired a large and valuable store of local knowledge, which, at a later period, he turned to good account in his writings. After residing at Sumatra during eight years, he returned to England, where he made the acquaintance of Sir Joseph Banks, who introduced him to most of the scientific and learned men of the day. In 1782 he published his excellent "History of Sumatra." The success of this work was, from the outset, very decided; and through the influence of distinguished persons, whose acquaintance he had made, the author became second secretary, and afterwards chief secretary, to the Admiralty. While he held that appointment, the battles of St. Vincent, Camperdown, the Nile, and Trafalgar took place; and, during that stirring and glorious period, Mr. Marsden's efforts were marked by untiring energy, integrity, and intelligence. In 1807 he retired upon a pension of £1500 per annum; and five years afterwards produced his "Grammar and Dictionary of the Malay Language," which was followed, after several years' interval, by a translation of the "Travels of the celebrated Marco Polo." His other important works were "Numismata Orientalia; or, Description of Eastern Coins," and some treatises on the Polynesian or East Insular Languages. In 1831 he voluntarily gave up his pension to the public; an act of liberality which elicited the warmest thanks of the House of Commons. At his death he bequeathed his collection of coins and medals to the British Museum, and his library to King's College. n. at Dublin, 1754; p. 1836.

MARSH, Right Rev. Herbert, D.D., marsh, bishop of Peterborough, was chiefly known as the translator of the profound and elaborate work of "Michaelis on the New Testament." After finishing his classical studies at St. John's College, Cambridge, he resided for many years at Göttingen, where he acquired an intimate acquaintance with the German language. On the invasion of Germany by the French, he returned to Cambridge and took his B.D. degree, and in 1807 was elected Lady Margaret's professor of divinity, delivering his lectures in English instead of in Latin, as had been the practice previously; and as he lectured from the university pulpit, all ranks flocked to hear him. Besides several important translations from the German, and a long list of controversial pamphlets, he published "A Course of Lectures, containing a Description and Systematic Arrangement of the several Branches of Divinity," &c.; "A History of the Translations which have been made from the Scriptures;" and "Höræ Pelagicæ." In 1808, Mr. Marsh was created D.D. by royal mandate; in 1816 he was made bishop of Llandaff; and, three years later, translated to the see of Peterborough. Eminent as were his talents and learning, and unwearyed as was his zeal as a divine, he probably owed much of his success in life to some important information on public affairs, which he transmitted to the English government during his residence in Germany, and which Mr. Pitt considered to be so important, that he rewarded it with a pension. b. 1753; p. 1838.

MARSHALL, William, mar'-shall, a distinguished modern writer on agricultural and rural economy, among whose works are, "Minutes of Agriculture," "Planting and Rural Ornament," "The Rural Economy of the Midland, Southern, and Western Counties," and "Experiments and Observations concerning Agriculture and the Weather." b. 1745; p. 1818.

MARSHALL, William Calder, R.A., sculptor, was educated at Edinburgh, and for some years practised his art there. He next studied under Chantrey in London, and under Baily; and in 1836 visited Rome. He first exhibited at the English Academy in 1835; and took up his residence in London permanently in 1839. In 1842 he was elected associate of the Scottish, in 1844 of the English Academy, and in 1852, R.A. Mr. Marshall resisted the attractions of the more lucrative branch of his art, portrait-busts, and devoted his great skill as a modeller of the figure to poetic sculpture; and with gradual success. The "Broken Pitcher" (1842), "Rebecca," and other models in plaster, were selected by Art-Union prizeholders; and the former executed in marble to the purchaser's order. A reduction of the "First Whisper of Love" (1845), was chosen by the holder of a £300 prize. The "Dancing Girl reposing" obtained the Art-Union premium of £500; reduced copies in Parian being distributed among the subscribers. One of his best works for refinement of feeling and of execution is "Sabrina" (1847). For the new Palace at Westminster, Marshall, one of the three sculptors employed, executed the fine statues of Hyde, Lord Clarendon, the historian, and Lord Somers. He was also selected for important statues erected by public subscription—that in bronze to Peel at Manchester; others proposed to be placed in public sites, to Jenner, Campbell, and Cowper. In 1857, Mr. Marshall obtained the first prize of £700, for a design for the national monument to the duke of Wellington; and was employed to execute various statues to the memory of Prince Albert. b. 1813.

MARSHAM, Sir John, mar'-sham, a learned English writer, who, after studying the law, became one of the six clerks in Chancery. During the civil wars, he adhered to the royal cause, and in 1660 was chosen member of Parliament for Rochester. Charles II. conferred on him the honour of knighthood. He is distinguished for his "Diatribæ Chronologica," or a Chronological Dissertation, wherein he examines the principal difficulties which occur in the chronology of the Old Testament; an enlarged edition of which work he afterwards produced. b. in London, 1602; p. 1685.—His son, Sir John Marsham, made large collections for a history of England, but never published them. He also wrote a "History of the English Boroughs."

taken prisoner by the Tartars, who sold him to the Turks. The year following he was ransomed, and obtained a colonel's commission. He was afterwards advanced to the rank of general; but when the Count d'Arco was condemned for giving up the fortress of Brisach to the duke of Burgundy, Marsigli, who commanded under him, was dismissed the service. He then retired to Bologna, where he formed a museum, and erected a printing-office; the first he bequeathed to the senate, and the last to the Dominicans. He also founded the Academy of Arts and Sciences at that place. Count Marsigli was a member of the Academy of Sciences at Paris, and of the Royal Society of London. He wrote, among other important works, "A Philosophical Essay on the Sea," "A Description, Historical, Geographical, &c., of the Danube," and "A Treatise on the Bosphorus." b. at Bologna, 1658; d. 1730.

MARSTON, John, mar'-ston, an English dramatic writer of the time of Elizabeth and James I., who is said to have been a student of Corpus Christi College, Oxford, and an intimate friend of Ben Jonson; but beyond these facts, nothing is known of the circumstances of his life. Nine of his plays have been printed separately: one of them, "The Malcontent," is a very fine production; it is said, however, to have been altered from Webster. His miscellaneous poems were collected and edited in 1764. He also assisted Ben Jonson and Chapman in writing "Eastward Hoe."

MARTIAL, Marcus Valerius, mar'-she-ah, a Latin epigrammatic poet. From some hints contained in his own works, it is ascertained that he went to Rome when young, and remained there during 35 years, after which he retired to his native place, Bilbilis, in Spain. The emperor Domitian conferred on him many favours, and raised him to the office of tribune. Martial, in return, complimented him as more than human; but, after his death, painted his enormities in glowing colours. His epigrams are very pointed and severe. b. about 103.

MARTIN I., Pope, mar'-tin, succeeded Theodoro in 649. He held a council at Rome, in which the heresy of the Monothelites was condemned. This giving offence to the emperor Constantius, he caused Martin to be sent to Constantinople, whence he was removed to the Crimea, where he died of ill-usage, in 655.

MARTIN II. succeeded John VIII. in 682. He condemned Photius, patriarch of Constantinople. d. 684.

MARTIN III., a Roman, succeeded Stephen VIII. in 942. He founded many churches and charitable institutions. d. 946.

MARTIN IV., a Frenchman of noble birth, succeeded Nicholas III. in 1281. He excommunicated the emperor Michael Palaeologus, and Peter I., king of Sicily, and gave the kingdom of the latter to Charles de Valois, son of Philip the Hardy, king of France. d. 1285.

MARTIN V. (Ottho Colonna) was elected pope in 1417, after the abdication of John XXIII. and of the antipopes Benedict and Gregory. His inauguration was very pompous, and he was attended, in a submissive manner, by the emperor and the elector-palatine. He persecuted the followers of Huss in Bohemia, and closed the council of Constance, in 1417. d. 1431.

in India, received a good mathematical education at a public school, and at the age of 20 entered the army with one of his brothers. His regiment was sent to India with General Lally, and in the war of 1758 he behaved with great gallantry; but, being ill-treated, he deserted into the English service, in which he signalized himself by many acts of bravery. Being employed to make a map of the estates of the nabob of Oude, he recommended himself to his patronage. The nabob loved the European arts, in which he was assisted by Martin, who opened a profitable bank and other commercial institutions under his protection, and thereby gained prodigious wealth. Having settled at Lucknow, he built there a magnificent but curious house, in a style of his own, and in which he could enjoy all the mildness and coolness of a European climate, with the fervour of the Asiatic. He also erected another on the banks of the Ganges, which was fortified in the European manner. He formed a large museum of natural history; constructed an immense garden, stocked with a prodigious variety of plants; and built an observatory, which he furnished with the best astronomical instruments. At his death, his great wealth was distributed principally in charity. He founded at Lyons a school of commerce and industry which is called La Martinière, after him. b. at Lyons, 1732; d. 1800.

MARTIN, John, a modern English painter, of considerable originality. Having in early life evinced a desire to become an artist, his father apprenticed him to a Newcastle coachmaker, for the purpose of learning heraldic painting; his indentures, were, however, cancelled after a short time, and he was placed in the studio of Bonifacio Mussò, an enamel painter. In 1806 he went to London with his master, who obtained employment for him in the firm of Mr. C. Muss, his son. Martin, speaking of his life at that period, says, "By close application till two or three o'clock in the morning, in the depth of winter, I obtained that knowledge of perspective and architecture which has since been so valuable to me. I was at this time, during the day, employed in Mr. C. Muss's firm, painting on china and glass; by which, and making water-colour drawings, and teaching, I supported myself; in fact, mine was a struggling artist's life when I married, which I did at 19."

In 1812 he resolved to paint a large picture; he set to work, and in a month produced "Sadak in search of the Waters of Oblivion." This obtained a place in the Royal Academy Exhibition, and was purchased for 50 guineas. Thus encouraged, the painter worked diligently, and became, for a period, the most generally popular artist in his native country. He produced a number of striking works, which, as depicting awe-inspiring subjects, in a manner characterized by fervid imagination and a feeling for the grandeur of nature, captivated the general public, and caused Martin to be regarded as possessing a "sublime style." Some of his most attractive and successful pictures, were—"Belshazzar's Feast," "The Seventh Plague," "The Fall of Nineveh," "The Eve of the Deluge," and "The Destruction of Herculaneum." He attained the extravagant popularity which greeted his first efforts, and his last pictures, illustrative of the "Last Judgment," were coldly received. He devoted considerable time to projects for the sanitary improvement of the metropolis, published some pamphlets on the subject, and took out patents for sewer-pipes, &c. At one time, his services were eagerly sought by publishers as an illustrator of books; and for one set of drawings—those made for an edition of Milton's poems—he is said to have been paid 2000 guineas. B. in Northumberland, 1789; D. 1854.

MARTINEAU, Harriet, mar'-te-no, an eminent modern authoress, was descended from a family of French extraction, which, on the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, commenced and carried on, during several generations, the business of silk-manufacturers at Norwich. In early youth she displayed great earnestness of character, and an unremitting eagerness to acquire knowledge. Her talent for literary composition was also very decided. Her father becoming embarrassed in his commercial affairs, Harriet, the sixth of eight children, resolved to support herself by literature. She commenced accordingly by publishing, in the year 1823, a volume of "Devotions for Young People," which was succeeded by her "Christmas Day" and "The Friend," in the two following years. Some tales and tracts occupied her pen up to 1830, when she published a more ambitious work entitled "Traditions of Palestine." About the same time she gained the prizes offered by the British and Foreign Unitarian Association for three tracts on the "Introduction and Promotion of Christian Unitarianism among the Roman Catholics, the Jews, and Mohammedans." Her next efforts were the "Illustrations of Political Economy," which, although they had been rejected by the Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge and several publishers, proved a most decided success. "Illustrations of Taxation" and "Poor-Law and Paupers" appeared next, and in 1837 she gave to the world her "Society in America," which was the result of a visit to the United States. "Dearbrook" and "The Hour and the Man," were the subsequent productions of her pen; but, although two excellent novels, they did not attain great popularity. Between the years 1839-41, her health was exceedingly delicate; but, on her recovery, she resumed the pen with her former energy, and produced "Life in the Sick Room," "Forest and Game-Law Tales," "The Billow and the Rock," and "Eastern Life, Past and Present," which last contained her travelling impressions of Syria and the Holy Land. Mr. Charles Knight having been compelled to relinquish the composition of the "History of England during the Thirty Years' Peace," Miss Martineau undertook the task, and was generally allowed to have produced a most interesting and valuable contribution to historical literature. She next published, in conjunction with Mr. Atkinson, a volume containing opinions relative to religious belief, which astonished the world by being directly opposite to those she had hitherto displayed. About 1856 she went to reside at a pleasant cottage she had built for herself at Ambleside. Her pen was next employed in the service of the "Westminster," and other reviews, and in occasional contributions to the daily and weekly press. Her last work of importance was a condensed reproduction of "Comte's Positive Philosophy." B. at Norwich, 1802.

MARTYN, John, mar'-tin, an eminent English botanist, who, in 1720, translated "Tournefort's History of the Plants growing about Paris," which induced him to make a similar catalogue of the plants about London. He co-operated with Dillenius in forming a society of botanists, which continued till 1728. About this time he read botanical lectures in London, and on the death of Bradley was chosen professor of botany at Cambridge. He became, in 1727, a member of the Royal Society. He practised physic in the city, and afterwards at Chelsea, but, in 1752, retired to Streatham. His principal works were several treatises in Latin on botany; a Translation of the Georgics and Bucolics of Virgil, with notes; translation of Boerhaave's treatise on the Powers of Medicine; Harris on the Diseases of Infants; and an abridgment of Philosophical Papers from the Memoirs of the Academy of Sciences at Paris. B. in London, 1699; D. 1763.

MARTYN, Thomas, F.R.S., an eminent antiquarian and natural philosopher, the son of the preceding, born at Chelsea, was educated at Cambridge, and, on his father's resignation in 1781, succeeded to the botanical professorship, which he held for 64 years, together with valuable church preferment. His philosophical writings by which he is most generally known, are, "Plantæ Cantabrigienses," "Herbariones Cantabrigienses," "The English Connoisseur," "The Antiquities of Herculaneum," "Elements of Natural History," "Flora Rustica," and an enlarged edition of "Miller's Gardener's Dictionary." B. 1736; D. 1826.

MARTYR, Peter, mar'-tir, an Italian diplomatist, who was employed by Ferdinand V., king of Castile and Aragon, in the education of his children. He also obtained some ecclesiastical benefices, and wrote a history of the discovery of America, in Latin; also a curious relation of his embassy to Egypt, in 1500, and a collection of letters relating to the history of Spain. B. 1455; D. 1523.

MARTYR, Peter, a celebrated Protestant divine, whose family name was Vermigli; but his parents gave him that of Martyr, from his own Peter, a martyr, whose church stood near their house. After receiving a private education, he entered an Augustine monastery at Fiesole. He became a distinguished preacher, and held an appointment in the cathedral of Naples, which he relinquished after reading the writings of Luther and other reformers. This change in his religious sentiments rendering it expedient for him to quit Italy, he went to Strasburg, where he married a nun, who, having adopted the principles of the Reformation, had fled from her convent. On the invitation of Edward VI. he went to England, and was made professor of divinity at Oxford, and canon of Christchurch. But in the succeeding reign he was obliged to leave the kingdom; on which he went to Switzerland. His wife died at Oxford, and, in the reign of Mary, her remains were taken up and buried beneath a dunghill; but when Queen Elizabeth came to the throne, they were honourably interred in Christchurch. Peter Martyr wrote some pieces against the errors of the church of Rome, and commentaries upon the Holy Scripture. B. at Florence, 1500; D. at Zurich, 1562.

MARVELL, Andrew, mar'-vel, an English poet and politician, who, at the age of thirteen, was sent to Trinity College, Cambridge, and, in 1657, became assistant to Milton, as Latin secretary. In the Parliament which met at the Restoration, he was chosen to represent his native town. He distinguished himself by his integrity as a senator, and by his wit as a writer against the corruptions of the court. Charles II. delighted in his conversation, but could never prevail upon him to support his measures. The following anecdote, so strongly depicting his political incorruptibility, was narrated in a small work published in 1784. "The borough of Hull, in the reign of Charles II. chose Andrew Marvell, a young gentleman of little or no fortune, and maintained him in London for the service of the public. His understanding, integrity, and spirit were dreadful to the then infamous administration. Persuaded that he would be theirs for properly asking, they sent his old schoolfellow, the Lord-Treasurer Dauby, to renew acquaintance with him in his garret. At parting, the lord-treasurer, out of pure affection, slipped into his hand an order on the Treasury for £1000, and then went to his chariot. Marvell, looking at the paper, calls after the treasurer, 'My lord, I request another moment.' They went up again to the garret, and Jack, the servant-boy, was called. 'Jack, child, what had I for dinner yesterday?' 'Don't you remember, sir? You had the little shoulder of mutton that you ordered me to bring from the woman in the market.' 'Very right, child; what have I for dinner to-day?' 'Don't you know, sir, that you bid me lay by the blade-bone to broil?' 'Tis so, very right; child, go away. My lord, do you hear that? Andrew Marvell's dinner is provided; there's your piece of paper. I want it not. I know the sort of kindness you intended. I live here to serve my constituents; the ministry may seek men for their purpose; I am not one.'" The close of his political career was brought about, according to Mr. Dove, in the following way. "Marvell had now rendered himself so obnoxious to the usual friends of a corrupt court, and to the heir presumptive, James, duke of York, that he was beset on all sides by powerful enemies, who even proceeded so far as to menace his life. Hence he was obliged to use great caution, to appear seldom in public, and, frequently to conceal the place of his abode; but all his care proved ineffectual to preserve him from their vengeance; for he died at the age of fifty-eight years, not without strong suspicions (as his constitution was active and vigorous) of having suffered under the effect of poison." Although his fame as a wit, satirist, and poet, was considerable during his time, it is as a man of great political integrity that he is remembered. A complete edition of his works was published, with his life prefixed, in 1776. v. in Yorkshire, 1620; p. 1678.

MARY I., mair-e, queen of England, was the daughter of Henry VIII., by Catharine of Aragon, his first wife. Her education was liberal, and she acquired so great a knowledge of the Latin language as to undertake a translation of the paraphrase of Erasmus on St. John's gospel, which, however, she did not complete. During the life of her father she experienced many marks of his fierce temper; and the treatment which her mother had experienced contributed much towards increasing her dislike to Henry, and to the alterations which he introduced into the church. During the reign of Edward, she could not be prevailed upon to join in communion with the Protestant divines; on this account, that amiable prince was persuaded by his minister, the duke of Northumberland, to set aside his sisters from the succession, and to declare Lady Jane Grey his heir. At his death, in 1553, that lady was proclaimed queen; but her reign lasted only a few days. The partisans of Mary became numerous, and she entered London without opposition. In putting to death Lady Jane and her husband, Lord Dudley, she indicated that sanguinary and revengeful temper which was soon displayed in a violent persecution of the Protestants; even Cranmer, to whom she is said to have been indebted for her life, did not escape her bigotry and cruelty. In 1554 she married Philip of Spain, eldest son of Charles V., with whom she lived on indifferent terms. A disappointment, occasioned by a supposed misarrriage, and aggravated by the loss of Calais, produced a fever, of which she died in 1558, and with her ended the domination of the papal power in England. s. at Greenwich, 1516.

MARY II., queen of England, the wife of William III., was the daughter of James II. by Anne Hyde, daughter of the earl of Claremont. At the age of 15 she was married to William, Prince of Orange, with whom she went to England, in 1689. The same year, Parliament having declared the crown vacant by the abdication of James, conferred it upon William and Mary. She was of a meek disposition, and did not interfere in matters of government, except when her husband was absent. (See WILLIAM III.) She died, without issue, of the small-pox, in 1694. p. 1692.

MARY STUART, stu-art, commonly called Mary queen of Scots, the daughter of James V., king of Scotland, by Marie of Lorraine, daughter of the duke of Guise, was only eight days old when her father died; on which she became heiress to the throne. Henry VIII. of England endeavoured to unite the two kingdoms, by a marriage between his son Edward and the infant queen of Scots; but his offer being rejected, he sent his troops into Scotland, where they took and plundered Edinburgh, but were soon obliged to return. In 1544, Mary was betrothed to Francis, dauphin of France, at which court she acquired those accomplishments which rendered her an object of universal admiration; and there, also, she imbibed those prejudices which proved the source of her misfortunes. In 1558 the marriage was celebrated, and, by the direction of their father-in-law, Mary and her husband assumed the title of king and queen of England, on the supposed ground of the illegitimacy of Elizabeth; an act of ridiculous ambition, which was afterwards fatal to Mary. In 1559 Henry II. died, and Francis became king of France; but, in less than two years, he left Mary a widow; on which she returned to her native country, after an absence of nearly thirteen years, and, says Robertson, "a stranger to her subjects, without experience, without allies, and almost without a friend." Scotland was at that time a prey to factional zeal. The Presbyterian party, grieved to desperation by the fierce intolerance of the Roman Catholic clergy, carried the work of reformation to the extreme, by destroying abbeys, cathedrals, libraries, and even the monuments of the dead. Such was the state of the kingdom at the landing of Mary, who, the first Sunday after her arrival, ordered mass to be said in her chapel; an act which gave great offence to the people. Mary, nevertheless, proclaimed that any attempts towards a change or subversion of the established church should be treated as a capital offence. Although she held several conferences with

Knox, during one of which she was bathed in tears before the reformer's fierce eloquence, Mary could not be induced to change her religious opinions. Several offers of marriage were made to Mary, who rejected them, and bestowed her hand on Henry, Lord Darnley, son of the earl of Lennox, a young nobleman of prepossessing appearance, but weak and impetuous in mind and temper, and mean and intemperate in his habits. This inauspicious marriage was soon followed by alienation, and the enemies of both did their utmost to widen the breach. They persuaded Darnley that David Rizzio, an Italian musician, whom the queen had appointed her foreign secretary, had supplanted him in her affections. A conspiracy was formed, and one night, while the queen was at supper with the countess of Argyle, Darnley conducted his confederates to the royal apartment, where Rizzio was murdered in the presence of Mary, who was then advanced in pregnancy. The next favourite at the court of Scotland was James Hepburn, earl Bothwell, a man of considerable talents, but of unprincipled mind. By his arts he gained an ascendancy over the mind of Mary, who appointed him lieutenant of the Marches. In 1566 she was delivered of a son, afterwards James VI. of Scotland and I. of England. Darnley was soon afterwards seized with a strange distemper, whilst staying at his father's house at Glasgow. He returned to Edinburgh; but, instead of proceeding to Holyrood Palace, went to a solitary house, which was blown up ten days afterwards, the body of the king being found in the garden, without any marks of violence upon it. This deed occasioned universal horror, and as it was believed that Bothwell was its principal contriver, he was brought before the privy council, but, after a mock trial, was acquitted. His influence over Mary increasing, he laid aside the mask, and, in 1567, seized the queen, and carried her to the castle of Dunbar, where, by entreaties and force, he prevailed on her to marry him. This is the great stain on the character of this ill-fated woman, which has called forth the condemnation both of her enemies and her defenders. A confederacy of the most powerful lords in the kingdom was formed against Mary and Bothwell; but, after a time, the queen abandoned the earl, and was taken first to Edinburgh, and afterwards to the castle of Lochleven. The lords of the confederacy forced her to sign a renunciation of her crown in favour of her son, and he was accordingly crowned at Stirling. After this, the enemies of Mary, who had suffered Bothwell to quit the kingdom, caused different persons to be executed for being concerned in the king's murder. Mary, after nearly a year's confinement, escaped from her prison in the island of Lochleven, and raised a large army; but the regent Murray marching against her, the royal party was defeated. On this, Mary fled into England, and implored the protection of Elizabeth, who acted with great duplicity for some time, and at length declared that no assistance could be afforded her unless she submitted to a legal trial. After some difficulties, this was agreed to, and the cause was to be determined at York, by a commission, which finally removed to London, where it was declared that "nothing had been produced whereby the queen of England could conceive or take any evil opinion of her good sister, for anything yet seen." Mary was, notwithstanding, kept in close confinement. The duke of Norfolk formed the design of marrying her, in which he was encouraged by several of the English nobility, and also by the regent Murray; but this being discovered by Elizabeth, the duke was sent to the Tower, whence he was not released till he promised to renounce all correspondence with the queen of Scotland, but afterwards renewing his ambitious project, he was tried and executed. After a long confinement at Coventry, Mary was removed to Fotheringay Castle, where she was to undergo the mock formality of a trial, on the charge of fomenting conspiracies against Elizabeth. When brought before the commissioners, she disclaimed their authority and asserted her innocence; but though no proof appeared of the charges, she was declared guilty of conspiring against the life of Elizabeth. Mary received the tidings with complacency, being wearied by her unparalleled persecutions. Many foreign powers interested themselves in her behalf, and her son James endeavoured to save her life, but in vain. She was beheaded in the castle of Fotheringay, February 8, 1587, after praying to God to forgive all who had thirsted for her blood. Thus fell Mary Stuart, a princess of uncommon beauty and accomplishments, as well as misfortunes. Her remains were interred in Peterborough Cathedral, whence they were removed by her son, after he had ascended the English throne, and deposited in Westminster Abbey. p. 1542.

MARY, queen of Hungary, was sister to the emperor Charles V., and married, in 1521, Louis, king of Hungary, who soon after was killed at the battle of Mohatz. His widow was appointed governor of the Low Countries in 1531, and in that station behaved with great courage and prudence. She headed the troops in several actions, and was so fond of hunting as to be called Diana, and the Huntress. She favoured the Protestants, and had a taste for literature. Between her and Henry II., king of France, there was a great animosity, and she committed considerable ravages in the French provinces. Henry, on his part, invaded Flanders, and destroyed the palace of Mary, who, in return, carried devastation into Picardy. The Spanish soldiers called her the mother of the camp. She resigned the government in 1555. p. 1558.

MARY of England was daughter of Henry VII., and married Louis XII. in 1514. Becoming a widow in the following year, she was united to the duke of Suffolk. p. 1497; p. 1534.

MARY, an Anglo-Norman poetess in the 13th century, was born in France, but resided chiefly in England. She was the authoress of a collection of fables, entitled "Ysopet" (the Little Æsop). M. Legrand d'Aussy published her fables in modern French prose.

MASACCIO, Thomas, ma-sa'-che-o, a celebrated Italian painter, was accounted the principal artist of the second age of modern art, from its revival under Cimabue. Fuseli says of him, "Masaccio was a genius, and the head of an epoch in the art. He may be considered as the precursor of Raffaele, who imitated his principles, and sometimes transcribed his figures." His most perfect works are the frescoes of St. Pietro del Carmine, at Florence, where vigour of conception, truth and vivacity of expression, are supported by surprising harmony of colour. p. about 1401; p. about 1420.

Naples, whose real name was Tomaso Aniello, and who, in 1647, headed an insurrection of his countrymen, besieged the viceroy, the duke of Arcos, in his palace, and compelled him to capitulate. During seven days, Masaniello was master of Naples; but, at the end of that time, was assassinated by some emissaries of the viceroy, in a riot. His story has been often dramatized, and he forms the hero of two operas, entitled "Masaniello," and "The Dumb Girl of Portici." n. 1623; p. 1647.

MASCAGNI, Paul, mas-kaw'-ye, a celebrated Italian anatomist, who was professor at Siena, Pisa, and Florence, and was elected an associate of the College of France. He completed the fine collection of anatomical preparations contained in the Museum of Florence. Several learned works were produced by him; among the rest, "Universal Anatomy," which appeared after his death, at Pisa, illustrated by many fine engravings, and which is one of the most complete and valuable works of its class. n. in Tuscan, 1752; p. 1815.

MASCARON, Julius, mas'-kă-rang', an eminent French ecclesiastic, entered among the priests of the Oratory; and soon became so popular a preacher, that multitudes thronged from all quarters to hear him. In 1666 he was called to court, to preach before Louis XIV.; and successively became bishop of Tulle and Agen. At the latter place he founded an hospital. A collection of his "Funeral Orations" was published, among which the most admired are those on Marshal Turenne, the Duke of Beaufort, and the Chancellor Seguier. n. at Versailles, 1634; p. 1703.

MASCHERONI, Lorenzo, mas'-kui-ro'-ne, an Italian mathematician, who published notes on the "Integral Calculus" of Euler, and assisted in the experiments performed by the Institute of Bologna, with a view of proving the figure of the earth by the descent of bodies. The invention, however, which has rendered his name conspicuous, was his celebrated Geometria del compasso, "the compass geometry." n. at Bergamo, 1750; p. at Paris, 1800.

MASENIUS, or MASEY, James, mas'-u'-ens, a Jesuit, who wrote a Latin poem, called "Sarcothea, or the Fall of Man;" which Lauder brought into notice by pretending that Milton was indebted to it for part of his "Paradise Lost." He was also the author of "The Art of Poetry," "Palæstra Styli Romani," "The Lives of Charles V. and Ferdinand," "Notes on the Annals of Trêves," &c. p. 1606; p. 1681.

MASERES, Francis, ma'-sair, an eminent English mathematician, who was descended from an old French family. He was educated at Cambridge, and adopted the law as his profession. After spending some years in America as attorney-general for Canada, he returned to England in 1773, and afterwards became censor of the Exchequer, deputy-recorder of London, &c. He was not only an able mathematician, but a most munificent patron of the science. At his own expense, he reprinted many valuable works relating thereto. His own works were, "Elements of Plane Trigonometry," "Principles of the Doctrine of Life Annuities," and an adix to Friend's "Principles of Algebra." Between the years 1791 and 1807 he published, at his own expense, a collection of works on Logarithms, in 6 large volumes, entitled, "Scriptores Logarithmici." At a later period, he produced reprints of the optical treatises of James Gregory, Descartes, Huygens, Barrow, and Halley. n. in London, 1731; p. at Reigate, 1824.

MASHAM, Mrs. Abigail, măsh'-ăm, the favourite of Queen Anne, and cousin of the duchess of Marlborough, who placed her in the queen's service as waiting-maid. She subsequently supplanted the duchess, and obtained a powerful influence over the queen. Harley, afterwards earl of Oxford, entered into an alliance with her, and the pair, during some time, virtually ruled at court. Her husband, Mr. Masham, was raised to the peerage, and both took a large share in the secret negotiation with France for placing the Pretender on the English throne. After the death of the queen, she retired into private life. p. 1734.

MASTIS, Andrew, ma-si'-us, a learned grammarian, who became counsellor to the duke of Cleves. His principal works are, "A Syriac Lexicon and Grammar," and "A Commentary on the Book of Joshua." n. 1516; p. 1573.

MASKELYNE, Rev. Nevil, mas'-ke-line, an eminent English astronomer, was educated at Cambridge, and, in 1753, took orders; but, becoming acquainted with Bradley, the astronomer, assisted him in his scientific labours. In 1761 he made a voyage to St. Helena, to observe the transit of Venus. Four years afterwards, he became astronomer royal, and, in 1767, commenced the publication of the world-famous "Nautical Almanack." In 1790 he gave to the world some of the results of his official labours at the Greenwich Observatory, in a work entitled "A Standard Catalogue of Stars." n. in London, 1732; p. 1811.

MASON, William, ma'-son, an English poet and divine, who, in 1714, published a poem entitled "Isis," which being considered as an attack on the university of Oxford, was answered by Mr. Warton in another, called "The Triumphs of Isis." In 1754 Mason entered into orders, was appointed chaplain to the king, and presented to the living of Aston, in Yorkshire. He also obtained the prebendaryship of York cathedral, which leading his mind to church music, he composed a book on that subject. Gray, the poet, appointed him one of his executors; and Mason wrote the life, and published the letters, of his friend. He also composed the epitaph for Gray's monument in Westminster Abbey. In the American war, Mr. Mason showed himself a warm defender of the rebels, as they were termed; for which he was struck out of the list of royal chaplains. The horrors of the French revolution are said to have caused an entire change in his political opinions. His "Elfrida" and "Caractæus," two dramas on the Greek model, are esteemed the best of his works. He also wrote a poem, entitled "The English Garden," and translated into English verse Du Fresnoy's "Art of Painting," to which Sir Joshua Reynolds added valuable notes. n. 1725; p. 1797.

MASON, Sir John, an eminent English statesman, who, becoming a favourite with Henry VIII., was employed in several embassies, and made a member of the privy council. He afterwards served Edward VI., and contrived to hold his places under Mary. Queen Elizabeth made him treasurer of her chamber, and he was chosen chancellor of the university of Oxford. His favourite maxim was, "Do, and say nothing." n. at Abington, Berks, about 1500; p. 1566.

Dunmow, Essex, was the author of an excellent little volume of ethics, entitled "Self-knowledge," of which there have been numerous editions; he also wrote "Practical Discourses for the use of Families;" "An Essay on Elocution," two "Essays on the Power of Poetical and Prosodic Numbers," "Christian Morals." b. 1706; d. 1763.

MASQUE DE FER, mask-de(c)-fair, or the "Iron Mask," the name of an unknown person in France, who was conveyed in the most secret manner to the castle of Pignerol in 1686, whence he was transferred to the isles St. Margaret in 1686. He was a man taller than ordinary, and extremely well made. His accomplishments were evidently great, and he had a fine taste for music. He always wore a mask, according to some, of velvet, while others assert it to have been of steel, furnished with springs, which was so constructed as to allow him free liberty to eat and drink. His keepers treated him with the greatest respect. At Pignerol he was intrusted to the charge of an officer named St. Mars, on whose appointment as lieutenant of the isles, this unknown personage accompanied him, as he finally did to the Bastille, where he died in 1703, and was buried under the name of Marchiali. Two gentlemen, who were prisoners in the room over him, contrived to hold some conversation with him by means of the chimney, and found that he was a man of general learning; but he informed them that a discovery of his name and rank would be death both to him and them. Numerous conjectures have been formed, and dissertations written, on this historical subject, which, nevertheless, still remains in impenetrable obscurity. It has been conjectured that he might have been the count de Vermandois, son of the duchess de la Vallière, thus imprisoned for having given a blow to the Dauphin; or a twin-brother of Louis XIV., so disposed of to prevent rivalry between the two brothers. This last opinion is that of Voltaire, and appears to derive some support from the Memoirs published by the Duke de Richelieu in 1780.

MASSÉNA, André, mas'-se-na, prince of Essling, duke of Rivoli, and marshal of France, joined a French regiment at an early age, and distinguished himself in the first wars of the Revolution. In 1795 he was promoted to the rank of general of division, and bore a glorious part in the Italian campaigns of Bonaparte. In 1798 he was placed at the head of the army charged to establish the republican government in the Papal States; but both his own soldiers and the inhabitants of the subjected states complaining of his insatiable avarice, he was compelled to resign his command. He remained unemployed until the following year, when he was given the command of the armies of the Danube and Switzerland, and defeated the Russians at the battle of Zurich; thus saving France from invasion. He was next sent to defend Genoa from the attacks of an Austrian army and the English fleet. In 1805 he was nominated marshal of France and duke of Rivoli, and in the following year received the command-in-chief of the army of Italy, when he succeeded in driving the archduke Charles before him, and effecting a junction with Napoleon. In 1806 he accompanied Joseph Bonaparte to Naples; and, by defeating the insurgent Calabrians, enabled Joseph to take possession of the throne. He commanded the fifth corps in Austria in 1809, and decided the victory at Essling, for which Napoleon created him prince of Essling. He was charged, in 1810, with the task of driving the duke of Wellington out of Portugal, but met a signal failure before the lines of Torres Vedras; and, after a masterly retreat into Spain, he was recalled in 1812. Ill-health prevented his taking part in the Russian campaign; and, in 1813, while commanding a division at Toulon, he declared his adhesion to the Bourbons. After the Hundred Days, he became commander-in-chief of the National Guard of Paris. He was chosen a member of the council of war before which Ney was arraigned, but formed one of the number who pronounced the court to be incompetent. This remarkable general, who was called by Napoleon "the spoilt child of Victory," was one of the ablest tacticians among Napoleon's subordinates; but although he possessed in the field all the best qualities of a commander, his character was disgraced by an avarice which was apparently without limit. Disraeli appears anxious to establish the fact that Masséna was a Jew. In his "Coningsby" he says, "several of the French marshals, and the most famous—Masséna, for example, was a Hebrew: his real name was Manasseh." b. at Nice, 1759; d. 1817.

MASSILLON, Jean Baptiste, mas'-see-yaung, a famous French prelate, who at the age of 18 entered the congregation of the Oratory. He acquired a superiority over all the preachers of his time; and Louis XIV. once said to him, "Father, when I hear other preachers, I go away much pleased with them; but when I hear you, I go away much displeased with myself." In 1717 he was appointed bishop of Clermont, and, in 1710, admitted a member of the French Academy. His works were printed in 12 vols. in 1748. b. at Illiers, Provence, 1663; d. 1742.

MASSINGHAM, Philip, mas'-sin-fer, a celebrated English dramatic author, was the son of one of the earl of Pembroke's retainers, and was sent to the university of Oxford. Having lost his patron's favour, for what reason is uncertain, he quitted the university without a degree, and went to London in 1606, where he engaged in dramatic composition until his death. At the outset he appears to have assisted others in writing plays, but, in 1622, produced an entire play of his own—"The Virgin Martyr." Some of the best of his remaining extant plays are, "A New Way to pay Old Debts," the "Maid of Honour," the "Fatal Dowry," the "City Madam," and the "Bashful Lover." b. at Salisbury, 1581; d. 1640.

American divine, became assistant to his father, also a clergyman, and distinguished himself by his piety and learning. In 1710, the university of Glasgow conferred on him the degree of D.D., and in 1714, he was chosen a member of the Royal Society of London. He wrote a number of books; among which are, an "Ecclesiastical History of New England;" "The Christian Philosopher;" "The Wonders of the Invisible World, being an Account of the Trials of several Witches lately executed in New England;" &c. In this last work, he showed an astonishing degree of credulity. B. at Boston, 1683; D. 1728.

MATHEW, Rev. Theobald, mat'-theu, the "Apostle of Temperance," was the son of an illegitimate member of the Llandaff family, and was educated for the Roman Catholic priesthood, at St. Patrick's College, Maynooth. After being appointed missionary at Cork, he acquired the greatest respect and consideration from all classes, and established religious societies for visiting the sick and poor. At a later period, he became president of a temperance association at Cork. He then devoted himself to the task of inducing spirit-drinkers to "take the pledge" of abstinence; and in a few months, converted no less than 150,000 in Cork alone. He afterwards made a progress through Ireland, visited Dublin, Liverpool, Manchester, Glasgow, and London, where the same success greeted his philanthropic efforts. A striking proof that he disregarded his temporal interests in the cause he had espoused, was afforded by the fact that a large distillery, owned by his brother, and from which he himself drew almost his whole income, was shut up in consequence of his crusade against alcoholic liquids. In recognition of his services, he was granted a pension of 300*l.* per annum. B. in Tipperary, 1790; D. 1856.

MATHEWS, Charles, a connoisseur of transcendent ability, and one who was long regarded as the master-mind of the mimic art, was the son of a bookseller in the Strand, London, who had placed him in Merchant Taylors' School, and apprenticed him to learn his own business. The stage, however, proving more attractive to young Mathews than the shop of his father, the latter gave him twenty guineas and his indentures, with permission to follow the bent of his inclinations; and a promise of twenty guineas more if he would abandon histrionics, and "turn to an honest calling." He rambled about with provincial companies for a time; but the great versatility of talent he possessed soon placed him at the top of his profession, and rendered him a general favorite with the public. After a long career of successful performances, his metropolitan engagement grew irksome, from managerial interference and professional rivalries, and he determined to "set up for himself," and to depend solely on his own exertions. For sixteen years previous to his death, he was accustomed to entertain whole audiences by his single efforts, in a species of entertainment entitled "Mathews at Home;" and never were admiring crowds more highly delighted than in witnessing the vivid portraits, which he drew. The "At Homes" of Mathews were not only well received throughout Great Britain and Ireland, but also in America, where some of his most felicitous portraits were sketched. While on his passage from that country he was taken ill, and on arriving at Liverpool his malady rapidly increasing, expired on his birthday, June 25th, 1835. B. 1776. Mathews was twice married, but had one child only, Charles Mathews the younger, also a famous actor of genteel comedy, and for some years lessee of the Lyceum Theatre, London.

MATTHIAS CORVINUS, mat'-thi-us kor'-ri-nus, called the Great, king of Hungary and Bohemia, was the son of John Hunniades. The enemies of his father confined him in prison in Bohemia; but, on regaining his liberty, he was elected king of Hungary, in 1458, when only fifteen years of age. His election, however, was opposed by many of the Hungarian lords, who offered the crown to Frederick III. The Turks, profiting by these divisions, invaded the country, but were expelled by Matthias, who compelled Frederick to yield to him the crown of St. Stephen, of which he had obtained possession. The war was afterwards renewed, and Matthias, overrunning Austria, took Vienna and Neustadt; on which the emperor was obliged to make a peace, in 1487. Matthias reformed many abuses, particularly with respect to duels and lawsuits, and was preparing an expedition against the Turks, when he died of an apoplexy, in 1490. B. 1413.

MATIGNON, Jacques de, mat'-teen-yawn, prince of Montague, and count of Thorigni, a famous general of France. He displayed great courage when young, in several battles, and in 1572 commanded the royal army in Normandy. In 1579 he was made a marshal of France, and assisted as constable at the coronation of Henry IV. B. 1525; D. 1597.

MATILDA, or MARY, ma'-til'-da, the daughter of Henry I., king of England, and wife of Henry V., emperor of Germany, was nominated by her father, in 1155, successor to the English throne; but, in her absence, Stephen, the nephew of Henry, usurped the title. Arriving in England with a large army, in 1139, she defeated Stephen, and was acknowledged queen by a parliament held in 1141. Stephen afterwards defeated the empress; on which the people declared for him, and Matilda was obliged to leave the kingdom. On the death of the emperor, she married Geoffrey Plantagenet, earl of Anjou, by whom she had a son, afterwards Henry II. of England. B. 1100; D. 1167.

MATILDA CAROLINE, queen of Denmark, the daughter of Frederick Louis, Prince of Wales, and father of George III., was married at the age of fifteen to Christian VII., king of Denmark; but, having been accused of an intrigue with the minister, Struensee, was divorced and sent into exile. B. 1751; D. at Zell, Hanover, 1775.

MATYS, Quintin, ma'-tis, an eminent painter, of the Dutch school, is stated to have been brought up as a blacksmith, which trade he abandoned on falling in love with a young lady, to obtain whose hand he studied painting, and became an excellent artist. A "Descent from the Cross," in the cathedral of Antwerp, is his masterpiece, and there is a celebrated picture by him, called "The Two Misers," at Windsor Castle. B. at Antwerp, 1460; D. 1523.

MATTHESSON, John, ma'-the-son, an eminent musical composer and performer, was a native of Hamburg, and of so precocious talent, that at nine years of age he was able to perform compositions of his own at the organ. He composed music for the church and for the theatre, and was always present at the performance of it. Notwithstanding he gave up so much time

MATTHEW CANTACUZENUS, kân'-tu-ku-sé-nus, the son of John, emperor of the East, and his associate in the empire in 1347. John abdicated the throne some time after, on which Matthew remained emperor, with John Palæologus I. These princes at length disagreed, and had recourse to arms. A battle was fought between them in Thrace, and Matthew being taken prisoner, was compelled to renounce the throne to his rival. He then retired to the monastery of Mount Athos, where he composed commentaries on the Song of Solomon.

MATTHEW of Westminster, an English monk and historian of the 14th century, who wrote a chronicle entitled "The Flowers of History," published at London, in 1567, in which he commences with the creation of the world; but the most valuable portion is that which he devotes to the chronicle of English events from the Conquest to the end of Edward I.'s reign. A translation of the work has been published in Bohn's "Antiquarian Library."

MATTHEWS, Thomas, math'-the-ws, an English admiral, who commanded in the Mediterranean in 1744, and fought an obstinate but indecisive battle off Toulon, with the combined fleets. Owing to his not being supported by Lestock, his second in command, Admiral Matthews failed to gain a complete victory; and yet for this he was dismissed the service, and Lestock was acquitted. He retired to his estate in Glamorganshire, and died there, 1751.

MATTHIAS, math'-thi-as, emperor of Germany, was the son of Maximilian II., and succeeded his brother, Rodolph II., in 1612. The empire was then at war with the Turks, with whom Matthias concluded a peace in 1615; but the war was renewed in 1618, and continued during thirty years. n. 1557; p. at Vienna, 1619.

MATTHEW, Peter, mat'-ye(r), a French historian and poet, was a zealous partisan of the League, and attended Louis XIII. to the siege of Montauban. He wrote "A History of Memorable Events in the Reign of Henry the Great," the history of the death of that monarch, "The History of St. Louis," "The History of France, from Francis I. to Louis XIII." n. 1563; p. 1621.

MATTHEW, Rev. Charles Robert, mat'-u-rin, an Irish divine, who produced several successful novels, and, in 1816, brought out a tragedy, entitled "Bertram," at Drury-lane Theatre. n. in Ireland, 1782; p. 1825.

MATY, Matthew, mat'-te, an eminent physician, who took his doctor's degree at Leyden, and, in 1740, settled in England. In 1750 he commenced a periodical work, printed at the Hague, called "Le Journal Britannique," giving an account of the principal productions of the English press. In 1758 he was chosen fellow of the Royal Society, to which, in 1763, he became secretary. He also rose to be librarian of the British Museum. The life prefixed to the "Memoirs of the Earl of Chesterfield," and many smaller works, were written by him. n. near Utrecht, 1718; p. 1776.

MATY, Paul Henry, son of the preceding, became chaplain to Lord Stormont, ambassador at Paris, and afterwards one of the librarians of 699 the British Museum, and, in 1778, a secretary of the Royal Society. In 1782 he commenced a literary review, which was continued till 1786. In 1784, when there were great divisions in the Royal Society, occasioned by the dismissal of Dr. Hutton from the post of foreign secretary, Maty resigned his place. n. 1745; p. 1787.

MAUPERTUIS, Peter Louis Mareau de, mo'-pairt-we, a celebrated French philosopher, was some time in the military service, which he quitted, and devoted himself to scientific pursuits. In 1723 he became a member of the French Academy, and, about four years after, was chosen a member of the Royal Society of London. In 1736 he was sent, with other academicians, to the north, to determine the figure of the earth, which service they performed with perfect success. At the invitation of the Prince of Prussia, afterwards Frederick the Great, he went to Berlin in 1740, and was appointed president and director of the Academy.

He accompanied that king in his campaigns against the Austrians; but exposing himself too much at the battle of Molwitz, he was made prisoner, and sent to Vienna, where he was well received by the emperor. He was soon permitted to return to Berlin, after receiving several marks of the imperial favour. He was of a vain and irritable temper, and had a dispute with Kœnig, and another with Voltaire, who exerted his satirical talents against him. This, however, was not much to the credit of the poet, who had before paid the highest compliments to Maupertuis, and from whom he had received no injury to justify his wanton attacks; Frederick, however, ordered the satire to be burnt by the executioner; upon which Voltaire quitted Berlin. His works are,—"The Figure of the Earth determined," "The Measurement of a Degree of Meridian," "Discourse on the Figure of the Stars," "Elements of Geography," "Nautical Astronomy," "Elements of Astronomy," "Reflections on the Origin of Languages," &c. n. at St. Malo, 1693; p. 1759.

MAUREPAS, Jean Frédéric Phelippeaux, Count de, mor'-pa, a French statesman, who, at an early age, was made secretary of state. In 1725 he was made superintendent of the marine, and, in 1738, minister of state. By the intrigues of Madame de Pompadour, he was exiled to Bourges in 1749. He was not recalled till 1774, when Louis XVI. intrusted the public affairs to his management. He entirely remodelled the marine department, and was a liberal encourager of the sciences. His memoirs, by himself, are curious, but carelessly written; they were printed at Paris in 1792. n. 1701; p. 1781.

MAURICE OF NASSAU, Prince of Orange, mor'-ice, was the son of William the Silent; after whose death, in 1584, he governed the Low Countries, being then only eighteen years old. He evinced, however, great courage and talents; and being named captain-general of the United Provinces, established that liberty which his father had begun. He made himself master of Breda in 1600, and this was followed by the capture of Zutphen, Deventer, Hulst, Nimeguen, and Gertruydenburg. He defeated the archduke Albert in 1597, and, in the same year, compelled the Spaniards to abandon the Low Countries. In 1600 he was forced to raise the siege of Dunkirk, but he soon afterwards obtained a great victory over Albert near Nieuport. This was followed by numerous conquests. In 1619, aiming at the sovereignty of Holland, he was opposed by the virtuous Barneveldt, who was sent to the scaffold for resisting the ambition of Maurice. was completed in a third volume, in 1799. In 1802, he produced the first volume of the "Modern History of Hindostan;" and in 1804 the second volume. Besides the works above mentioned, Mr. Maurice wrote "Poems," "Sermons," his own "Memoirs," &c. n. at Hertford about 1754; p. 1811.

MAURICE, Rev. Frederic Denison, a modern English divine, regarded as the chief of the "Broad Church" party, was son of a Unitarian clergyman, and was sent to the university of Cambridge, where, although he did not take a degree, he passed his examinations with considerable distinction. After leaving Cambridge, he went to London, and was employed to write for the "Athenaeum" upon its being started by Mr. Silk Buckingham. He likewise produced, at the same period, a novel, entitled "Eustace Conway." His religious views next undergoing considerable modification, he went to Oxford, took his degree there, and became a clergyman of the Church of England. His orthodoxy on many doctrinal points has been brought into question, but by every section of the clergy his moral and intellectual worth has been freely admitted. He wrote largely on theological matters, and contributed treatises on Moral and Metaphysical Philosophy to the "Encyclopaedia Britannica." He was one of the promoters of the Christian Socialist movement, which had for its object the abolition of the system of competitive labour, and the association of the working classes into small communities, which should undertake work in common, and divide the proceeds. He is the founder and principal of the Working Men's College, an institution at which instruction is given at nominal charges, to those who are desirous of self-improvement. n. 1805.

MAURUS, Terentianus, mau'-rus, a Latin poet and grammarian, who flourished under Trajan, and is alluded to with respect by St. Augustine. The only work by him which has survived, is a dissertation on the Art of Poetry.

MAURE, Jean Siffrein, Cardinal, mau'-re, a distinguished French orator, who, after pursuing his theological studies at Avignon, went to Paris in his 18th year, to gain a livelihood by the exercise of his talents. His first works attracted considerable attention; but, being resolved to devote himself to pulpit eloquence, he took orders, and having produced, in 1774, an eulogy on Fénelon, was nominated a vicar-general. He was elected a member of the Academy in 1785, and was sent four years subsequently to the States-general as a deputy of the clergy. He took a prominent part in the debates upon every great question, whether of finance, ecclesiastical affairs, or general administration.

Maxentius

A partisan of the aristocracy, his eloquence was constantly brought to bear against Mirabeau, whose most formidable antagonist he became. Upon the closing of the National Assembly, he left France, and went to Italy, when Pope Pius VI. nominated him cardinal, and bishop of Montefinseone. In 1804 he was permitted to return to France, and from that period he became the devoted servant of Napoleon. The latter made him archbishop of Paris in 1810, a dignity he retained until the fall of his master, in defiance of the pope's commands to the contrary. The events of the year 1814 compelled him to again seek a refuge in Italy; where, upon the pope's for his former disobedience, imprisoned him for some months. Cardinal Maury was an acute logician and fluent orator, but was far from possessing the energy and eloquence of Mirabeau. As a divine, his habits were not a model for imitation. An edition of his works was published at Paris in 1827, under the title of "Select Works of Cardinal Maury." n. in France, 1716; p. at Rome, 1817.

MAURY, Matthew, a distinguished American hydrographer and astronomer, who, at the age of nineteen, entered the United States navy as midshipman, and made a voyage round the world, which lasted four years. After his return, he passed his examination, and was appointed, with the grade of lieutenant, to the Eden. Subsequently, he was charged with the astronomical department of an expedition dispatched to the South Sea. He was next placed at the head of the hydrographical department of the United States Naval Board. In this last position he constructed his "Wind and Current Charts," a work deduced from a great number of nautical journals and logs, and of the highest utility to seamen. Of a similarly excellent character is his work entitled "The Physical Geography of the Sea," which has been translated into all the European languages. During the Civil War of 1861-61, he held a commission as captain in the naval service of the Confederate States. n. in Virginia, 1866.

MAVOR, Rev. William, LL.D., mai'-vor, a native of Aberdeenshire, who went to England early in life, and after acting as assistant in a school at Burford, established himself as the master of an academy at Woodstock, where he gained the favour and patronage of the Duke of Marlborough, entered into holy orders, and was presented to the vicarage of Hurley, Berkshire. It is, however, as an author and compiler of useful books that Dr. Mavor will be chiefly remembered. Among his literary labours are a "Universal History," in 25 small volumes, a collection of "Voyages and Travels," also in 25 vols.; "The British Tourist," 6 vols.; "The Modern Traveller," 4 vols.; "Histories of Greece, Rome, and England; Spelling and Class Books; Miscellanies in Prose and Verse; and many others." n. 1758; p. 1837.

MAWE, Joseph, maw, an eminent mineralogist and conchologist, who travelled in various parts of South America, and published numerous works on the subject of his researches. Among them are, "Travels in the Interior of Brazil," a "Treatise on Diamonds and Precious Stones," "Familiar Lessons on Mineralogy and Geology," "The Linnean System of Conchology," and "The Mineralogy of Derbyshire." n. about 1755; p. 1820.

Maximianus Hercules, and declared himself emperor in 306. He was opposed by Galerius Maximianus, who was defeated, and slew himself. Maxentius then marched into Africa, where he rendered himself odious by his cruelties. Constantine afterwards defeated him in Italy, and he was drowned in crossing the Tiber, 312.

MAXIMIANUS, Marcus Aurelius Valerius, măx-im-i-ai'-nus, a Roman emperor, who, from being a common soldier, was associated in the government by Diocletian, in 286. He distinguished himself by his military skill and bravery against the barbarians, and defeated Aurelius Julius, who had assumed the imperial title in Africa. When Diocletian abdicated the crown, in 305, he compelled Maximianus, much against his will, to do the same; but, about a year afterwards, he resumed the dignity, and opposed his son, Maxentius. The troops, however, mutinied against Maximianus, who fled into Gaul, where he was put to death by order of Constantine, 310.

MAXIMIANUS, Galerius Valerius, emperor of Rome, was originally a shepherd in Dacia, afterwards a soldier, and raised to the imperial dignity by Diocletian, who also gave him his daughter in marriage. He conquered the Goths and Dalmatians, but was defeated by the Persians, over whom he afterwards gained a complete victory. In 305 he induced Diocletian to abdicate the throne; but his cruelty soon rendered him odious to the Romans, who raised Maxentius to the throne. He was a bitter persecutor to the Christians, whose god he implored for relief in his last illness, after vainly seeking aid from the heathen deities. d. 311.

MAXIMILIAN I., max-i-mil'-yan, emperor of Germany, was son of Frederick III., and was created king of the Romans in 1486. Upon the death of his father, in 1493, he became emperor. He engaged in several wars with France, in most of which he was successful. Forming the design of making himself pope, he, to further his purpose, assumed the ancient title of the Roman emperors, Pontifex Maximus, and endeavoured to prevail upon Julius II. to admit him as his coadjutor. He united with England against France, and served under Henry VIII. in 1513. He wrote some poems, and the Memoirs of his own life. b. 1459; d. 1519.

MAXIMILIAN II., emperor of Germany, the son of the emperor Ferdinand I., was elected king of the Romans in 1552. He was chosen king of Hungary and Bohemia, and succeeded his father in 1564. He was a tolerant ruler and a lover of peace, and greatly encouraged the arts and sciences. b. 1527; d. at Ratisbon, 1576.

MAXIMILIAN, duke of Bavaria, in the 17th century, was named, on account of his courage and success, the Defender of Germany, and, for his singular prudence, he acquired the name of Solomon. He zealously opposed the Protestants, and was considered as one of the principal supporters of the Catholic religion. In 1620 he gained the battle of Prague, against Frederick, prince palatine, who had been elected king of Bohemia. For these services Maximilian was named an elector of the empire. b. 1581; d. 1651.

MAXIMILIAN EMANUEL, e-măn'-u-el, elector of Bavaria, rendered great service to the emperor Leopold. He signalized himself at the siege of Neuhausel, in 1685; at that of Buda, in 1686; and, the year following, in the battle of Mohatz. He commanded, about this time, the army of Hungary, and took Belgrade, sword in hand, in 1689. He was afterwards governor of the Low Countries; but, taking part with France in the war of the Spanish succession, was put under the ban of the empire, and, in 1706, deprived of his states, regaining them at the general peace. b. 1662; d. at Munich, 1726.

MAXIMILIAN JOSEPH I., jo'-sef, king of Bavaria, succeeded his uncle, Charles Theodore, in 1799. Attaching himself to the fortunes of Napoleon, he gave his daughter in marriage to Eugene Beauharnais, in 1805. In the same year his duchy was erected into a kingdom. In 1813, however, he formed a member of the league against the emperor, and, by that proceeding, retained his throne after the fall of Napoleon. His reign was marked by a great number of reforms in the administration of his kingdom. b. 1756; d. 1825. This prince bore the title of Maximilian Joseph II., as elector of Bavaria, from 1799 to 1805.

MAXIMILIAN JOSEPH II., king of Bavaria, succeeded Louis Charles, his father, in 1848. b. 1811; d. 1864.

MAXIMILIAN, Emperor of Mexico and brother of Francis Joseph, the present emperor of Austria, ascended the imperial throne of Mexico in 1861, being summoned thither by the nobles of that country, and having the promise of material support from Napoleon III. The French troops, however, that had been sent to Mexico prior to the coming of Maximilian, were withdrawn in 1868, and the emperor, after a vain effort to assert his authority, was betrayed by treachery, captured, and shot at Queretaro by order of Juarez, June 19, 1867. b. at Schoenbrunn, 1832.

MAXIMINUS, Caius Julius Verus, max-i-mi-nus, emperor of Rome, was the son of a Thracian peasant, and having displayed great courage in the Roman armies, rose to command. On the death of Alexander Severus, he caused himself to be proclaimed emperor, 235. His strength was such that he is said to have stopped a chariot in full speed with one of his fingers. He was killed in a revolt of his soldiers, 238 a.d.

MAXIMUS, Magnus, măx'-i-mus, a Spaniard, was general of the Roman army in Britain, when he proclaimed himself emperor, 383. Having made himself master of Gaul, Britain, and Spain, he fixed the seat of his empire at Trèves. He next marched into Italy, where he committed dreadful cruelties; but was at last besieged in Aquileia, by the emperor Theodosius. His soldiers delivered him up to Theodosius, who ordered him to be beheaded, in 388, a.d.

MAXIMUS OF TYRE, a Platonic philosopher, who visited Rome in 146, but died in his own country, in the reign of Commodus.

MAXIMUS THE CYNIC, and tutor of Julian the Apostate, was a native of Ephesus. He professed magic, and initiated Julian into the Eleusinian mysteries, and assured him of success in his Persian expedition; he was put to death by the emperor Valens, in 366.

MAXWELL, Lord Robert, măx'-wel, one of the lords of the regency that governed Scotland in 1536, while James V. was absent in France upon a matrimonial expedition. At a subsequent period, taking offence at the appointment of Oliver Sinclair to the command of the army, he, with many of the Scottish nobility, surrendered to the English at Solway Moss. After the death of James V. he was ransomed, and returned to his native country, where, in 1543

he presented to the Lords of Articles a bill for the authorization of the Scriptures to be read in the vulgar tongue; an act which formed one of the most important of those which preceded the Reformation. The measure became law, despite the energetic opposition of Cardinal Beaton and the hierarchy. Lord Maxwell was soon afterwards apprehended, at Beaton's command, but escaped. b. 1546.

MAY, Thomas, mai, an English dramatic poet and historian, was educated at Cambridge, after which he entered at Gray's Inn, where he wrote some plays, and translated several authors, particularly Lucan's "Pharsalia." Charles I. employed him in writing two historical poems; one on the life of Henry II., and the other on the reign of Edward III.; but, in the civil war, May joined the Parliament, and was appointed their secretary and historiographer. He published the History of the Parliament which began in 1640, and a "Breviary of the History of the Parliament of England." He is said to have written five plays, two of which are printed in Dodsley's collection. b. 1695; d. 1650.

MAYENNE, Charles of Lorraine, Duke of, mai-yen, was the second son of Francis of Lorraine, duke of Guise. He displayed great courage at the sieges of Poitiers and Rochelle, and at the battle of Moncontour; he also defeated the Protestants in Guineau, Dauphiny, and Saintonge. When his brothers were killed, at the meeting of the States at Blois, he declared himself head of the League, and assumed the title of lieutenant-general of France. He proclaimed the cardinal of Bourbon king, by the name of Charles X.; but was defeated by Henry IV. at the battle of Arques, and again at Ivry. In 1606 he was reconciled to the king, who made him governor of the Isle of France. b. 1554; d. 1611.

MAYER, John Frederick, mai-er, a Lutheran divine, who became superintendent of the churches of Pomerania, and professor at Stettin. His greatest work is the "Bibliotheca Biblica," printed in 1713. Besides this, he wrote "A Treatise on the Method of Studying the Holy Scripture," "Dissertations on Particular Parts of the Bible." b. at Leipzig, 1650; d. 1712.

MAYER, Tobias, a celebrated German astronomer, who was self-taught, and, by his own application, acquired a knowledge of the Latin language. In 1750 the university of Göttingen appointed him mathematical professor. Mayer made several discoveries in geometry and astronomy, and published some excellent works, the chief of which are his "Table of Refractions," "Theory of the Moon," and "Astronomical Tables and Precepts," for which last the English Board of Longitude gave his widow £3000. b. at Württemberg, 1733; d. 1782.

MAYERNE-TURQUET, Theodore de, Baron d'Aubonne, mai-yern, an eminent physician and chemist, was physician to Henry IV. of France; but, on the death of that monarch, went to England, and was appointed physician to James I., who conferred on him the honour of knighthood. He continued in favour with Charles I., to whom he adhered in the civil war. b. 1675; d. 1655.

MAYHEW, Henry, mai-hu, a modern English littérateur, whose father, a solicitor in good practice, sent him to Westminster school, whence he twice ran away, and subsequently made a voyage to Calcutta on board a ship of war. Returning to England, he served three years in his father's office as articled clerk. He next spent some time in Wales, and, on his return to London, commenced his literary career. With his old schoolfellow, Mr. Gilbert A'Beckett, he took the Queen's Theatre, in London, and there produced his first farce, called "The Wandering Minstrel." About the same time he started the comic publication, "Figaro in London;" he was also the chief originator of "Punch," which was commenced in 1841, and of which he was for a long time the editor. Between the years 1846-1851, he published, in conjunction with his brothers Horace and Augustus, a series of humorous tales, which became very popular. Some of these were entitled "The Greatest Plume of Life; or, the Adventures of a Lady in Search of a Servant," "Whom to Marry, and How to get Married," "The Image of his Father," and "The Adventures of Mr. and Mrs. Sandboys and Family at the Great Exhibition of 1851." Mr. Mayhew's most important work was that produced in 1851, entitled "London Labour and the London Poor; a Cyclopaedia of the Condition and Earnings of those that will work, those that cannot work, and those that will not work." Of a similar character was "The Great World of London," commenced by Mr. Mayhew in 1856; but the former only of these works was completed. He likewise wrote a series of excellent books for boys; one, founded on the life of Sir Humphrey Davy, called "The Wonders of Science;" another, entitled "The Peasant-boy Philosopher," being based upon the life of James Ferguson; and a third on the "Boyhood of Luther." b. 1812.

MAYHEW, Horace and Augustus, brothers of the preceding, besides assisting in the composition of several of the above-mentioned works, were the authors of a number of tales and sketches of a broadly humorous character, which enjoyed a considerable share of popularity. The novel, entitled "Paved with Gold," was commenced by Henry and Augustus in co-partnership, but was soon afterwards continued and conducted to a most effective termination by Augustus alone, who has also written "The Prettiest Girl in Bloomslury," and a great variety of lively and interesting tales and sketches, published in various periodicals.—Horace Mayhew was for many years a principal contributor to the pages of "Punch."

MAYNARD, Sir John, mai-nard, an English statesman and lawyer, who, after having studied at Exeter College, Oxford, entered at the Middle Temple, was in due course called to the bar, and distinguished himself as one of the prosecutors of Strafford and Laud; but afterwards opposed the violent proceedings of the army, and the usurpation of Cromwell, for which he was twice sent to the Tower. After the Restoration he was knighted, but refused the honour of being a judge. At the Revolution he displayed great talents in the conference between the Lords and Commons, on the question of the abdication of the throne by James II., and warmly advocated that measure. When William III., in allusion to Sergeant Maynard's great age, remarked that he must have outlived all the lawyers of his time, Sir John happily replied, "Yes; and if your highness had not come over to our assistance, I should have outlived the law too." He was appointed one of the commissioners of the great seal in 1689. b. about 1603; d. 1680.

MAYNE, Jasper, mai-n, an English divine and poet, who was educated at Westminster school, whence he removed to Christ Church, Oxford, of which he became student. In 1648 he was created D.D., and two years afterwards was deprived of his studentship for his loyalty. At the Restoration he was promoted to a canonry of Christ Church. Mayne was a man of considerable wit and humour, which he often carried to some excess, particularly in his will, wherein he left his servant man, who was fond of tippling, an old trunk, in which, says he, there is something to make him drink. The man eagerly sought for his legacy, and, on opening the trunk, found a red herring. Dr. Mayne wrote some poems, now obsolete, sermons, and two plays, called the "City Match," and "The Amorous Warre," the latter of which was a satire upon the Puritans. b. 1604; d. 1673.

MAZARIN, Julius, maz'-a-rā, a Roman cardinal and minister of State to Louis XIV. of France, who, being appointed nuncio-extraordinary to France, acquired the friendship of Richelieu and the confidence of Louis XIII. In 1641, Pope Urban VIII. made him cardinal, and, on the death of Richelieu, Louis appointed him minister of state. He was also nominated one of the executors of the king's will, and had the principal management of affairs during the minority of Louis XIV.; but at length the murmurs of the people rose so high against him, that he found it expedient to quit the kingdom, and a price was set on his head. He afterwards recovered his power, and continued to render the state the most important services, the principal of which was the restoration of peace between France and Spain in 1659. His application to business produced a disease which caused his death. b. 1602; d. 1681. His letters have been published in 2 vols.—(one of his nieces, Hortense Mancini, duchess of Mazarin, was celebrated for her wit and beauty. She married, in 1661, the duke de la Meillerie, from whom she separated, and went to England, where she was surrounded by a crowd of admirers, but particularly patronized St. Evremont. d. in London, 1699.

MAZEPPA, John, ma-zep'-pa, hetman or commander-in-chief of the Cossacks of the Ukraine, was the son of a Polish gentleman, and became a page at the court of John Kasimir, king of Poland. After his return to his native province of Podolia, he engaged in an intrigue with the wife of a neighbouring lord, who surprised him and caused him to be bound naked upon the back of a wild horse. The frightened animal ran with his burden until it reached the country of the Cossacks of the Ukraine, where Mazeppa was released and restored to health. He subsequently adopted their course of life, and rose by degrees to the rank of their hetman. In that capacity he displayed great energy and talent, and succeeded in gaining the esteem of the Czar Peter, who appointed him prince of the Ukraine. Being desirous, however, of rendering himself independent, Mazeppa fought against the Czar, and enlisted his forces under the banner of Charles XII. at the battle of Pultowa. After the defeat of the Swedish king, he took refuge first in Wallachia, and afterwards at Bender. His extraordinary ride forms the subject of one of Lord Byron's poems. b. about the middle of the 17th century; d. in Turkey, 1709.

MAZZA, Angelo, mat'-sa, an eminent Italian poet, a native of Parma, in the university of literature. He translated the odes of Pindar, and Akenside's "Pleasures of Imagination;" and, having attained a high degree of literary reputation, was admitted into the Arcadian Academy at Rome. b. 1740; d. 1817.

MAZZHINGH, Joseph, Count, mat'-sen-je, a distinguished composer, the descendant of an eminent Tuscan family, was born in England, of an English mother. He was very early noted for his musical ability, and so diligently did he pursue his studies, that he was considered qualified for the post of director of the opera house when but little more than 18 years of age. The theatre having been destroyed by fire in 1789, among the valuable property lost was the whole of the music of Paisiello's opera, "La Locanda," and Mazzhingi re-wrote the orchestral parts from memory. "The Blind Girl," the "Turnpike Gate," "Paul and Virginia," and a long list of other once popular pieces, were from his fertile pen, and Sir Walter Scott warmly thanked him for the manner in which he set to music some of that author's poetry. b. 1764; d. 1844.

MAZZINI, Giuseppe, mat'-sel'-ne, a modern Italian politician, who was educated for the law; but being inspired with an enthusiastic love of liberty, abandoned his profession soon after he had commenced its practice. Allying himself with a small circle of ardent Genoese gentlemen, he became the soul of a movement which had for its object the regeneration of Italy. In furtherance of their ideas, these young Genoese established a literary journal, which was soon suppressed, but was again commenced at Leghorn. In 1830 Mazzini became an active member of the secret society called the Carbonari, but being denounced to the police, was arrested. After a detention of six months, he was set at liberty, on the understanding that he should quit Italy. He took refuge at Marseilles, and founded there a journal and a society, both of which were significantly named "Young Italy." The main idea of both was that "the freedom of Italy, both from domestic and foreign tyranny, could only be attained by a union of all the separate states into one nation—Romans, Piedmontese, Tuscans, Neapolitans, Lombards, Venetians, &c.—all merging their separate interests in the one common name of Italians, and under this name forming a single powerful European nation." The precise form of government was to be decided by circumstances; Mazzini himself preferred the republican. After months of secret plotting, a conspiracy was organized, which from Genoa as a centre, spread through all Italy, from the Alps to the extremity of Sicily, and even the officers and soldiers of the Piedmontese and Neapolitan armies were concerned in it. This formidable organization was discovered, however, and a great number of the chief agents therein either lost their lives or sought safety in flight. This took place in 1833, and from that year until 1848, Mazzini was mainly employed in a propaganda of his ideas throughout the Italian peninsula. He resided in France, in Switzerland, and was expelled from both countries in turn; upon which he went to London, always keeping up a close correspondence with his party in Italy. In 1844, Sir James Graham, then home secretary, authorized the opening of several letters in the post-office. It was thereby ascertained that the brothers Bandiera were plotting an insurrection in the Venetian states. This was communicated to the Austrian government, and the lives of the Baudieras were lost in consequence. After the French revolution of 1848, and the insurrection at Milan, Mazzini went to Italy with the view of giving a turn to the great Italian movement in conformity with the ideas he had so long advocated. After the defeat of Charles Albert, and the consequent re-establishment of the Austrian rule in Italy, Mazzini was accused of nullifying the king's efforts by causing the republican party to keep aloof from him. He next travelled about in Garibaldi's wake, and, in 1849, went to Rome. The pope had fled before his arrival, and an assembly, elected by universal suffrage, had passed decrees for the total abolition of the temporal sovereignty of the pope, and for the creation of the Roman states into a republic. Mazzini's advent at this crisis was hailed with acclamations by the Romans. With Saffi and Armellini, he was appointed triumvir, and charged to defend the republic against its enemies. The French, under General Oudinot, landed soon afterwards at Civita Vecchia. It was generally believed that the French would be allowed to enter Rome without impediment; but Mazzini and his great ally, Garibaldi, prepared for a desperate resistance. Garibaldi had only 14,000 regular troops under his command; he nevertheless maintained the city against the invaders during two months, with an obstinate bravery that excited the astonishment and admiration of Europe. On the entrance of the French, Mazzini returned to England and resumed his pen. His ideas were promulgated as zealously as before; and the expulsion of the Austrians from Lombardy, and its annexation to Piedmont in 1859; the subsequent adhesion of Tuscany, Modena, Parma, Naples, Sicily, and other portions of the country to the kingdom of Italy, have gone far to realize the idea originally broached by Mazzini; and although these events have been brought about directly by somewhat different agencies from those which he contemplated, it is certain that the influence of his writings on the minds and actions of the Italians has of late years been very potent indeed. n. at Genoa, 1868.

MAZZUOLI, Francesco, mar-see-o-le, commonly called Parmigiano, a famous Italian painter, who has also been designated as the inventor of the art of etching. He had an admirable genius for painting; his invention was ready, and he had a peculiar talent in giving grace and sweetness to his figures. n. at Parma, 1504; d. 1540.

MEAD, Richard, mede, a celebrated English physician, who studied under Gravins, at Utrecht, after which he removed to Leyden, and contracted a close intimacy with Boerhaave. On completing his studies in that celebrated school of physics, he went to Italy, and took his doctor's degree at Padua. In 1696, he returned to his native country, and commenced the practice of physic at Stepney, where he resided seven years. In 1702 he published his treatise on Poisons, which procured him considerable reputation. In 1704 he was admitted a member of the Royal Society, of which, in 1707, he became vice-president, and, in 1727, he was appointed physician to George II. He was also author of "A Discourse concerning the Plague," a treatise "On the Scary," and "Medicina Sacra." His works were very popular at the time when they were written, and have been translated in Italy, France, and Germany. n. in London, 1673; d. 1764.

MEADE, George Gordon, a n. in the United States army, who graduated at the military academy of West Point in 1835, and received his commission as second-lieutenant of artillery. He resigned his commission the following year, but entered the army again in 1842, and served with great distinction in the subsequent war with Mexico. He was raised to the rank of brigadier-general of volunteers in 1862, during the American Civil War, and took part in the battles of Antietam and Fredericksburg in the same year, in the latter of which, the troops of the Northern States, commanded by General Burnside, were routed with much loss. In 1863 he was appointed commander-in-chief of the army of the Potomac, and soon after fought the battle of Gettysburg. In the following year, General Grant, who had been nominated commander-in-chief of the United States armies, took command of the army of the Potomac, and Meade being second in command, rendering able assistance in the operations that brought the war to a close. n. at Cadiz, 1816.

n. Pierre François André, mek'-ä, an eminent French astronomer, whose great merits were first discovered by Lalande. In 1782 he gained the prize of the Academy for his memoir on the comet of 1681, which was expected to return in 1796. He became editor of the "Connaissance des Temps," which work he improved. In 1792 he was employed in the great work of measuring the arc of meridian between Dunkirk and Barcelona. He returned from this task in 1794; but wishing to extend it as far as the Balearic Isles, he set out for them in 1803; but death prevented the accomplishment of his object. n. in France, 1774; d. 1805.

MECHITAR, or MEKHITAR, mek'-hi-tar, the founder of the order of Mechitarists, and reviver of Armenian literature, in 1691 entered an Armenian convent at Sebaste, and subsequently became secretary to Archbishop Michael. Meeting with a work by an Italian priest on the reconciliation of the Armenian church with that of Rome, he secretly became a proselyte to the latter church. In 1700 he sought to reconcile the two parties of the Armenian priesthood at Constantinople; but, meeting with little success, he openly preached submission to the pope. The Armenians were so enraged at this, that, to save his life, Mechitar was compelled to fly from the city. He went first to Smyrna, and afterwards to the Morea, then under the dominion of Venice. On the conquest of the Morea by the Turks, he went to Venice, where he was permitted to found a convent, wherein he set up a printing-press, which, in his hands and in those of his followers, produced hundreds of volumes in the form of Armenian translations of the best works in European literature. Mechitar published an Armenian Bible in 1783, and an Armenian Grammar and Dictionary. n. at Sebaste, Cappadocia, 1679; d. 1749.

MEAD, Joseph, meed, a learned English divine, who, in 1602, entered at Christ's College, Cambridge, where he studied with intense application, was chosen fellow, and proceeded to his degree of bachelor in divinity. He refused several preferments, particularly the provostship of Trinity College, Dublin, which was repeatedly offered him by Archbishop Usher. His works were collected into one volume folio, and published in 1672. The principal is his "Commentary on the Apocalypse," in explaining which MEDICI, Cosmo de', med'-e-che, called the Elder, and the Father of his Country, founder of an illustrious family at Florence, was a merchant, who acquired great wealth, which he appropriated to the noble purposes of advancing learning and supporting learned men. He collected a noble library, which he enriched with inestimable manuscripts. The envy excited by his riches, raised him many enemies by whose intrigues he was obliged to quit his native country. He then retired to Venice, where he was received as a prince. His fellow-citizens afterwards recalled him, and he bore a principal share in the government of the republic of Florence during thirty-four years. On his tomb was engraved this inscription: "The Father of his People, and the Deliverer of his Country." p. 1389; p. 1464.

MEDICI, Lorenzo l', surnamed the Magnificent, was the son of Peter, grandson of Cosmo, and brother of Ju an de' Medici. These two brothers, who enjoyed an almost absolute power in Florence, were viewed with a jealous eye by Ferdinand I., king of Naples, and Pope Sixtus IV. At their invitation the potent family of Pazzi formed a conspiracy against the Medici in 1478, and Julian was assassinated as he was attending mass. Lorenzo was also wounded, but escaped with his life, and was conducted to his palace by the people, with loud acclamations of joy. Having inherited the great qualities of his grandfather Cosmo, he was accounted the Mæcenas of his age. It was a singular but noble spectacle to observe the citizen engaged in commerce at one moment, and managing public affairs at another; now entertaining merchants, and next receiving ambassadors; giving public shows to the people, and erecting asylums for the sick and unfortunate; ornamenting his country with magnificent buildings and sending learned men to the East in search of valuable Greek manuscripts: such a man was Lorenzo, whom the Florentines, grateful for all these benefits, declared chief of the republic. He drew to his court a number of learned men, and sent John Lascaris into Greece to purchase literary treasures to enrich his library. Lorenzo himself cultivated letters, particularly poetry, and his compositions have been several times printed. He was so universally esteemed that the princes of Europe were glad to choose him as arbitrator in their differences. This illustrious man had three sons,—Peter, who succeeded him, Julius, and John, who became pope by the name of Leo X. Lorenzo forms the subject of a splendid biography by William Roscoe. p. 1418; p. 1492.

MEDINA, Sir John, mai'-de-na, a portrait painter, was born at Brussels, went to England in 1688, and after painting a great number of pictures, proceeded to Scotland, where he was knighted. p. 1658; p. 1711.

MEHAMED, or MOHAMMED, mai'-hai-maid, the name of seven kings of Granada, who reigned between the years 1238 and 1454.

MEHEMET ALI, me'-he-met, Pacha of Egypt, commenced his remarkable career as the keeper of a small shop at Cavalla, in Roumelia; but, abandoning the pursuits of a trader for the profession of arms, he took an active part in suppressing a rebellion of the pirates of Candia. In 1799 he headed a corps of Albanians, and went to Egypt, where he fought on the side of the British, and assisted in the expulsion of the French from that country. He soon acquired great influence in Egypt, and formed an alliance with the Mamelukes, against Khosrew Pacha, the viceroy of the sultan. The Mamelukes having regained all their former influence, chose Mehemet as their viceroy. The sultan created him pacha of Cairo in 1806, and added to this dignity the pachalik of Alexandria in the following year, ostensibly for the services rendered to the Ottoman empire, but gained over, in reality, by Mehemet's gold. His next step was to turn against the redoubtable soldiery that had helped him to gain so much power, and, after a vain effort to reduce the turbulent Mamelukes to subjection, he ordered them to be exterminated. In 1811, 470 of the Mamelukes were invited within the citadel of Cairo, where they were ruthlessly put to the sword, 1200 more being massacred throughout the country. By this step Mehemet Ali became the undisputed master of Upper Egypt. The Wahabees, a fanatical sect, were his next victims, and these he destroyed after a war which lasted six years. He subsequently dispatched an army into Nubia, under the command of one of his sons, Ismail Pacha, who succeeded in conquering the provinces of Dongola, Sennaar, Kordofan, &c. Upon the Greeks raising the standard of independence, he assisted the sultan against them, by dispatching to the shores of the Morea a fleet of 163 vessels, under the command of his son, Ibrahim Pacha. This fleet wrought havoc upon the country during three years, but was destroyed at Navarino by the combined squadrons of England, France, and Russia, in 1827. As a reward for his co-operation against the Greeks, the sultan ceded to Mehemet Ali the island of Candia, in 1830; but this was not sufficient to gratify his ambitious desires, for he further demanded of the sultan the cession of Syria. This being refused, he invaded the country with a powerful army, and rapidly conquered the province. After a great victory at Konieh, in 1832, he was in triumphant march upon Constantinople, but was brought to a halt by European intervention: he succeeded, nevertheless, in gaining, by the treaty of Kutayah, the possession of Syria and the province of Adana. In 1839 the sultan, Mahmoud II., resolved to regain Syria; but suffering defeat at the hands of Mehemet Ali, he sought the assistance of England and other European powers. By this means, Mehemet, after having been defeated near Beyrout, and finding Alexandria blockaded, consented to forego his claims upon Syria, on condition that his family should be constituted hereditary pachas of Egypt. Thenceforth he ruled in peace, but in 1843 resigned the government to his son, Ibrahim Pacha, who dying soon afterwards, the pachalik was vested in Abbas Pacha, Mehemet's grandson. During the last two years of his life he was deprived of reason. Mehemet Ali was unquestionably an extraordinary man and wise ruler: he introduced European organization and tactics into his army, encouraged agriculture, commerce, and industry, and founded military and medical schools in his dominions. His rise was due to his native intelligence and indomitable courage and energy; for it is a remarkable fact that this former Albanian peasant was throughout his earlier career totally destitute of education. He only learnt to read at the age of forty-five. It is, however, to regretted that his rise was assisted by such violent measures as intrigue, treason, and assassination. For the French people he had a particular admiration, and sent to Paris two of his sons and a number of Egyptian youths to receive their education. n. at Cavalla, Roumelia, 1709; n. at Cairo, 1849.

MEHUL, Stephen Henry, me(r)l, a celebrated composer, who, in 1779, went to Paris, and there became the friend of Gluck. In 1790 he produced, at the Opéra Comique, "Euphrosyne" and "Coradin," both of which were eminently successful. He subsequently composed, among other operas, "Stratonice," "Joseph," "Cora and Alonzo," and "Melidor." A large number of hymns, sonatas, and the celebrated republican airs, "Chant de la Victoire," "Du Départ," and "Du Retour," issued from his pen. n. 1763; n. at Paris, 1817.

MEIXNER, Christopher, mi'-ners, a German historian and miscellaneous writer, who studied at Göttingen, where he became professor of philosophy; and subsequently pro-rector. Among his numerous works are, "A History of the Origin and Progress of Philosophy among the Greeks," "On the Origin and Decline of the Sciences among the Greeks and Romans," and others on kindred subjects. n. in Hanover, 1747; n. 1810.

MEISSNER, Augustus Gottlieb, mise'-ner, a popular German writer, who composed a large number of romances, essays, and tales. His style was exceedingly agreeable, lively, and shrewd. The most important of his works were "Alcibiades," "Bianca Capello," and "Spartacus." n. in Upper Silesia, 1753; n. 1807.

MEISSONNIER, Jean Louis Ernest, mi-son'-e-air, a celebrated French painter, of the style termed in France genre. His most celebrated works were,—"The Painter in his Studio," "Le Corps-de-Garde," and "A Barricade—June, 1848." All his works were painted with Flemish care and finish, but were, nevertheless, thoroughly original in their treatment. His pictures, although generally of a small size, brought very large sums, and he stood at the head of a crowd of enthusiastic imitators. He was likewise very successful as a designer of book illustrations. The best of these last were the sketches for "Paul and Virginia," Balzac's novels, and "The French People painted by themselves." n. at Lyons, 1812.

MELA, Pomponius, me'-la, a Latin geographical writer, was a native of Spain. His valuable work, entitled "De Situ Orbis," is divided into three parts, and contains a description of the world as it was known in his time. Flourished in the early half of the 1st century.

MELANCTHON, Philipp, me-lä'ne'-thon, the famous reformer, and friend of Luther. His family name was Schwarzerde, or black earth, which Reuchlin, his friend, altered to the corresponding Greek word, Melancthon. He made rapid progress in his studies at the university of Heidelberg, whence he removed to Tübingen, where he continued six years. In 1518 he obtained the Greek professorship of Wittenberg, where he formed a close friendship with Luther, whose opinions he defended both in his public lectures and in his writings. In 1527 the elector of Saxony appointed him to visit the churches in his territories; but his greatest labour was in drawing up the Augsburg Confession of Faith. His learning and moderation became famous throughout Europe, and the kings of France and England invited him to their kingdoms, with flattering offers, which he declined. During the progress of the Reformation, he exhibited a different temper from Luther, being more cautious and timid; on which account he was often reproved by him in severe terms. The prudence of Melancthon, however, was of great service, and tended considerably to the propagation of the Protestant doctrines, by guarding them from the abuses of intemperate zeal. In 1529 Melancthon assisted in the conferences at Spire, and, in his journey thither, visited his mother, a pious woman, who asked him what she should believe, and how she should pray amid these religious disputes, at the same time repeating her simple creed and form of devotion. "Continue," said her son, "to believe and to pray as you do at present, and do not trouble yourself about controversies." He distinguished himself in the conferences held at Ratiblan in 1541 and 1548. He wrote a "Censure of the Interim," and all the papers presented at those conferences. The works of this learned and amiable man were collected in 1541, and published at Bale. n. at Bretten, or Bittenheim, in the palatinate of the Rhine, 1597; n. at Wittenberg, 1560.

MELAS, mel'-a, a celebrated Austrian general, who, in 1796, commanded against the French in Italy, and uniting with Suwardoff, in 1799, defeated Championnet at Genoa, but was himself beaten by Napoleon at Marengo, in the following year. n. 1807.

MELBOURNE, William Lamb, Viscount, mel'-born, an English statesman, who entered the House of Commons in 1805, under the auspices of the Whigs. Canizares appointed him secretary of state for Ireland, a post he filled with very distinguished success. In 1825 he was called to a peerage, after the death of his father, and while a member of Earl Grey's cabinet greatly contributed to the passing of the Reform Bill. In 1834 he became first lord of the Treasury, and head of the Whig party, a position he retained, with only one short interruption, until the year 1841. Lord Melbourne was but ill qualified to head the ministerial councils of a great nation; but his engaging and conciliatory manners secured the allegiance not only of the Whig, but also of several distinguished members of the Tory party. n. 1770; n. 1844.

MELHO, Philip de, mel'-lo, an eminent divine and Biblical translator, and the first native of Ceylon who was admitted into the Christian ministry. His learning and labours earned him the titles of "Rabbi de Melho," and the "Great Labourer." As an oriental poet, also, he ranks high. After being educated at the only seminary in his native town, and passing an examination in Hebrew and Greek, he was licensed to preach before attaining the age of 21, and officiated with much distinction in Portuguese, Dutch, and Tamil. His principal works are Tamil versions of the New Testament from the Greek, the Dutch liturgy, and the Psalms of David; a work against Popery, entitled "Triumph of the Truth"; a Catechism in Portuguese; and a Version of the Pentateuch from the Hebrew, published in 1790. At his death, he left translations of the books of Joshua, Judges, and Ruth, in MS. He also wrote many original poems of great merit. at Colombo, Ceylon, 1723; n. 1

MELI, Giovanni, mel'-le, a celebrated Sicilian poet, was a physician by profession, and for some time held the professorship of chemistry at the university of Palermo. He was most successful in bucolic verse, and has been placed by his admirers after Theocritus. He likewise produced odes, canzoni, satires, epistles, fables, and some captivating short poems. n. at Palermo, about 1740; p. 1815.

MELISSUS, mel'-is'-us, a philosopher of Samos, who flourished about 431 b.c., and who is distinguished not only as a teacher of the Eleatic doctrines, but, in the history of his country, as a statesman and naval commander.

MELITUS, mel'-i'-tus, a Greek orator and poet, and the principal accuser of Socrates. The Athenians, out of compunction for their unjust treatment of that great man, put Melitus to death, b.c. 400.

MELLON, Harriet, mel'-lon, Duchess of St. Alban's, was the posthumous daughter of a Mr. Matthew Mellon, who held a commission in the East India Company's service, and whose widow married a Mr. Entwistle, a musician. Mrs. Entwistle, who was an accomplished woman, went on the stage; her husband became leader of the band in various provincial theatres; and the services of Harriet were put in requisition at a very tender age, in order to augment a scanty income. After passing her childhood in playing juvenile characters in the provinces, she appeared, under the auspices of Sheridan, at Drury Lane, in January, 1795, as Lydia Languish, in the "ivals;" and although attracting but little notice at first, gradually rose in public estimation, and ultimately attained to a considerable degree of professional celebrity, particularly in characters of a vivacious or boyesdish cast. Thomas Coutts, the wealthy banker, married her in 1814, and died in 1822, appointing his widow universal legatee, and bequeathing to her his share in the banking house and business in the Strand, and all benefit and interests to arise therefrom. She was now immensely rich, and rumour was soon busy in naming the fortunate suitor of the banker's widow; till at length, in June, 1827, the question was settled by her marriage with William, duke of St. Alban's, then in the 27th year of his age. The bulk of her immense property, including the half profits of the banking house, her mansion in Stratton Street, and all her movables, plate, diamonds, &c., she bequeathed to Miss Angela Burdett, youngest daughter of Sir Francis Burdett, and grand-daughter of Mr. Coutts, who in consequence took the name of Coutts. n. about 1775; p. 1837.

MELMOR, William, mel'-morth, an English writer, who was a benchet of Lincoln's Inn, and, in conjunction with Williams, edited Vernon's "Reports." He was the author of the "Great Importance of a Religious Life," a valuable little book, which has gone through many editions. n. 1666; p. 1743.

MELMORN, William, son of the preceding, published some well-executed translations of Pliny's and Cicero's Epistles, and was also the author of the letters which bear the name of Sir Thomas Fitzosborne; some poems in Dodsley's Collection, and Memoirs of his father. n. 1710; p. 1769.

MELVILLE, Sir James, mel'-eil, a Scotch writer, who became page to Mary queen of Scots, whom he attended in her last moments: he afterwards entered the service of the duke of Montmorency. On his return to Scotland, in 1561, he was appointed privy councillor and gentleman of the bedchamber. He was the author of some very curious "Memoirs of Affairs of State." n. about 1535; p. 1607.

MELVILLE, Andrew, a celebrated Scotch reformer, who, four years after the establishment of the Reformation in Scotland, left the university of St. Andrews, where he had acquired considerable proficiency in languages and philosophy, for that of Paris. After studying in France during five years, he went to Geneva, where he was appointed to the chair of Humanity in the Academy. In 1574 he returned to Scotland, on which occasion Beza wrote a letter to the General Assembly, declaring that "Melville was equally distinguished for his piety and his erudition, and that the church of Geneva could not give a stronger proof of affection to her sister church of Scotland than by suffering herself to be bereaved of him, that his native country might be enriched with his gifts." As a writer, teacher, and reformer of the church of his native country, Melville soon displayed uncommon ardour. The overturning of episcopacy and establishment of presbytery were the objects of his constant efforts. In 1580 he was appointed principal of St. Mary's College, in the university of St. Andrews, and there taught the Hebrew, Syriac, and Chaldean languages. His boldness giving offence to the Scottish court, he was cited before the privy council, which sentenced him to be imprisoned, and to be punished in his person and goods. On this he made his escape to London, where he remained for nearly two years. After James I. had ascended the English throne, he invited him to London; but Melville, having written a short epigram in contempt of a rite of the English church, the privy council convicted him of gross scandal, and after a year's confinement in the houses of the dean of St. Paul's and the bishop of Westminster, he was sent to the Tower, where he remained nearly four years. In 1611 he was released, and went to the university of Sedan, whence he never again returned. McCre says of Melville: "Next to the Reformer, I know of no individual from whom Scotland has received such important services, or to whom she continues to owe so deep a debt of national respect and gratitude." n. 1545; p. at Sedan, 1622.

MELVILLE, Henry Dundas, Viscount, the son of Lord Arncliffe, a Scotch judge, and the friend and coadjutor of the younger Pitt, received his education at the university of Edinburgh. In 1773 he became solicitor-general; and soon after was appointed to the offices of lord advocate, and joint keeper of the signet for Scotland. In 1783 he was made privy-councillor and treasurer of the navy; and from that time took a leading part in all the measures of the Pitt administration. He was appointed president of the board of control at its formation; in 1791, became secretary for the home department; and, in 1794, secretary of war, which latter post he held till Mr. Pitt's retirement from office. He was then created a viscount; and when Mr. Pitt again became premier, Dundas was made first lord of the admiralty. In 1805 he was impeached by the Commons on a variety of charges of peculation, &c.; and though he was acquitted of the alleged malversations, and only proved to have been negligent of his duty with respect to his agents, he took no further part in public affairs. His influence was for many years supreme in Scotland, and he did not always wield his power with much consideration for opponents. In fact, his will was law, and the fiat of "the Dundases" was sufficient to repress all comment on public matters in that part of the country. A monument was, however, erected to Lord Melville's memory in Edinburgh. b. 1710; d. 1811.

MELVILLE, Herman, a modern American novelist, who, incited by passion for maritime adventure, in his eighteenth year went on board ship as a cabin sailor. In 1841 he joined a whaling vessel, and went on a cruise. After eighteen months of that monotonous mode of life, he took advantage of the vessel putting into Noukaliva, to desert, in company with another young sailor. He gained the interior of the island, but was detained a prisoner during four months by a savage tribe. A vessel from Sydney having put into the port, he succeeded in getting on board. He afterwards visited Tahiti and the Sandwich Islands, and, in 1843, returned to Boston, after four years of travel and adventure. In 1847 he married, and went to reside upon his farm in Berkshire, U.S. "Type," the first work of this author, had an immense popularity, and in it was recounted in a delightful manner his adventures in the Marquesas Islands. In his next works, "Omoo," "Mardi," and "Redburn," the unknown regions of the Pacific Ocean were described with all his former vigour; but his style became by degrees eccentric and unequal. "The White-Jacket," "Peter," and "Israel Potter" were subsequently produced, and were greeted with almost as much popularity as his first works. Mr. Melville also supplied a number of romances and sketches to the periodical literature of his country. b. at New York, 1819.

MEXING, Hans, mem'-ling, a celebrated painter and missal illuminator of the 15th century, of the circumstances of whose life very little that is authentic is known. He is said to have become an inmate of the hospital of St. John, at Bruges, in 1477, and to have therein painted the exquisite pictures which still adorn the establishment. His most celebrated works are the "History of St. Ursula," "The Marriage of St. Catharine," and "The Descent from the Cross." As a decorator of missals and church books, he was eminently successful; and the specimens of his art which have been preserved are accounted inestimable treasures. b. at the close of the 15th century.

MEXION, mem'-non, a Greek historian, who wrote an account of the rulers of Hyrcania, of which fragments have been preserved by Photius. They have also been translated into French by Gedyon, and inserted in the fourth volume of the "Memoirs of the Academy of Inscriptions." Flourished in the 2nd century.

MEXION, of the Isle of Rhodes, an able general of Darius, king of Persia, whom he advised to desolate his country, in order to impede the progress of Alexander the Great, and then to attack Macedonia; but this counsel was overruled by the other generals. After the battle of the Granicus, Memnon defended Miletus with vigour, took the isles of Chios and Lesbos, carried terror into Greece, and was preparing a stop to the conquests of Alexander, when he was carried off in the midst of his successes. His wife was taken prisoner with the family of Darius, and became the mistress of Alexander. b. at Mitylene, b.c. 383.

Mendoza

ALEXANDER, me-nun'-der, a Greek comic poet, who was called the prince of new comedy, and preferred to Aristophanes. All his plays are lost; but the six comedies of Terence were borrowed from him; by which we may form some judgment of his excellence. b. 341 b.c.; d. 290 b.c.

MENDELSSOHN, Moses, men'-del-some (which signifies Moses the son of Mendel), a learned German Jew. He was brought up for the pursuits of commerce, but devoted himself to literature, in which he attained a distinguished reputation. In 1755 he published his first piece, entitled "Jerusalem;" in which he pretended that the principle of the Jewish religion is deism. His next work was "Phædon; or, a Discourse on the Spirituality and Immortality of the Soul." In this excellent treatise the principle of the immortality of the soul was acutely maintained. On account of this book, the author gained the appellation of the Socrates of the Jews. He also wrote "Philosophical Works," "Letter to Lavater," "Commentary upon Ecclesiastes," and a translation of the first book of the Old Testament. b. 1729; d. 1786.

Hisack, a celebrated German musician, was grandson of the preceding. As early as his 16th year, he distinguished himself as a pianist and musical composer. His first work was the opera entitled "The Wedding of Canacho;" this was quickly followed by the overture to Shakspeare's "Midsummer Night's Dream." In 1820, having just completed his 24th year, he made his first visit to England, where his overture was played, and received with enthusiasm. Thenceforth, he paid an almost annual visit to this country, where he felt he was even more appreciated than in his native land. "St. Paul," his first oratorio, was composed for an English musical society, as was "Elijah," his third and best work of the same kind. His last visit to England took place in 1847, when he conducted his "Elijah" at London, Birmingham, and Manchester. In the same year, his health, which had been declining for some time, became very bad, and he went to reside in Switzerland; but, although he appeared to derive considerable benefit from the mountain air, he was carried off by an affection of the brain, soon after his return to Leipzig. He left behind a large collection of musical manuscripts, portions of which were published. Mendelssohn's works embrace every department of the musician's art; and it is the firm conviction of the most competent critics, that his oratorios "St. Paul" and "Elijah" will live to charm and delight the world as long as the "Messiah" and the "Israel in Egypt" of the immortal Handel. b. at Hamburg, 1809; d. at Leipzig, 1847.

MENDEZ, Moses, men'-des, an English poet, born in London of Jewish parentage, who received a liberal education at Oxford, and graduated as M.A. in 1750. He wrote some very popular musical entertainments, and several poems, which were published in one volume; and was the intimate friend of Thomson. b. 1755.

MENDOZA, Diego Hurtado, men'-dy'-tha, an eminent Spanish statesman and scholar, under Charles V., who distinguished himself as a soldier, diplomatist, geographer, historian, and poet. Charles V. intrusted him with several important missions, and, during six years, he held the military command of Tuscany. He made a noble collection of Greek and Arabic manuscripts, and used all the resources of his wealth and power to advance learning. Under Philip II. he fell into disgrace, and was banished from the Spanish court; but his leisure was occupied by the composition of his "War against the Moors," and in collecting upwards of 400 Arabic manuscripts. At his death he bequeathed his library to the king. b. at Granada, 1503; d. at Madrid, 1575.

MENEKRATES, me-nek'-rai-te-s, a Greek physician, celebrated for his pride and vanity. He crowned himself like the master of the gods, and, in a letter which he wrote to Philip, king 'replied, "Philip I. crates, greeting and better sense." Philip once invited him to his board; but a separate table was set for the arrogant physician, served only with perfumes and frankincense, while before the other guests was placed good and substantial cheer. Menecrates lived 360 b.c.

MENEDIMUS, men-eil'-e-nus, a Socratic philosopher, who was a native of Eretria. He was first a tent-maker, then a soldier, and lastly a disciple of Plato. He was called the Eretrian bull, on account of his grave and stolid look. d. 301 b.c.

MENENIUS AGRIPPA. (See AGRIPPA, Menenius.)

MENGES, Anthony Raphael, mengs, a celebrated German painter, who studied under his father, painter to Augustus III., king of Poland, and subsequently greatly improved himself at Rome. Charles III. of Spain invited him to his kingdom, and became his patron. Menges formed his style after Raffaele, Correggio, and Titian. To his excellence as an artist, he added literary talent, and wrote several works in Italian; as, "The Life of Correggio," "Reflections on Beauty," and a treatise on "Taste in Painting," "On the Principal Pictures at Madrid," &c., which have been translated into English, with his life prefixed. b. at Aussig, Bohemia, 1723; d. at Rome, 1770.

MENNES, Sir John, menns, an English poet and wit of the 17th century, was a native of Sandwich, in Kent, and by profession a naval officer. He was knighted by Charles I., and obtained the post of comptroller of the navy, but was removed from his station during the civil war. At the Restoration, however, he regained his appointment, and attained to the rank of admiral. His poetical productions are comprised in a small volume, entitled "Museum Delicie." d. 1671.

MENNO, Simonis, or Simon, men'-no, chief of a sect which sprang up in Germany at the time of the Reformation, and which was called after his name, was originally a minister in Friesland, but left his parish, and, for a time, joined the Anabaptists. He gathered about him a number of disciples in Germany, Holland, and Flanders, maintained the necessity of rebaptism in adults, and denied that Jesus Christ received a human body from the Virgin. The Mennonites still continue a considerable sect in Holland, and are not to be confounded with the Anabaptists. A considerable amount of curious information relating to Menno and his followers is to be found in Mosheim's "Ecclesiastical History." b. 1505; d. in Holstein, 1561.

MENSCHIKOFF, Alexander, men'-ski-kof, a prince of the Russian empire, was the son of a peasant, and the servant of a pastry-cook, who employed him to cry pies about the streets. His appearance pleasing Peter the Great, he took him into his service. Menschikoff soon insinuated himself into the confidence of his sovereign, who, in 1704, made him governor of Ingria, with the rank of major-general, and at length conferred on him the title of prince. In 1713 he was accused of peculation, and condemned to pay a heavy fine, which the czar remitted, and restored him to favour. Under the Czarina Catharine he had still more power, and his daughter was married to Peter II., who made Menschikoff duke of Cozel, and grand master of the imperial hotel; but, by the intrigues of Dolgorouschki, mistress of the czar, he fell into disgrace, and was banished to his estate, where he lived in such magnificence that Peter was persuaded to send him, for his own safety, to Siberia, where he died in a poor hut, 1729. b. at Moscow, 1674.

MENSCHIKOFF, Alexander Serjevitsh, Prince, a Russian admiral and general, was the grandson of the preceding. He was at first attached to the embassy at Vienna; but, becoming aide-de-camp to Alexander I., in 1812, he shared in the military service of the period, and attained the grade of general. When Nicholas ascended the throne, he dispatched Menschikoff on a mission to Abbas-Mirza, shah of Persia, who, taking advantage of a revolt in the Russian army, suddenly broke off the negotiations, and the ambassador narrowly escaped death. In 1824 he commanded a division of the Russian army which took Anapa, and was afterwards severely wounded at the siege of Varna. In 1831 he was appointed governor of Finland, and in 1834 attained the rank of admiral. In 1833 the Czar Nicholas sent him to Turkey on an embassy relative to the holy places; but his haughtiness and obstinacy were little suited to further the end he had in view. In a short time he presented his ultimatum; his departure soon followed. The war with Russia was the result of this act, and when the allied forces landed in the Crimea, he was in the chief command of the Russian forces. Defeated at the Alma, he hastily fortified Sebastopol, and sank the Russian fleet at the entrance to the port. Shortly after the defeat at Inkermann, and the death of the Czar Nicholas, he fell ill, and was superseded in his command in the Crimea by Prince Gortschakoff. A few months later he was, however, charged with the defence of Cronstadt against the allied English and French fleets. In 1856 he was recalled to occupy a position at the court of the emperor Alexander II. b. 1780.

MENTON, men'-tor, a Greek artist of the age of Pericles. He excelled in polishing cups and engraving flowers upon them.

MENU, me-nu', a Hindoo legislator, and the supposed author of a code of laws and morality. This vast work, which is still extant, is written in verse, and in the Sanscrit language. Sir William Jones translated it into English in 1796. The Hindoos consider Menu as the son of Brahma, and the first created man. There is no authentic date to be assigned for his birth, but the ode which is attributed to him is considered to be older than the Vedas, which latter were composed about the 11th or 12th century b.c.

MERCATOR, Gerard, mer-kai'-tor, a celebrated geographer, who composed a Chronology, a greater and lesser Atlas, and "Geographical Tables;" also "A Treatise on the Creation," &c. He was the first to represent the meridians by equidistant parallel lines, and the parallels of longitude by lines at right angles with the meridian; whence the name Mercator's Projection, now employed in nautical maps. He engraved and coloured his own maps. n. in Flanders, 1512; d. 1594.

MERCAUR, Nicholas, an eminent mathematician, who settled in England, where he became fellow of the Royal Society, and published several valuable works on astronomy. b. 1640; d. about 1690.

MERCIER, Louis Sebastien, mair'-se-ai, a celebrated French author, who wrote works in almost every department of literature. In 1781 he commenced his celebrated "Picture of Paris," wherein he dissected the social system of the French capital with so much vigour and truth, that he judged it prudent to leave Paris and carry on the publication in Switzerland. So completely did this work exhibit the corruption and frivolities of French society, that its publication has been claimed as one of the great precursors of the French revolution. He returned to France after the revolution, and edited the "Patriotique Annale," a republican journal, but moderate in tone. b. at Paris, 1740; d. 1814.

MERIAN, Matthew, mer'-i-an, a German engraver, who set up a book and print business at Frankfort-on-the-Maine. Many of his engravings were excellent. He published the "Topography of the Universe," in 31 volumes. b. at Basel, 1593; d. about 1650.

MERIAN, Matthew, an eminent German painter, chiefly of portraits, was son of the preceding. As a student, he derived instruction from Sandrart, from Vandyck in London, from Le Sueur at Paris, and from Carlo Maratti at Rome. Although he produced some historical pieces, his fame chiefly rests upon his portraits. The emperor Leopold I. and some of the highest German princes and nobles sat to him. Upon the death of his father, he carried on his business, without, however, neglecting his professional efforts. b. at Basel, 1621; d. 1687.

MERIAN, Sibylla Maria, a celebrated naturalist, who excelled in drawing insects, flowers, and fruits, was sister of the painter, and daughter of the engraver, mentioned above. She became the wife of John Andriez Graff, a painter, in 1665; but her own name was so celebrated as an artist, that her husband's was prevented from being adopted. She painted flowers and insects after nature with scrupulous exactness, and, in 1699, undertook a voyage to Surinam in order to make drawings of the insects of that country. Although her fame mainly rests upon her artistic performances, she was an excellent writer. Her principal work was, the "Origin of Caterpillars; their Nourishment and Changes," which was afterwards enlarged by herself and daughters, and was reproduced in France by Marret, under the title of "Histoire Générale des Insectes de l'Europe." She also wrote "Generation and Transformation of the Insects of Surinam." Both of these works were published in Paris under the general title of "Histoire des Insectes de l'Europe et de l'Amérique," in 1771. Sir Hans Sloane purchased many of her drawings for a considerable sum, and they are now contained in the print department of the British Museum. Several collections of her fine drawings are also preserved at St. Petersburg, in Holland, and at Frankfort. b. at Frankfort-on-the-Maine, 1647; d. at Amsterdam, 1717.

MÉRIMÉE, Prosper, mer'-e-mai, a modern French littérateur, who was educated for the profession of the law; but after the revolution of 1830 obtained high employment under the constitutional government. In 1831 he was appointed to an inspectorship of the antiquities of France. The duties of his office caused him to make several archaeological tours throughout France, and the result was the publication of a number of illustrated works of considerable importance. In 1844 he was elected a member of the French Academy. In addition to his archaeological labours, he wrote historical works, romances, and plays. His best-known historical studies were the "Jaquerie" and "Chronicle of the Reign of Charles IX." Of his novels, one became European in its popularity;—this was "Colomba," a wonderful picture of Corsican life and revenge. As a writer for the obtained only a small amount of b. at Paris, 1803.

MERLIN, Ambrose, mer'-lin, a British who lived about the year 180, and was a in his time as a magician and prophet. The oldest tales are told of him by some ancient writers; such as that he was endangered by an incantation, and that he conveyed by enchantment the stupendous stones on Salisbury Plain from Ireland. There also goes under his name some extravagant predictions. Near Carnarvon is a mound called Merlin's Hill, beneath which tradition relates that he was buried.

MEROVINGS, mer-moi'-ngs, king of France, succeeded Clodion in 448, and defeated Attila in 451. He is said to have extended the bounds of his kingdom to Trèves, which city he took and plundered. He began the race of French kings called Merovingian. b. about 411; d. 458.

MERU, mer'-u, a name of the divine and poet, termed by Loewth one of the best of men and most eminent of the ab- of Troy," and poems on sacred subjects, but his principal performance is a version of the Psalms, with annotations. b. 1724; d. 1769.

MEXUR, Robert, mer'-re, a dramatic writer, was the son of a London merchant, and received his education at Harrow and at Christ's College, Cambridge, after which he entered at Lincoln's Inn; but, abandoning legal study, sought a commission in the Guards, which service he also quitted, and went abroad. He became a member of the Della Cruscan Academy at Florence, and affixed that signature to a number of poems, which appeared in the English newspapers, and became the object of the satire of Gifford, in his "Bavi d" and "Mavind." In 1791 Merry married Miss Brunton, an actress, with whom he went to America, where he died. His dramatic compositions are, "L. . . .," a grey; "The Magician no Conjurer," "Fénelon," and "Ambitious Vengeance." b. 1755; d. 1798.

MIR, John Andrew van der, mair'-d, the famous leader of the Brabant patriots in 1789, entered the French service, in which he acquired the title of "The Brave Fleming." He afterwards served in the Austrian army, and rose to the rank of lieutenant-colonel. By a series of successful operations against the imperial troops in the Netherlands, Ghent and Brussels fell into his hands, and the chief command of the Belgian troops was intrusted to him. Through party intrigue, however, he was removed from his command, and thrown into prison, where he remained until the Austrians recovered possession of the country.

Mersenne

MERSENNE, Marin, mair-sen', an eminent French mathematician, who in 1615 was appointed professor of philosophy at Nevers. After resigning this office, as well as that of superior of the convent in which he lived, he travelled in Italy, Germany, and the Netherlands. He subsequently took up his final residence at Paris. His chief work was "Harmonie Universelle," which contains a variety of useful information connected with the science of music. b. 1588; d. at Paris, 1648.

MERTON, Walter de, mer'-ton, a learned and munificent prelate of the 13th century, and founder of the college which bears his name at Oxford, was born at Merton, in Surrey, and educated at the convent of that place. After obtaining several preferments, he became lord chancellor in 1258; was deprived of the seal the same year by the barons, but restored to it in 1261, and in 1274 consecrated bishop of Rochester. d. 1277.

MESMER, Frederick Antony, mes'-mer, a celebrated German physician, who first propagated the doctrines of animal magnetism, long called Mesmerism, after his name. In 1766 he took the degree of M.D. at the university of Vienna, and wrote a treatise on the "Influence of the Planets upon the Human Body." In conjunction with Father Hell, a Jesuit and professor of astronomy at Vienna, Mesmer, in 1772, engaged in a series of investigations relative to the influence of the lodestone in curing disease. They achieved what they termed an "extraordinary success;" but Hell having published a work in which he declared Mesmer to be only a physician who had been employed by him to practically test the new discovery, the latter engaged in a violent controversy with his rival. All the scientific men of Vienna, however, sided with Hell, and Mesmer, who was pronounced to be an impostor, was obliged to quit the city. He visited several parts of Germany and Switzerland, everywhere working astonishing cures, and, in 1778, reached Paris, where he speedily became the most popular professor of the healing art in the French capital. Thousands of people, from peer to peasant, flocked to his apartments for the purpose of being "mesmerized." In a short time, however, he found a rival in a French physician, who embraced his doctrine, and practised it with such success as to gain £100,000 in fees from his patients. Mesmer declared that he was ruined, and applied to the government to grant him "a château and its lands, where he might be enabled to continue his treatment at leisure, and independently of persecution." The French government would not comply with this request, but Mesmer was offered a very large sum, on condition that he would permit certain individuals named by government to witness his proceedings, and report thereon. He soon afterwards left France and settled at Spa, whither a crowd of wealthy patients followed him. A subscription was subsequently entered into for his benefit, and the sum of £14,000 was raised. With this money Mesmer returned to Paris, and again commenced his public treatment; but those persons who had conducted the subscription having set up a society for gratuitously practising animal magnetism, Mesmer, finding no more money was to be got out of his discovery, left France, and repaired to England, where he lived under an assumed name. He subsequently returned to his native country, where he occupied himself in the composition of a new work upon his discovery. Mesmer's principal works were "Memoirs on the Discovery of Animal Magnetism," and "Collection of Facts and Documents relative to Animal Magnetism." b. at Marsburg, Baden, 1734; d. 1815.

MESSALINA, Valeria, mes-sa-lé-na, wife of the emperor Claudius, was of a most libidinous character, and committed adultery with all the officers of her court. Having been repudiated by Claudius, she espoused her favourite, Silius, who was put to death with her, by order of the emperor, A.D. 48. She was as cruel as she was debauched, and caused many distinguished Romans to be put to death.—There was another of the same name, who was the third wife of Nero, after her first husband, Atticus, had been put to death by that tyrant. On the death of Nero, she devoted the remainder of her days to study, and acquired a great reputation.

MESTON, William, mes'-ton, a burlesque poet, was educated at Abberdon University, where he became professor of philosophy in Marischal college. He was an accomplished scholar and mathematician; but is best known by his burlesque poems called "Mother Grim's Tales." b. 1639; d. 1745.

METASTASIO, the Abbé Peter Bonaventura, ma'-tas-tá-se-o, an eminent Italian poet, who early displayed a genius for poetry, and wrote verses at the age of six years; and was only fourteen when he composed his tragedy, "Il Giustino." A celebrated lawyer and critic, named Gravina, was his instructor, and made him his heir when he died. In 1721 Metastasio produced his play of "Didò," acted at Naples, with the music of Sarro. The success of this piece stimulated him to follow up the same career; and, in 1729, the emperor Charles VI. invited him to Vienna, where he gave him a large pension. The empress Maria Theresa bestowed upon him magnificent presents, as also did Ferdinand VI., king of Spain. The emperor offered him a patent of nobility, and the empress the order of St. Stephen; but he declined both. He wrote a great number of operas and other dramatic pieces, which are highly admired in his native country. b. at Rome, 1698; d. at Vienna, 1782. In England he is chiefly known as the author of the libretti of several operas, such as "Artaserse," "La Ciomenza di Tito," and "Semiramide."

METCALFE, Charles Theophilus, Lord, met'-kaf, a distinguished British colonial statesman, at the age of fifteen was sent out to India as a cadet in the Company's service, where, for seven years he filled various offices, and in 1808 was selected by Lord Minto to take charge of a difficult mission to the court of Lahore, the object of which was to secure the Sikh states, between the Sutlej and Jumna rivers, from the grasp of Runjeet Singh. In this he fully succeeded, the treaty being concluded in 1809. He subsequently filled several other high offices of trust; and, in 1835, upon Lord W. Bentinck's resignation, was provisionally appointed governor-general, which office he held until Lord Auckland's arrival, in the year following. During this short period he effected many bold and popular reforms, not the least of which was the liberation of the press of India from all restrictions. This, however, giving umbrage to the directors, caused his resignation, and return to Europe, when he was appointed governor of Jamaica—the difficult duties of which (the emancipation of the negroes having but recently occurred) he discharged to the satisfaction both of the government and the colonists. After two years' residence, the climate proved so unfavourable to his health, that he was compelled to resign; but was shortly afterwards selected to undertake the government of Canada. In this important post, his judgment, firmness, and general statesmanlike qualities were most advantageously exerted; and he was raised to the peerage by the title of Baron Metcalfe. His health, however, was greatly impaired by long service in such widely different climates as India and Canada, and in 1845 he once more returned to his native country, but did not long survive. b. in Berkshire, 1785; d. 1846.

METELLI, Augustin, mai-tui-le, an eminent painter, who excelled in painting perspective and architecture; and, in conjunction with Michael Angelo, produced several great works. b. at Bologna, 1609; d. at Madrid, 1660.

METELLUS, Q. Cæcilius, me-tel'-us, an illustrious Roman, who distinguished himself against Jugurtha, king of Numidia (B.C. 109), and thence acquired the name of Numidicus.

METIUS, James, me'-te-us, a native of North Holland, who is said by Descartes to have been the inventor of the refracting telescope. About the beginning of the 17th century, this individual, "while one day amusing himself with a few burning-glasses, after looking through them singly, began to look through them by pairs, placing one at each extremity of a short tube. In this way a convex and concave lens happening to be employed together, the first refracting telescope is said to have been constructed." Barlow, in his "History of Optics," however, declares that the refracting telescope must have been known in England at a much earlier date. Metius lived in the 17th century.

METON, me'-ton, an Athenian mathematician who invented what is called in chronology the golden number. Flourished 432 B.C.

METRODORUS, met-ro-dor'-us, a disciple of Democritus, and the master of Anaxarchus and Hippocrates. He was a physician of Chios, and maintained that the matter of the universe is eternal. Flourished 4th B.C.

METTERNICH, Clement Wenceslas, Prince, met-ter-nik, a celebrated German diplomatist. His ancestors had been distinguished in the wars of the empire against the Turks, and his father, Count Metternich, had obtained some distinction as a diplomatist, and as the associate of Kaunitz. At the age of fifteen, he entered the university of Strasburg, and, two years afterwards, removed to Mayence, to complete his studies. In 1790 he made his first appearance as master of the ceremonies at the coronation of the emperor Leopold II.; and, in 1794, after a short visit to England, was attached to the Austrian embassy at the Hague, in the following year marrying the heiress of his father's friend Kaunitz. All this time he was serving his apprenticeship in diplomacy. He first came into notice at the congress of Rastadt, where he represented the Westphalian nobility, after which he accompanied Count Stadion to St. Petersburg; was, in 1801, appointed minister at the court of Dresden; then, in 1804, proceeded as ambassador to Berlin, where he took a leading part in forming the well-known coalition which was dissolved by the battle of Austerlitz. After the peace of Presburg, he became Austrian minister at the court of Napoleon. The rise of the young ambassador had been unusually rapid, and the French emperor greeted him with the remark, "You are very young to represent so powerful a monarchy;" "Your majesty was not older at Austerlitz," replied Metternich, with all the address of a courtier. When war broke out, in 1809, he returned to the Austrian court, then about to seek refuge in the fortress of Comorn, and was appointed minister of foreign affairs. It was during his tenure of office, that he struck out the idea of a marriage between Napoleon and an Austrian archduchess. Napoleon was divorced from Josephine, and Maria-Louise was escorted by Metternich to Paris. But Austria had only adopted this course as an expedient, and, after the French defeat in Russia, again declared war against France. The grand alliance was signed at Toplitz in the same year, and Metternich was, upon the spot, created a prince of the empire. He took a very prominent part in the subsequent conferences and treaties, and signed the treaty of Paris on behalf of Austria. He afterwards paid a visit to England, and received the honour of a doctor's degree from the university of Oxford. Upon the opening of the congress of Vienna, he was chosen president. With the continental statesmen, the war against Napoleon was also a war against revolutionary principles. England, however, fought not against principles, but for self-preservation. What the potentates of the continent desired quite as much as the putting down of Napoleon, was the extinction of revolution. This was the aim of that "Holy Alliance" which has been the object of merited obloquy, and of which Metternich was the presiding genius. In 1822, when Canning assumed the direction of the Foreign Office, England entered an indignant protest against this infamous compact. After the French revolution of 1830, the emperor Francis exclaimed, "All is lost;" Metternich, however, thought otherwise. When Pius IX. ascended the papal throne, in 1846, his professions aroused all Italy, and Austrian influence was shaken throughout the peninsula. The French revolution followed, and half the thrones of Europe were emptied of their occupants. At Vienna the shock was also felt; the government fell, in spite of the resistance of Metternich, who maintained his state policy to the last. To calm the people, the old diplomatist was asked to resign: he answered, "I will not resign, gentlemen; I will not resign." The archduke John, without replying to Metternich, simply repeated his former statement; "I have already told you, Prince Metternich, resign." "What! is this the return I get for my fifty years' services?" he said, and the next day left the city with an escort of cavalry. He went to England, where he remained some time. In 1851 he again appeared at the Austrian court; but the old diplomatist was never again requested to undertake office; his power was really gone. Renowned rather than great,—venerated more for his age than for power,—admired, but not lamented, the old statesman passed away. b. 1773; d. 1859.

MULEN, Anthony Francis van der, me(r)-len, a celebrated painter, who always accompanied Louis XIV. on his campaigns, the incidents of which he perpetuated with his brush. In drawing the horse, he was without an equal in his time. b. at Brussels, 1634; d. 1690.

Meyer

MEYER, Jeremiah, mi'-er, a miniature painter, a native of Tübingen, who went to England in 1749, with his father, a portrait painter, who placed him under Zincke, the eminent painter in enamel, but he soon surpassed him. In 1761, the Society of Arts having offered a premium for the best drawing of a profile of the king, the prize was gained by Meyer; and he was afterwards appointed painter in enamel to their majesties, and was one of the founders of the Royal Academy. n. 1735; d. 1789.

MEYERBERG, Giacomo, mi'-er-bair, a celebrated composer, of Hebrew descent, who came of a wealthy family, and was the schoolfellow of Carl Maria von Weber. His first dramatic piece, "Jephtha's Daughter," was produced at Berlin when he was only 18 years of age. His style was formed upon the Italian models. His best operas were "Semiramide," "Robert le Diable," "Les Huguenots," "Le Prophète," "L'Étoile du Nord," and "Dinorah." Another opera, entitled "L'Africaine," was produced in 1865, after his death. b. at Berlin, 1794; d. 1861.

MEXYCKE, Sir Samuel Rush, mer'-vik, an eminent antiquary, whose chief works were "Arms and Armour," "Costume of the Original Inhabitants of the British Islands," and "A Critical Enquiry into Ancient Armour, as it existed in Europe, but more particularly in England, from the Norman Conquest to the Reign of Charles II." b. 1783; d. 1848.

MEZERAI, François Endes de, mez'-e-rai, an eminent French historian, who was educated at the university of Caen; on leaving which, he obtained a military employment, and served two or three campaigns in Flanders. Having abandoned the army, he projected the "History of France," while writing which he was liberally encouraged by Cardinal Richelieu; and on its completion in 1651, obtained a pension from the king. He was also admitted a member of the Academy, and had a principal share in the compilation of their dictionary. Besides his "History of France," and an abridgment, he wrote a treatise on the "Origin of the French," a continuation of the "History of the Turks," several satires against the ministry, "History of a Mother and Son," &c. n. 1610; d. 1633.

MEZZOFANTI, Joseph Caspar, mez-so-fan'-te, a celebrated linguist, was the son of a carpenter, and was intended for the same trade; but being taken under the patronage of Father Respighi, was sent to the university of Bologna, where he so distinguished himself, that at the age of 22 he was appointed professor of Arabic. At that period he was master of the Latin, Greek, Hebrew, Arabic, Spanish, French, German, and Swedish languages. During the war of which northern Italy was so long the field, Mezzofanti came into contact with soldiers of the Austrian, Russian, and French armies, and always turned the opportunity such meetings afforded him of studying the modern languages to the best account. In 1812, he became assistant, and in 1815, chief librarian of his university; and every traveller through Bologna made a point of seeing the great linguist. Lord Byron, when he visited the place, called him "a walking polyglot, a monster of languages, and a Briareus of parts of speech." In 1822, according to Lady Morgan, he spoke forty languages. Although he had received many flattering offers to take up his residence in Paris, Vienna, and Rome, it was not until 1831 that he was induced to settle in the last-named city. After being appointed to some minor posts, he was nominated keeper of the Vatican library, retaining the post until the year 1833, when he was created a cardinal. Mezzofanti, although incomparably the greatest linguist that ever lived, left no works, philological or otherwise, to perpetuate his fame; and notwithstanding his ability to express himself in fifty-six different languages, and his acquaintance with sixty-four others, he wrote nothing of importance relative to any one of them. n. at Bologna, 1774; d. at Rome, 1849.

MICHAEL I., mi'-kel, emperor of the East, succeeded to the throne on the death of Anastasius, in 811. He was a great prince, and the father of his people; but was deposed by Leo the Armenian, his general, in 813. He then retired to a monastery, where he spent the remainder of his days in devotion.

MICHAEL II. was born in Upper Phrygia, of an obscure family; but was ennobled by Leo the Armenian. That monarch afterwards sent him to prison, and condemned him to death; but the night previous to his intended execution, Leo was assassinated, and Michael placed on the throne, A.D. 820. He endeavoured to force his subjects to celebrate the Jewish sabbath and passover, and was guilty of great cruelties; on which his general, Euphemius, revolted, and proclaimed himself emperor; but was slain near Syracuse in Sicily. n. 829.

MICHAEL III. succeeded his father Theophilus, in 842, under the regency of his mother Theodora, whom he compelled to enter a monastery with her daughters. He at first associated Bardas, his uncle, with himself in the empire, and, at his instigation, sent St. Ignatius, patriarch of Constantinople, into exile. Michael afterwards put Bardas to death, and elevated Basil the Macedonian to the title of Cæsar, by whom he was assassinated in 867.

MICHAEL IV., usually styled the Paphlagonian, from the country where he was born, of obscure parentage, obtained the imperial throne in 1034, through the influence of the empress Zoe, who, having fallen in love with him, murdered her husband, Romanus Argyropulus, to obtain her wishes. Michael made war, with success, against the Saracens and Bulgarians; and afterwards retired to a monastery, where he died in 1041.

MICHAEL V. succeeded his uncle, the preceding emperor, in 1041, after having been adopted by the empress Zoe, whom he exiled a few months afterwards, which so irritated the people, that they deprived him of his eyes and sent him to a monastery. Zoe and her sister Theodora then reigned in conjunction.

MICHAEL VI., or the Warrior, reigned after the empress Theodora, in 1056; but, the year following, was compelled to relinquish the sceptre to Isaac Comnenus; on which Michael retired to a monastery.

MICHAEL VII. was the eldest son of Constantino Duca and of Eudocia. That princess, a few months after the death of her husband, married Diogenes, a Roman, whom she caused to be proclaimed emperor; but, in 1071, the usurper was taken prisoner by the Turks, and Michael regained the throne. In 1073, Nicephorus took Constantinople by the aid of the Turks, and Michael was obliged to retire to a monastery. He afterwards took orders, and became archbishop of Ephesus.

MICHAEL VIII., surnamed Palæologus, was regent of the empire during the minority of John Lascaris, whom he deprived of his throne and his eyes, in 1200. The year following, he retook Constantinople. He signed an act for effecting a union between the Greek and Latin churches, which, however, did not succeed. Pope Martin IV. excommunicated him, as the supporter of heresy and schism. D. 1232.—From the termination of the short reign of Isaac II., in 1204 until 1261, the seat of the Eastern empire under its Greek princes was at Nice.

MICHAEL ANGELO BUONAROTTI, an'-jai-to bo-na-rot'-te, a celebrated Italian painter, sculptor, and architect, was born of an ancient Tuscan family, and evinced, from his earliest youth, the greatest talent for art. He was placed under the tuition of Dorasenichino and Ghirlandajo, the two most celebrated artists of the time; but quitted them at the age of fifteen years, having already acquired all that they could teach him. Lorenzo de' Medici soon afterwards assigned him apartments in his palace, and treated him as if he were his own son. At the death of his magnificent patron, his fame was established. Pope Julius II. invited him to settle at Rome, where Michael Angelo carved the mausoleum of that pontiff; he also painted in fresco the ceiling of the Sistine chapel, and was, in succession, the favourite artist with three popes.—Leo X., Paul III., and Julius III. At the age of forty, he turned his attention to architecture, and constructed one of the grandest examples of that art,—the cupola of St. Peter's. Michael Angelo's commanding genius has never been contested: all place him in the first rank as painter, sculptor, and architect. At Mantua there is a "Sleeping Cupid," and at Rome a "Dacchus," which Raffaele said were worthy of Phidias or Praxiteles. His "Last Judgement" remains a marvellous proof of his great genius as a painter. Beauties and excellences of all kinds are to be seen in his works; but his manner was sometimes exaggerated,—a defect which may be pardoned in one who was ever seeking to attain the sublime in art. He was the author of some sonnets. D. 1475; D. 1564.

MICHAELIS, John David, mik'-ai-lis, a learned orientalist and biblical critic, was born at Halle, in Saxony, and there educated. He visited England, and for a time was preacher at the German chapel, St. James's palace; and on his return to Germany was made professor of theology at Göttingen; was honoured with the order of the Polar Star, conferred on him by the king of Sweden; and was made an aulic councillor of Hanover. Among the most valuable of his works are his "Introduction to the New Testament," translated into English by Bishop Marsh, and his "Commentaries on the Law of Moses." B. 1717; D. 1781.

MICHAUD, Joseph, me'-sho, a French historian, who was a member of the Institute under the first empire, and celebrated, in verse, the marriage of Napoleon and the birth of the king of Rome. Under the restoration he acted as newspaper censor. His principal works were, "History of the Crusades," and "History of the Hundred Days." B. in Savoy, 1767; D. 1839.

MICHELET, Jules, me'-she-lai, an eminent modern French historian, who, in 1820, was appointed teacher of history and languages at the College Rollin. He commenced his literary career by the composition of several elementary works on the study of history, which, obtaining considerable popularity, attracted the attention of the government towards him as a writer of research. He received the appointment of chief officer in the historical department of the French Archives, and was soon afterwards selected by Guizot to continue the latter's lectures on history to the Faculty of Literature. In 1838 he was appointed professor of history in the College of France. In 1845-46 considerable attention was directed towards two works of this author, translations of which appeared in England, under the titles, "The People," and "Priests, Women, and Families." In consequence of the attacks made in these works upon the ecclesiastical party, Guizot, the prime minister, interdicted his lectures. In 1847 he commenced his "History of the French Revolution;" upon which, and the "History of France," he was for several years engaged. His latest works are "The Bird," "The Lusset," "The Sorcerer," and two small treatises on social questions. B. at Paris, 1793.

MIDDLE, William Julius, mik'-el, a poet, born at Laugh-hu, in Dumfriesshire, was first raised in business as a brewer; but not succeeding, went to London, and devoted himself to literature. In 1765 he was employed as corrector of the press in the Clarendon printing-office at Oxford, where he published a poem, called "The Conchubine," in imitation of Spenser, which he afterwards republished under the title of "Sir Marlyn." His principal production, a translation of "The Lusiad" of Camoens, appeared in 1775; prefixed to which is a historical and critical Introduction, with a life of Camoens. He was also the author of many of the finest pieces in Evans's "Old Ballads;" and in 1778 accompanied his friend Commodore Johnstone on a mission to Lisbon as secretary. B. 1734; D. 1783.

MIDDLETON, William, mid'-el-ton, a Welsh poet, soldier, and sailor, was born at Gwynnog, Denbighshire, served in the armies of Queen Elizabeth, and afterwards commanded a ship of war. He wrote a paraphrase of the Book of Psalms in Welsh verse, and was also the author of the "Art of Poetry." D. 1595.

MIDDLETON, Thomas, an English dramatic author, who wrote in conjunction with Jonson, Fletcher, and Massinger. Three of his plays,—"A Mad World, my Masters," "The Mayor of Queenborough," and "The Roaring Girl,"—are included in Dodsley's collection of old plays. These were his best works; but there are many others by him. B. about 1628.

MIDDLETON, or MYDDLETON, Sir Hugh, a wealthy citizen and goldsmith of London, who, in 1601, offered, at his own cost, to supply London with pure water. His proposal being accepted, he commenced what he termed the "New River," selecting the Chadwell and Amwell springs at Ware, in Hertfordshire, as the sources thereof. The river had a course of 37 miles, and its projector had stipulated to complete it in four years; but the mechanical appliances of that day not proving equal to such a speedy accomplishment of the work, and Middleton's fortune being, moreover, exhausted, he applied to his fellow-citizens for assistance. Meeting with no response, he petitioned James I., who entered into an agreement with him to pay half the present or prospective expenses, on condition of being entitled to half the property. In little more than a year the great work was completed, and on the 29th of September, 1613, the water of the New River entered a reservoir prepared for its reception at Sadlers

Middleton

Wells, near Pentonville. The work had occupied five years and five months in its execution, and had cost £500,000. There was no dividend, however, for nineteen years, and then only one under £12. Meanwhile Middleton had been knighted, but had been compelled to sell his shares, and made a profession of what is now termed civil engineering. In acknowledgment of his services, he was created a baronet in 1632. These services were set forth as follows:—"For bringing to the city of London, with excessive charge and greater difficulty, a new cut, or river of fresh water, to the great benefit and inestimable preservation thereof. 2. For gaining a very great and spacious quantity of land, in Brading Haven, in the Isle of Wight, out of the bowelles of the sea; and, with banks and pyles, and most strange defensible and chargeable mountains, fortifying the same against the violence and fury of the waves," &c. In 1636, Charles I. made over to Sir Hugh the whole of his father's shares in the New River for a yearly rent of £500. b. date unknown; d. about 1640.

MIDDLETON, Conyers, a celebrated English divine and critic, received his academical education at Trinity College, Cambridge, of which he was chosen fellow in 1706. In 1717 he was created D.D., on which occasion he resisted the claim of Dr. Bentley, regius professor, to exorbitant fees. This occasioned a lawsuit, in which Middleton triumphed. A personal enmity was the consequence of this affair; and when Bentley printed his proposals for a new edition of the Greek Testament, Middleton attacked them with such force that the design was abandoned. In 1724 he spent some time in Italy, and on his return published his famous "Letter from Rome," showing that the religious rites of the Roman Church were drawn from the heathens. An attack on Dr. Waterland's "Vindication of the Scripture," in 1731, drew upon Middleton the charge of infidelity, and he narrowly escaped academical censure. In 1741 appeared his "Life of Cicero," a very curious and valuable work, and highly necessary towards forming a just idea of the character and writings of that great man, as well as exhibiting an exact picture of the Roman republic in his time. In 1743 he published the Epistles of Cicero to Brutus and those of Brutus to Cicero, in Latin and English, with a vindication of their authenticity. In 1749 appeared his "Inquiry into the Miraculous Powers supposed to have subsisted in the Christian Church, from the earliest ages." This work gave great alarm to the clergy, and numerous answers were written to it. In 1752 appeared an edition of all his works, with the exception of the "Life of Cicero." Dr. Middleton's style is admirable, and his learning was profound and multifarious. b. 1683; d. 1750.

MIERIS, Francis, meer'-is, called the Elder, a celebrated Dutch painter, was the disciple of Gerard Dow, whose manner he imitated. His pictures are very valuable. b. at Leyden, 1635; d. 1681.—He had a son, William Mieris, called the Younger, who was a good landscape-painter, and a modeller in clay and wax. b. at Leyden, 1662; d. 1747.—His grandson Francis was also an artist in the same line. b. 1689; d. 1763.

MIGNARD, Peter, meen'-yard, called the Roman, from his long residence in Rome, was the favourite artist of Louis XIV., whose portrait he painted ten times. He also adorned the palaces of St. Cloud and Versailles, and was ennobled by Louis. b. 1610; d. 1695.

Mill

M. Francis Augustus Alexis, meen'-gal, a modern French historian, who was educated for the legal profession at Aix, but removed to Paris, where he lodged with M. Thiers, and in 1824 produced, when only 23 years of age, his "History of the French Revolution, from 1789 to 1814." He was afterwards extensively employed as a journalist, and was associated with Armand Carrel and Thiers in conducting the "National." After the revolution of 1830, he was appointed director of the archives in the foreign ministerial department, which office he vacated in 1848. His principal works are, "History of Mary Stuart," "Charles V.," "Negotiations relative to the Spanish Succession under Louis XIV.," and several treatises on Moral and Political Science. b. at Aix, 1796.

MILDMAY, Sir Walter, mild'-may, a statesman of great integrity, who filled several situations under the Tudors. Under Henry VIII. he was employed in the court of augmentation; under Edward VI. he had an office in the mint; in queen Mary's reign he sat in Parliament as member for Cumberland; and in Elizabeth's, he was appointed chancellor of the exchequer, an office which he held for 23 years, and discharged with zeal and impartiality. He was the founder of Emanuel College, Cambridge. b. 1559.

MILKHOUSE, Robert, milk'-hoos, by trade a weaver, possessed much of the poet's power as well as of the poet's feeling. His "Vicissitude" and "Sherwood Forest" contain passages of which any poet might be proud; but are greatly marred by a melancholy and querulous tone. His productions made him many generous friends; and though not rich, he escaped from the sufferings attendant on genius in poverty. Shortly before his death he published "The Destinies of Man," a poem in two parts, which contains several beautiful passages. b. 1839.

MILL, John, mil, a learned divine and biblical critic, was born at Shapp, in Westmoreland; received his education at Queen's College, Oxford; became rector of Bletchington, in Oxfordshire, prebendary of Canterbury, and chaplain in ordinary to Charles II. He was employed 30 years in preparing a valuable edition of the Greek Testament, with various readings, amounting in number, it is said, to upwards of 30,000. b. 1645; d. 1707.

MILL, James, an eminent historian, who, after receiving some education at the grammar-school of Montrose, and continuing it in the house of Sir John Stuart, M.P. for Kincardineshire, was sent to the University of Edinburgh to study for the Church. After distinguishing himself as a Greek scholar, he obtained a license to preach in 1793; but, changing his views, he, two years afterwards, went to London with Sir John Stuart. For some time he supported himself by means of the "Literary Journal;" and, on the discontinuance of that print, was engaged to write for others, and occasionally contributed to the "Edinburgh Review." He commenced his "History of British India" in 1806, and completed it in 1818. This great work was much derided at one time. Macaulay wrote bitterly against both it and its author, but retracted his censures at a later period. The knowledge and ability displayed in the course of this history, led to his being employed as head of the Correspondence Department of the East India Company. Besides his great work on India, Mr. Mill contributed articles on Education, Government, Jurisprudence, Law of Nations, Liberty of the Press, &c., to the "Encyclopædia Britannica." In 1822 he published "The Elements of Political Economy," and, seven years subsequently, "The Analysis of the Phenomena of the Human Mind." His latest efforts were the "Fragment on Macintosh," and the articles on "The Formation of Opinions" and "The Ballot," in the "Westminster Review." n. at Montrose, 1773; d. 1836.

MILL, John Stuart, an eminent writer on political economy, the son of the preceding, was at an early age appointed to a clerkship in the East India House, and rose to the grade of examiner of Indian correspondence, the post formerly held by his father. His first literary efforts appeared in the form of contributions to the Westminster and Edinburgh Reviews; but the work which made him generally known was his "System of Logic, Ratiocinative and Inductive," the first edition of which was published in 1843. The practical portion of this work was, says its author, "an attempt to contribute something towards the solution of a question which the decay of old opinions and the agitation that disturbs European society to its inmost depth, render as important in the work was the "Essays on some Unsettled Questions of Political Economy," in 1844. The more extensive "Principles of Political Economy" succeeded this in 1861. Among his other works may be named "An Essay on Liberty," and "Thoughts on Parliamentary Reform," produced in 1859; "Considerations on Representative Government," in 1861; and an "Examination of Sir William Hamilton's Philosophy," in 1865. He was one of the members for the city of Westminster from 1865 to 1868. n. 1896.

MILLAIS, John Everett, mil'-lâis, an eminent English painter, and the acknowledged head of that body of innovators in modern art termed the "Pre-Raphaelite" school, or, as it was formerly called, the "Pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood." A student of drawing from a very early period, he entered the Royal Academy school, and, by the time he had reached his nineteenth year, had carried off all the honours to be gained in that probationary sphere. With William Holman Hunt (see HUNT) and others, he assisted in founding the "Brotherhood" mentioned above, and, in 1849, exhibited his first picture in the new style, which was afterwards to become celebrated. The picture was not named, but was a representation of the child Jesus in the shop of his reputed father, Joseph the carpenter. This picture shadowed forth all the great qualities, no less than the defects, of the painter. It was harsh, uncouth, and mediæval in its drawing and perspective; but it was full of thought, invention, richness of colour, and displayed great power over pencil and brush. Year after year Mr. Millais departed further from his old manner, and ultimately became one of the best of modern English painters. Most people are acquainted with his beautiful works, called, respectively, "The Huguenot," "The Proscribed Royalist," "The Order of Release," and "Autumn Leaves." He likewise drew a number of illustrations to books, short tales, and sketches. He became A.R.A. in 1853, and R.A. in 1868. n. at South-

MILLAR, John, mil'-lar, a learned writer, was born at Shotts, in Lanarkshire, and educated at Glasgow, where, by the interest of Lord Kames, in whose family he had been a tutor, he obtained, in 1761, the professorship of law, which he held for nearly forty years. He was the author of "The Origin of the Distinction of Ranks in Society" and "An Historical View of the English Government." n. 1735; d. 1801.

MILLER, Joseph, mil'-ler, a witty actor, who was a favourite low comedian about the time that Congreve's plays were fashionable, to the success of which, it is said, his humour greatly contributed. The compilation called "Joe Miller's Jests" was the work of John Motley; but Miller's name has not only been used to pass off the original stock, but thousands of other jokes and witticisms manufactured long after the bones of Joe were deposited in the churchyard of St. Clements, Strand; where a stone still exists, with an epitaph written by his friend, Stephen Duck. b. 1684; d. 1738.

MILLER, James, a political and dramatic writer, received his education at Wadham College, Oxford; and while at the university, wrote a satiric piece, called "The Humours of Oxford," which created him many enemies, and hindered his preferment. He also published several political pamphlets against Sir Robert Walpole; and also some plays, the principal of which is the tragedy of "Mahomet." n. in Dorsetshire, 1703; d. 1744.

MILLER, Edward, Mus. Doc., was the son of a pavior at Norwich, and bred to the same business; but having a dislike to it, he ran away, and became a pupil of Dr. Burney, who was then resident at Lynn. In 1756 he became organist of the church of Doncaster, where he remained till his death. Dr. Miller published "Institutes of Music," "The Elements of Thorough Bass and Composition," "The Psalms of David, set to Music, and arranged for every Sunday in the Year," and "The History and Antiquities of Doncaster." n. 1807.

MILLER, Hugh, an eminent geologist, whose father was lost at sea on board a small vessel of which he was the owner, while Hugh was still a child. He was sent to the parish school, and in course of time was apprenticed to the trade of a stonemason. From the time he had mastered the art of reading, he had been assiduous in his search after knowledge, and a love of natural history had been fostered in him by his uncle. While hewing stones in the quarry, he was engaged in observing their geological facts. Of poetry, also, he was very fond; and, after seeking in vain to get a certain effusion in rhyme inserted in a newspaper, he published a volume of verse, which brought him into notice, and obtained for him the clerkship of a bank in his native place. The leisure afforded by this occupation he turned to good account. After contributing for a short period to the "Inverness Courier," he published "Scenes and Legends of the North of Scotland." He was next selected by the "Free Church" party to edit their organ, the "Witness" newspaper, a post which he continued to fill until his death. His first geological paper appeared in this print, and having been followed by a series of others, when the Geological Association met at Glasgow, Sir Charles Lyell, Dr. Buckland, and Sir Roderick Murchison, all expressed themselves astonished and delighted at the labours of the new scientific writer. fishes described by him in this series, was named by Professor Agassiz after Mr. Miller. A republication of the papers afterwards took place, under the title of the "Old Red Sandstone; or, New Walks in an Old Field." His ready, picturesque, and vigorous pen was henceforth constantly employed; and he produced, after a visit to the south, "First Impressions of England and its People;" "Foot-prints of the Creator;"—an answer to some of the statements of the "Vestiges of Creation;" the "Geology of the Bass," and the "Testimony of the Rocks." He also lectured upon his favourite science in Edinburgh and London, and, in 1855, read a paper on the Fossil Flora of Scotland, before the British Association at Glasgow. In addition to the above-mentioned works, he gave to the world a most interesting account of his early life, in a work called "My Schools and Schoolmasters." Miller shot himself in 1856, while labouring under disease of the brain. n. at Cromarty, 1802.

MILLIN, Aubin-Louis, mee'-yoo, a celebrated French antiquary, who acted as keeper of the medals and antiquities in the Royal Library at Paris. His chief works were, "Dictionary of the Fine Arts," "Dictionary of Mythology," "Monuments of Antiquity," and "Gallery of Mythology." He edited the "Magasin Encyclopédique" during twenty years, and also produced a number of works relative to the antiquities of his native land, Savoy, &c., which were full of valuable historical matter. n. 1759; n. 1818.

MILLINGEN, James, mil'-lin-jen, an English archaeologist, who, about the time of the French revolution, went to Paris with his father, but was arrested at the instance of the National Convention. After his liberation, he became partner in a bank at Paris, and henceforth devoted his leisure to archaeological pursuits. He was fortunate enough to become the purchaser of several vases full of gold coins of the Roman emperors, dug up at Abbeville. Being afflicted with disease of the chest, he was compelled to repair to Italy, where he resided until his death, making, however, occasional visits to the French capital, where he was always welcomed by antiquaries as the bearer of some valuable ancient relic. His most important works were, "A Medallic History of Napoleon," "Ancient Coins of Greek Cities and Kings," "Ancient Inedited Monuments of Grecian Art," and "Remarks on the State of Learning and Fine Arts in Great Britain;" besides which he was becoming fellow of his college. In 1815 he published "Fazio," a tragedy, which was played at Covent Garden Theatre without his consent, in consequence of the defective state of the law at that period. In 1817 he entered into holy orders, and obtained a living at Reading. In 1820 he produced "The Fall of Jerusalem," a sacred poem, founded upon Josephus's narrative. The university of Oxford appointed him its professor of poetry in the following year. The "History of Christianity from the Birth of Christ to the Abolition of Paganism in the Roman Empire" was his next important publication. In 1849 he produced a beautiful edition of Horace, adding to it a most interesting life of the poet. In the same year he was appointed dean of St. Paul's, and shortly afterwards gave to the world a continuation of his "History of Christianity," under the title of a "History of Latin Christianity." He likewise produced a new and copiously annotated edition of Gibbon's "Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire." In addition to the works already mentioned, he was the author of "The Martyr of Antioch," "Belshazzar," "Anne Boleyn," and a "History of the Jews." n. 1791; n. 1868.

MILNE, Colin, miln, a divine and naturalist, was educated at Marischal College, Aberdeen, of which city he was a native. He afterwards became rector of North Chapel, Essex, and was the author of a "Botanical Dictionary," "Institutions of Botany," "Indigenous Botany," &c., works held in high repute with the learned in his favourite science. n. 1815.

MILNER, John, mil'-ner, a catholic divine, and writer on theology and ecclesiastical antiquities, was educated at the schools of Sedgley Park, near Wolverhampton, and Edgbaston, Birmingham, and completed his studies at the college of Douay. In 1777 he was ordained a priest, and commenced his pastoral duties in 1779, at the Catholic chapel, Winchester. After publishing some controversial pieces, he devoted his attention to the study of ecclesiastical architecture, and in 1790, became a member of the Royal Society of Antiquaries. He contributed several papers to the "Archæologia;" and published, in 1798, a "Dissertation on the Modern Style of Altering Cathedrals, as exemplified in the cathedral of Salisbury;" a "History, Civil and Ecclesiastical, and a Survey of the Antiquities of Winchester," and subsequently, a "Treatise on the Ecclesiastical Architecture of England." He was afterwards engaged in some controversial squabbles, in which he

He was professor of history at Parma many years, and on his return to France became tutor to the due d'Anguien. His works are, "Elements of the History of France," "Elements of the History of England," "Elements of Universal History," "History of the Troubadours," "Memoirs for a History of Louis XIV. and XV.," and "Translations of Orationes from the Latin Historians." n. 1726; n. 1735.

MILMAN, Rev. Henry Hart, mil'-man, an eminent English historian and poet, who was educated at Eton and Brasenose College, Oxford, 1803, with the title of "bishop of Castabala," and in 1814 visited Rome, where he stayed about a year. He published, in 1818, a work entitled the "End of Religious Controversy," in which he vindicated Roman catholicism on those points of faith usually attacked by Protestants, and was more or less engaged in similar contests till shortly before his death. n. 1752; n. 1826.

MILNES, Richard Monckton, Lord Houghton, milns, a politician, poet, and prose writer, who, a few years after concluding his university career at Cambridge, was elected member of parliament for Pontefract, and distinguished himself therein as a zealous supporter of all questions relative to popular education and complete religious equality. His literary efforts were various in kind and of an excellent character. As a poet, he produced "Poems of Many Years," "Memorials of Many Scenes," "Poems, Legendary and Historical," and "Palm Leaves." His "Life, Letters, and Literary Remains of John Keats" was an appreciative and delightful commemoration of departed genius. He was understood to have been the writer of several interesting articles in the "Westminster Review." He published several of his speeches, delivered from his place in the House of Commons, and wrote a number of political pamphlets, the most important of which were "Thoughts on Party Politics," and "Real Union of England and Ireland." He was raised to the peerage as Baron Broughton in 1838. d. 1869.

MILÓ, mí-ló, a famous athlete of Crotona, in Italy, who is said to have carried a bullock on his shoulders above forty yards, and then killed it with one blow of his fist, after which he devoured it in one day. He received the prize seven times at the Pythian games, and six at the Olympic. Many other marvellous things are related of his enormous strength. According to Ovid, he was devoured by wild beasts, about 600 B.C.

MILÓ, Titus Annius, a Roman, who made several parties for the purpose of obtaining the consulate. He was opposed by Clodius, and supported by some of the first members of the senate. In a quarrel between Clodius and Milo, on the Appian Way, the former was slain by some of the domestics of the latter. Cicero undertook to plead the cause of Milo; but the rostrum being surrounded by soldiers and a crowd of people, who expressed their disapprobation, he was so dismayed as to be unable to proceed. Milo was exiled to Marseilles, whither the orator sent him his discourse; on which he said, "O Cicero! if thou hadst spoken this, Milo would not have been now at Marseilles." Killed 48 B.C.

MILTIADES, mí-lí-tí-dee, a celebrated Athenian general, who succeeded his brother in the government of the Athenian colony in the Chersonese, B.C. 513. He proposed to destroy the raft over which Darius had passed in his Scythian expedition, and so cut off the Persian king's retreat; his comrades, however, overruled the proposal, and Miltiades became so unpopular as to be compelled to return to Athens. Twenty years afterwards, the Persians having declared war against Greece, their army landed in overwhelming numbers at Marathon. The Athenians, under Miltiades, were very few; yet, by his superior skill, the Persians were defeated with great slaughter, and part of their fleet destroyed, 490 B.C. After this, he had the command of a naval squadron, with which he took several islands; but being obliged to raise the siege of Paros, and also dangerously wounded, he returned to Athens, where he was accused of holding intelligence with the Persians, and condemned to death, which sentence was altered to imprisonment. He died shortly after of his wound, B.C. 489.

MILTON, John, mí-l'ton, an illustrious English poet, was educated first at St. Paul's school, and afterwards at Christ's College, Cambridge, where he took his degrees in arts, being designed for the bar or the church; but, not having an inclination for either calling, he returned to his father, who had retired from business with a good fortune, and settled at Horton, in Buckinghamshire. Here the poet wrote his "Comus," "L'Allegro," "Il Penseroso," and "Lycidas;" poems of such merit as would alone have immortalized his name. In 1637 he travelled into France and Italy. On his return to England, he settled in London, and undertook the tuition of his nephews, for which profession he appears, by his "Treatise on Education," to have been well calculated. On the outbreak of the differences between the King and Parliament, Milton engaged as a political writer on the popular side; and by his great animosity to the hierarchy, he published some pamphlets against the bishops. In 1643 he married the daughter of a justice of peace in Oxfordshire; but, his wife had brought up with different sentiments than her husband, and disapproving of his zeal, left him, and returned to her father. He repudiated his wife, and published some tracts on divorce, to vindicate this act, which he was about to carry into effect, when his wife's friends brought about a reconciliation. He continued an ardent member of the party, even after the execution of Charles I. He also wrote with great asperity against the king's book of prayers and meditations, entitled "Eikon Basilike." About this time he was wholly deprived of sight, owing to a natural weakness and intense application to his studies. In 1652 he lost his wife, and soon afterwards took another. He was a determined republican, and wrote with energy against monarchical government, "the very trappings of which," he said, "would support a commonwealth," while, as Latin secretary to the Council of State, he rendered good service to the cause of national liberty. Milton endeavoured to prevent the Restoration; but in event he had undoubted cause to dread, considering the active part taken by him in the rebellion. And when the Restoration took place, he was excepted from the act of indemnity; on which he kept himself concealed some time. By the interest, however, of Sir William Brouncker and others, he obtained a pardon, soon after which he lost his second wife. In the time of the plague he removed, with his family, to Buckinghamshire, where he completed his "Paradise Lost," which was first printed in 1667. This immortal work he sold to a bookseller for £5. For the idea of it he is said to have been indebted to an Italian drama on the Fall of Man; and it is certain that he had himself an intention at first of writing only a tragedy on the same subject. As the work grew under his hand, his soaring genius gave it the form and consistence, the variety and elegance, of an epic poem. He subsequently composed "Paradise Regained," which, though abounding in beauties, is in all respects inferior to "Paradise Lost," though Milton, remarkably enough, is said to have considered it the better poem. "Paradise Lost" was unknown in the poet's lifetime, and for many years after. It was not till Mr. Addison wrote his admirable critique upon it in the "Spectator," that its beauties became generally understood, and the whole merits of the poem to be admired. Dryden had, indeed, given his approbation of the work and his opinion of the author in an excellent epigram, which is usually prefixed to the "Paradise Lost." Besides this, and the other poems mentioned above, Milton wrote a drama on the Greek model, entitled "Samson Agonistes," which possesses uncommon beauties, though not adapted for theatrical representation. His "Comus" has been several times performed, and the first time was for the benefit of the author's granddaughter, Mrs. Clarke, a widow in reduced circumstances. On that occasion Johnson wrote a prologue. Among the prose works of Milton, we shall only mention his "History of England," which comes down only to the Conquest, and his "Areopagitica," in which he pleaded the cause of a free press with great force. The whole of his prose works have been published in five volumes in Bohn's Standard Library. When at Cambridge, he was so handsome as to be called "The Lady of Christ's College," and retained his comeliness to the last. By his first wife he had three daughters, two of whom used to read to him in eight languages, though they understood only their own, it being a usual saying with him, that "one tongue was enough for a woman." His remains were interred at the parish church of St. Giles, Cripplegate, where a monument has been erected to his memory; and there is another in Westminster Abbey. b. in Broad Street, London, 1608; d. 1674.

MIMNERMUS, mim-ner'-mus, a Greek poet and musician, was a native of Colophon, and contemporary with Solon. He excelled in elegiac poetry, the invention of which has been ascribed to him. Some fragments of his are included in the "Anthea" of Brunet. Flourished about 630 b.c.

MINA, Don Francisco Espoz, mo'-na, a distinguished Spanish general, who for a long time was commander-in-chief of the Catalonian army, first distinguished himself in guerilla warfare, and by the incessant activity and admirable presence of mind he displayed. Having co-operated in the blockade of Pampeluna, and recovered several other places, he was mortified to find that, at the general peace in 1814, he had been labouring only to re-establish the despotic policy of Ferdinand VII., and made an ineffectual effort in the cause of freedom to gain over the garrison of Pampeluna. He then sought an asylum in France; but whilst resident in the French capital, was arrested by a commissary of police, employed by the Spanish ambassador. On this occasion the conduct of Louis XVIII. was most honourable; he dismissed the commissary, insisted upon the ambassador being recalled, and not only released Mina, but granted him a pension of 1000 francs. When the army of Cadiz, in 1822, unfurled the standard of freedom, by proclaiming the constitution of 1812, Mina hastened to Navarre, and was advancing against Pampeluna at the head of a few hundred followers, when he was informed that the king had accepted the constitution. He was subsequently appointed captain-general of the three armies of Navarre, Catalonia, and Arragon; but when, by the intervention of France, Ferdinand was again enabled to discard his professed adherence to the constitution, Mina left Spain for England. After the accession of Isabella II. under the regency of her mother Christina, Mina took an active part against Don Carlos; and to him and his wife the charge of educating the young queen was committed. b. in Navarre, 1782; d. 1836.

MINIE, Claude-Etienne, min'-e-at, commonly min'-e, the inventor of the rifle which bears his name, entered the French army as a private soldier, and rose to the grade of brigadier. He was among the first of those scientific gentlemen who in recent times endeavoured to perfect the long-known but neglected principle of the rifle. Although it is now superseded, the Minie's was for some time the best rifle extant. The Minie's ball was a great advance upon everything of the kind that had preceded it. It was an elongated one, conical at its point, and with a hollow behind, in which was placed a metal cap or thimble. Captain Norton, Mr. Greener, and J. Caron, a French artillery officer, arrived at similar results with M. Minie; but, at any rate, his inventions were the first to become extensively employed, and they form, undoubtedly, the first steps in that grand march of improvement in gunnery which has taken place within the last few years. b. at Paris, 1800.

MIRABAUD, Jean Baptiste de, mir'-a-bo, a French writer, who was at first a member of the Congregation of the Oratory, and afterwards in the army. His works are translations of Tasso's "Jerusalem" and Ariosto's "Orlando" into French. In 1770 was published, under his name, an atheistical book, entitled "The System of Nature," which was translated into English, and attracted much attention at its first appearance. This work, though it still passes under the name of Mirabaud, was in reality the production of Baron d'Holbach and others. b. at Paris, 1675; d. 1700.

MIRABEAU, Victor Riquetti, Marquis de, mir'-a-bo, born of an ancient family, in Provence, was one of the principal initiators of a political sect called Economists. For his "Théorie de l'impôt," a tract in which he made some free remarks on the finances and government, he was incarcerated in the Bastille for some time. His principal work was entitled "L'Ami des Hommes" (the Friend of Mankind). In this work the author displayed considerable knowledge of rural and political economy, and also furnished some judicious hints for the good of society. b. 1715; d. 1789.

MIRABEAU, Honoré Gabriel Riquetti, Count de, one of the leaders, and the greatest orator during the French revolution. After serving some time in the army, he espoused a rich heiress of Aix; but he soon squandered away the fortune he had received with her, and plunged himself into debt. He was confined in different prisons, and on obtaining his liberty, eloped to Holland with the wife of a French nobleman, the Marquis de Monnier. For this he was afterwards imprisoned in the castle of Vincennes, and remained there a considerable time. In 1780 he regained his liberty, and published his work on "Lettres de Cachet." He subsequently visited London, and, on his return to Paris, employed himself with literature. In 1786 his great abilities recommended him to the notice of the minister Calonne, who dispatched him on a secret mission to Prussia. The French revolution offered Mirabeau an ample field for his activity. Imbibing the doctrine of equality, he opened a shop, over the door of which was inscribed "Mirabeau, dealer in drapery." He was elected deputy of the third estate for Aix, and the courtiers termed him the Plebeian Count. In the National Assembly he displayed the very highest powers of an orator, but died in the midst of his political career, as is supposed, of poison, and his obsequies were celebrated with great pomp. Mirabeau wrote "A Comparison between the Great Condé and Scipio Africanus," "History of Prussia under Frederick the Great," a collection of his orations in the National Assembly, "Secret History of the Court of Berlin;" this book was burnt by the common executioner. The character of this remarkable man, who might be styled the Alcibiades of the Revolution, was, till lately, but imperfectly understood. It is certain, that if he crushed the old aristocracy upon the one hand, he, on the other, kept down the fury of democracy. When he became president of the National Assembly, in 1791, he rendered immense services to his country, in introducing clearness and order where all had before been entanglement and confusion. Had his life been prolonged, it is more than a question whether the French revolution would have been other than a bloodless one—a simple change from despotism to constitutional monarchy. "I carry to the grave," he once said, "the last shreds of the monarchy." His death was a public calamity. His ambition was not to set up or destroy absolute monarchy, but to raise himself to the position of prime minister of a constitutional régime. "Much has been said of the venality of Mirabeau," says his friend Dumont, "as if his talents were actually put up to the highest bidder; but this is an exaggeration. It may be admitted that he was not over scrupulous in money matters; but he was too proud to be dishonest, and he would have thrown through the window any one who dared to make a humiliating proposal." At one time he received a pension from Monsieur (afterwards Louis XVIII.), and subsequently, during the last six months of his life, one from the king; but he considered himself as an agent intrusted with their affairs, not to be governed by, but to govern and direct those who granted them. "When I am gone," he said, "my value will be appreciated. Misfortunes, to which I have put a stop for the present, were overwhelming France in every direction; but that base faction (the Jacobins), which I now overawe, will be let loose upon the country. They want to govern the king, instead of being governed by him; but soon neither they nor he will govern: a vile faction will rule the country, and debase it by the most atrocious crimes." n. at Bignon, near Nemours, 1749; d. 1791.

MIRANDA, Francisco, me-ran'-da, the founder of the independence of Spanish America. He rose to be colonel in the Spanish army, and was for some time intrusted with important matters by the governor of Guatemala; but, taking part in a conspiracy against the Spanish viceroy, he was compelled to fly from his native country. He went to Paris in 1789, and allied himself with the republican party, who appointed him to a command under General Dumouriez. In 1806 he resolved to achieve the independence of his country; and, after a long struggle, succeeded in establishing a republic at Caracas, in 1811. He sustained a defeat by the Spanish army subsequently, and was treacherously betrayed to the Spanish general, who sent him in chains to Spain, where he died in the prison of the Inquisition, 1816; n. at Caracas, about 1750.

MIRANDOLA, Giovanni Pico della, mer'-an-do'-la, Count and Prince of Concedia, was one of the brightest ornaments of literature in the 15th century. In his youth he gave astonishing proofs of genius; and, when little more than twenty, set up in all the universities of Italy a number of difficult problems in the sciences, which he engaged publicly to defend. He finally fixed his residence at Florence, where he lived on terms of intimacy with the most distinguished men of the age, particularly Lorenzo de' Medici and Polizano. n. 1463; d. 1494.

MITCHELL, Sir David, mil'-chel, an eminent naval commander in the reign of William III., was descended from a respectable family in Scotland. He commanded the Elizabeth of 70 guns at the battle off Beachey Head, where he behaved with great gallantry. In 1693 he was made rear-admiral of the Blue, and in 1694 had the honour of knighthood conferred upon him. He was employed in bringing over to England and carrying back Peter the Great, czar of Muscovy, and was also sent on a diplomatic mission to Holland. d. 1710.

MITCHELL, Joseph, a dramatic writer, who was patronized by Sir Robert Walpole. He wrote "The Fatal Extravagance," a tragedy; "The Highland Fair," a ballad opera, &c.; and several poems. n. in Scotland, 1684; d. 1738.

MITCHELL, Sir Andrew, a British admiral, born in Scotland, accompanied Sir Edward Vernon to India, in 1776, as a midshipman; and while there did such good service that he was rapidly promoted to the rank of post-captain. On the commencement of hostilities with the French republic, he was appointed to the command of the Asia, of 61 guns, and next to the Impregnable, of 90. In 1795 he was made rear-admiral; and, in 1799, shortly after being promoted to the rank of vice-admiral of the White, he joined Lord Duncan off the coast of Holland, and entering the Texel, the Dutch fleet surrendered to him without firing a shot. He was now created a knight of the Bath, and in 1802 was appointed commander-in-chief on the American station. n. about 1757; d. at Bermuda, 1800.

MITCHELL, Sir Thomas Livingstone, an able geographer and military surveyor, who served with distinction during the Peninsular war as an officer of the staff. The military maps which he constructed throughout the campaign are preserved in the Ordnance Office, as models of accuracy and excellent execution. In 1827 he produced "Outlines of a System of Surveying for Geographical and Military Purposes," and was about the same time nominated deputy surveyor-general of New South Wales, which post he retained until his death. He proved himself one of the most distinguished explorers of the Australian continent, and, under circumstances of great difficulty and danger, traced the course of the river Darling to its junction with the river Murray, and discovered Australia Felix. An account of these labours was published in 1833, in a work entitled "Three Expeditions into the Interior of Eastern Australia, with descriptions of the recently explored region of Australia Felix." On coming to England for the purpose of passing his works through the press, he received the honour of knighthood from her Majesty, was elected fellow of the Royal and of the Geographical Societies, and became D.C.L. of the university of Oxford. He subsequently discovered the Victoria river, and invented a new propeller for steam-vessels, on the principle of a weapon used by the aborigines of Australia. While staying in England, in 1853, he read an account of his invention at the United Service Institution, and afterwards published it, with the title, "Origin, History, and Description of the Boomerang Propeller." In addition to the works we have already mentioned, he produced a "Map of the Colony of New South Wales," in three sheets; "Journal of an Expedition into the Interior of Tropical Australia," and "Australian Geography, with the Shores of the Pacific." He attained the grade of colonel in 1854, and at his death his remains were honoured by a public funeral at Sydney. b. at Craighend, Shropshire, 1792; d. at Sydney, 1855.

MITFORD, William, mit'-ford, an eminent English historian, who studied at Queen's College, Oxford, and subsequently entered himself at the Middle Temple; but, succeeding to the family estates upon the death of his father in 1761, he retired into the country, and devoted his life to the study of the Greek language and literature. In 1768 he was appointed captain in the South Hampshire militia, of which Gibbon was the major. Some conversations between the historian of the "Decline and Fall" and himself led, it is said, to his undertaking a history of Greece. That history was produced in successive volumes, the first of which appeared in 1784. Although superseded at the present time by the works of Grote and Bishop Thirlwall, Mitford's history affords new and accurate views of many important events. The great defect of the work is the strong prejudice of the author against democracy,—a prejudice which caused him to regard Philip of Macedon as a perfect hero, and the Athenians as a set of miscreants. With him Demosthenes was nothing less than an unprincipled demagogue. Mr. Mitford also published a treatise on the Religions of Ancient Greece and Rome. He was returned to Parliament in 1785, and sat there during many years; but his speeches were principally made upon the militia laws. A treatise by him upon "The Military Force, and particularly the Militia of England," created some excitement in its day, but is now forgotten. b. in London, 1741; d. in Hampshire, 1827.

MITFORD, Mary Russell, an eminent modern authoress, was the daughter of a clever physician, but whose unthrifty habits involved him in constant pecuniary embarrassments. When the future authoress had attained her tenth year, her father made her a present of a ticket in the Dublin lottery, which eventually turned up a prize of £20,000. This large sum was, however, dissipated by the extravagant parent, who was, nevertheless, a most kindly man and affectionate father. Mary was placed at school at Chelsea, where she met as pupils, at various times, Miss Landon (L. E. L.), Fanny Kemble, and Lady Caroline Lamb. Before she reached her twentieth year, she put forth a volume of verse, which was demolished by the "Quarterly Review." Nowise disheartened, she brought out another, and, in reality, adopted literature as a profession. For some time, her pen was engaged upon short tales and sketches for the magazines, the success of which emboldened her to take a higher flight. The "Sketch Book" of Washington Irving was published about that period, and attained the greatest popularity. This led Miss Mitford to turn her attention to the composition of a series of rural tales and descriptions of rustic life and scenery. She had long been residing at a pleasant village on the borders of Berkshire and Hampshire, and was familiar with every house, cottage, and green lane, and dweller therein. She accordingly set to work to give faithful delineations of the place and its inhabitants. Her first essays were sent to the "New Monthly Magazine," but the then editor, Thomas Campbell, at once rejected them. After many disappointments, they appeared in the "Lady's Magazine." These were afterwards put forth in a collected form, and were entitled "Our Village," a book which justly merits its great popularity, being truly unrivalled of its kind. Five series of "Our Village" were published. "Belford Regis; or, Sketches of a Country Town," subsequently appeared, the materials for which were drawn from the town of Reading. Her later, though less celebrated works, were "Stories of Country Life," and "Atherton," a novel. She also wrote several dramas. Her "Julian" was performed in 1823, Macready enacting the leading part. The "Foscari" and "Rienzi" were also very successful; but "Charles the First" was interdicted by Colman, who at the time was licenser of plays. It was subsequently played at a minor theatre, but soon disappeared from the stage. Her latest effort was "Recollections of my Literary Life; or, Books, Places, and People," which is a light gossiping commentary upon many of the people and of the circumstances which influenced her life. b. at Alresford, Hampshire, 1786; d. at Swallowfield Cottage, near Reading, 1855.

MITHRIDATES, mith'-ri-da'-tees, the name of six kings of Pontus, of the first five of whom there is nothing particular to record.

MITHRIDATES VI., the greatest of the name, and one of the most determined enemies that the Romans encountered, succeeded to the throne b.c. 120, at which time he was only eleven years of age. The Romans, anxious to weaken his power, declared war against him, and he, in revenge, ordered all the Romans in his dominions to be massacred. He then marched with a powerful army against Aquilinus, whom he defeated; but Sylla, after some victories, forced Mithridates to make peace, b.c. 84. He renewed the war in alliance with Tigranes, king of Armenia. After conquering Bithynia, Mithridates laid siege to Cyzicum, in the Propontis; but Lucullus, having marched to its relief, besieged Mithridates in his camp. The king of Pontus defeated the Romans in two combats, but was completely vanquished in a third. Gabrio being sent to supersede Lucullus in the command, this change was advantageous to Mithridates, who recovered the best part of his kingdom. Pompey, however, obtained a great victory over him near the Euphrates, b.c. 65, upon which Mithridates fled to Tigranes, who refused him an asylum. He next sent ambassadors to Pompey to sue for peace, but the Romans insisted upon his surrendering in person. Meantime his people revolted, and proclaimed his son Pharnaces king. Rather than fall into the hands of the Romans, Mithridates put an end to his life, b.c. 63. b. about 131 b.c.

ITSCHERLICH, Eilard, itsch'-er-lik, a distinguished German chemist, who was, in 1821, appointed professor of chemistry in the university of Berlin. He was the discoverer of the fact, that two bodies having the same composition could assume different forms; to which Berzelius gave the name "Isomerism." His greatest literary work is "Manual of Chemistry," which details the principles of the science from a mathematical and physical point of view. b. at Neurede, near Jever, 1794. d. 1863.

MOELLENDORF, Richard Joachim Henry, t.de.mel'-len-dorf, a Prussian general, whose behaviour at the battles of Molwitz and Kottwitz, in the first Silesian war, having attracted the notice of Frederic II., whom he accompanied thither as a page, he was promoted to a company in the Guards; became a colonel in 1761, afterwards lieutenant-general, and in 1783 governor of Berlin. During the dismemberment of Poland, in 1793, he commanded the Prussian troops, and did everything in his power to alleviate the sufferings of the Poles. On his return home he was created a field-marshal, and made governor of South Prussia. He succeeded the duke of Brunswick in the command of the Prussian army on the Rhine, in 1794; and gained the victory of Kaiserslautern, and was present at the battles of Jena and Auerstadt, where he was wounded. b. 1724; d. 1816.

MOFFAT, Robert, prof-fat, an eminent missionary, who, with John Williams and others, accepted the task of preaching the gospel to barbarous tribes, in 1816. In 1810 he visited England, and, at several public meetings, narrated his adventures among the savage and frequently warlike tribes of Africa. About the same time he published a work, entitled "Missionary Labours and Scenes in Southern Africa;" he also completed a translation of the New Testament and the Psalms into the Bechuma language. He returned to the scene of his missionary labours shortly afterwards. His daughter married the celebrated Dr. Livingstone. b. in Scotland, at the close of the last century.

MOHAMMED, in Turkish MAHOMET, mo-ham'-med, or ma'-ho-met, the founder of the Mussulman religion, sprung from the noble family of Koreish. Losing his father in his infancy, his guardianship devolved on his uncle, Abu Taleh, who employed him to go with his camels from Mecca to Damascus. In this employment of camel-driver he continued till he was twenty-five years of age, when he married Khadijah, a rich widow, becoming thereby one of the wealthiest men in Mecca. He soon made himself remarked for his religious zeal; and having observed in his travels the infinite variety of sects which prevailed, he conceived the project of reforming the religion of his country, and uniting the various sects into the worship of one God. He accordingly spent much of his time in a cave near Mecca, seemingly alone, and employed in meditation and prayer; but in reality he called to his aid a Persian Jew, well versed in the history and laws of his persuasion, and two Christians, one of the Jacobite and the other of the Nestorian sect. With the help of these men, he framed the "Koran," or Mahometan Bible, which he pretended to have received at different times from heaven, by the hands of the angel Gabriel. At the age of forty, he publicly assumed the prophetic character, calling himself the apostle of God. At first he had only his wife and eight other followers; but in three years his disciples were considerably more numerous. On these he imposed the most marvellous tales, but well adapted to deceive ignorant and superstitious minds. He pretended to have passed into the highest heavens in one night, on the back of a beautiful ass called Al Borak, and accompanied by the angel Gabriel. There he had an interview with Adam, Abraham, Moses, David, and Jesus Christ, who acknowledged his superiority, which was confirmed to him by the Deity himself. This romance staggered even some of his best friends; and a powerful confederacy being formed against him, he was forced to quit Mecca, and to seek a refuge in Medina. This retreat occasioned the foundation of his empire and of his religion. The Mohammedans adopt it as their chronological standard, calling it the Hegira, that is, the Flight or Persuasion, being the 16th day of our July, 622 A.D. Mohammed had still a number of disciples, upon whom he inculcated this principle, that they were not to dispute for their religion by word, but by the sword. This was a doctrine well adapted to a lawless and wandering people, and was soon carried into practice by them. The Jewish Arabs were the first who experienced its effects. Mohammed ordered and upon them the most shocking cruelties, put numbers to death, sold others for slaves, and distributed their goods among his followers. A faith thus propagated could not but succeed in a country like Arabia. He rewarded his adherents by plunder, and held out to them a certain happiness of the most sensual kind hereafter. In 627 he made a treaty with the inhabitants of Mecca, which two years afterwards he violated, and stormed the place with fire and sword. Having made himself master of Arabia, he extended his under tribute. While engaged in this victorious career, a Jewess poisoned some meat which was laid before him, and of which he and his companions ate heartily. One of them died immediately, but the prophet lingered some time. When the woman was examined, she declared that she had perpetrated the deed on purpose to try whether he was really a true prophet. Of the effects of this poison he died, 632 A.D., and of the Hegira 11, aged 62. After the death of Khadijah, he had several wives and concubines, by whom he had many children, but left only a daughter, named Fatima, who married his successor, Ali. It is a vulgar error, that the body of Mohammed was laid in a steel coffin, and suspended in his tomb at Medina between two magnets. The "Koran" of this impostor contains a good deal of practical morality, drawn from the Scriptures, but blended with extravagant tales and blasphemous doctrines. It has been well translated into English by Sale, and into French by Savary.

MOIR, David Macleth, moir, a modern poet and prose writer, who was educated for and practised the medical profession. He made his first appearance as an author in 1812, by writing a few minor poems and essays. He next wrote for some local magazines and journals, and, at the commencement of "Blackwood's Magazine," he became a contributor to its pages, and remained so until his death. For the same magazine he also wrote "The Autobiography of Maule Wauch." In 1831 he published the "Outlines of the Ancient History of Medicine," and, in the same year, exerted himself energetically while the cholera raged in Muscellaruch, where he practised his profession, and subsequently published a pamphlet entitled "Practical Observations on Malignant Cholera." In 1851 he delivered a course of lectures upon the "Poetical Literature of the Past Century," at the Edinburgh Philosophical Institution. As a poet, he was tender and pathetic, rather than forcible and original. His poetical works were collected in 1852, and to them was prefixed his life. Dr. Moir was a graceful essayist, and a competent man of science, and was, moreover, a kind and excellent man. B. at Musselburgh, 1798; D. 1851.

MOITTE, Jean Guillaume, moit, a famous French sculptor, whose father was an engraver of some eminence. After studying under Pigal and Lemoyne, he obtained the grand prize for sculpture, in 1768, for a statue of David with the head of Goliath. This entitled him to be sent to complete his studies at Rome, from which city he returned to Paris in 1773. He was admitted a member of the French Academy in 1783. His chief works are bas-reliefs, the most worthy of notice of which are the great basso-relievo of the front of the Pantheon, which was removed after the restoration of the Bourbons, and one in the gallery of the Luxembourg. Among his statues are the colossal figures of Brittany and Normandy at the barrier des Bons Hommes, and an equestrian statue of Napoleon. B. 1747; D. 1810.

MOLA, Pierfrancesco, mo'-la, a clever historical and landscape painter, a pupil of Albani. B. at Coldere, in the Milanese, about 1821; D. 1866.

MOIRAN, Abraham de. (See DEMOIRAN.)

MOLAI, Jacques de, mo'-lai, was the last grand-master of the order of Templars. The prodigious wealth of the knights having excited the envy and hatred of Philip the Fair, king of France, he resolved to suppress the order. Accordingly, a violent persecution broke out against the knights, on charges the most absurd and abominable. Molai was tried, condemned, and burnt alive near Paris, in 1314. He endured his suffering with fortitude, and vindicated the innocence of his order to the last.

MOLÉ, Francis René, mo'-lai, an eminent French comedian, who during the revolution became an associate of the Jacobins, and officiated in the church of St. Roch, as the priest of the goddess of Reason. B. 1734; D. 1802.

MOLÉ, Louis Mathieu, Count de, a distinguished French statesman, was the son of President Molé, who fell a victim to the French revolution. After living some time with his mother in Switzerland and England, he returned to France in 1796, studied at the Ecole Centrale, which was subsequently converted into the Polytechnic School, and in 1806 attracted the attention of Napoleon, by a volume of "Essais de Morale et de Politique," which contained opinions of a highly absolute cast. From this time his rise was rapid, and in 1813 he was appointed minister of justice, and received the title of count. On the fall of Napoleon he was made a peer of France, and in 1817 filled the office of minister of the navy under the Duke of Richelieu, but quitted this post when his colleagues displayed the reactionary tendencies which ended in the expulsion of Charles X. from the throne. After the revolution of 1830, Count Molé, for a brief period, held the office of minister of foreign affairs; and in 1836 was elevated to the post of prime minister, of which he was dispossessed in 1839 by the coalition of Thiers and Guizot. After the revolution of 1848, though elected both to the constituent and the legislative assemblies, he took comparatively little interest in political affairs, but remained staunch to his conservative views, and after the coup-d'état of 1851, against which he protested, retired into private life. B. 1780; D. 1855.

MOLESWORTH, Lord Robert, moles'-worth, a nobleman who contributed so effectually to the revolution of 1689, that William III. admitted him of the privy council, and dispatched him upon an embassy to the court of Denmark. Having given some offence at Copenhagen, he was recalled, and after his return to England, published an account of the kingdom of Denmark, which enjoyed great popularity. Under George I. he acted as commissioner of trade and plantations. The same monarch also advanced him to the Irish peerage in 1716. B. at Dublin, 1656; D. 1725.

MOLESWORTH, Sir William, an English statesman and man of letters, was the eighth baronet in his family, an old Cornish one, originally of Irish extraction. After spending some time at Cambridge and Edinburgh, where an Italian refugee was his tutor in classics, metaphysics, and mathematics, he repaired to Germany. Philology and history were his chief studies in the latter country; and, after completing his collegiate course, he made the tour of Europe, and returned to his native land in 1831. In the year following he was returned to Parliament as member for East Cornwall; was re-elected in 1834; but, in 1837, declining to contest this seat, he sought and obtained the suffrages of Leeds. He represented this latter place until 1841, after which time he remained out of Parliament during several years. The constituency of Southwark chose him as their representative in 1845, and in that capacity he sat in the House of Commons until his death. In the Aberdeen administration of 1853, he was appointed first commissioner of public works, and in 1855 commenced his short but brilliant career as secretary for the colonies. As a speaker, he was too philosophical to be generally popular; but several of his speeches were as well received as they, and, indeed, nearly all he uttered, deserved to be. These were orations on the colonies, on the state of the nation and condition of the people, and on transportation. He was for some time the proprietor and conductor, in conjunction with his friend John Stuart Mill, of the "Westminster Review." Many valuable articles from his pen likewise appeared in the newspapers and periodicals. A noble edition of the works of Thomas Hobbes (see HOBBS), in 16 volumes, was produced by him at his own expense. B. in Cornwall, 1810; D. 1855.

MOLESWORTH, Jean Baptiste, mol'-sair, a celebrated French comic poet, whose real name was Poquelin. His father, who was a tapestry-maker, intended him for the same business; but young Poquelin being in the habit of visiting the theatre, conceived a violent inclination for the stage. At the age of 14 he commenced his studies under the Jesuits, and made a rapid progress in belles lettres. His father becoming reduced in circumstances, the youth associated himself with some persons of his own age, who had a like attachment to dramatic representation. It was in consequence of this connexion that he took the name of Molière. This event took place in the year 1645, after which time we hear no more of him until 1653, when he was appointed by the prince de Conti who had known the youth at college, director of an histrionic company at Languedoc. He subsequently went with his players to Lyons, where, in 1653, he brought out his first comedy, entitled "L'Etourdi," or, "The Blunderer," which piece was received with great applause, and greatly pleased his patron, the prince de Conti. That prince offered to make him his secretary, which honourable station Molière declined, saying, that, "though he was a passable author, he should make but a bad secretary." After performing at various places, Molière's company visited Paris, where, in 1653, they performed several of his plays before Louis XIV., who took the troupe into his own service, and gave their leader a pension. During the subsequent fifteen years, Molière worked hard as a dramatic author and actor, and received many substantial marks of the royal favour. His last piece, L'Hypocrite, occasioned his death; for, by his exertions in performing Arnan, the principal character, he was seized with a convulsion, of which he died. The archbishop of Paris refused to allow his remains to be interred in consecrated ground, on account of his profession, till he was compelled to do so by the king. Molière left a widow, with whom he had lived a very unhappy life, and who married a comedian named Guérin, and died in 1723, aged 62. The works of Molière have been often printed; one of the best editions is that of Paris, 1833. They have been translated into English; and several of his comedies have been adapted to our stage with success. Molière is justly called the French Aristophanes. n. at Paris, 1622; n. 1673.

MOLIERES, Joseph Privat de, mol'-e-air, a philosophical writer, became a member of the congregation of the Oratory, and was a pupil of Malebranche, on whose death he quitted the society and devoted himself wholly to physics and mathematics. He was afterwards professor of philosophy at the royal college, and died in 1742. Molières' works are, "Philosophical Lectures;" "Mathematical Lectures," and "La Premier Partie des Elémens de Géométrie." n. at Tarascon, 1677; n. 1742.

MOLINA, Louis, mo'-le-na, a celebrated Spanish Jesuit. He completed his studies at Coimbra, after which he was professor of divinity at Evora during twenty years. Molina wrote "Commentaries on the 'Summa' of Aquinas," a treatise "De Justitia et Jure," another "De Concordia Gratia et Liberi Arbitrii." The last is a work of merit, and occasioned great disputes afterwards between the Jesuits and Dominicans, the latter order accusing Molina of reviving Pelagianism. n. 1535; n. 1601.

MOLINOS, Michael, mo'-le-nose, a Spanish divine, who published a book called the "Spiritual Guide," in which he maintained that man must annihilate himself, or reduce his mind to an absolute quiescence, in order to enjoy God. For this he was sent to the prison of the Inquisition, where he died. The religious opinions of Molinos occasioned great disputes in France, where they were known by the name of "quietism," on account of the passive disposition of mind which they inculcate. Fénelon and Madame Guyon were the great advocates and improvers of this system. n. 1627; n. 1698.

MOLLOY, Charles, mol'-loi, a dramatic writer, who became a student of the Middle Temple, and was the editor of a periodical paper called "Common Sense." His plays are, "The Perplexed Couple," "The Coquette," and "The Half-pay Officers." n. in Dublin, 1706; n. 1766.

MOLO, mo'-lo, a rhetorician, who went to Rome n.c. 87. He taught rhetoric with great reputation, and had Cicero and Julius Caesar among his pupils. The former followed him to Rhodes to profit by his instructions. Some years afterwards, Molo was sent ambassador by his countrymen to the Roman senate, and was received with great honour.

MOLYNEUX, Sir William, mol'-i-nez, a gallant knight in the reign of Henry VIII., who displayed great bravery at the battle of Flodden Field. On his death-bed he gave this advice to his son: "Let the underwood grow; the tenants are the support of a family, and the commonalty are the strength of a kingdom. Improve this fairly; but force not violently, either your bounds or rents, above your forefathers'."

MOLYNEUX, William, an eminent mathematician, who received his education at Trinity College, Dublin, after which he entered as a student of the Middle Temple, London. The Philosophical Society, established at Dublin in 1683, owed its origin to his endeavours, and he became the first secretary. Soon after, he was appointed or-general of the works and chief engineer. In 1685 he was chosen a member of the Royal Society, and in 1689 settled with his family at Chester, where he employed himself in finishing his "Treatise on Dioptries," which was published in 1692. In this year he returned to Dublin, and was chosen one of the representatives for that city. Besides the above, he wrote: "Sciothericum Telescopium;" or, a description of a Telescope Dial invented by him; also, "The Case of Ireland stated, in relation to its being bound by Acts of Parliament in England;" some papers in the "Philosophical Transactions;" and several letters between him and Mr. Locke. n. at Dublin, 1656; n. 1698. — Samuel, son of the preceding, became secretary to George II. when Prince of Wales, and was distinguished by his skill in astronomy. He improved the method of making telescopes, and presented one made by himself to the king of Portugal. But being appointed a commissioner of the Admiralty, he was left without time to pursue his scientific inquiries. He gave his papers on the subject to Dr. Smith, professor of astronomy at Cambridge, who printed them in his "Treatise on Optics." n. at Chester, 1689; n. 1738.

MONBODDO, James Burnett, styled Lord, mon-bod'-do, a learned Scotch writer, and one of the lords of the Court of Session, received his education at Aberdeen, and at the university of Groningen. In 1738 he returned to Scotland, commenced the practice of the legal profession, and was, in 1767, elevated to the bench. As a writer, he was profound but paradoxical. Boswell, in a note in his "Tour to the Hebrides," says, "there were several points of resemblance between him and Dr. Johnson: learning, clearness of head, precision of speech, and a love of research on many subjects which people in general do not cultivate." Foote paid Lord Monboddoo the compliment of saying, "that he was an Elzevir edition of Dr. Johnson." His most important works were, a "Dissertation on the Origin and Progress of Language," and "Ancient Metaphysics." He held the singular notion that men were only a civilized species of monkeys, and that the savage state was that in which virtue and happiness could be best attained. His extravagant admiration of the ancients led him to make, like them, supper his principal meal, and at these entertainments he had Dr. Nash, Dr. Hutton, and many of the learned of Edinburgh, as his guests. n. at Monboddoo, Kincardineshire, 1714; n. at Edinburgh, 179 come a captain till 1791. In 1793, having been sent to the Pyrenees at the head of the "chasseurs Cantabres," he so distinguished himself by his gallantry, that in a short time he became successively general of brigade and general of division. In 1795 and 1796 he made most successful campaigns in Spain and Italy; and, after the peace of Lunéville, was appointed inspector-general of the gendarmerie; in which capacity he rendered such important services to Napoleon, that he was made one of his first marshals in 1804, and soon afterwards created duke of Conégliano. In 1808 he once more took part in the war with Spain, and contributed to the capture of Saragossa in 1809; but, during the last years of the empire, he ceased to participate in military operations which he disapproved, and did not reappear till 1814, when he tried, as major-general of the national guard, to defend the walls of Paris, laying down his arms only after the capitulation was signed. After the "hundred days," Monecy refused to preside at the council of war appointed to try Marshal Ney; and for this generous act was imprisoned in the fortress of Ham for three months, deprived of all his functions, and expelled from the chamber of peers, to which, however, he was readmitted in 1819. In 1823 he joined the Duke d'Angoulême in his invasion of Spain, and finished his military career with a success worthy of his first exploits. He was afterwards nominated governor of the Hôtel des Invalides, and in this capacity received the ashes of Napoleon in 1840. n. 1754; p. 1812.

MONGE, Gaspard, mawnzsh, an eminent French geometrician, was the son of an hotel-keeper, and was employed, at the age of 16, to teach natural philosophy in the college of Lyons. In 1780 he became member of the Academy of Sciences, and, three years afterwards, was appointed examiner of naval aspirants. Energetically espousing the principles of the Revolution, he became, in 1792, minister of marine, which post proving to be little in accordance with his genius, he renounced the employment soon afterwards, and turned his attention to providing his country with the most efficient methods of defence. He was one of the founders of the Polytechnic School, accompanied Bonaparte to Egypt, and became president of the Institute of Cairo. The emperor subsequently nominated him senator, Count de Peluse, and loaded him with honours. After the restoration of the Bourbons, he fell into disgrace. His various works on geometry are among the clearest and best in the French language, which is particularly rich and excellent in this department of science. n. 1746; p. 1813.

MONGE, Lieutenant-colonel, was sent to Vienna by Napoleon, after his escape from Elba, to carry off Maria Louisa and her son to France; and, under various disguises, reached the Austrian capital, and had nearly succeeded in his mission, when the police got notice of the project. Monge was obliged to flee, but effected his escape to France, rejoined the emperor, and fought at Waterloo. He was ultimately reduced to such poverty as to be obliged to work as a common labourer. n. in the hospital of St. Louis, 1829.

MONMOUTH, James, duke of, mon'-mouth, natural son of Charles II., was, at his father's restoration, created earl of Orkney, and, at a subsequent period, became duke of Monmouth and knight of the Garter. He was for some time in the service of France, with an English regiment, and signalized himself against the Dutch; for which he was made lieutenant-general. On his return to England he was sent, in 1679, to quell an insurrection in Scotland; after this he joined the disaffected party, who were for excluding the duke of York from the succession to the throne. He was also concerned in a plot against his father, for which he was pardoned, and then went to Holland, whence he returned on the accession of James II., and having landed in Dorsetshire, obtained followers, but was defeated at Sedgemoor, in Somersetshire, and being taken prisoner, was conveyed to London, where he was tried and sentenced to death. n. at Rotterdam, 1649; beheaded, 1685.

MONROVIER, Jean Baptiste, mo-nvot'-yai, a celebrated fruit and flower painter, who was employed by Le Brun to decorate the palace at Versailles with examples of his art, and became member of the French Academy of Painters. His fame reaching England, he was invited to London about 1680, by the duke of Montague, to embellish his house (the late British Museum). These beautiful decorations were, however, destroyed when the palace was pulled down to allow of the erection of the present building. Monoyer likewise decorated the mansions of several others of the English nobility, and fourteen flower-pieces by him are to be seen in the room called George the Second's private chamber, at Hampton Court Palace. He studied a collection of his own designs, which was published in a folio volume. n. at Lille, 1636; p. in London, 1699.

MONRO, Alexander, mun-ro', a celebrated physician, who studied at Leyden, and contracted an intimate friendship with Boerhaave. In 1719 he returned to Edinburgh, where he read lectures on anatomy. His most important and valuable works are,—"Csteology," "Anatomy of the Nerves," several papers in the "Medical Essays" of Edinburgh, and on the "Success of Inoculation in Edinburgh." They were collected and published together in 1781, in one volume. n. in Scotland, 1697; p. 1767.

MONROE, James, fifth president of the United States, was of Scotch descent, and entered the American army of independence, as volunteer, in his 16th year, and, at the close of the war, became colonel, on the recommendation of General Washington. He next studied the law at the William and Mary College, in Virginia, and was sent as representative of Westmoreland county to the legislature. After forming a member of the senatorial body of the United States for three years, General Washington appointed him minister to France. In 1796 he was recalled, but was, two years afterwards, chosen governor of his native state of Virginia. He held that office for three years, at the end of which he again went to France as United States minister. While in Paris, he negotiated the purchases of New Orleans and St. Louisiana. He next represented his native country at the courts of Spain and Great Britain, and, in 1808, returned home. After serving as secretary of state under President Madison, he was chosen president, in 1816, and re-elected in 1821. Upon the termination of his presidency, he retired to Virginia, where he acted as a justice of the peace. During the last years of his life, he lived at New York. The line of policy known as the "Monroe Doctrine" was first promulgated by Monroe. It reserves the whole American continent for the inhabitants of the United States, and declares that no foreign power ought to possess jurisdiction over any portion of it. n. in Westmoreland county, Virginia, 1751; n. at New York, 1831.

MONSEY, Messenger, mon'-se, an English physician, was a man of great eccentricity of manners, and of considerable talents, and was for many years physician of Chelsea Hospital. Having a great aversion to interment in churches or churchyards, he ordered, by his will, that his body be dissected, and the skeleton preserved in Chelsea Hospital. n. 1692; n. 1784.

MONSON, Sir William, mon'-son, an English naval officer, born at South Carlton, in Lincolnshire, was educated at Balliol College, Oxford, and entering the naval service, served in several expeditions in the reign of Elizabeth. He was knighted by the Earl of Essex, for his conduct in the expedition to Cadiz; and in the reign of James I. he distinguished himself against the Dutch. n. 1649; n. 1613.

MONSTRELET, Enguerrand de, mon'-stre-lat, a celebrated French chronicler, relative to whose early life nothing authentic is known. He was appointed provost of the city of Cambrai, and bailiff of Wallaincourt, which offices he retained until his death. His chronicles commence about the time that Froissart's terminate, and, like his predecessor, he gives a clear and picturesque narrative of the wars of France, and of the principal persons engaged in them, from the year 1400 to 1453. The best modern edition of Monstrelet's Chronicles is that of Buchon, published in 1836. An English translation of the work was made by Mr. Johnes, in 1810. n. about the close of the 14th century; n. 1453.

MONTAGU, Basil, mon'-ta-gu, an English writer on law, and editor of the works of Lord Bacon, after concluding his educational career at the university of Cambridge, entered himself at Gray's Inn, and was called to the bar in 1758. Possessed of little talent as a pleader, he turned his attention to the laws of bankruptcy, obtained a good practice in that department, and wrote many valuable works connected therewith. Lord Erskine, while lord chancellor, appointed him a commissioner of bankrupts; but Mr. Montagu, convinced of the injury done to suitors by this mode of administering the law, published, and presented to the House of Commons, some statements which led to the abolition of the commissionerships and the enactment of a new law, under which he received the post of accountant-general in bankruptcy, and retained it for ten years. His legal works are too numerous to be here quoted; but in general literature the most important of his labours were "Selections from the Works of Taylor, Hooker, Hall, and Lord Bacon;" "The Works of Francis Bacon, Lord Chancellor of England," in 16 vols., to which was added a life of that great writer. Altogether, he is said to have published forty volumes, leaving behind him upwards of a hundred more in MS. n. in London, 1770; n. 1851.

MONTAGU, Lady Mary Wortley, was the eldest daughter of Evelyn Pierrepont, earl, and afterwards duke of Kingston. She received a liberal education, and taught herself the elements of the Latin language. In 1712 she married

Montagu

Edward Wortley Montagu, grandson of the first earl of Sandwich. This gentleman distinguished himself in Parliament as an able and upright senator, and was the intimate friend of Addison. In 1716 he was appointed ambassador to the court of Constantinople, whither he was accompanied by his lady. During this embassy, she wrote an elegant and interesting description of Constantinople, in letters to her friends. Of these, a surreptitious edition appeared in 1733, in 3 vols., to which was afterwards added a fourth volume. The editor was the notorious Cleland. These letters were so well received, as to pass through several issues, and to be translated into many languages. A genuine edition of these, and Lady Mary's other works, was published under the authority of her son, the marquis of Bute, in 1807. While at Constantinople, she obtained information of a practice among the villagers, of inoculating for the small-pox. This operation she performed on her son, and by this means was instrumental in introducing inoculation into the east of Europe. At the end of 1718, Lady Mary returned to England, and settled at Twickenham, where she formed an intimacy with Pope; but the friendship was afterwards broken off, and the poet did not scruple to write satires against her talents and reputation, which, however, he was mean enough to deny. In 1730, on account of her health, Lady Mary went to Italy, and took up her residence in Venice, where she remained till 1761, when, at the request of her daughter, Lady Bute, she returned to England. n. at Thoresby, Nottinghamshire, 1690; n. 1762. A complete edition of her writings was published by her great-grandson, Lord Wharfedale, in 1836, under the title of "Letters and Works of Lady Mary Wortley Montagu."

MONTAGU, Edward Wortley, son of the preceding, whom his niece, in her biography of his mother, describes as "betraying from the beginning (that surest symptom of moral (or mental) disease, an habitual disregard of truth, accompanied by a fertile and ready invention, never at fault." He received his education at Westminster school, whence he ran away, and entered into the service of a chimney-sweeper. His family had given him up as lost, when a gentleman recognised him in the street, and took him home to his father. He escaped a second time, and engaged with the master of a fishing smack; after which he shipped himself on board a vessel bound to Spain, where he served as a muleteer. In this situation he was discovered and conveyed home to his friends, who placed him under a tutor, with whom he travelled abroad. His father being rather senile in his remittances, owing probably to the son's extravagance, the tutor is said to have committed a curious fraud to obtain a supply. This was the printing a book entitled "Observations on the Rise and Fall of Ancient Republics, by Edward Wortley Montagu, Esq." This work, whether the production of the son or not, gave great pleasure to the old gentleman, who acknowledged it in a handsome manner. Edward was for some time in Parliament, and conducted himself in a manner becoming his rank. He afterwards went to the Levant, where he adopted the dress and manners of the Turks. Out of pique against his family, he caused an advertisement to be inserted in the English papers, for a wife without fortune, in order that, by having an heir, he might disappoint his relations, which expedient, however, failed. He wrote "Observations on Earthquakes," and some curious papers in the "Philosophical Transactions." n. 1713; p. 1776.

MONTAGUE, George, a distinguished English naturalist, was one of the original members of the Linnean Society of London. His "Ornithological Dictionary, or Alphabetical Synopsis of British Birds," was first published in 1802, and may be advantageously consulted by the student of natural history, even at the present time. In the following year, he put forth a "Natural History of British Shells, Marine, Land, and Fresh-water," to which a supplement was added in 1809. His most important contributions to the Transactions of the Linnean Society were, a "Description of three Rare Species of British Birds," "On some Species of British Quadrupeds, Birds, and Fishes," "Of several New or Rare Animals, principally Marine, found on the South Coast of Devonshire," and "Some New and Rare British Marine Shells and Animals." Mr. Montague was a gentleman of ancient family, who resided upon his estate in Wiltshire, and afterwards at Kingsbridge, in Devonshire, and his works were the result of a polished and lettered ease. n. 1815.

MONTAGUE, Richard, a learned English prelate, who, in 1616, became dean of Hereford, and in 1621 published a learned answer to Selden's "History of Tithes." He afterwards engaged in a controversy with the Roman Catholics, on which occasion he wrote his "Appello Cæsarem," for which he was ordered to appear at the bar of the House of Commons in the first Parliament of Charles I., on the charge of maintaining Arminian and popish errors. He was made bishop of Chichester in 1628, whence he was translated to Norwich in 1638. His principal work is an "Ecclesiastical History," in Latin, in which his learning appears to great advantage. n. in Buckinghamshire, about 1577; p. 1641.

MONTAGUE, Elizabeth, an English authoress, the care of whose education was undertaken by the celebrated Dr. Conyers Middleton. (See MIDDLETON, Conyers.) In 1760 Mrs. Montague published "An Essay on the Writings and Genius of Shakspeare," which obtained a great and deserved reputation. She formed a literary society, known by the name of the Blue-Stocking Club, from the circumstance that a gentleman belonging to it wore stockings of that colour. Mrs. Montague was noted for another peculiarity,—that of giving an annual dinner on May-day to the chimney-sweepers of the metropolis, to celebrate the fact of her kinsman (see MONTAGU, Edward Wortley) having been for some time a chimney-sweep. George Lord Lyttleton was a warm admirer of Mrs. Montague, and was assisted by her in the composition of his "Dialogues of the Dead." n. 1720; p. 1800.

MONTAIGNE, Michel, Seigneur, or Lord of, mont-aigne, a celebrated French essayist, was intended for the bar, but afterwards renounced that profession, and travelled into Germany, Switzerland, and Italy, making his observations rather on human nature than on places and curiosities. At Rome he was honoured with the citizenship. In 1581 he was chosen mayor of Bordeaux, in which post he gave such satisfaction as to be elected to fill this office a second time. He took part in the meeting of the States-general at Blois in 1589, when the Duke de Guise and his brother were treacherously murdered. After an active life, he retired to his seat of Montaigne, in Perigord, where he devoted himself for the remainder of his life to philosophical studies. The celebrated "Essays" were written at a time when Montaigne was suffering from deep melancholy, which had been induced by the horror with which the massacre of St. Bartholomew (1572) had inspired him. He kept a journal of his tour in Germany, Switzerland, and Italy, which was discovered two centuries afterwards, in his family château, and given to the world under the title of "Journal of the Travels of Michel de Montaigne." The "Essays," which were justly called by Cardinal du Perron "the breviary of free-thinkers," treated of the most diverse subjects, were evidently composed without plan, and were the simple and truthful expression of Montaigne's mind upon certain occasions. They are written in a facile and quaint style; on which account, as well as for their deep sincerity, they have a great charm for most readers. The most remarkable essays are those on friendship, the education of children, and on the administration of justice. The best English translation of the "Essays" is that of Cotton. n. at Montaigne, Perigord, 1593; p. 1592.

MONTALEMBERT, Marc René, Marquis de, mon-tal-em-bair, a celebrated French engineer general, and member of the Paris Academy of Sciences, displayed great military talent in the French, Russian, and Swedish services; but is best known by his works, which were, "Perpendicular Fortifications; or, the Art Defensive superior to the Art Offensive, by a New Manner of employing Artillery;" "Correspondence with Ministers and Generals," and some comedies and poems. n. at Angoulême, 1714; p. 1800.

MONTALEMBERT, Charles Forbes, Comte de, a celebrated French writer, who sprung from an old family of Poitou, and whose father was a peer of France, and ambassador at Stockholm from the court of Charles X. His mother was a Scotch lady. He received his education at the university of Paris. At the outset of his career he was an advocate of the union of Catholicism and democracy, of which Lamennais was the apostle (see LAMENNAIS), and was one of the editors of a journal founded to advocate that union, called "L'Avenir." He subsequently commenced a kind of crusade against the university, and opened, in 1831, with Lacordaire, a school called the "Ecole Libre." (See LACORDAIRE.) His opposition to the then existing government at length brought him before the tribunals of justice; but, during the process of trial, his father died, and as he thus became a peer of France, he claimed the right of being tried by the upper chamber, by which he was condemned to a fine of a hundred francs. His defence, pronounced before the chamber, may be considered as the beginning of his political career; but he was prevented, not having attained the legal age of 30, from taking his seat until 1840. The condemnation of Lamennais by the pope greatly increased the severity of Montalembert's orthodoxy, and, both by writing and speaking, he thenceforward made himself known as the great champion of Catholicism. In 1836 he published his famous "Life of Elizabeth of Hungary." In 1842 he strongly opposed the educational measure of M. Villemain, and in the following year published his Catholic manifesto. In 1813 he delivered, in the Chamber of Peers, three remarkable speeches on the liberty of the church, the liberty of education, and the liberty of the monastic orders. He also made himself notorious by the part he took on behalf of oppressed nationalities; and in 1817 had a solemn funeral service celebrated in Notre Dame to the memory of Daniel O'Connell. After the establishment of the republic, M. de Montalembert was elected a member of the Constituent Assembly, and then acted with the opposition party. He was opposed to the measure for again requiring journals to furnish security, to the continuance of the state of siege, and to the admission of Louis Bonaparte. At the end of the session, however, he supported a bill for the restriction of the press, and highly approved of the French expedition to Rome. He was re-elected to the Legislative Assembly, and distinguished himself by his frequent encounters with M. Victor Hugo, his only rival in oratory, and by his defence of the president. When the coup d'état came, he protested strongly against the imprisonment of the deputies, but was nevertheless named a member of the Consultative Commission,—a distinction he declined, and was, in 1852, elected into the Corps Législatif. At the election in 1857 he lost his seat, and retired into private life, but came before the public again as the writer of an article in the "Correspondant," which led to his being summoned before the bar of the correctional police, and to his subsequent trial, which attracted the attention of all Europe. For that effusion he was fined 3000 francs, and ordered to be imprisoned for six months. M. de Montalembert was likewise known in England as the author of two eloquent works, entitled, respectively, "Catholic Interests in the 19th century," and the "Political Future of England." The first was a brilliant but partial review of Catholicism in Europe; the conclusion arrived at being, that that form of religious belief promised to spread and to endure. In the latter work he displayed great knowledge and still greater sympathy with English intelligence and energy: its schools, its journalism, and its political institutions, were discussed in a liberal and enlarged spirit; but the work can have little practical benefit, on account of the singular view of the author, that England would gain by renewing her connexion with Rome. Both these works have been translated into English. M. Montalembert proved himself one of the first men in Europe, both as a writer and as a speaker; and, by his eminence and his great interest in literature and education, was among the leaders of the French Academy, of which he was elected a member in 1852. n. in London, 1810.

MONTANUS, mon-tai'-nus, the founder of the sect of Christian heretics called Montanists, or Cataphrygians, pretended that the Holy Spirit descended upon him, as well as upon two of his followers, Priscilla and Maximilla, ladies of considerable property. He denied the doctrine of the Trinity, and condemned second marriages as adulterous. His followers, who were numerous, affected extraordinary agitations of the body, as the effects of the Spirit, and pretended to make prophecies. Among others who were gained over to this strange sect was the learned Tertullian; but, in the end, he separated himself from them. n. about the middle of the 2nd century, at Ardaba, in Mysia; n. at the beginning of the 3rd century.

MONTCAUSSE, Charles de St. Maure, duke de, mon-to'-sai, peer of France, was appointed by Louis XIV., in 1698, governor of the dauphin. He was a man of inflexible integrity and austere virtue, and inculcated in the mind of his pupil the purest sentiments. Bossuet and Fluct were nominated by him as the young prince's preceptors; it was for the use of the dauphin that the Delphin edition of the ancient classics was first made. Before his marriage with his wife, he presented to her a poetical offering, entitled "The Garland of Julia," which contained madrigals transcribed by the calligraphist Jarry, and was decorated with floral designs by the painter Robert. This splendid volume excited much interest on account of its beauty. n. 1610; p. 1690.

MONTCAULM, Louis Joseph, Marquis de, mont'-kam, a brave and distinguished French general, who entered the army at an early age, and signalized himself on many occasions, particularly at Piacenza, in 1716. In 1756 he became field-marshal, and was appointed to command the French army in Canada, where he opposed Lord London with considerable skill and success. He afterwards defeated Abercromby, his lordship's successor; but in the battle fought under the walls of Quebec, in 1759, Montcaulm received a mortal wound, as did also his brave opponent, the English general Wolfe. n. at Caudiac, near Nantes, 1712.

MONTCEVREUX, Count Sebastian, mon'-tai'-koo'-koo'-le, an Italian gentleman, who went to France in the suite of Catherine de Medici, and became enphearer to the dauphin Francis, son of Francis I. He was accused of having poisoned the young prince at Valence, in 1536, and, being put to the torture, confessed that he was hired to do it by the partisans of Charles V. The friends of the emperor, however, fully refuted the abominable charge, and threw it back upon his patron, Catherine de Medici, wife of Henry II., brother to the dauphin. Put to death 1536.

MONTCEVREUX, Raymond, Count de, a famous general in the service of Austria, entered early into the army, under his uncle, who commanded the artillery of the emperor. The first action in which he distinguished himself was in 1638, when, at the head of 2000 men, he surprised 10,000 Swedes, who were engaged in besieging Nussau, in Silesia, and whom he compelled to abandon their baggage and artillery, but was subsequently taken prisoner by General Bannier. He did not regain his liberty till two years afterwards; but employed that time to great advantage in study. On returning to his profession, he defeated the Swedes in Bohemia. After the peace of Westphalia, he travelled in different countries. In 1657 he was appointed field-marshal, and sent to the relief of John Casimir, king of Poland, who was attacked by Sweden and the prince of Transylvania. After defeating the latter, he took Cracow from the Swedes, and gained several important successes, which produced a peace. He next served against the Turks, and drove them out of Transylvania, for which he was made president of the imperial council. In 1678 he was sent against the French, and had to oppose the great Turenne, who fell in the contest, and Montcuenli, in his despatch to the emperor, regretted the loss of a man who was an honour to humanity. He afterwards acted with great courage and skill against the Prince de Condé. B. at Modena, 1608; D. 1680.

MONTMAYOR, George de, mon'-tai-mā-yor, a Castilian poet, who took his name from the place of his birth. After serving in the army, he was employed at the court of Philip II. He wrote "Diana," a pastoral romance, which was continued by (il Polo. B. 1520; D. 1562.

MONTESPAN, Madame de, mon'-tes-pā, a celebrated French lady, who was wife of a nobleman of that title, and mistress of Louis XIV., over whom she gained a complete ascendancy, which she maintained till that monarch became attached to Madame de Maintenon. Madame de Montespan had children by the king, one of whom became duke of Maine and another count of Toulouse. B. 1641; D. 1707.

MONTESQUIEU, Charles de Secondat, Baron de, mon'-tes-kye, an eminent French writer, who was educated for the legal profession. His first literary performance that became famous was entitled "Persian Letters," published in 1721, which gave proofs of a fine genius and a sound judgment. The year following he pleaded with so much eloquence against the imposition of a new tax, that it was suppressed. In 1728 he was admitted a member of the French Academy, though not without opposition from Cardinal Fleury, who conceived that there were some things dangerous to religion in the "Persian Letters." Montesquieu having formed the design of his great work, the "Spirit of Laws," travelled into Germany and Holland, and lastly to England, where he resided two years, calling this the country for thinking and France that for living. On his return home he published his treatise "On the Causes of the Greatness and Declension of the Romans." In 1748 appeared his "Spirit of Laws," which ought rather to have been termed the Spirit of Nations. In it the author distinguished three sorts of government, the republican, the monarchial, and the despotic; all of which he examined with much clearness, the whole work being an admirable exposition of political science as it was understood in the author's time. Montesquieu was an upright man and a conscientious judge. B. near Bordeaux, 1689; D. 1755.

MONTESUMA, mon-te-zu'-ma, the last emperor of Mexico, was a prince of noble qualities. He opposed the invaders of his country with firmness, but was at last seized by Cortes, who forced him to acknowledge himself a vassal of Spain. The Mexicans having assembled in great numbers against the Spaniards, Cortes, being apprehensive that he was not sufficiently strong to resist them, obliged his royal captive to appear in his robes, in order to appease his subjects. The insurgents, however, discharged their arrows while he was speaking, and mortally wounded him, in 1520. Prescott has finely narrated his history in his "Conquest of Mexico." Montezuma left two sons and three daughters, who embraced the Christian religion. The eldest received an estate and the title of count from Charles V. D. 1608.

MONTAUDON, Bernard de, mon'-fo-kau-ng, a learned French antiquary, who in his youth served as a cadet in the army; but the death of his parents made so great an impression upon his mind, that he entered the congregation of the Benedictines of St. Maur, in 1675. He applied himself to study with prodigious application, and acquired a great knowledge of languages, theology, history, and general literature. In 1698 he went to Italy, to consult the public libraries there, and was received with much distinction at Rome, by the college of cardinals and Pope Innocent XII. On his return to Paris, in 1702, he published a curious relation of his journey, under the title "Diarium Italicum." His principal works were, "Analeceta Græca," an edition of the works of St. Athanasius, Greek and Latin, with notes; a collection of ancient Greek writers, a French translation of Philo's "Contemplative Life," with notes; "Palaographia Græca," "Antiquities Explained," in French and Latin, and a supplement to the same (this is a work of immense erudition, and of the greatest value to students of art); "Monuments of the French Monarchy," an edition of the works of Chrysostom, "Dissertation on the History of Judith." B. at Soulague, Languedoc, 1655; D. at Paris, 1741.

MONTFORT, Simon, Count de, mawnt'-fort, a famous French general, who, in 1209, conducted the crusade against the Albigenses, on which occasion he tarnished his reputation by his cruelties. In 1213 he gained a complete victory over Raymond, count of Toulouse. B. 1165; killed at the siege of Toulouse, 1218.

MONTFORT, Simon de, earl of Leicester, mont'-fort, was younger son of the preceding, by an English lady. He went to England in 1236, to assume the English title in right of his mother, and was well received by Henry III., who appointed him to the government of Gascony, with the title of seneschal, and gave him his sister in marriage; but, rendering himself odious by his cruel rule, he incurred the displeasure of the English monarch. In revenge, he incited the English barons to revolt, placed himself at their head, in 1253, and forced the king to convoke a Parliament, called, by the old chroniclers, "the Mad Parliament," at Oxford, and extorted from him many important concessions. During many years, he exercised almost absolute power in England, and took the king and his son Edward prisoners at the battle of Lewes, in Sussex, in 1264. In the following year, however, Prince Edward made his escape from Hereford, where he had been confined; and, in the same year, the royal and baronial forces having met at Evesham, the latter were defeated with immense slaughter, both De Montfort and his son being among the slain. Much difference of opinion has existed among historians as to the character of De Montfort; but he was certainly a brave and able man, and, although probably more ambitious than he had openly professed to be, was undoubtedly greatly instrumental in founding English national liberty. Killed, 1265.

MONTGOLFIER, Jacques Etienne, mon-go'-fe-ai, the inventor of air-balloons, was a native of Vidalon-les-Annonai. In conjunction with an elder brother, he devoted himself to scientific pursuits, and was the first who manufactured vellum paper, still so much admired for its beauty. One day while boiling water in a coffee-pot, the top of which was covered with paper folded in a spherical form, he saw the paper swell and rise—a circumstance that suggested to him the idea of a light machine, made buoyant by inflation, for traversing the air. After various trials, it being ascertained that a balloon, with a car attached to it, could be kept suspended by a supply of heated air, the experiment was repeated on a large scale at Versailles, when the Marquis d'Arlandes ascended in the presence of the royal family, and a vast concourse of people. n. 1745; p. 1799.

MONTGOMERY, Gabriel de, Count of mont-gom'-e-re, a celebrated French nobleman, of Scottish descent, who, in 1559, had the misfortune to kill Henry II. of France, by accidentally wounding him in the eye, as they were tilting at a tournament given by that monarch, on the occasion of the marriage between his daughter Elizabeth and the king of Spain. After this unfortunate disaster, Montgomery went to Italy, and lived there and in other countries, till the civil wars recalled him to France, where he attached himself to the Protestants, and became one of their principal chiefs. He defended Rouen in 1562 against the royal army; and, when the city was taken by assault, he escaped to Havre. In 1569 he raised the siege of Bearne, in Navarre, then closely pressed by the Catholics, after which he followed the besiegers to Orthez, which he took by assault. Montgomery was at Paris at the time of the massacre of the Protestants in 1572, but escaped, though closely pursued. With his family, he retired first to Jersey, and afterwards to England. In 1573 he returned to Normandy, where he was joined by some of the Protestant nobility at St. Lo, at which place he was besieged by Matignon, lieutenant-general in Lower Normandy; but Montgomery escaped, and went to Domfront, whither he was followed by Matignon, who, after a prolonged contest, made him prisoner. This gallant nobleman was subsequently condemned to death by Catherine de' Medici, who was then regent of the kingdom, and beheaded in 1574.

MONTGOMERY, James, an English poet, was the son of a Moravian preacher, and was sent to be educated at the settlement of that sect at Fulneck, near Leeds. There he was principally distinguished for his indolence and melancholy; and, although poetry and fiction were strictly forbidden, he contrived to read, clandestinely, "Robinson Crusoe" and Cowper's poems. His inattention to his studies caused him to be placed by the school authorities with a shopkeeper, from whom, in 1789, he ran away. A few months afterwards he sent a volume of poems to a London bookseller, and followed it himself to the great metropolis. The poems were declined; but the young poet obtained a situation in the publisher's office. In 1791 he wrote a tale, his first prose production, for the "Bee," an Edinburgh periodical, and soon afterwards published a novel, which was declined, because the hero gave utterance occasionally to a strong expression. The young author was greatly hurt at this, for he was of a deeply religious cast of mind, and imagined he had only done that which was right in imitating Fielding and Smollett. He returned to a situation for some time, and at length entered the service of Mr. Gales, a printer and bookseller at Sheffield, who permitted him to write political articles for the "Sheffield Register," a paper conducted on what were then termed revolutionary principles. A warrant being issued for the apprehension of Gales, he fled to America, and Montgomery started a paper on "peace and reform" principles, called the "Sheffield Iris," and was soon afterwards indicted for producing some doggerel verses, which had been brought to his printing-office to be printed. For this he was fined £20, and sentenced to three months' imprisonment. On another occasion, for publishing an account of a riot at Sheffield, he was fined £30, and was imprisoned for six months. His subsequent career was comparatively uneventful. In 1806 he produced "The Wanderer in Switzerland," which quickly ran through three editions, and was subsequently followed by other and better works of the same nature, the chief of which were, "The West Indies," "The World before the Flood," and "Greenland," a poem descriptive of the establishment of the Moravians in that desolate region, which sect he had again joined. In 1823 he produced "Original Hymns for Public, Private, and Social Devotion." In 1825 he assumed the editorship of the "Sheffield Iris," whereupon he was entertained at a public dinner by his fellow-townsmen. His interesting "History of Missionary Enterprise in the South Seas" was produced in 1830. Five years later he was offered the chair of rhetoric in the university of Edinburgh, which he declined. Sir Robert Peel, about the same time, bestowed upon him a pension of £150. In 1836 he left the house of his old employer Gales, where he had lived during forty years, for a more convenient abode. He delivered several courses of lectures upon "The British Poets," at Newcastle-on-Tyne and other places, during some years; but, in 1841, he visited his native country on a missionary tour. His last effort was a lecture "On some Passages of English Poetry but little known," n. at Irvine, Ayrshire, 1771; p. at Sheffield, 1854.

MONTGOMERY, Rev. Robert, a popular poet and poet, of whose boyish years nothing is known till he conducted, at an early age, a periodical publication in Bath. In 1828 he produced his "Omnipresence of the Deity," which attained an astonishing degree of popularity, twelve editions having been sold in as many months. Another volume of religious poems soon followed, containing "A Universal Prayer," "Death," "A Vision of Heaven," and "A Vision of Hell." A third production, entitled "Satan," was next put forth, and obtained almost as much success as its predecessors. In 1830, the religious poet resolved to devote himself to the church, entered at Lincoln College, Oxford, and graduated B.A. in 1833. Two years afterwards he was ordained, and became a curate at Whittington, in Shropshire. In 1836 he went to London, where he officiated as minister of Percy-street Chapel, which he quitted for the Episcopal chapel of St. Jude's at Glasgow; but, as his preaching drew large congregation in the latter place, so much of controversy as engendered, that he resigned the incumbency. In 1843 he again commenced his ministerial labours at Percy-street Chapel, which he continued to fulfil until his death. In addition to the works already quoted, he published many others, nearly all of which shared the success of his early efforts. The principal of these were, "The Messiah, a Poem in Six Books;" "Luther, or the Spirit of the Reformation;" and "Sacred Meditations and Moral Themes." Lord Macaulay, in his essay on the Rev. Robert Montgomery, attributes the great success of his poems to unblushing puffery; but the real reason was, doubtless, that he addressed a very large class with whom poetry is usually rejected as profane, and who found in Montgomery's verse a mental food which had hitherto been denied to them. preacher, he is described as combining a mixture of rant and affectation; his manner was, however, engaging, and he was undoubtedly a general favourite with his congregations. b. at Bath, 1807; d. at Brighton, 1855.

MONTHOLON, Charles Tristan, Comte de, mou-to-lon, one of the most faithful adherents of Napoleon I., who, after serving for a short time in the navy, quitted it, and obtained a commission in a cavalry regiment, with which he went through the campaigns in Italy, Germany, and Poland; rose to the grade of colonel, and greatly distinguished himself at the battle of Wagram, where he received five wounds. Appointed chamberlain to the Emperor in 1809, he served him in that capacity until Napoleon's first abdication, when the count requested to be allowed to accompany him, but could not obtain that honour. During the Hundred Days he acted as one of Napoleon's aides-de-camp. Upon the deportation of the Emperor to St. Helena, the count accompanied him, and remained near his person until his death. He was one of the ex-emperor's executors, and to him were confided all the MSS. which had been composed at St. Helena. These he afterwards published under the title of "Mémoires towards the History of France under Napoleon, written at St. Helena." In 1840 he took part in Louis Napoleon's descent at Boulogne, and was sentenced to imprisonment with his leader. b. 1779; d. 1853.

MONTI, Vincenzio, mon-te, a celebrated Italian poet, was, in his youth, secretary to Don Luigi Braschi, nephew of Pope Pius VI.; but afterwards entirely devoted himself to poetry. Desirous of rivaling Alfieri, he wrote the tragedies of "Caius Gracchus" and "Aristodemo," and then composed several poems in imitation of Dante. He, in the first instance, ridiculed the French; but after the successes of the republic in Italy, he became one of the greatest eulogists of Napoleon. He next became professor of eloquence at Pavia, of belles-lettres at Milan, and, finally, historiographer of the new kingdom of Italy; but after the fall of Napoleon, he sang the praises of the Austrian empire, a versatility of opinion which caused him to lose the esteem of his countrymen. Besides the works we have quoted, he made a beautiful translation of Homer's "Iliad," and published some polemical writings. b. 1751; d. 1828.

MONTLUC, Blaise de, mont-look, a celebrated French general, who rose through the different ranks in the army to that of marshal of France. His first services were in Italy; and at the battle of Pavia, in 1525, he was taken prisoner. In the wars of Piedmont he served with great reputation, and, in 1536, recovered Bonlogne from the English. The city of Siena, in Tuscany, having driven out the imperial garrison, and solicited the protection of France, Montluc was appointed to command the forces sent thither in 1554. He sustained a siege of eight months against the imperial army, commanded by the Marquis de Marignano, who was obliged, after several attacks, to convert the siege into a blockade. It was not till the garrison and inhabitants had endured the utmost extremity of famine, that the place capitulated, when Montluc and his troops marched out with the honours of war. He commanded in Guienne during the wars which ravaged France on account of religion, and defeated the Huguenots in several actions, but was guilty of great cruelties to the vanquished. At the siege of Rabastens, in 1570, he was so severely wounded in the face, as to be obliged always to wear a mask to hide his deformity. At the age of 75 he wrote the memoirs of his military life, under the title of "Commentaries;" and therein recounted, with horrible frankness, the story of his numberless acts of cruelty. b. at the château of Montluc, Guienne, about 1502; d. 1577.

Montpensier

MONTMORENCY, Matthew de, mont-mo-rin-se, or mout-mo-ren-se, a distinguished French general, who signalized himself by his valour at the battle of Pont-à-Bouvines, in 1214, and, the year following, was employed against the Albigeuses, in Languedoc; for which services he received the sword of constable of France, and was made general of the army. He afterwards took several places from the English. Louis VIII. committed his son to the care of the constable, who, by his prudence, dissolved a league which had been formed against the queen-mother during the minority of Louis IX. d. 1230.

MONTMORENCY, Anne de, a descendant of the preceding, displayed great military talents at an early age, and was at the battle of Marignano in 1515. In 1521 he defended the city of Meziers, and compelled the count of Nassau to raise the siege. He accompanied Francis I. to Italy, as marshal of France, and was taken prisoner, with the king, at the battle of Pavia. The important services he had rendered to the state were rewarded with the sword of constable in 1538; but, several years afterwards, he fell under the displeasure of Francis. In the reign of Henry II. he regained favour at court, and was employed in military service, but was again disgraced through the intrigues of Catherine de' Medici. Charles IX. recalled him, and he served against the Calvinists, but was taken prisoner by them at the battle of Dreux, in 1562. Having obtained his liberty the year following, he took Havre from the English. b. at Chantilly, 1493; died of wounds received in battle, 1567.

MONTMORENCY, Henry, duke de, was grandson of the preceding, and was beloved by the people of France for his bravery, generosity, and other great qualities. Having joined Gaston of Orleans against Cardinal Richelieu, Montmorency took up arms in the province of Languedoc, of which he was governor. The king sent against him the marshals de la Force and Schomberg, and a battle ensued at Castelnaudary, where the duke was made prisoner, and, notwithstanding the earnest and general solicitations for his pardon, was beheaded at Toulouse in 1632. b. at Chantilly, 1595.

MONTPENSIER, mont-pé-se-ai, Anne Maria Louisa, Duchess de, was the daughter of Gaston, duke of Orleans, brother of Louis XIII. She was generally known by the name of Mademoiselle, and embraced the cause of Condé in the civil wars. She caused the cannon of the Bastille to be fired on the French troops, and showed, on many occasions, a most impetuous spirit. After trying in vain to espouse several sovereign princes, among the rest Charles II. of England, she is said to have secretly married the Count de Lauzun. Mademoiselle passed her last years in devotion, and wrote her memoirs, which are very curious, and full of anecdotes relative to the Court of Louis XIV. and the Fronde leaders. b. at Paris, 1627; d. 1693.

MONTROSE, James Graham, Marquis of, non-trose, was descended from one of the oldest families in Scotland. He married young, and went abroad, but returned to Scotland about 1633, and was generally considered one of the most accomplished gentlemen of his time. He was at first one of the most violent of the popular leaders, and took a principal part in the preparation of the National Covenant; but, thinking himself slighted by the Covenanters, went over to the royal side. In 1644 he was nominated by Charles I. captain-general of the forces to be raised in Scotland, and immediately commenced his attacks upon the Covenanters with various success. At the battle of Tippermuir, however, he defeated the Covenanters with immense slaughter; but, being surprised at Philiphaugh, in 1645, by General Lesly, his forces were routed, and he and a few followers only succeeded in gaining the Highlands after considerable difficulty. In 1646 he was allowed to take his departure for Norway. He went to France, and served with great distinction in the army of that power, and was offered the grade of lieutenant-general of the Scots in France, and other high appointments, all of which he refused. After the death of Charles I., Montrose was deputed by Charles II. to invade Scotland, and accordingly dispatched some troops to the Orkneys, joining them himself shortly afterwards; but, in the very first encounter with the Covenanters on the mainland, he was utterly routed. He escaped in the disguise of a Highland rustic; but was soon delivered up to General Lesly, and taken to Edinburgh, where he was subjected to many barbarous indignities, and sentenced to death. His demeanour throughout this crisis was dignified and self-possessed, and caused many to sympathize with him who had before regarded him as the cruel agent of a tyrant. In 1650 he was hanged on a gibbet, after which his limbs were severed from his body, and affixed to the gates of the chief towns in Scotland. Charles II., at the Restoration, reversed the sentence, and ordered the scattered remains of the unfortunate nobleman to be collected; which was accordingly done, and they were buried with great solemnity in Edinburgh. n. in Scotland, 1612.

MONTUCLA, Jean Etienne, mon-took'-la, a French mathematician and scientific writer, was an associate of the National Institute, and a member of the Academy of Berlin. He accompanied Turgot to Cayenne, as secretary of the government and royal astronomer. On his return to France, he was appointed first commissioner of public buildings. His principal works were, "Researches on the Quadrature of the Circle," "Collection of Tracts upon Inoculation," and "History of Mathematics." This last is valuable, and has been translated into English. n. at Lyons, 1725; n. 1799.

MONTUCCI, Antonio, mon'-took'-che, a learned philologist, particularly excelling as a Chinese scholar, studied at the university of Siena, devoting himself to the living languages with almost incredible application. In 1785 he was appointed professor of English in the Tolomei college; and, in 1789, accompanied Mr. Wedgwood to England as Italian teacher in his family. Being in London in 1792, when preparations were making for Lord Macartney's embassy to China, Montucci took the opportunity of obtaining assistance from some Chinese youths attached to the embassy in acquiring their language, with which he was before only imperfectly acquainted. In 1806 he went to Berlin, on the invitation of the king of Prussia; but the invasion of the country by Bonaparte for some time interrupted his plans; and, returning to Italy, he died at Siena, in 1820. n. there, 1762. He was the author of a "Chinese Dictionary," an "Italian Pocket Dictionary," and several elementary works in that language; and edited the "Poesie inedite" of Lorenzo de' Medici, published at the expense of Mr. Roscoe.

MOORE, Sir Jonas, moor, whose mathematical knowledge recommended him to Charles II., who employed him in several works and made him surveyor-general of the ordinance. He was one of the governors of Christ's Hospital, and mainly instrumental in inducing Charles to endow a school for mathematics in that institution, for the use of which Sir Jonas compiled a "General System of Mathematics," in 2 vols., which was published subsequent to the author's death, n. about 1620; n. 1681.

MOORE, Edwin, an English poet, who wrote "Fables for the Female Sex;" "The Gamester," a tragedy; "Gill Blas," a comedy, and other pieces. He was likewise editor of The World, a weekly paper, for which Lords Lyttleton and Chesterfield and Horace Walpole wrote. n. 1712; n. 1757.

MOORE, Dr. John, a physician and miscellaneous writer, who received his education at Glasgow, where he applied to the study of medicine. In 1747 he became assistant-surgeon in the army in Flanders, where he remained till the general peace. After the war, he pursued his medical studies at London and Paris; at the latter place he was appointed surgeon to the household of Lord Albemarle, the English ambassador. On his return to Scotland, he became partner with Dr. Gordon, an eminent practitioner at Glasgow; but, in 1772, he accepted an invitation to travel with the young duke of Hamilton. After spending five years abroad, Dr. Moore settled in London, and, in 1779, published the fruits of his travels, in "A View of Society and Manners in France, Switzerland, and Germany." This work was so well received that, in 1781, he added to it two volumes, entitled, "A View of Society and Manners in Italy." In 1785 he published "Medical Sketches." His next performance was a novel of a very superior character, entitled "Zeluco," which abounds with incident, though the principal character is so atrocious as to excite the reader's horror. In 1792 he accompanied Lord Lauderdale to Paris, and witnessed some of the principal scenes in the Revolution, of which he published an interesting account in 1795. The year following appeared his novel entitled "Edward," intended as a contrast to "Zeluco," but inferior to it. In 1799 he gave to the world "Mordaunt;" being sketches of life, characters, and manners in various countries. This work is neither a romance, novel, nor book of travels; but it contains many lively and instructive observations. n. at Stirling, 1780; n. at Richmond, 1802.

MOORE, Sir John, a brave and distinguished English general, was son of the preceding, and entered the army in his fifteenth year. His father possessing great influence in aristocratic circles, caused the young soldier to rise rapidly, and to gain the rank of lieutenant-colonel before he had seen any service. In , however, he showed that he was possessed of great military qualities, by the part he took in Paoli's descent upon Corsica. His next services were in the West Indies in 1796, in Ireland during the rebellion of '98, and in Holland shortly afterwards. In 1801 he commanded the reserve of the army dispatched to Egypt, and greatly signalized himself, receiving a wound at the head of his men. Upon the renewal of the war in 1802, he applied to be placed in command of a camp of instruction upon the Kentish coast. His request was granted, and he successfully trained a number of light infantry regiments, which afterwards formed the celebrated light division of the duke of Wellington's army in the Peninsular war, and evinced, by their deeds, a valuable proof of the soundness of Moore's method. In 1809 he went, with an army of 10,000 men, to Sweden, to assist Gustavus Adolphus IV. in defending his kingdom against the designs of Napoleon; but, becoming involved in a dispute with that monarch, he returned to England with his troops. In August of the same year he was sent to Portugal, and was placed in command of an army of 30,000 infantry and 5000 cavalry, which was ordered to co-operate with the Spanish troops against the French in the north of the peninsula. Two months afterwards he commenced his march from Lisbon; but, on entering Spain, discovered that the whole of the Spanish forces with which he was to act had been thoroughly routed. He had sent his cavalry and artillery by another route than that which he had pursued, and a wide tract of country still lay between himself and a portion of his army, which had been sent to him from England under Sir David Baird, and which had landed at Corunna. Sir John Moore remained for a time inactive at Salamanca, urged to advance by the British ambassador in Spain, but himself inclined to retreat into Portugal. Suddenly discovering that the French intended to surround him, he commenced a rapid, if not too hasty, march to Corunna. In that memorable retreat through the mountains of Galicia, in the depth of a severe winter, Sir John Moore displayed the highest qualities of a military commander. Before the battle of Corunna the British troops were, to all appearance, completely disorganized and exhausted; yet, animated by the example of their heroic leader, they turned upon their advancing foes, and inflicted upon them a decisive repulse. The victory was dearly bought, for Sir John Moore fell, but in a manner worthy of the last moments of Epaminondas, Bayard, and Wolfe. With his expiring breath he hoped, "that the people of England would be satisfied—that his country would do him justice." The student who desires to learn more of the personal history of this hero, may turn with advantage to the first volume of Napier's "History of the War in the Peninsula," to Southey's "Peninsular War," and to Jones's "Account of the War in Spain and Portugal." B. 1701; D. 1809.

MOORE, Thomas, a celebrated poet, was the son of a small tradesman at Dublin, and after receiving some education at a school in the same city, was entered at Trinity College, Dublin, in 1794. He had already commenced rhyme-making, and had inserted two poems in a Dublin magazine. His collegiate career was somewhat distinguished; but being of the Roman Catholic faith, he was not permitted to take honours. About 1799 he went to London, and entered himself of the Middle Temple, with the view of adopting the law as his profession. In 1801 he produced the "Odes of Anacreon," which he had composed while at college, and in the following year, "The Poetical Works of the late Thomas Little," a collection of lyrics in imitation of Catullus. He now began to be introduced to the fashionable circle in which, throughout his after life, he sought to move. Through the influence of Lord Moira he was, in the following year, appointed to a post at Bermuda; but finding, on his arrival, that the situation was distasteful to him, he returned almost immediately. He pursued his homeward journey throughout the United States, and visited New York, Virginia, Boston, Niagara, and Quebec. Soon after his arrival in England, he put forth his "Odes and Epistles," which being severely criticised by Jeffrey, led to the "bloodless duel" between himself and that gentleman satirized by Byron in his "English Bards and Scotch Reviewers." (See JEFFREY.) At this period he was much courted by the noble and the fashionable, and was a constant guest at Holland and Lansdowne Houses. He had a sweet voice, and being a good musician, was in the habit of singing the melodies of his native land with much success at aristocratic reunions. This fact led to his engaging himself to write a series of Irish melodies, the accompaniments to which were to be adapted from Irish airs by Sir John Stevenson. This task was not completed until 1834. Of a similar character were his "National Airs" and "Sacred Songs." In 1812, his friend Mr. Peary, editor of the "Morning Chronicle," negotiated on his behalf with the Messrs. Longman the sale of a quarto volume of poems, for which Moore was to receive 3000 guineas. Five years afterwards, this poem appeared under the title of "Lalla Rookh," and was immediately highly successful. This brilliant composition was something quite new to the public, who were captivated with its rich colouring, its melody, and its oriental spirit. The "Fudge Family in Paris" was his next work, and was the result of a visit to the French capital, made in company with Mr. Rogers. He soon afterwards learned that his deputy at Bermuda, "after keeping back from him the proper receipts of his office, had made free with the proceeds of a ship and cargo deposited in his hands." For this, Doctors' Commons made a claim upon him to the amount of £6000. The poet's friends proffered assistance; but he honourably resolved to pay off the claim out of the earnings of his pen. The remaining years of his life may be described as an untiring pursuit of poetry, prose, and fashionable society. As Byron said, he dearly loved a lord, and was never so happy as when he was in the presence of the noble. The simple enumeration of his chief productions will show, however, that he did not trifle with or neglect the magnificent gifts with which nature had endowed him. During the subsequent twenty years he laboured incessantly, and gave to the world, among others, "The Loves of the Angels," a poem; "The Epicurean," a prose-poetical romance; "Fables of the Holy Alliance," "Memoirs of Captain Rock," "The Summer Fête," "The Life of Lord Edward Fitzgerald," the "History of Ireland," and the "Life of Sheridan." Some time previously to the year 1821, Lord Byron intrusted Moore with his manuscript autobiography, which was to be published for Moore's benefit, but not until after Byron's death. In 1821 Moore sold the MS. to Murray, and engaged to edit it for the sum of 2000 guineas. In 1824 Byron died, but Lady Byron deeming that the publication of the autobiography was calculated to injure the character of her husband and his family, offered to repay to Mr. Murray the sum he had advanced to Moore. This the poet would not accede to, but, after some altercation, Moore himself repaid the sum he had obtained from the publisher, and the MS. was burnt. He, however, wrote a Life of Byron for the Messrs. Longman for a like sum. As a poet, he displayed grace, pathos, tenderness, and a luxuriant imagination; his melody was tender and flowing, but it was deficient in power and naturalness. His literary merits obtained for him, in 1835, a pension of £300 per annum. The "Irish Melodies" and "Lalla Rookh" have passed through many editions, and are still exceedingly popular. During the last years of his life, Moore was engaged in completing a collected edition of his poetical works, which was published after his death. His character was vain but kindly, and many proofs of his goodness of heart appear in the "Memoirs and Correspondence of Thomas Moore," edited by Earl Russell in 1856. b. at Dublin, 1779; d. 1852.

MORAND, Saverio François, mo-rant', a celebrated French surgeon, who went to England in 1729 to avail himself of the instructions of Cheselden, whose esteem he acquired. On his return to his own country, he became surgeon-major of the Guards, and director of the Academy of Surgeons. He was also made chevalier of the order of St. Michael, and admitted a member of the Academy of Sciences, and of the Royal Society of London. His chief works were,—"A Treatise on the High Operation for the Stone," "Discourse on the Necessity that a Surgeon should be learned," "Experiments and Observations on the Stone," and "Miscellaneous Works." b. at Paris, 1697; d. 1773.

MORANT, Philip, mo-rant', an English antiquary and divine, who became rector of Aldham, in Essex, and was appointed by the House of Peers to prepare the votes of Parliament for the press. He edited several works, and wrote a "History of Colchester," the "History of Essex," and some Lives, which were inserted in the "Biographia Britannica." b. in Jersey, 1710; d. 1770.

MORDAUNT, Charles. (See PETERBOROUGH, Lord.)

MORE, Sir Thomas, mor, a distinguished English statesman and writer, was the son of Sir John More, one of the judges of the King's Bench. He received his education at Oxford, and afterwards became a student of Lincoln's Inn. As soon as he came of age he obtained a seat in Parliament, where he opposed a subsidy demanded by Henry VII. for the marriage of his eldest daughter, with such eloquence that it was refused by the House. At the accession of Henry VIII., he was called to the bar, and, in 1508, appointed judge of the sheriff's court in London, which was then a considerable post. By the interest of Wolsey, he obtained the honour of knighthood and a place in the privy council. In 1521 he was made treasurer of the Exchequer, and, in 1523, chosen speaker of the House of Commons, where he resisted a motion for an oppressive subsidy, which gave great offence to Cardinal Wolsey. Sir Thomas was made Chancellor in 1530, and, by his indefatigable application in that office, there was, in a short time, not a cause left undetermined. To the high qualities of learning, wit, and liberality, he joined a staunch adherence to the Roman Catholic religion and the papal authority. This led him to deny the king's supremacy as head of the church in England, for which he was sent to the Tower, tried, and condemned to lose his head, which sentence he courageously endured. Sir Thomas More wrote several works against the reformation, and some epistles to Erasmus and other learned men. The best of his works is a kind of political romance, composed in Latin, entitled "Utopia," wherein the author delineates what he conceives to be a perfect commonwealth, situate in an imaginary island. This work has been translated into English by Bishop Burnet, Cayley, and others. Sir Thomas had four children. His eldest daughter, Margaret, married a gentleman named Roper, who wrote the life of his father-in-law. She was an accomplished woman, and well read in the Greek and Latin languages. She wrote a treatise on the "Four Last Things," and died in 1511. Sir Thomas More's character has been much misrepresented by Foxe, in his "Martyrology," and by Bishop Burnet in his "History of the Reformation," both charging him with cruel persecution of the Protestants while chancellor. Erasmus, however, distinctly testifies, that "whilst More was chancellor, no man was put to death for these dogmas." All his contemporaries describe him as being of a singularly amiable disposition, and unaffectedly and sincerely pious. Erasmus, who was his frequent guest, says, "With him you might imagine yourself in the Academy of Plato. But I should do injustice to his house by comparing it to the Academy of Plato, where numbers and geometrical figures, and sometimes moral virtues, were the subjects of discussion: it would be more just to call it a school and an exercise of the Christian religion. All its inhabitants, male and female, applied their leisure to liberal studies and profitable reading, although piety was their first care. No wrangling, no idle word, was heard in it; every one did his duty with alacrity, and not without a temperate cheerfulness." Sir James Mackintosh gave an interesting sketch of this great man's life in a volume entitled "Eminent British Statesmen," published in Lardner's "Cabinet Cyclopædia." b. in Milk Street, London, 1480; beheaded, 1535.

MORE, Anthony, Sir, a famous painter, who was successful in portraits, of which he painted several in England, in the reign of Queen Mary, on whose death he accompanied Philip II. to Spain, where he lived on terms of great intimacy with that monarch for some time; but presuming too much on his familiarity, incurred the displeasure of the king, and had to quit the country. He then entered into the service of the duke of Alva, by whom he was made receiver-general of the revenues of West Flanders. b. at Utrecht, 1519; d. 1575.

MORE, Henry, an English divine, who received his education at the university of Cambridge, where he applied himself to the study of the Platonists. Most of his writings were devoted to the exposition of a Christiano-Platonic philosophy. The best account of More's studies was given by Enfield, in his "History of Philosophy." "More was strongly under the opinion, so common among his contemporaries, that the wisdom of the Hebrews had been transmitted to Pythagoras, and from him to Plato; and, consequently, that the true principles of divine philosophy were to be found in the writings of the Platonists; at the same time he was persuaded that the ancient cabalistic philosophy sprung from the same fountain, and therefore endeavoured to lay open the mystery of this philosophy by showing its agreement with the doctrines of Pythagoras and Plato, and pointing out the corruptions which had been introduced by the modern Cabalists. The Cartesian system, which sprang up at this time, was embraced by More, as, on the whole, consonant to his ideas of nature; and he took much pains to prove that it was not inconsistent with the Cabalistic doctrine. His penetrating understanding, however, discovered defects in this new system, which he by profound erudition, an inventive genius, and a liberal spirit." More's chief works were, "A Key to the Revolver of Descartes," "The Key to the Revolver of Descartes," and a collection of philosophical poems. He was one of the original members of the Royal Society, and, although offered high preferments in the church, chose rather to live a life of retirement, wherein he might devote himself to the pursuit of philosophical studies. B. 1611; D. 1687.

MORE, Hannah, an eminent English authoress, who, early in life, opened a school at Bristol for the education of girls. In this occupation she was assisted by her sisters, and, in course of time, the establishment became one of the most flourishing schools in that part of England. In 1773 she produced a pastoral drama, entitled "The Search after Happiness," which meeting with a successful reception, she was encouraged to write a regular tragedy. Obtaining an introduction to Dr. Johnson and Garrick, she wrote two works for the stage; but being of a deeply religious tone of mind, she determined to forsake writing for the theatre, and retire into the country. During the remaining years of her life, she resided in Somersetshire; the profits resulting from her many productions enabling her to enjoy a literary ease, and to assist in ameliorating the condition of the rustic population in her neighbourhood. It was at one time intended to commit the education of the Princess Charlotte of Wales to her charge; but, although the project fell to the ground, it was the cause of her publication entitled "Hints towards Forming the Character of a Young Princess." Her next effort was the popular novel, "Celebs in Search of a Wife." Her chief works of a religious order were "Practical Piety," "Christian Morals," and "Essay on the Character and Writings of St. Paul." B. near Bristol, 1743; D. at Clifton, Gloucestershire, 1833.

MOREAU, Jacob Nicholas, ma-ro', a French author, who was counsellor of the Court of Aids, historiographer of France, librarian to the queen, and censor royal. He wrote several works, the chief of which were "Lessons in Morals, Politics, and Law;" "Principles of Political Morality;" and "The Duties of Prince: or, a Discourse on Justice." B. : Saint Flourantin, 1717; D. 1803.

MOREAU, Jean Michel, a celebrated French designer and engraver, who studied under Lebas, and became, in 1770, designer to the king, and in 1797 professor of drawing to the Écoles Centrales of Paris. His designs, nearly all of which were engraved by himself, amounted to more than 2000, and he was one of the most popular illustrators of the works of Voltaire, Rousseau, Molière, &c. B. 1741; D. 1814.

MOREAU, Jean Victor, one of the most celebrated generals of the French

the son of an advocate, and the legal profession; but his ardent love of military adventure caused him to enlist as a private soldier when he had attained his 18th year. His discharge was purchased, however, and for several years he studied and practised the law, gaining some popularity by his eloquent defence of the prisoners of Rennes against the government. Upon the outbreak of the Revolution, he resolved to devote himself to a military career; placed himself at the head of a battalion of Breton volunteers, and, in 1792, joined the army of Dumouriez. In two years he reached the grade of general of division, and assisted Pichegru in the conquest of Holland. He was next nominated commander-in-chief of the army of the Rhine and Moselle, and in 1798 defeated the Austrians under General Warmser, and drove them across the Rhine. While in pursuit of the Austrians in Germany, he was met by the Archduke Charles, who was at first beaten by Moreau. The Austrians, however, were soon so strongly reinforced, that Moreau was compelled to retire before overwhelming numbers. With a powerful enemy in his rear, and assailed on every side by a hostile peasantry, he forced his way through the defiles of the Black Forest, and, by his glorious retreat, gained more honour than by his previous advance. Shortly afterwards he incurred the displeasure of the Directory, from being suspected of complicity with his old friend Pichegru in corresponding with the Bourbon princes. Upon this, he requested to be allowed to retire from the army. But his services were again sought in 1799, when he was sent to Italy, where the French were in a disastrous condition. At Novi, after the death of Joubert, he saved the army. Again nominated to the command-in-chief of the army of the Rhine, he crossed that river in 1800, defeated the Austrians in several engagements, drove General Kray before him as far as the Danube, gained the decisive victory of Hochstadt, and signed the armistice of Parsdorf. At the commencement of hostilities, he gained the celebrated victory of Hohenlinden, and advanced upon Vienna, which was only saved by the armistice of Steyer. The peace of Lunéville put an end to this glorious career in 1801. Upon his return to Paris, the first consul pretended to receive him with great cordiality; but Moreau and Bonaparte were too eagerly pursuing the same ambitious path to escape coming into collision. Bonaparte spoke of Moreau as "the retreating general;" while the victor of Hohenlinden retaliated by defining his rival as a "general at ten thousand men a day." In 1804, Moreau was accused of being implicated in the royalist conspiracy of Pichegru and Georges Cadoudal; and, although there was no evidence against him, was condemned to an imprisonment of two years. Moreau requested that this sentence might be converted into banishment, which, being acceded to, he set out for the United States, where he lived during several years. His hatred of Napoleon caused him to accept, in 1813, a proposal made to him by the Emperor Alexander to assist the allies against France. Scarcely had he joined the allied army before Dresden, when both his legs were crushed by a cannon-shot. He underwent the amputation of both limbs without a groan, but died after a few days of suffering. b. at Morlaix, Brittany, 1763; d. 1813.

MOREAU, Hégésippe, a French author, who went to Paris at an early age, with the intention of attaining a brilliant position by the exercise of his poetical talents. Meeting with little encouragement, he, after several years of misery, died of consumption in one of the hospitals of the French capital. Moreau wrote a volume of poems, which was published three months before his death, entitled "Myosotis," and which evinced a style full of grace and freshness. b. 1810; d. 1833.

MOREAU DE LA SARTHE, Jacques Louis, an eminent French writer upon medicine, who was educated for the profession of surgery, but was compelled to relinquish its practice through receiving a wound of the right hand. Thereupon he devoted himself to the theory of medical science, and produced a number of works which gained him much distinction. In addition to several valuable papers inserted in the "Journal of Medicine," he produced an "Essay upon Gangrene," "Outline of a Course of Hygiene," and a "Treatise on Vaccination." b. near Mans, 1771; d. at Paris, 1826.

MORELL, Thomas, mo-vel', a learned English divine and lexicographer, who became fellow and D.D. of King's College, Cambridge, and published valuable editions of Ainsworth's Latin Dictionary and Hederic's Greek Lexicon. He was also author of "Annotations on Locke's Essay on the Human Understanding;" assisted Hogarth in writing his "Analysis of Beauty," and selected the passages of Scripture for Handel's Oratorios. b. at Eton, 1703; d. 1784.

MORELL, James, mo-rail'-le, an eminent Italian librarian, who, in 1778 became keeper of the great library of St. Mark, at Venice, and retained that post until his death. He discovered a large fragment of Dion Cassius, and was the editor of many classical authors, besides producing numerous treatises on questions connected with the history of literature. b. at Venice, 1746; d. 1819.

MOREAU, Louis, mo-rser-e, a French divine and historiographer, who conceived the idea of producing a biographical and geographical dictionary, and published it in 1671. His intense application in preparing a second edition of this great undertaking, produced a disorder of which he died. This dictionary has been several times revised and augmented; among others, by Leclerc and Bayle. The last edition is that of Paris, 1759, in 10 vols. b. 1643; d. 1680.

MORRIS, Edward Rowe, more, an English antiquary, who was, in 1752, chosen a fellow of the Society of Antiquaries, and projected an equitable society for insurance on lives and survivorships by annuities. He was the author of the "History and Antiquities of Tunstall, in Kent," and a "Dissertation on Founders and Foundries." b. at Tunstall, Kent, 1730; d. 1778.

MORRIS, Antoine de Bourbon, Count de mo'-rai, a natural son of Henry IV. of France and Jacqueline de Beuil, countess de Moret. He espoused the cause of Gaston, duke of Orleans, and raised an army in Languedoc; but perished in the engagement at Castelnaudary, when the duke of Montmorency was made prisoner. b. 1607; killed, 1632.

MORETO Y CABANA, Augustin, mo-rail'-to, a comic poet of the 17th century, and contemporary with Calderon, was the author of a considerable number of dramas and short poems, which were greatly successful. Several of his plays were imitated by Molière. About 1670 he abandoned poetry to embrace an ecclesiastical life, and became a favourite with Philip IV. His comedies were published at Valencia in 1676, and again in 1703. b. in Spain, about 1625; d. about 1639.

MORGAN, William, mor'-gan, an eminent Welsh divine, who became, in 1515, bishop of Llandaff, whence he was translated to St. Asaph in 1601. He had a principal share in the translation of the Bible into Welsh, first printed in 1558. d. 1604.

MORGAN, Sir Henry, a celebrated English buccaneer, who at first served under Mansfield, after whose death he collected a fleet of twelve ships, and attacked and extorted ransom from a town in the island of Cuba. He subsequently carried Portobello by assault, and destroyed the fort of Mazaribon. In 1689 he retired to Jamaica, intending to enjoy peaceably the fortune he had acquired; but in the following year again put himself at the head of a fleet of 37 sail, with which he ravaged the coast of Nicaragua. In 1671 he marched upon Panama with 1300 men, and took and burnt the city. His career was checked by the signature of a peace between England and Spain. After a visit to England, he returned to the West Indies, having been knighted by Charles II., and appointed governor of Jamaica. b. early in the 17th century; d. in Jamaica, 1688.

MORGAN, William, a distinguished mathematician, a native of Glamorganshire, was actuary to the Equitable Assurance Company, London; and remained connected with that institution 56 years. He was the author of "The Doctrine of Annuities and Assurances of Lives," "A Review of Dr. Crawford's Theory of Heat," together with various treatises connected with financial affairs. b. 1833.

MORGAN, Sir Thomas Charles, an English physician of some eminence, who received the honour of knighthood in Ireland, in 1811, and in the following year, meeting with Miss Owenison, the popular Irish authoress, at the residence of the marquis of Abercorn, in the county of Tyrone, he married her. He shortly afterwards relinquished his medical practice, and became a writer of light and sparkling sketches for the "New Monthly" and other magazines. His best efforts were, "Sketches of the Philosophy of Life," "The Philosophy of Morals," and "The Book without a Name," which last was written in conjunction with Lady Morgan. When the Whigs came into office in 1831, Sir Charles was appointed a commissioner of Irish fisheries. He was also fellow of the College of Physicians. b. in London, about 1733; d. 1843.

MORGAN, Sydney Owenison, Lady, a popular Irish authoress, wife of the preceding, was the daughter of a musician of some merit in Dublin, who was moreover a cultivated and intellectual man, and thus fitted to prepare the future authoress for that elegant society of which she subsequently became so eminent a member. Her first girlish efforts were directed to poetry; and at fourteen she produced a volume of miscellaneous verses, and afterwards a series of songs, set to Irish airs. When only sixteen, she had published two novels, which, although favourably spoken of at the time, produced no very important effects; but the "Wild Irish Girl," published in 1806, at once raised her to a conspicuous position in the literary world. This novel passed through seven editions, and formed an introduction for its gifted authoress into the best society. She first met Sir Charles Morgan while staying at the house of the Marquis of Abercorn, and in 1812 they were married. Her next work of importance was entitled "France," and was the result of three observant years spent in that country. It was a critical review of the social state of the country, rather than a book of travels, and was published in 1818. It achieved immense success, and led to a decision, on the part of the French government of the time, to refuse the gifted authoress readmission to the country. "Florence Macarthy," her second novel, was published in England during her stay in France, and contributed in no small degree to add to the writer's fame. "The Life and Times of Salvator Rosa" was first given to the world in 1823. In the historical and philosophical disquisition, entitled "Woman and her Master," Lady Morgan contended that her sex had been condemned to obscurity and passive obedience by man. Among many other works, she produced "The Book of the Boudoir," "The Princess," and "Dramatic Scenes from Real Life." Lady Morgan, although receiving large sums for her works, was not wealthy, and a pension of £300 a year was conferred on her during the ministry of Earl Grey. b. at Dublin, about 1766; d. 1859. (See Lady Morgan's Letters, &c., edited by W. H. Dixon, published in 1862.)

MORGHEN, Raphael, mor'-jain, a celebrated Italian engraver, who studied under Volpato, whose daughter he married. In 1793 he took up his residence at Florence, at the invitation of the grand-duke Ferdinand II. His masterpiece was an engraving of the "Last Supper," by Leonardo da Vinci; but he is stated to have engraved upwards of 200 plates, some of the best being reproductions of the great works of the painter Raffaele. b. at Florence, 1758; d. 1833.

MORHOF, Daniel George, mor'-hof, a learned German writer, who, in 1660, was chosen professor of poetry at Rostock, whence he removed to Kiel, where he discharged the same office, but afterwards became professor of history and librarian. His principal works were "Polyhistor," in which he gave a survey of universal literature down to the middle of the 18th century, treated of choice works, and of rare works upon grammar, rhetoric, poetry, mathematics, history, &c.; and the "Princeps Medicus," in which he defended, in a curious manner, the pretensions of the kings of France and England to the power of curing the scrofula or king's evil. b. 1639; d. 1691.

MORICE, Sir William, mor'-is, an English gentleman, memorable for the share which he had in bringing about the restoration of Charles II. He was the kinsman of General Monk, who procured him the place of secretary of state, which he resigned in 1663. He wrote a book called "The Common Right of the Lord's Supper Asserted." d. 1676.

descriptive of Eastern life and manners, which enjoyed at one time great popularity. When still young, he made a tour through the East, the main incidents of which he described in his "Travels through Persia, Armenia, Asia Minor, or Constantinople." He was appointed British envoy to the court of Persia in 1810, where he remained till 1816, and soon after his return published "A Second Journey through Persia," &c. During his stay in the East, he made diligent use of his opportunities of studying the character of the people; and the knowledge thus acquired was turned to account in his "Adventures of Hajji Baba of Ispahan," whose "Adventures in England" he described in a second series; "Zohrab, or the Hostage," "Ayesha, or the Maid of Kars," "Abel Alnutt," "The Banished," &c.; in all of which, he manners, customs, and modes of thought prevalent in the East are very happily portrayed. b. 1780; d. 1848.

MORIN, Peter, mor'-i, a learned French critic, who spent several years in the printing-office of Paul Manutius, at Venice, and afterwards taught Greek and Geography at Vicenza, whence he was invited to Ferrara. Cardinal Borromeo, being apprised of his merit, called him to Rome, where he was employed on the edition of the Septuagint, on that of the Vulgate, and lastly on the great edition of the Bible translated from the Greek version. He published a collection of General Councils, and other works. b. at Paris, 1531; d. 1608.

MORIN, Jean Baptiste, a French astrologer, who studied physic at Avignon, and took his doctor's degree in that faculty. His pretended skill in astrology, and the fame acquired by the casual fulfilment of some of his predictions, recommended him to the Cardinals Richelieu and Mazarin, the latter of whom procured him the place of mathematical professor in the Royal College, with a handsome pension. He wrote "Astrologia Gallica," and a curious little book against the Pre-Adamites. b. 1583; d. 1656.

MORIN, Simon, a French fanatic, who, in 1647, published a strange book, in which he called himself Jesus Christ and the Second Messiah. Notwithstanding his extreme ignorance, he obtained numerous followers; but was burnt alive at Paris, 1663.

MORISON, Robert, mor'-i-son, a physician and professor of botany at Oxford, studied in the university of Aberdeen, till interrupted by the civil wars, in which he displayed great zeal and courage on the royalist side. After the execution of Charles I., he went to France, where he took his doctor's degree, and was appointed director of the royal garden at Blois. In 1660 he returned to England, and was nominated physician to Charles II., and regius professor of botany at Oxford. He read botanical lectures in the garden at Oxford, and wrote some interesting works on "Elementary Botany," and on "The History of Botany." b. at Aberdeen, 1620; d. 1693.

MORISOR, Claude Bartholomew, mor'-i-so, a French author, who wrote "Peruviana," a secret history, with fictitious names, of Cardinal Richelieu, Mary of Medici, and the duke of Orleans, first published in 1645. He was also the author of some other works. b. at Dijon, 1592; d. 1661.

MORITZ, Charles Philip, mo'-ritz, a German author who travelled in England, Switzerland, and Italy; and wrote numerous works, the principal of which are his "Travels," "The Antiquities of Rome," the novels of "Anthony Reiser" and "Andrew Hartknopf," and various grammatical treatises. b. 1757; d. 1793.

MORLAND, Sir Samuel, mor'-land, an English statesman, who accompanied Whitlock in his famous embassy to the queen of Sweden, and afterwards became assistant to Thurloe, Cromwell's secretary. Becoming privy to a plot for destroying Charles II., he is stated to have divulged it to that monarch, while still abroad. For this service he was created a baronet at the Restoration. He wrote a book entitled "Urim of Conscience." He was made master of mechanics to Charles II., and invented the speaking-trumpet, a fire-engine, and a capstan for heaving up anchors. b. about 1625; d. 1695.

MORLAND, George, a celebrated English painter, was the son of an artist in London, who employed him constantly in making drawings for sale. By this means young Morland acquired a wonderful facility of invention and rapidity of execution; but owing to the narrow and illiberal manner in which his talents were used by his father, he contracted low habits, and formed bad connexions. His pictures, however, soon became objects of estimation and inquiry; and the persons who administered to his intemperance profited by his weakness to get into their possession pieces of very great value. Hence he was always at work, and always poor. Many of his best pictures were painted in sponging-houses, to clear him from arrest, or in alehouses, to discharge his reckoning. The pictures of this skillful artist are faithful representations of rural nature and animal life. His drawings of farmyards, cattle, fishermen, and smugglers on the seacoast, are generally very good. b. 1763; d. 1804.

MOULEY, George, mor'-le, an English prelate, who was appointed by Charles I. canon of Christchurch, and was one of the divines who assisted him at the treaty of Newport. In 1649 he went abroad, and did not return till the Restoration, when he was made dean of Christchurch, and soon afterwards bishop of Worcester. In 1662 he was translated to Winchester, to which see he was a great benefactor. He was a munificent prelate, and bequeathed large sums to several institutions. He published some religious treatises. b. in London, 1597; d. 1634.

MOULEY, Thomas, an old English composer, of whose life little is known; but Wood, in his "Athenæ Oxonienses," states that he became a gentleman of the chapel royal in 1592. He composed canzonets, madrigals, anthems, and the "Funeral Service" included in Dr. Boyce's collection, which was the first attempt to set to music the words of the reformed Liturgy. He was likewise the author of a "Plain and Easy Introduction to Practical Music," first published in 1597, and subsequently translated into German. d. about 1604.

MORNAY, Philip de, lord of Plessis-Mornay, mor'-nai, a celebrated French nobleman, who was secretly educated in the Protestant faith by his mother; but upon the death of his father, in 1500, he openly avowed his religious opinions. In 1576 he went to the court of the king of Navarre, afterwards Henry IV., who made him a member of his council, confided to him the charge of the finances of his kingdom, and sent him to England to request assistance from Queen Elizabeth. During the wars of the League, he acted as superintendent-general of Navarre, and was, throughout his life, the chief of the Protestant party in France, his great learning and zeal in religious matters causing him to be regarded with deep veneration by the adherents of the Reformed faith. In 1578 he published a treatise on the Church, and, in the year following, began his work on the "Truth of the Christian Religion." In 1593 he published his book on the Eucharist, which occasioned a conference between him and Cardinal Du Perron, the result of which was that Mornay obtained the appellation of the Protestant Pope. In 1607 he printed a famous book, entitled "The Mystery of Iniquity; or, the History of the Papacy." b. 1540; d. 1623.

MORNINGTON, Garret Wellesley, Earl of, mor'-ning-ton, an accomplished Irish nobleman, an eminent composer, and father of the greatest English general,—the duke of Wellington. At the age of 10, he played Corelli's sonatas upon the violin, which instrument gave place to the harpsichord when he had attained his 14th year. He continued the study and composition of music without relaxation throughout his life; and so highly did the University of Dublin esteem his talents, that it conferred upon him the degree of doctor of music, and afterwards elected him professor of that faculty. His compositions were principally vocal: in glee music he was particularly happy. The four-voiced glees, "Here in cool grove,"—"Gently hear me, charming maid,"—"Come, fairest nymph," are generally acknowledged to be masterpieces of the art. By his wife, Anne, daughter of Arthur, first earl of Dungannon, he had a large family. His sons were the Marquis of Wellesley, Lord Maryborough, the duke of Wellington, Lord Cowley, and the Rev. Gerard Wellesley. b. in the county of Meath, Ireland, about 1720; d. 1781.

MORNAY, Charles Augustus Louis Joseph, Duc de, mor'-ne, a modern French statesman, and one of the most devoted adherents to the second empire. After pursuing his studies with considerable success, he was appointed sub-lieutenant of the 1st regiment of lanciers, and served under the duke of Orleans in several campaigns in Algiers with much distinction. About the year 1838 he quitted the army, turned his attention to commercial speculations, and published a pamphlet on the "Sugar Question." Enjoying a large fortune, he was soon enabled to place himself at the head of many important industrial enterprises, as well as to attract much notice as a projector of financial reforms. At the commencement of the revolution of 1848, he kept aloof from politics; but, on being elected to the Legislative Assembly, he rapidly proved himself to be one of the most energetic supporters of the President, Louis Napoleon, whose brother he is supposed to be. The Count de Morny was one of the few individuals of whom the President requested assistance in preparing the coup d'état of December, and on that occasion, he displayed equal coolness and audacity. As minister of the interior, he signed or countersigned most of the proclamations and decrees by which the opponents of that act were either arrested or banished. In January, 1852, he retired from office, in consequence of the decree promulgated for the confiscation of the property of the Orleans family.

He subsequently placed himself in nomination as government candidate for election to the Corps Législatif. Being returned, he took his seat, and, in 1854 succeeded M. Billault as president of that body. In the years 1856-1857, he represented the imperial dynasty of France at the court of Russia, and, while acting in that capacity, married a daughter of one of the most distinguished noblemen in that country. During many years, the Count de Morny's name was associated with every kind of speculation: railway companies, canals, mines, finance,—no form of commercial and industrial enterprise being neglected by him. He was likewise a liberal patron of the arts; and his gallery of paintings is admitted to be one of the most choice in France. He was created Duc de Morny in 1862. n. at Paris, 1811; n. 18⁵.

MOROSINI, Francesco, mo-ro-se'-me, a gallant soldier, who, as governor of Candia, about the middle of the 17th century, defended that island, with 30,000 men, against a Turkish force of four times that amount: but was ultimately compelled to surrender. He subsequently, as commander of the Venetian fleet, attacked that of the Turks, near the Dardanelles, and totally defeated it. In 1689 he was elected doge of Venice. n. 1694.

MORRIS, Lewis, mor-ris, a Welsh antiquary and poet, who surveyed the coast of Wales in 1737, by order of the Admiralty board, and his work was published in 1748. Some of his poetical pieces in the Welsh language have been printed, and he left above 80 volumes of MSS. relative to Welsh antiquities. n. in the Isle of Anglesey, 1702; n. in Cardiganshire, 1765.

MORRIS, Richard, brother of the above, was also a poet and critic in his native language, and superintended the printing of two valuable editions of the Welsh Bible. n. 1779.

MORRIS, Captain Charles, a famous English song writer, whose convivial pieces were at one time in high repute. Many of them might perhaps be spared, yet some are chaste in sentiment and felicitous in expression. n. 1739; n. 1832.

MORRIS, George P., an American poet and journalist, who was, for twenty years, editor of the "New York Mirror," a journal to which some of the ablest writers in the United States contributed. He was subsequently engaged in the management of the "Home Journal," one of the most popular of the many cheap publications of that country. Mr. Morris wrote a drama entitled "Briar Cliff," which was founded upon some incidents of the American revolution; and an opera called "The Maid of Saxony." His most important literary production was, however, a collection of Poetical Pieces and Melodies: one of his songs, "Woodman, spare that tree," was at one time as popular in England as it was in America. As a poet, he was more fervid and energetic than elegant. n. at Philadelphia, 1802.

MORRISON, Rev. Robert, mor-ri-son, a distinguished missionary to China, who was the first to preach the Protestant doctrines in that country. He was the son of humble parents, but received a fair elementary education at a school kept by his uncle at Newcastle. Between the years 1799 and 1801 he studied Hebrew, Latin, and theology, with the assistance of a Presbyterian minister of the town. The same gentleman, in 1803, furnished him with an introduction to the committee of the Independent Theological Academy in London, and he was accordingly received into their institution. In the following year he offered his services to the London Missionary Society, which being accepted, he removed to the college of that body at Gosport. At the beginning of 1807, after having studied Chinese, he set sail for China, and, in the same year, arrived at Canton. During twenty-five years he remained in China, engaged in translating and disseminating the Holy Scriptures, having rendered into Chinese the whole of the Bible, after eight years of unremitting labour: in this task he was assisted by Dr. Mi-ne. In 1824 he visited England, and presented to George IV. a copy of the Scriptures in Chinese. Two years afterwards, he returned to the field of his labours, and continued his noble exertions until his death. Dr. Morrison and his coadjutors printed and circulated, between the years 1810 and 1836, upwards of 750,000 copies of works in the Chinese character. In this number were included 2075 complete Bibles, 9970 New Testaments, and 31,000 shorter portions of the Scriptures. n. at Morpeth, Northumberland, 1782; n. at Canton, 1834.

MORSE, Samuel Finley Breese, mor-se, a scientific American, celebrated as the inventor of the United States' system of telegraphs. In 1811 he went to England, and entered at the Royal Academy of Arts, where he, two years afterwards, gained a prize for a sculpture model. He subsequently returned to America, and pursued his profession with considerable success. It was while on board ship, in 1832, returning to America, after a second visit to England, that the idea of his great invention first occurred to his mind. He remembered the experiments of Franklin with a wire four miles in length, and imagined "that if the presence of electricity could be made visible in any part of this circuit, it would not be difficult to construct a system of signs by which intelligence could be instantaneously transmitted." Almost immediately after his landing in America, he commenced a series of experiments; but, having little time to give to the subject, it was not until four years afterwards that he succeeded in demonstrating his theory upon a wire half a mile in length. Congress at once voted him 30,000 dollars to enable him to carry out his views; and, in 1844, he saw the realization of his hopes, in the perfect working of a wire 40 miles long, which had been constructed between Washington and Baltimore. Mr. Morse's invention is the simplest of all the electric telegraphs; it requires only a single wire, and is self-recording, or self-printing. The alphabet is formed of a combination of short strokes and dots, marked by a steel pricker upon a sheet of paper, uncoiled beneath it by clockwork mechanism. More than three-fourths of the telegraphic wires in the United States are worked according to this great invention. The New York and Newfoundland Telegraphic Company nominated him their electrician, and he was also appointed professor of natural history at Yale College. In 1856 he visited England and was entertained at a public dinner by the directors of several telegraphic companies. n. at Charlestown, Massachusetts, 1791.

in Ireland; but he united himself, in 1320, with the insurgent barons, who raised the standard of revolt against the king on account of his favourites, Dispensers. (See EDWARD II.) Mortimer was taken and imprisoned in the Tower of London, but contrived to escape to France. Subsequently, he, with Queen Isabella, wife of Edward II., made a descent upon England with a small force, which was increased by large numbers of the English people who joined his standard. The king was taken prisoner, and afterwards assassinated in prison; his son, Edward III., being placed upon the throne, in his 14th year. During some time, Mortimer exercised absolute power in the name of the young monarch, and put to death Kent and Lancaster, the king's uncles. Edward III. at length resolved to get rid of the cruel baron, who was arrested, and hanged near Smithfield in 1330. s. about 1287.

MORTIMER, Edmund, Earl, espoused Philippa, daughter of Lionel, second son of Edward III.—Roger, son of the preceding, was declared heir to the crown in 1385, but died in 1399, leaving an only daughter, who married Richard of York, giving to that family a claim to the throne of England. Hence arose the wars of the Red and White Roses, between the houses of York and Lancaster.

MORTIMER, John Hamilton, an English painter, received his first instructions from his uncle, who was an itinerant portrait-painter; but afterwards became a pupil of Hudson, who had been the teacher of Sir Joshua Reynolds. Mortimer obtained one of the first prizes for an historical picture from the Society for the Encouragement of Arts: his subject being the Conversion of the Britons. In 1779 he was appointed by his majesty a Royal Academician, without any solicitation; but his intemperate habits caused his demise shortly afterwards. s. in Sussex, 1741; p. 1779.

MORTIMER, Thomas, a miscellaneous English writer, who was for some time British vice-consul in the Netherlands. His principal works are, "The British Plutarch," a "Dictionary of Trade and Commerce," "The Elements of Commerce, Politics, and Finances," a "History of England," and "The Student's Pocket Dictionary." s. 1780; p. 1809.

MORTON, John, mor'-ton, an English prelate and statesman, who was educated at Oxford, after which he became so eminent for his skill in jurisprudence as to be appointed privy councillor to Henry VI. In 1478 he was made bishop of Ely, and chancellor of England by Edward IV. During the reign of Richard III. he remained out of England, but upon the accession of Henry VII. to the throne, was nominated one of the privy council, and, in 1486, obtained the archbishopric of Canterbury. Pope Alexander VI. created him cardinal in 1493. Sir Thomas More, who was in his youth a page in Morton's household, is stated to have derived the facts of his "History of Richard III." from the cardinal archbishop. Morton was a man of the greatest ability and probity. s. at Bere, Dorsetshire, 1410; p. 1500.

MORTON, James Douglas, fourth Earl of, and regent of Scotland, received his education under the famous Buchanan, at Paris, but returned to Scotland in 1542, and greatly promoted the Reformation. In 1563 he became lord high chancellor: in a few years, however, he was compelled to relinquish the office and fly to England, for the part he took in Rizzio's murder. After a few months, Bothwell succeeded in obtaining his pardon from Queen Mary; whereupon he returned to Scotland. He soon began to take a prominent part in affairs, and, in 1572, succeeded the earl of Mar as regent, which office he resigned in 1577, his rule having made him odious to the whole nation. The government was then confided to James VI., who had attained his 12th year. Morton, however, was too ambitious to remain in retirement, and contrived to get possession of Stirling Castle, and also to obtain the charge of the young king. He thus secured his former power; but his ascendancy was only of short duration, for, being charged as accessory to the murder of Darnley, he was sent to the castle of Edinburgh, and afterwards to Dumbarton, then under the command of Lennox, father of Darnley. In 1581, he was taken to Edinburgh for trial; and though he vehemently protested his innocence of the crime with which he was charged, he was condemned to death. Although he admitted that he had been made acquainted by Bothwell with a design for murdering Darnley, he declared that he did not participate in the crime. As to making known the plot, "to whom," he said, "could I reveal it? To the queen?—she was aware of it. To Darnley?—he was such a babe, that there was nothing told to him but he would reveal to her again; and the two most powerful noblemen in the kingdom, Bothwell and Huntley, were the perpetrators. I foreknew, and concealed the plot; but as to being art and part in its execution, I call God to witness I am wholly innocent." He suffered death with the utmost fortitude, being beheaded by a machine much resembling the guillotine, and called the "maiden." s. at Dalkeith, 1530; beheaded, 1581.

MORTON, James Douglas, Earl of, a distinguished Scotch nobleman, who, at the age of 26, established a philosophical society at Edinburgh,—a society which has since made a considerable figure in almost every branch of knowledge. The Royal Society of London elected him their president in 1733, and, on the death of the earl of Macclesfield, he was chosen an associate in the Academy of Sciences at Paris. He evinced an ardent zeal for the sciences, and was an eminent patron of merit. He was well acquainted with natural and experimental philosophy, but more particularly devoted to astronomical observations. s. 1707; p. 1768.

MORTON, Thomas, an English dramatic writer, who was educated for the legal profession, but whose natural bent was for the drama. Abandoning his legal studies before he had been called to the bar, he gave himself entirely to play-writing, and became the most popular dramatist of his day. For his comedy of "Town and Country" he received the sum of £1000 before the piece was placed in rehearsal. His works are, however, but poor productions to read, when it is remembered how great was their popularity: they are showy, unnatural, and scarcely ever genuinely humorous or witty; but they are never dull, and are constructed with admirable dramatic tact. A few of them still keep their place on the stage, such as "Speed the Plough," "A Roland for an Oliver," "The Invincibles," "A Cure for the Heartache," "The School of Reform." &c. s. in the county of Durham, 1764; p. 1838.

Greek pastoral poets of antiquity, who were contemporaries, and whose works are usually printed together in the Poetae Minores. They lived, probably, in the 3rd century B. C.

MOSER, George Michael, mo'-ser, a gold-chaser and painter on enamel, who went from Switzerland to London at an early age, became celebrated for his artistic productions, and painted on a watch-case, for George III., portraits of the Prince of Wales and the Bishop of Osnaburg. He was appointed keeper of the Royal Academy of Arts, being the first who held the office. Sir Joshua Reynolds states that he was unrivalled as a gold-chaser, and that his knowledge in every branch of painting and sculpture was immense. B. in Switzerland, 1704; D. 1783.—His daughter Mary was a distinguished flower-painter, and was elected R.A. D. 1819.

MOSES, Micosti, mo'-ses, a Spanish rabbi of the 14th century, who published, at Venice, a folio volume entitled "The Great Book of Precepts," which is explanatory of the Hebrew laws.

MOSHEIM, John Lorenz von, mos'-him, a learned German divine and historian, who became professor of divinity at Helmstedt, and was afterwards chancellor of the university of Göttingen. He translated Cadworth's "Intellectual System of the Universe" into Latin, with learned notes; but his greatest work is the "Ecclesiastical History," written in Latin, of which the best English translation is that of Dr. Murdoch, published in the United States, 1832, and enriched by valuable annotations. Mosheim also wrote, among many other works, nine volumes on "The Morals of Holy Scripture." B. at Lubeck, 1694; D. 1755.

MOSSOP, Henry, mos'-op, a distinguished tragic actor, the son of a clergyman, was educated at Trinity College, Dublin; and made his first appearance on the stage at Dublin as Zanga, in the "Revenge," but soon removed to London, where, next to Garrick and Henderson, he was esteemed the first tragedian of his time. In 1761 he became manager of one of the Dublin theatres; but the speculation ruined him, and he died in penury at Chelsea in 1773; B. 1720.

MOTHERWELL, William, moth'-er-wel, poet and journalist, when a youth obtained a situation in the sheriff clerk's office at Paisley, where he continued for many years. In 1827 he published an interesting and pleasing collection of ballads, entitled "Minstrelsy, Ancient and Modern," and was afterwards successively editor of the "Paisley Magazine," "Paisley Advertiser," and the "Glasgow Courier." In 1833 was published a collected edition of his own poems, some of which possess a pathos and an intensity of feeling seldom equalled. These qualities are strikingly exhibited in his "Jeanie Morrison," and "My heid is like to rend, Willie," an address by a dying girl to her lover; while his success in imitating the old mystic ballad is well exemplified in the "Ettin Lang of Sillerwood," "Holbert the Grim," and other pieces. Some years after his death, a monument to his memory was erected by subscription in the necropolis of his native city, Glasgow. B. 1798; D. 1835.

MOTLEY, John Lothrop, mot'-le, a modern American historian, whose family emigrated to New England about the middle of the last century. His Christian names are derived from a maternal ancestor, the Rev. John Lothrop, who was one of the Pilgrim Fathers, and settled in Massachusetts in 1634. The future historian was sent to Harvard University in 1827, at which time he had attained his 13th year. Leaving that establishment four years afterwards, he spent two or three years at the universities of Göttingen and Berlin. A course of continental travel, which embraced Germany, France, Italy, Switzerland, and England, succeeded. During the years 1841-2, he acted as secretary of the American legation at St. Petersburg; after his return to his native country, he devoted himself to study and to literary pursuits, the fruits of which were a number of articles contributed to the "North American Review," and other periodicals. He likewise produced some works of fiction. Conceiving the idea of composing a history of the great struggle in which the provinces of the Netherlands threw off the Spanish yoke, he again visited Europe, settled with his family at Dresden, in the first instance, and subsequently resided, during three or four years, in Germany and the Netherlands. The first instalment of this great undertaking was given to the world in 1856, under the title of "The Rise of the Dutch Republic, a History." This work was brought out simultaneously in London and New York. It passed through several editions, both in England and America, and was reproduced at Amsterdam and at Leipzig. M. Guizot translated it into the French language; and there was, besides, a French version of it published at Brussels. A German and a Dutch translation were also made. In England, the book has attained a large circulation, for there are few passages of history relating to other nations that are so interesting to an Englishman as the struggle of the Dutch states for civil liberty, and a release in full from the domination of the Pope and the terrors of the Inquisition. The first half of the second portion of this work was published in London at the close of the year 1860, and, like its predecessor, attracted to itself a very wide-spread popularity. The title of this last is "History of the United Netherlands," and embraces a period beginning with the death of William the Silent and ending with the murder of Henry III. of France. As a writer, Mr. Motley is clear, forcible, and picturesque. In 1869, he succeeded Mr. Reverdy Johnson as ambassador to Great Britain. B. at Dorchester, Massachusetts, 1814.

Mottley

MOTTE, Antoine Houdar de la. (See LA-MOTTE.)

MOTTEVILLE, Frances Bertaut de, mot'-veel, a French lady, who was attendant on Anne of Austria, whose Memoirs she wrote. Her work is valuable for its information relative to the private life of the queen, and for its anecdotes of the Fronde. B. in Normandy, about 1621; D. 1659.

MOTLEY, John, mot'-le, a dramatic writer, was the son of Colonel Mottley, who followed James II. to France, and was killed at the battle of Turin, in 1706. His son received his education at St. Martin's library school; after which he obtained a place in the excise office, but was obliged to resign it in 1720. He then had recourse to his pen for gaining a livelihood, and wrote five dramatic pieces; also the "Life of the Czar Peter the Great," and the "History of Catharine of Russia," but the work of his which obtained by far the greatest popularity, is the well-known collection of fæetie, called "Joe Miller's Jests," which he compiled, though the authorship was attributed to another person. B. 1692; D. 1750.

MOULIN, Peter du, mo'-lā, a French Protestant divine, who, after studying at Leyden, became minister at Charenton. In 1615 he visited England, and James I. gave him a prebend in the cathedral of Canterbury. He afterwards went to Sedan, where he was appointed professor of divinity, and was regarded as the chief minister of the Protestant faith in France. Among other works, he composed the "Anatomy of Arminianism," in Latin; "The Capuchin, or the History of the Monks;" "The Novelty of Popery;" and "A Defence of the Reformed Churches." B. 1688; D. 1658.

MOULIN, Peter du, son of the preceding, was chaplain to Charles II., and prebendary of Canterbury. He wrote a "Defence of the Protestant Religion," and several other theological works. B. in France, 1600; D. at Canterbury, 1684.

MOULIN, Louis du, brother of the preceding, became a violent Independent, and wrote several works against the established Church of England. B. 1603; D. 1633.

MOUNIER, John Joseph, mo'-ne-ā, a distinguished member of the States-general in 1789, was bred to the legal profession; and was successively advocate of the Parliament of Grenoble and judge-royal. While a member of the National Assembly, he exerted all his talents and influence to promote the establishment in France of a limited monarchy; but finding his efforts vain, retired first to Grenoble, his native place, and afterwards to Geneva, where he published "Recherches sur les Causes qui ont empêché les Français de devenir Libres." He subsequently visited England, but resided chiefly in Switzerland, Italy, or Germany, till 1801, when he returned to France, and, in 1804, was nominated a councillor of state. B. 1758; D. 1806.

MOUNTFORT, William, mont'-fort, an English dramatic writer, and also an excellent comic actor; to whom, being one of the handsomest men on the boards, the parts of the lovers were usually allotted. While performing one of these parts, he captivated the affections of Mrs. Bracegirdle, then greatly admired for her personal charms. This lady had rejected the addresses of a Captain Hill, who, in company with Lord Mohun, waylaid Mountfort one night, in the winter of 1692, as he was returning from the theatre to his lodgings, and, before he could draw his sword, ran him through the body, and killed him on the spot. Hill made his escape to the continent, and Lord Mohun was tried by his peers for the murder, but was acquitted for want of evidence. The duke of Hamilton eventually killed Lord Mohun in a duel in Hyde Park. Mountfort was the author of five plays, and other pieces. B. 1659.

MOURAD BEY, mo'-rad, a famous Mameluke chief, was a native of Circassia, and after the destruction of Ali Bey, in 1773, obtained the government of Cairo in conjunction with Ibrahim Bey, which, notwithstanding some severe contests with the Turkish government, which tried to dispossess them, they contrived to keep. When Bonaparte invaded Egypt, Mourad opposed the French with much vigor; but was obliged to retreat to Upper Egypt. He subsequently entered into a treaty with General Kleber, and accepted the title of prince of Assouan and Jirgeh, under the protection of France. D. of the plague, in 1801.

Mozart

MOYSE, Henry, moise, a Scotch gentleman, who was page to King James I., and one of the gentlemen of his privy-chamber. He wrote a diary of what passed at court in his time, which was printed in 1753. B. 1573; D. 1630.

MOZART, John Chrysostom Wolfgang Gottlieb, mo-zart, a celebrated German musical composer, was first taught music by his father, who was sub-director of the chapel at Salzburg; and his proficiency was so great, that when a child of six years he played before the emperor Francis I., who called him "the little sorcerer." In the following year the youthful prodigy went with his father upon a European tour. They visited Paris, where the child played upon the organ before the whole French court: there he also gave concerts, and published his two first works, before he had completed his eighth year. In 1764 he went to London, where he exhibited his talents before the royal family, and passed through the ordeal in a most triumphant manner. So much interest did he excite in England, that the Hon. Daines Barrington wrote a description of his extraordinary performances, which was read before the Royal Society, and published in its "Transactions." Before leaving London, in 1765, Mozart composed, and dedicated to the queen, six sonatas. After visiting the Hague, and going a second time to Paris, Mozart and his father returned to Salzburg in 1768, in which year he wrote a complete opera, by desire of the Emperor Joseph II. At 14 he became director of the archbishop of Salzburg's concerts. He shortly afterwards visited Rome, where the pope bestowed upon him the order of the Golden Spur. In 1779 he took up his residence in Vienna, and, in the following year, was captivated by the charms of Mdlle. Constanee Weber, an amiable lady and celebrated singer. He made a proposal of marriage to her, which was declined by the family of the lady, on the ground that his reputation was not sufficiently established. Upon this, Mozart composed his "Idomeneo," and to Mdlle. Weber was assigned the principal part in the opera. It was received with enthusiasm, and the hand of the lady upon whom his affections were fixed rewarded the composer's efforts. In 1786 he produced his famous "Nozze di Figaro," and, in the following year, his chef-d'œuvre—"Don Giovanni," which latter was coldly received by the Viennese; Mozart declared, however, that he had written the opera to please himself and his friends. "Die Zauberflöte" (the magic flute) was given to the world in 1791, and, in the same year, "La Clemenza di Tito" was first sung, during the coronation festival of Leopold II. Considerable space would be required for the bare enumeration of this great musician's masses, vocal pieces, symphonies, quintets, quartets, &c. His sublime "Requiem" was written on his deathbed. Nature, so bountiful of her intellectual gifts, had denied to Mozart physical strength: he was small and weak in body, and with a delicate constitution. "It has been said of Mozart," writes one of his biographers, "that his knowledge was bounded by his art, and that, detached from this, he was little better than a nonentity; but his acquirements were far greater than is generally supposed; in proof of which we have the best authority for saying, that once, at a court masquerade given at Vienna, Mozart appeared as a physician, and wrote prescriptions in Latin, French, Italian, and German. ing this to be true, he could not have been a very ignorant man, nor always a dull one, out of his profession: but still stronger evidence in favour of his understanding may be derived from his works. That he who in his operas adapted his music with such felicity to the different persons of the drama—who represented the passions so accurately—who coloured so faithfully—whose music is so expressive that, without the aid of words, it is almost sufficient to render the scene intelligible;—that such a man should not have been endowed with a high order of intellect, is hard to be believed; but that his understanding should have been below mediocrity, is incredible." n. at Salzburg, 1756; n. at Vienna, 1792.

MUDGE, John, mudj, an English physician, and an excellent mechanic, who wrote a treatise "On the Catarrhus Cough," and improved the construction of reflecting telescopes. n. 1793.

MUDGE, Thomas, brother of the preceding, was an excellent watchmaker, and one of the best mechanicians of his day. He made great improvements in chronometers, and received a grant of £3000 from the government for his services. In 1789 he gave an account of his labours in a work entitled, "Description, with Plates, of the Time-keeper invented by Mr. Thomas Mudge." n. at Exeter, 1716; n. 1794.

MUDGE, William, nephew of the last-mentioned, rose to the rank of major-general in the army; and superintended the execution of the grand trigonometrical survey of England and Wales, and wrote an account of the operations. n. 1763; n. 1821.

MURDO, Robert, author of numerous works in natural history, and others of an entertaining and instructive character, was, in 1802, appointed Gaelic professor and teacher of drawing in the Inverness academy. He subsequently filled other situations of a like nature; but ultimately turned his attention exclusively to authorship, and commenced his career with a novel, entitled "Glenfurgus." He then for a while sought employment as a reporter on the London newspapers, and his literary efforts were henceforth unceasing. Independently of his contributions to periodicals, upwards of 80 volumes from his pen were in rapid succession brought before the public. Of these we can only mention a few:—"Modern Athens" (a description of Edinburgh); "Babylon the Great" (a description of London); "The British Naturalist;" "The Feathered Tribes of the British Islands;" "Conversations in Moral Philosophy;" "The Elements: the Heavens, the Earth, the Air, the Sea;" "Popular Mathematics;" "Man, in his Physical Structure, Intellectual Faculties, &c.;" "The Seasons;" "History of Hampshire and the Channel Islands;" "Domesticated Animals;" "Gleanings of Nature;" "China and its Resources;" &c. n. in Forfarshire, 1777; n. 1842.

MUGGLETON, Lodowicke, mug'-gel-ton, an English tailor and fanatic, of the 17th century, who wrote several books full of absurdity and blasphemy, which were burnt by the hangman, and the author pilloried. He nevertheless obtained some followers, and founded the sect termed Muggletonians. This sect is not quite extinct at the present day. n. 1697.

MULLER, G. J., mool'-der, a modern Dutch chemist, famous for his discovery of the nature of the substance to which he applied the term "protein." Professor Johnston, in his preface to the English translation of Mulder's "Cheistry of Vegetable and Animal Physiology," thus states the consequences of the discovery:

—"That this protein formed the basis of a large group of animal substances—the albuminous group, comprising fibrin, albumen, casein, the crystalline lens of the eye, the hair, horn, &c. That in these substances, the protein was combined with oxygen, sulphur, or phosphorus, or with two of these bodies, or with all three; and that the proportions of these several elements determined the special qualities of each compound of the albuminous group. That the sap and leaves, but especially the seeds of plants, contained protein in combination with sulphur and phosphorus, as it is found in the animal body, and that the gluten of wheat, the legumin of the bean, and the nitrogenous substances generally, which are found in the seeds of plants, were compounds of this kind. That these substances were formed by the plant out of the food drawn by its several parts from the air and from the soil. That it produced them for the purpose of diminishing the digestive labour, so to speak, of the animal; of supplying it with food fitted directly to form and nourish its muscular and albuminous parts, and that the animal received its whole supply of the raw material out of which those parts were to be built up, from the vegetable food on which it lived." Mulder occupied the chair of chemistry in the university of Utrecht.

MULGRAVE, Constantine John Phipps, Lord, mül'-grate, an English navigator, entered the navy at an early age, and became post-captain in 1765. At the general election in 1768, he was returned as member for Lincoln, and took an active part in Parliament on several popular questions, particularly those on libels and the Westminster election, on the latter of which he wrote a pamphlet, entitled "A Letter from a Member of Parliament to one of his constituents, on the late proceedings in the House of Commons." In 1773 he went towards the North Pole on a voyage of discovery, with two ships, one commanded by himself, and the other by Captain Lutwidge. Of this voyage, Lord Mulgrave published a narrative in 4to. His lordship was a good navigator and mathematician. n. 1746; n. 1792.

MÜLLER, Gerard Frederick, me(r)-ler, a German historian and traveller, who went to Russia in early life, as a teacher of history and geography. Having gained the favour of the empress Catharine, he became historiographer, member of the Academy of St. Petersburg, and conservator of the Russian archives. He was charged with several scientific expeditions, and accompanied Gmelin, in 1733-43, to Siberia. He was the author of "Memoirs towards the History of Russia," and "Travels and Discoveries in Russia." n. 1705; n. in Russia, 1783.

MÜLLER, Otho Frederick, a Danish naturalist, and one of the most original observers of the 18th century. After travelling in various countries as tutor to a Danish nobleman, he returned to Copenhagen in 1767, and married a lady of considerable property; whereupon he devoted his life to scientific pursuits. He was appointed by Frederick V. of Denmark to continue the publication of the "Flora" of his native country, and in 1779 commenced a corresponding work on the Zoology of Denmark, but only lived to complete two parts. Müller also made researches relative to the minute animals, and published several treatises thereon, which Cuvier declared entitled their author to a "place in the first rank of those naturalists who have enriched science with original observations." B. at Copenhagen, 1730; D. 1734.

MÜLLER, John, a Swiss historian, who was professor of Greek at Schaffhausen, and, in 1786 became librarian and councillor of state to the elector of Mainz. In 1800 he received the appointment of first keeper of the imperial library at Vienna. In 1806, after the battle of Jena, Müller saw Napoleon at Berlin, and seemed to have been overcome by the attentions paid to him by the emperor. In 1807 he received from his new patron the post of secretary of state for the new kingdom of Westphalia, and in the following year became director of public instruction, zealously discharging these duties until his death, which soon followed. His chief works were "Histoire Universelle," "History of the Swiss Confederation," an invaluable book, which was written in German, but of which there is an admirable French translation by Professor Mounard, of Lausanne, published at Geneva. A complete edition of Müller's works was issued at Tübingen, in 27 vols., 1819. B. at Schaffhausen, Switzerland, 1752; D. at Cassel, 1809.

MÜLLER, Charles Otfried, a learned German writer, and one of the greatest scholars of modern times, after completing his education at the university of Berlin, became professor of ancient languages at Breslau in 1817. He conceived the idea of writing a history of the Hellenic races and cities, of which the first volume, "Orchomenos and the Minyans," appeared in 1820. About the same time he became professor of archaeology, or ancient art, at Göttingen, whereupon he applied himself to a searching investigation of the principles of antique art, and visited Dresden, France, and England in furtherance of the same design. The nature of his subsequent studies will be seen by the enumeration of a few of his great works,—"Manual of the History of Ancient Art," a "History of Greek Literature" (this was written for the Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge, and was left unfinished at the author's death); "The Dorians," which was a history of the religion, manners, and politics of one of the Greek races; "The Etruscans;" and an edition of the "Eumenides" of Æschylus. B. at Brieg, Silesia, 1797; D. in Greece, 1841.

MÜLLER, John, an eminent modern German physiologist, who took his degree of doctor in medicine at the university of Bonn in 1823. In 1830 he became professor of physiology and anatomy at the same place, exchanging to Berlin three years afterwards. In 1833 he published his great work, "The Physiology of Man," which was soon afterwards translated into French and English, and is still, perhaps, the best existing work on physiology. His later writings, embracing every subject in comparative anatomy and physiology, have been chiefly published in his own journal, devoted to physiology, &c. B. at Coblenz, 1801; D. 1869.

MÜLLER, Maximilian (ordinarily abbreviated into Max), a learned orientalist, received his education in Germany and France, and soon made himself known by his mastery of the Sanscrit and other Indian languages, from which he published numerous translations, particularly devoting himself to the elucidation of Brahminical literature. In 1843, Mr. Müller went to England, and was shortly afterwards engaged by the East India Company to publish, at their expense, his edition of the "Rig-Veda," and for that purpose settled at Oxford, where the first volume appeared in 1849. In 1854 he was entered Taylorian professor at Oxford, having for some time previously discharged the duties of the chair as deputy professor; and was at the same time invested with the full degree of M.A. by decree of convocation. In 1858 he became curator of the Bodleian library; was elected Fellow of All Souls College in 1853; and in 1860 was an unsuccessful candidate for the chair of Sanscrit, vacant by the death of Professor Wilson. Mr. Müller's publications from Eastern literature are very numerous, and gained for him the reputation of being one of the most accurate and profound oriental scholars of the day. He also contributed various papers of great value to the "Edinburgh Review" and other periodicals. B. at Dessau, in Anhalt-Dessau, 1823.

MÜLLER, John. (See REGIOMONTANUS.)

MULLER, William John, mool'-lev, an English artist, of German descent, who made several long tours in Greece, Egypt, and Turkey, and painted a number of remarkable pictures, illustrative of Oriental life and scenery. In 1845 he was overtaken by a severe illness, the result of the great mental labour he had undergone, and which was increased by the bad treatment he had received at the hands of the Royal Academicians, all his fine pictures having been placed so far from the spectator's eye that they could not be seen. Subsequently to his death, his works were eagerly sought after, and commanded high prices. A collection of his sketches realized £4360 at a sale by auction. His best paintings were, "Turkish Merchants with Camels," "Athens from the road to Marathon," "Sketch of an Egyptian Slave-market," "The Sphinx," and "Prayer in the Desert." In 1841 he produced a finely-illustrated work, entitled "Picturesque Sketches of the Age of Francis I." B. at Bristol, 1812; D. there, 1845.

MULOCK, Miss Dinah Maria, mul'-lok, a modern English authoress, who, at the age of 23, made a highly successful appearance as a novelist, by the production of her well-known fiction, entitled, "The Ogilvies." In 1850 she published "Olive," a romance; and, in the following year, a picture of middle-class Scottish life, called "The Head of the Family." "Agatha's Husband" succeeded, and was in turn followed by a collection of short fictions, entitled "Avilion, and other Tales." Among the best of her latest efforts stands "John Hallifax, Gentleman," a charming piece of writing, in which Miss Mulock's fine imaginative powers and agreeable style appear in their most matured form. B. at Stoke-upon-Trent, 1826.

MULREADY, William, mul'-red'-e, a distinguished modern painter, who evinced a taste for art in his earliest youth, and was accordingly sent, at the age of 15, to study at the Royal Academy. After some ineffectual attempts at the classic and high historic branches of his art, he fortunately acted upon the advice given to students by Sir Joshua Reynolds, and proceeded to make a diligent investigation of the methods pursued by the greatest masters of the Dutch school. This happy turn of study led him to discover where his true strength lay, and quickly enabled him to find subjects in the suburbs of London which he would formerly have passed over as unworthy of his notice. In 1809 he exhibited at the Royal Academy a "Carpenter's Shop and Kitchen," and the "Music Lesson." Other paintings of a similar character followed; and, in 1815, his style was fixed and his fame established, by the production, among other works, of "Idle Boys," which, moreover, secured his election as an associate of the Royal Academy. In the following year he exhibited "The Fight Interrupted," and became R.A. From this period down to the year 1863, Mulready continued to produce works of the very highest excellence, all, from first to last, characterized by the same soberness of effect, the same breadth and simplicity of treatment, the same truth of drawing and mellowness of colour. The best of these are, "The Wolf and the Lamb," "The Convalescent," "The Last In," "The Seven Ages of Man," "Choosing the Wedding Gown," and "Crossing the Ford." Fortunately, through the liberality of Mr. Sheepshanks and other gentlemen, these treasures of art have become national property. They may be seen at the South Kensington Museum, where they form a portion of the "British Collection." B. at Ennis, Ireland, 1786; p. 1863.

MUMMIUS, Lucius, mum'-mi-us, a Roman consul, who, for his victories over the Achæans, was called Achæicus. He destroyed Corinth, Thebes, and Chalcis, and sent the treasures of art these cities contained to Rome; but was so ignorant of the value of the works of the most celebrated artists of Greece found at Corinth, that he is stated to have told those who conveyed them to Rome, that if they lost or injured them, they should make others in their stead.

MUNON, Peter Andrew, moonch, a Norwegian antiquary and philologist, who received his early education under his father, at Skien, and afterwards passed to the university of Christiania, where, in 1834, he underwent his examination in jurisprudence. The bent of his genius was, however, towards history and philology; and on his obtaining the appointment of professor of history at the university of Christiania, he devoted himself to an elucidation of the ancient history and languages of Norway and the North. He paid visits to England, Scotland, and Rome, to trace out the vestiges of the ancient Norsemen, either in books or in the customs of the people who are descended from those old sea-rovers. Professor Munch wrote extensively, his most important works being "Historical and Geographical Description of the Kingdom of Norway during the Middle Ages," and "History of the Norwegian People." In the translated edition of the "Transactions" of the Northern Antiquarian Society, many articles by him are to be found of these, the most interesting to English readers is, perhaps, that entitled "Geographical Elucidations of the Scottish and Irish Local Names occurring in the Sagas." He also composed, for the use of schools, a "History of Norway, Sweden, and Denmark;" and collected a series of entertaining stories from Norwegian history. B. at Christiania, 1810; p. 1863.

MUNCK, Andrew, a modern Norwegian poet and cousin of the preceding, who became, in 1830, an amanuensis in the university library of Christiania. His poems are very popular with his countrymen: of these he has published two collections, entitled, respectively, "Poems, Old and New," and "New Poems." There is also a drama by him, founded on the subject domon de Caus, a lunatic who was imprisoned the Bicêtre in 1641, and from whom, it has been stated by some French authors, the marquis of Worcester derived his notions of the principle of the steam engine. B. 1811.

MÜNCHHAUSEN, Adolphus, Baron, (mu'-n-hous'-en), a Hanoverian statesman, who was, during 37 years, privy councillor to the electors of that kingdom. He had a principal share in founding the university of Göttingen, in which seat of learning he held the office of curator, and established professorships of political science, history, and geography. The Royal Society of sciences of Göttingen was also much indebted to his liberality. B. at Hanover, 1698; p. 1770. MÜNCHHAUSEN, Jerome Charles Frederik von, a German officer in the Russian service, who served in several campaigns against the Turks, was a passionate lover of horses and hounds; of which, and of his adventures among the Turks, he told the most extravagant stories, all his fancy so completely got the better of his memory, that he really believed his most extravagant fictions, and felt very much offended if any doubt was expressed on the subject. Having become acquainted with Burger at Pyrmont, and related these waking dreams to him, the poet published them in 1787, with his own improvements, under the title of "Wunderbare Abenteuer und Reisen des Herrn von Munchhausen." The wit and humour of the work gave it great success, and it was translated into several foreign languages. p. 1797.

MUNDAY, Anthony, mun'-dai, a dramatic poet of the 16th century, who was the author of the "City Pageants," and enlarged Stowe's "Survey of London." p. 1633.

MUNDAY, Joseph Shepherd, mun'-den, a famous comic actor, who, from 1790 to 1813, delighted the audiences of Covent Garden with his inimitable representations; from 1813 to 1824, when he retired from the stage, his services were transferred to Drury Lane. His humour was exuberant and racy; and though often verging on caricature, he could melt the heart by touches of true pathos, as readily as he could stir it into mirth by the exquisite drollery of his marvellously flexible countenance. B. 1758; p. 1832.

MUNGO PARK. (See PARK, Mungo.)

MUNNICH, Christopher Burchard, Count de, moon'-nik, a German general in the service of Russia, who at first distinguished himself as an officer of engineers, under Prince Eugene. Peter the Great invited him to Russia, where he constructed the Ladoga canal. After terminating this great enterprise, he was loaded with honours, and created field-marshal and privy councillor. At the head of the Russian troops, he defeated the Poles and Turks in 1737, and made himself master of Pereikoy, Otehakof, and Choezim. He subsequently became prime minister; in which capacity he came into collision with Biren, who had been appointed regent, in accordance with the will of Anna Ivanovna, the late empress, whose favourite he had been. (See BIREN.) Marshal Munnich was at first successful over his rival, and Biren was banished to Siberia; but, upon the accession of the empress Elizabeth, Munnich was in turn sent into exile, in 1742, and remained in Siberia during twenty years. He was recalled by Peter III., upon his accession, and appeared at court in the sheepskin dress MUNSTER, Sebastian, mun-ster, a learned German divine, who at first was a Franciscan monk, but afterwards embraced the Reformed religion, and was nominated Hebrew professor at the university of Basel. Munster was called the Esdras and Strabo of Germany. He wrote a Hebrew Grammar and Dictionary, and published a Cosmography, in folio, and a Latin version of the Old Testament, with other learned works. b. at Inglesheim, 1499; d. of the plague, at Basle, 1552.

MURAD, or AMURATH. (See AMURATH.)

MURAT, Joachim, moo'-ra, a celebrated French marshal, and king of Naples, was the son of an innkeeper at Cahors. His father intended him for the church, and succeeded in getting him admitted to the college of Cahors; but young Murat's disposition was ill-suited to the ecclesiastical profession. An amour was the cause of his quitting the college; after which he enlisted in a regiment of chasseurs, from which he was dismissed for insubordination. Returning to his father's house, he occupied himself with the management of the horses belonging to the inn. The outburst of the Revolution gave to his impetuous and restless spirit an opportunity for action; and he became one of the most energetic partisans of liberty and equality. He had again entered a cavalry regiment, and during the Reign of Terror rapidly rose to the grade of colonel. In 1795 he rendered good service to Bonaparte, which the future emperor rewarded by placing Murat upon his staff when he set out for the Italian campaign of the same year. The fortunes of Bonaparte and Murat were henceforth closely allied. He was confidential aide-de-camp to his patron in Egypt; and, having signalized himself on every occasion as a man of impetuous bravery, was soon nominated general of division. On the 18th Brumaire (9th Nov. 1799), he commanded the sixty grenadiers who dispersed the Council of Five Hundred. For this service Napoleon appointed him commandant of the consular guard, and gave him the hand of his sister Caroline in marriage. After the battle of Marengo, in which he commanded the cavalry with distinguished bravery, he was created governor of the Cisalpine republic, and, afterwards, governor of Paris. When Napoleon became emperor, he bestowed the field-marshal's bâton upon Murat, and created him prince, with the title of grand-duke of Berg and Cleves. "The handsome swordsman," as he was termed, went through the German campaign of 1805 with more than his accustomed brilliancy of deed. In the invasion of Spain, in 1808, he commanded the French army, and was ambitious of gaining the throne which Charles IV. had vacated for himself; but Napoleon preferred to place his brother Joseph upon the Spanish throne, at the same time bestowing the crown of Naples upon Murat. In 1808 he was proclaimed king of the Two Sicilies, as Naples and Sicily are often called. He reigned in peace until 1812, his rule being characterized by mildness and liberality. In the latter year he headed the cavalry of the grand army which invaded Russia, and in the advance performed his customary feats of personal valour; and, during the disastrous retreat, he commanded in chief from Smolensko to Wilna. After the battle of Leipsic, he hurried back to his kingdom, and having broken with Napoleon, by whom he imagined himself to have been slighted, entered into negotiations with the allies. The congress of Vienna, however, not recognising his kingly title, he declared in favour of Napoleon immediately after learning that the emperor had returned from the isle of Elba. Calling upon the Italians to fight for their national independence, he marched into Upper Italy, where he encountered the Austrians at Tolentino, in 1815, but met with a signal defeat, and lost at once his army and his throne. Subsequently, he attempted to regain the latter, and landed with a few followers upon the coast of Calabria; but, being captured, was brought before a Neapolitan military commission, which basely condemned him to be shot. As a military commander, Murat was mediocre; but his impetuous bravery, his love of daring, and his uniform success in battle, would seem to entitle him to the praise which Napoleon bestowed upon him when he called his favourite "the best cavalry officer in Europe." b. at Cahors, in Perigord, 1767; shot, 1815.

MURAT, Caroline Maria Bonaparte, wife of the preceding. (See BONAPARTE, Caroline.)

MURATORI, Luigi Antonio, moo'-ra-to'-re, a celebrated Italian historian, who has been termed "the father of the history of the Middle Ages." After completing his education at Modena, he entered into holy orders, and was invited, at the age of 23, to Milan, by Count Charles Borromeo, who appointed him librarian of the Ambrosian college. Thereupon Muratori commenced the study of the Italian middle-age records, and subsequently published his "Rerum Italicarum Scriptores," in twenty-eight volumes; wherein he gave every chronicle of the mediæval period, accompanying them with learned and valuable commentaries. His "Antiquitates Italianæ" was first produced in 1742; and of this valuable contribution to history the author himself wrote, "I have treated first of the kings, dukes, marquises, counts, and other magistrates of the Italian kingdom; after which I have investigated the various forms of the political government, and also the manners of the private citizens, the freedom and franchises of some classes, and the servitude of others; the laws, the judicial forms, the military system; the arts, sciences, and education; the progress of trade and industry; and other matters of social and civil history." Muratori was a member of the Royal Society of London, and of several other learned bodies; but he was exposed to the calumnies and persecutions of some bigots of his church, who accused him of holding heretical opinions, and even denounced him to Pope Benedict XIV. That liberal pontiff, however, wrote to the historian, that "those passages in his works which were not found acceptable to Rome, did not touch either the dogma or the discipline of the Church; but that, had they been written by any other person, the Roman Congregation of the Index would have forbidden them, which, however, they had not done in the case of Muratori's works, because it was well known that he, the pope, shared in the universal esteem in which his merit was held." The whole of the historian's minor works were collected and published, in 19 volumes, in 1787. Besides the above-mentioned productions, he wrote a learned treatise upon Italian Poetry, and an enlightened devotional work, wherein he combated much of the superstition and bigotry of the Roman Catholic church. B. at Vignola, Modena, 1673; D. at Modena, 1750.

MURCHISON, Sir Roderick Impey, mur'-chis-on, a distinguished modern geologist, director-general of the Geological Survey of the United Kingdom, and director of the Metropolitan School of Science applied to Mining and the Arts. After receiving a portion of his education at the Durham grammar-school, he entered the military college of Marlow in 1805, and left it two years subsequently, upon receiving a commission in the 36th regiment. He served at the battle of Vimiera, and shared the dangers and the glory of the retreat made by Sir John Moore upon Corunna. In 1815 he married, and quitted the military profession. Becoming acquainted with Sir Humphry Davy, he was urged by that great chemist to devote his leisure to scientific pursuits. Acting upon this advice, he proceeded to study the science of geology, and shortly afterwards explored the Highlands, Yorkshire, and other parts of the kingdom, in company with Professor Sedgwick. In 1828 he accompanied Mr. (afterwards Sir Charles) Lyell in a geological tour among the extinct volcanoes at Auvergne. After exploring the chain of the Eastern Alps, he published a memoir upon the subject, accompanied with a geological map, in 1829. He subsequently returned to the study of the geological formations of Great Britain, and succeeded in discovering the whole series of Silurian rocks in the sea-cliffs westward of Milford Haven. The term "Silurian system" was first used by him, in consequence of the vast deposits of which it is constituted being most fully displayed in those parts of England and Wales once inhabited by a tribe of Britons to whom the Romans applied the name "Silures." With this great discovery Sir Roderick Murchison's name has ever since been identified, and he has put forth his views thereupon in an important work, entitled "The Silurian System." In the years 1835 and 1839 he explored the Rhenish provinces; and, in 1840, in company with M. de Verneuil, a French geologist, he set out for Russia, with the intention of investigating the geological formations of that country, hitherto very little known. The result of his several expeditions was published in 1845, in a magnificent volume, entitled "Geology of Russia and the Ural Mountains," in the production of which he was assisted by M. de Verneuil and the Count Von Keyserling. Shortly after the publication of this book he was knighted by her majesty Queen Victoria, and was created a member of the order of St. Stanislaus by the emperor Nicholas. About the same time the Royal Society awarded him its Copley medal for his efforts in establishing the "Silurian System." He wrote extensively upon the subjects of his observations and explorations, and a large number of important contributions by him appeared in the "Transactions" and "Journals" of the learned societies of Great Britain. In 1855 he produced "Siluria; the History of the oldest known Rocks containing Organic Remains, with a Brief Sketch of the Distribution of Gold over the Earth." Sir Roderick Murchison likewise declared that gold should be found in the Austrian Alps, and urged the government to organize an expedition to test the truth of his views. This appeal met with no official response; but his theories were rapidly confirmed through the actual discovery of the precious metal by private individuals. He was M.A. of Cambridge and Dublin, D.C.L. of Oxford, trustee of the British Museum, and member of almost all the scientific bodies of Europe. B. in Ross-shire, 1792.

MURRE, Sir William, mure, a Scotch poet, whose works mostly remain in manuscript. Some of them, however, appeared in a volume entitled "Ancient Ballads and Songs," published in 1827. In the civil war, he took the popular side, served as captain in the Ayrshire regiment, and was wounded at Marston Moor, near Rowallan, Ayr, 1594; D. 1657.

MURRE, William, of Caldwell, an eminent scholar and critic, was educated at Westminster and the University of Edinburgh, and studied subsequently in Germany. He represented Benfrewshire in Parliament from 1843 to 1855, and was Lord Rector of the University of Glasgow during the years 1847 and 1848. His chief work, "A Critical History of the Language and Literature of Ancient Greece," was incomplete at his death; but the several portions of it, on the epic and lyric poets, and the historians, may be considered as separate works. In the first two volumes, devoted to an examination of the "Iliad" and "Odyssey" of Homer, he endeavours to prove the essential unity of both these poems, together with the identity of their authorship; and it is admitted he successfully refuted the theory which regarded the epics of Homer as collections of national songs composed by different men, and possibly at different times. B. 1799; D. 1860.

MURER, Marc Antoine François, moor'-rai, a learned French critic, who, at the age of 18, read lectures upon Cicero and Terence in the college of Auch, whence he proceeded to Paris, and taught the classics and civil law with great reputation. His sarcastic and vivacious character, however, procured him many enemies, and, being accused of heresy and depraved habits, he was imprisoned; but, obtaining his release, he repaired to Toulouse, where fresh charges were brought against him. To avoid punishment, he fled to Italy. At Rome he was well received, was ordained a priest, and was presented to several rich benefices. He taught philosophy, theology, and civil law in the latter city, and enjoyed the esteem of Popes Pius V. and Gregory XIII. His works consist of valuable annotations upon the Latin classics, "Poemata," and "Orations." His commentaries upon Plato's "Republic," and upon Sallust, Cicero, Terence, and Aristotle, are regarded as very excellent. B. near Limoges, 1526; D. at Rome, 1585.

MURGER, Henry, moor'-zhai, a modern French littérateur, who became, in 1838, secretary to Count Tolstoy, a wealthy Russian nobleman, resident at that period at Paris. It was whilst reading to his patron the productions of contemporary authors, that the desire to achieve a name in literature was first awakened in his breast. He began by writing verse, and attacked the poet Barthélemy in a satirical poem. His next work was a volume of poetry, entitled "Via Dolorosa," for which he was unsuccessful in obtaining a publisher. He then lived that strange, irregular, and somewhat romantic mode of life called by himself and other French novelists the "Bohemian." Fired with literary ambition, but painfully uncertain as to where he should procure a dinner, the young enthusiast mixed in the society of a number of young painters, musicians, and poets,—the strange bond of impecuniosity uniting them all. Chamfleur became his friend during this time, and with him, Murger wrote a number of small pieces for the Luxembourg theatre. After producing several poems and novels with more or less success, he, in 1848, gave to the public the celebrated "Scenes of Bohemian Life," which fixed his fame. This fine recital of the adventures of his early days opened to him the pages of the "Revue des Deux Mondes," and to that journal he afterwards contributed several of his best works. M. Murger was less successful as a dramatist and poet, the particular charm of his style depending not upon invention and imagination, but on the truth and reality of his pictures of life. B. in Paris, 1822; d. 1860.

MURILLO, Bartolomeo Stefano, moo-rael'-yo, a celebrated Spanish painter, studied under his uncle Juan del Castillo, at Seville, whence, in 1643, he proceeded to Madrid, and obtained instruction from the celebrated Velasquez. In 1645 he returned to Seville, where he rapidly rose to the highest distinction, and painted several historical works for the king of Spain. In his own country, his fame chiefly rests upon his numerous altar-pieces; but in England, where his works are highly prized, his simple works, such as "The Spanish Peasant Boy," in the National Gallery, are most highly prized. His death was the result of an accident he met with while working upon a scaffolding in the Capuchin convent at Cadiz, at his painting entitled the "Marriage of St. Catherine." B. at Seville, 1618; d. at the same place, 1682.

MURPHY, Arthur, mer'-fe, a dramatic and miscellaneous writer, who, after receiving some education at the college at St. Omer, in France, at the age of 18 returned to Ireland, and was placed in the counting-house of a merchant who was his relation; but not liking that occupation, he went to London, and, having a great inclination to the stage, made an effort in the character of Othello, but without success. He then commenced a literary career, and produced "The Orphan of China," a tragedy, which was well received. He also established a weekly paper, called "The Gray's Inn Journal," and two others in defence of government, entitled the "Test" and the "Auditor." Having studied the law, he was called to the bar by the Society of Lincoln's Inn, but never had much practice. His plays of the "Grecian Daughter," "All in the Wrong," "The Way to Keep Him," and "The Citizen," had great success, and produced the author wealth and fame. Mr. Murphy also acquired considerable reputation by his "Lives" of Fielding and Johnson, and, above all, by his translation of Tacitus. He was a commissioner of bankrupts, and, for the last two years of his life, had a pension of £200 a year. His last literary performance was the "Life of Garrick," which is by no means equal to his former works. Mr. Murphy was the intimate friend of Dr. Johnson, Burke, Garrick, Foote, and other eminent men. B. in Ireland, 1730; d. in London, 1805.

MURPHY, James Cavanah, an architect and historian, who spent several years in Spain and Portugal, and produced a number of works relative to the history and antiquities of those History of the Mahometan Empire in Spain." The volume entitled "Arabian Antiquities" contained 97 fine plates, among which were several depicting the Alhambra. B. in Ireland, about 1760; d. 1816.

MURPHY, Robert, a modern mathematician, was the son of a poor shoemaker of Mallow, in Ireland. In his 11th year, his thigh-bone was fractured by his being run over by a cart. This accident was the cause of his being confined to his bed during twelve months. Among other papers, an old Cork almanac, containing some mathematical problems, was given him wherewith to employ his mind. This led him to ask for a copy of Euclid, and a work upon algebra, both of which he mastered unaided, and before he had attained his 13th year. He next forwarded answers to the mathematical problems inserted in the newspapers by a gentleman at Cork. The latter sought out the lad, and succeeded in interesting some gentlemen in his behalf. He was received into a classical school in his native town, and subsequently went to the university of Cambridge, where, in 1829, he took his B.A. degree, and afterwards became fellow and dean of his college. Having fallen into dissipated habits, he was compelled to leave the university in 1832. After spending some time in Ireland, he went to London in 1833, and commenced as a mathematical teacher and writer. Two years later, he was appointed examiner in mathematics and natural philosophy at the University of London. To the Cambridge "Philosophical Transactions" he contributed many papers on mathematics, and wrote a treatise on the "Theory of Algebraical Equations." He likewise furnished the earlier parts of the "Penny Cyclopædia" with articles on natural philosophy. B. at Mallow, Ireland, 1806; d. in London, 1843.

MURRAY, or MORAY, James Stuart, Earl of mur'-rai, was a natural son of James V., king of Scotland, by Margaret, daughter of Lord Erskine of Mar. He went with his sister, Mary queen of Scots, to France, in 1548, and was among her retinue when she was married to the dauphin of France; but after his return to his native country, he soon began to play an important part in the councils of the party of the Reformation. He was subsequently deputed to repair to France and invite his sister to Scotland. In 1561 he returned to Edinburgh, and upon the queen's arrival, a few weeks afterwards, he was appointed by her prime minister. For his services in that office, Mary created him earl of Mar; but a rival claimant to the title having appeared in Lord Erskine, the minister received the earldom of Murray in its stead. Together with John Knox and queen Elizabeth, he was opposed to the queen's marriage with Darnley; but though he became estranged from his sister, he took no active part in the murder of her husband. He is said, however, to have been aware of the plot for the assassination of Darnley, which, it is avowed, he declared he would neither aid nor hinder. Soon after the horrid deed, he left Scotland for the continent, visiting Elizabeth on his way. He returned after the coronation of James VI., and was proclaimed regent in 1567. After the queen's escape from Lochleven Castle, he took up arms against her, and defeated her at Langside. Subsequently, he complied with the summons of queen Elizabeth, and appeared at the trial of his unfortunate sister, and bore witness against her. In 1570, however, while riding through the streets of Linlithgow, he was shot by James Hamilton of Bothwellhaugh, in revenge of a personal injury committed by him years before. b., it is supposed, about 1533.

MURRAY, Hugh, a voluminous and successful writer on geography and kindred subjects, at an early age became a clerk in the excise office in Edinburgh; where his official duties leaving him considerable leisure, he cultivated a taste for literature with rare and indefatigable ardour. In the early part of his career he edited the "Scots' Magazine," contributed to the "Edinburgh Gazetteer," and published successively "Discoveries and Travels in Africa, Asia, and America." At a later period of his life he contributed 15 volumes to the "Edinburgh Cabinet Library," on subjects connected with his favourite study; but the work on which his reputation mainly rests, is his "Encyclopædia of Geography," a stupendous monument of reading, industry, and research. b. in the manse of North Berwick, 1779; d. 1848.

MURRAY, John, a physician, who attained to a distinguished pre-eminence as a lecturer on natural philosophy, chemistry, materia medica, and pharmacy, at Edinburgh, where he had been educated. He wrote "Elements of Chemistry," a "System of Chemistry," "Elements of Materia Medica and Pharmacy," and "System of Materia Medica and Pharmacy." d. 1820.

MURRAY, Lindley, an American grammarian, who at first acted as clerk to his father, a merchant at New York, but was subsequently placed with a private tutor, to acquire some classical knowledge. He next applied himself to the study of the law, and, in his 21st year was called to the bar; but upon the breaking out of the dispute between Great Britain and America, he entered upon a commercial career. Having acquired some property, he retired from business, and bought an estate near New York but the summers of his native country proving too relaxing for his frame, he resolved to settle in England; and accordingly crossed the Atlantic, and took up his residence near York, where he lived till his death. His "Grammar of the English Language," Key, and Exercises, were composed in England, and in a condition of such bodily infirmity, that he could take no exercise, except in a carriage. During the latter years of his life, he was entirely confined to his chamber. Besides the three works already named, he produced "The English Reader," "Lecteur Français," and a small work "On the Duty and Benefit of a Daily Perusal of the Holy Scriptures." The large sums obtained by him for his educational works were entirely devoted to charitable purposes. b. in Pennsylvania, 1745 d. near York, 1826.

MURRAY, Sir George, a gallant British general, governor of the Royal Military College at Woolwich, &c., was educated at the high school and university of Edinburgh, entered the army in 1789, and gained great distinction in almost every quarter of the globe for his military achievements, and more especially for the skill and ability with which he discharged in the Peninsular war the duties of quartermaster-general. In 1812 he was appointed to the government of the Canadas; but on hearing that Napoleon had escaped from Elba, obtained his release from that office, and joined the British army in France. On his return to England he was appointed governor of Edinburgh Castle; and in 1819 the governorship of the Royal Military College was conferred upon him. In 1823 he became lieutenant-general of the ordnance, was soon after elected M.P. for Perthshire, and in 1828 took office as secretary of state for the colonies. In Sir R. Peel's administration of 1834-5 he filled the office of master-general of the ordnance; but lost his seat for Perthshire. At the Westminster election in 1837 he opposed and was defeated by Sir Deacy Evans and Mr. Leader. When the Whigs assigned in 1841, Sir George again received the appointment of master-general. Sir George Murray is likewise known to the world in a literary capacity, as the editor of "Marlborough's dispatches." b. in Perthshire, 1773; d. 1848.

MURRAY, William, a distinguished actor and theatrical manager, made his first appearance, in his 19th year, at Covent Garden, under the auspices of Mr. Kemble. He shortly afterwards settled in Edinburgh, where he remained 42 years as actor and lessee of the Theatres Royal and Adelphi, and, during that period, besides his professional fame, he enjoyed the universal respect of the citizens, and the friendship of Scott, Allan, Wilson, Jeffrey, and the other leading literati of Edinburgh. Mr. Murray was a most versatile actor; and could take successfully a very wide range of characters. He was in the habit of delivering addresses at the beginning and close of the theatrical season, which were masterpieces of wit and humour. b. 1791; d. 1852.

MURRAY, John, an eminent English publisher, who was at first in partnership, as medical bookseller, with Mr. Higley, but afterwards devoted his attention to a much more extensive line of business. A man of considerable tact, he sought and made the acquaintance of the best writers of his day, and contrived to maintain a long course of business transactions with them by the exercise of well-timed liberality. His first great undertaking was the establishment of the "Quarterly Review," in 1809. He published a few of Sir Walter Scott's, and all Lord Byron's works. His name was also to be found on the title-page of works by Campbell, Moore, Canning, Hallam, Croker, Isaac Disraeli, Washington Irving, Southey, Lockhart, Crabbe, and Bishop Heber. Several of his publishing ventures were particularly fortunate; such as the "Domestic Cookery," of which upwards of 300,000 copies have been sold. The "Family" and "Colonial" Libraries were also valuable and successful speculations. b. 1778; d. 1843.

MURRAY, William, Earl of Mansfield. (See Mansfield, Earl of.)

MUSA, Antonius, mu'-sa, a Greek physician, who cured Augustus of a dangerous illness by bathing. He was the first who advised the use of the cold bath. The Romans erected a statue in his honour. Two tracts, "De Herbâ Botanica," and "De tuenda Valetudine," are attributed to him.

Musa, Ibn-Nosseyr, a famous Arab conqueror, who, in 707, was nominated governor of Mauritania, and who quickly reduced the whole of the tribes inhabiting the northern shores of Africa. In 710 he landed in Spain with a small army, and, after some successes, returned to Africa laden with spoil. In the following year he dispatched his subordinate, Tarik, into Spain. The latter defeated and killed Roderick, the Gothic king, and pushed his victorious arms as far as the rich city of Toledo, which he plundered. Musa, unwilling to allow so much glory and wealth to fall to the share of his lieutenant, put himself at the head of 18,000 men, with whom he landed at Algeiras in 712. He rapidly reduced Seville, Beja, Merida, and marched upon Toledo, where he met Tarik, whom he caused to be beaten and thrown into prison. Tarik was, however, subsequently restored to his command by the caliph Al-Walid; whereupon he overran Spain in an easterly direction. Musa, on the other hand, pursued a northerly course, and took Salamanca and other considerable cities. The two Arab generals quickly reduced the whole of Spain, and were summoned to Syria by the caliph Al-Walid. Tarik obeyed instantly; but it was not until a second messenger had been despatched to Musa that he turned eastward. He arrived in Syria at the beginning of 715, accompanied by thousands of captives, among whom were four hundred of the Spanish nobility, and with a long train of camels laden with spoil. The caliph received him coldly; and upon his death, shortly afterwards, Suleyman, his successor, cast Musa into prison, and fined him 200,000 pieces of gold. One of his sons was also put to death, and his head brought to Musa by Suleyman himself, who asked him if he knew it; upon which the afflicted parent replied, "Cursed be he who has slain a better man than himself." Musa died in poverty, 717; s. 640.

MUSEUS, mu-se-us, an ancient Greek poet, who is stated to have lived in the mystic ages of Greece, and to have been an Athenian. All his works are lost; but some quotations from them, given by Plato, and others, were inserted by Henry Estienne, or Stephens, in his "Philosophical Poetry of the Ancients."—There was another of the same name, who wrote a poem called "Hero and Leander." He is supposed to have flourished in the 5th century of the Christian era.

MUSEUS, John Charles Augustus, a German writer, who studied theology at the University, with the intention of entering into holy orders. Relinquishing theology for general literature, he, in 1760, published a parody on Richardson's novel, entitled "Grandison the Second," the success of which urged him to make renewed efforts as an author. It was not, however, until after an interval of eighteen years that he gave to the public his "Physiognomical Travels," a satire upon Lavater. In the interim he had supported himself by teaching at the gymnasium of Weimar. His fame was secured by this last production; and he thereupon proceeded to collect and write his "Volksmärchen der Deutschen," or "Popular Legends of Germany," which were a series of charming narratives gathered from the peasantry, and dressed up in a simple and beautiful style. His other works were a collection of novelettes and tales for children, and a number of satirical sketches entitled "Freund Heins Erscheinungen," or "Death's Advent," in which Museus treated of the many human undertakings cut short by the summons of that inevitable visitor. Some of his posthumous sketches were collected by his pupil Augustus von Kotzebue, and published in 1791, with the title, "Some Traits of the Life of the good Museus." Museus was no less witty and captivating as a writer than kindly and generous as a man. B. at Jena, 1735; D. 1787.

MUSEGRAVE, William, mu'-gravi, an English physician and antiquary, who, in 1684, was chosen secretary to the Royal Society. He edited "Geta Britannicus," which is the life of Geta, by Capitolinus, and a number of medical works. B. 1657; D. at Exeter, 1721.

MUSCHENBROEK, Peter van, moosh-shen-e(r)k, an eminent Dutch natural philosopher and mathematician, who, with Gravesande, first introduced the Newtonian philosophy into Holland. He became professor of mathematics and natural philosophy at his native place; and was a member of the Royal Society of London and of the Academy of Sciences at Paris. His "Course of Natural and Experimental Philosophy" is a valuable work, and has been translated into English by Colson. He also wrote, in Latin, treatises on the Magnet, Capillary Attraction, Cohesion, and Meteorology. B. at Leyden, 1692; D. at the same place, 1761.

MUSSET, Alfred de, moos-sai, an eminent modern French poet, playwright, and novelist. After completing his education at the college of Henry IV., where his fellow-pupil and intimate friend was the duke of Orleans, son of Louis Philippe, he essayed the most diverse studies. The law, medicine, finance, painting, were in turn engaged in, in turn abandoned. In 1830 he put forth a small volume of poetry, entitled "Tales of Spain and Italy." The success which the work obtained was quite undeserved—in a moral point of view, at least; but this early favour encouraged its author to proceed, and to achieve better things. A celebrity at 23, the young poet made a journey to Italy with George Sand, under the name of confidential secretary. Between the years 1836-40, he produced several works, more or less characterized by an affectation of Byronic misanthropy and disgust of things mundane. Two or three collections of poems and a number of plays succeeded, the best of which last, however, were not adapted for the stage. At the revolution of 1848, he lost his post of librarian to the ministry of the interior, but regained it after the establishment of the empire, with the additional appointment of reader to the empress. During his last years he gave himself up to play and even grosser pleasures. His last volume of verse was published in 1850, and showed a premature decay of the author's powers: he was nevertheless elected a member of the French Academy in 1852. At his death, he left some poems and a drama uncompleted. B. at Paris, 1810; D. 1857.

MUSTAPHA I., mu'-ta-fa, sultan of Turkey, succeeded his brother Ahmed I. in 1617; in the same year he was, however, deposed by the Janissaries, and thrown into prison. He was afterwards released and replaced upon the throne, but again deposed by the Janissaries, and strangled in 1623.

MUSTAPHA II., son of Mahomet IV., succeeded Ahmed II., his uncle, in 1695. He defeated the Austrians at Temeswar, and made war, with success, against the Venetians, Poles, and Russians. Fortune at length turning against him, he was forced to make peace. He was deposed by his subjects, and died in 1703.

MUSTAPHA III., the son of Ahmed III., ascended the throne in 1757. He was a weak prince, and, by trusting to his favourites, greatly exhausted the public treasury. His brother Abdul Ahmed succeeded him. D. 1774.

MUSTAPHA IV. ascended the throne in 1807, after the deposition of Selim III. Mustapha

Bafraktar, pasha of Rudshuk, collected an army and marched upon Constantinople, demanding that the deposed Selim should be given up to him; but Selim had been already strangled, and his dead body was brought to Bafraktar, who thereupon deposed Mustapha IV., and placed his brother Mahmoud upon the throne (see MAHMOUD II.) by whom Mustapha was put to death in 1808.

MUSURUS, Constantine, mu-su'-rus, a Turkish diplomatist, the representative of an ancient Cretan family of high rank. After serving his country in various diplomatic missions to Athens and Vienna, he was sent as ambassador to London in 1855, and since that time has continued to represent Turkey at the court of St. James's. b. at Constantinople, 1807.

MUTIUS, Cælius, mu'-shi-us, first named Cordus, and afterwards Scævola, an illustrious Roman, who distinguished himself when Porsenna besieged Rome, 507 B.C. Mutius entered the camp of Porsenna to assassinate him, and, by mistake, stabbed one of his attendants. Being seized and brought before Porsenna, he said that he was one of 300 who had engaged, by oath, to slay him; and added, "This hand, which has missed its purpose, ought to suffer." On saying this, he thrust it into the coals which were burning on the altar, and suffered it to be consumed. Porsenna, struck with this intrepidity, made peace with the Romans. The name of Scævola, or left-handed, was given as a mark of distinction to Mutius and his family.

MYLNE, Robert, mil'-na, an eminent architect and civil engineer, who built old Blackfriars Bridge, taken down 1864, and erected Sir Christopher Wren's monument in St. Paul's Cathedral, to which establishment he acted as surveyor. b. at Edinburgh, 1734; d. 1811.

MYRON, mi'-ron, a celebrated sculptor of ancient Greece, whose praises were frequently sung by both the Greek and Roman poets. He excelled in carving animals. He was the modeller of the Discobolus or Quoit-thrower, an ancient marble copy of which is in the British Museum. He flourished in the 5th century B.C.

MYTENS, Daniel, mi'-tens, a Dutch painter, who went to England, and became the best portrait-painter at the court of James I. He painted portraits of James I., Prince Rupert, and the dwarf, Sir Jeffrey Hudson. When Vandyck became popular, Mytens retired to the Hague. b. in Holland, 1599; d. about 1660.

NABIS, na'-bis, tyrant of Sparta, whom Philip, king of Macedon, appointed governor of Argos. He was guilty of the greatest cruelties, and had a statue, carved to resemble his wife, which, by springs, would embrace any one that touched it, and then pierce the victim through the body with spikes. This machine Nabis devised as a means of extorting money from his people; and when any one refused, he threatened to introduce him to his wife. He was slain B.C. 192.

NABONASSAR, na'-bo-na'-sar, king of Babylon. He is celebrated by the famous epoch which bears his name, and which commenced in the year 747 B.C. He is supposed to be the same with Baladan, the father of Merodach, mentioned in Scripture. Reigned between 743 and 734 B.C.

NABOPOLASSAR, na'-bo-po-las'-a-r, king of Babylon, united with Astyages against Assyria, which empire they conquered, and having divided it between them, founded two kingdoms, that of the Medes under Astyages, and that of the Chaldeans under Nabopolassar, A.C. 621-05.

NADIR SHAH, na'-dir-sha, called also Tamasp 'ouli Khan, king of Persia, and a famous conqueror, was son of a maker of sheepskin coats, who belonged to the race of Afshar, a Turkish tribe, which had attached itself to the king of Persia. Nadir, after he had become great, was fond of alluding to his mean origin; and when one of his sons, who was about to marry a princess of the royal family of Delhi, was requested to name his ancestors for seven generations, Nadir replied, "Tell them that you are the son of Nadir-Shah, the son of the sword, he grandson of the sword, and so on, till they have a descent of seventy, instead of seven generations." From his earliest youth he displayed great courage and boldness. At the age of 17 he was taken prisoner by the Uzbeks in one of their annual incursions into Khorassan. After a captivity of four years, he effected his escape, returned to his native country, and subsequently entered the service of the governor of Khorassan, who appointed him to command an army sent against the Tartars. Nadir gained a complete victory with an inferior force, and took the Tartar general prisoner. The governor at first treated him with great distinction; but becoming jealous of his aspiring spirit, refused him a grade in the army he had promised him, and when Nadir complained of this breach of faith, caused him to be bastinadoed. Exasperated at this dishonourable treatment, Nadir became the leader of a band of robbers. With this troop he rose to great power. In 1727 he joined Tamasp, son of the monarch of Persia, who had been pushed from the throne by the Afghan conquerors of Persia. His first act was to kill Futteh Ali, the commander of the Persian forces; after which he took the supreme command. In the same year, he drove the Afghans out of Mushed. After several great victories, he took Isphahan, and put to death Ashraff, the Afghan king. He next took the name of Tamasp Kouli, or "the slave of Tamasp," and was also ennobled with the title of Khan. He was likewise granted the four finest provinces of the kingdom. But this did not satisfy his ambitious nature, and upon the first opportunity he deposed Tamasp, whose son, an infant eight months old, he proclaimed king, at the same time constituting himself regent. In 1735, he gained the battle of Erivan, in which the Turks lost 50,000 men. The infant monarch died in the same year; upon which Nadir called a great council of the kingdom, at which more than a hundred thousand persons are said to have attended, by whom he was acknowledged king. With the view of destroying the Afghans as an independent power, he invaded the province of Candahar, and in 1738 the city of that name fell into his power. In the following year he marched into Hindostan, and after defeating the Mogul troops, entered Delhi, where he acquired immense riches. After his return to Persia, he turned his arms against the king of Bokhara, who was compelled to submit. Nadir next marched along both banks of the Oxus, as far as the Caspian, which territory he conquered, and put its monarch to death in 1740. He had thus secured peace for Persia, whose dominions were extended in every direction. But his last years were characterised by cruel tyranny, which excited universal hatred against him; and at length a conspiracy of some of the highest officers of his court was formed, and he was assassinated in 1747. b. in Khorassan, 1688.

NÆVUS, Cneius, nē-vi-us, a Latin poet, who served in the first Punic war, upon which he wrote an epic poem. He likewise produced several comedies, one of which was so displeasing to Metellus, the consul, that he expelled him from Rome. Nævius retired to Utica, where he died about 204 b.c. Some fragments of his are extant.

NÆVIUS, a famous augur in the reign of Tarquin, of whom it is related, that, in order to convince the king and the Romans of his supernatural power, he cut a stone with a razor, and thus turned the ridicule of the populace into admiration. Cicero, however, who had himself been an augur, treats this miraculous event as a mere fiction.

NAHL, Johann August, nal, an eminent Prussian sculptor, who executed the colossal statue of the late Frederick, which stands in Frederick's Square, Berlin. In 1755 he was appointed professor of the Academy of Arts at Cassel. b. at Berlin, 1710; d. at Cassel, 1781.

NAKHEIMOV, Nicolaevitch, nak-ke-mof, a Russian poet, who received his education at the university of Moscow; after which he entered the army, but soon quitted it, and devoted himself to literature. Possessed of considerable wealth, he retired to his estates, where he occupied himself with the composition of his "Fables" and a large number of prose satirical pieces. His satire in verse, entitled "The Speaking Monkey," was written in derision of the French subsequently to the invasion of Russia by Napoleon I. This production is pronounced to be not inferior to the writings of Voltaire. b. at Kharkov, 1782; d. 1814.

NALDI, Sebastiano, nal-de, a famous Italian buffo singer, who went to London early in the nineteenth century, and obtained great clat. He was accidentally killed at Paris in 1819, by the explosion of an apparatus which had been invented for cooking by steam. This person, who possessed a marvellous power of facial contortion, has been consigned to immortality by Byron, in the line—

"Watch each distortion of a Naldi's face," which occurs in the "English Bards and Scotch Reviewers."

NALSON, John, nal-son, an English divine, who, after having gone through the usual course of a university education at Cambridge, obtained the living of Doddington, and a prebend in Ely cathedral. He was the author of "An Imperial Collection of the Affairs of State, from the Scotch Rebellion to the Murder of Charles the First," and also wrote an account of the trial of that monarch. b. 1638; d. 1698.

NANI, John Baptist, na-ne, a Venetian historian, who in 1641 was admitted to the College of Senators, and sent ambassador to France. He returned to Venice in 1648, having obtained from Louis XIII. considerable succours for carrying on the war against the Turks. In 1654 he was sent as ambassador to Germany, where he rendered great services to the republic. He continued to serve his country on many great occasions, and was appointed procurator of St. Mark. NANTRUIL, Robert, nan-te(r)-e, a celebrated French miniature-painter and engraver, who drew the portrait of Louis XIV., in crayons, with such elegance, that the king appointed him designer and engraver to his cabinet. His engravings of portraits are highly valued. b. at Rheims, 1630; d. at Paris, 1678.

NAPIER, John, Baron, of Merchiston, na-peer', a celebrated Scotch mathematician, who, towards the close of the 16th century, discovered the method of superseding long and laborious arithmetical operations by the invention of his logarithmic tables, which, says Laplace, in his "Système du Monde," "by reducing to a few days the labour of many months, doubles, as it were, the life of an astronomer, besides freeing him from the errors and disgust inseparable from long calculations." The principles of this great invention were detailed by Napier in two works, published in the years 1614 and 1619. Besides other works, he wrote a curious pamphlet, entitled "Secret Inventions profitable and necessary in these Days for the Defence of the Island," the original of which is kept in the archbishop of Canterbury's library at Lambeth. b. at Merchiston Castle, near Edinburgh, 1550; d. at the same place, 1617.

NAPIER, William John, Lord, a British naval officer, entered the service at the age of 16, and was a midshipman on board the Defiance at the battle of Trafalgar. In 1833 he was appointed superintendent of the interests of the British nation in China, and arrived at Macao in July, 1834. Obstacles were placed in the way of his mission by the governor of Canton, who was desirous of obtaining delay until he could communicate with Peking; but Lord Napier was not inclined to delay the superintendence of those interests which he had been appointed to protect, and sailed up the Canton river, and arrived at the Canton factory in his boat on July 24. The next morning the governor issued orders that he should return to Macao, which were replied to by a positive refusal: commercial transactions between the British and Chinese merchants were prohibited by the governor; on which Lord Napier sent the Imogene and Andromache frigates up the Bogue river, which were fired at by the forts, and the Chinese forts were demolished by the ships' guns. This was on the 17th of September; and the ships, owing to calms, being obliged to anchor for several days, Lord Napier became seriously indisposed on the 14th, and the men-of-war were ordered to "move out of the river," in order to avoid further interruption to commerce, and Lord Napier returned to Macao, where, on the 11th of October, 1834, he expired. — at Kinsale, 1787.

NAPIER, Sir Charles John, a modern British admiral, who, in 1799, at the age of 13, entered the navy, and served in the North Sea on board the Martin sloop of war. In the following year he went to the Mediterranean station, where he took part in several minor actions, and had his thigh broken by a shot during an engagement between the Reeruit brig and a French corvette. In 1809 he displayed signal bravery at the taking of Martinique, being the first to scale the walls. For this and some subsequent services he was made post-captain; after which he served as volunteer on land in Spain. In 1811 he stormed expedition, which sailed for the East in 1798. He took Alexandria, gained over Mourad Bey the battle of the Pyramids, and, although the fleet had been destroyed by Nelson at Aboukir, the French were soon masters of Egypt. Suddenly quitting his army, he set sail for France, and, after narrowly missing capture by the English cruisers, appeared unexpectedly at Paris at the end of the year 1799, at a time when the administration of the Directory had grown irksome to the nation. Bonaparte at once became the head of a very powerful party, and, aided by Siéyès, his brother Lucien, and General Leclerc, he overthrew the Directory on the famous 18th Brumaire, year 8 of the Republic (9th Nov. 1799), caused himself to be named first consul, having for his colleagues Cambacérès and Lebrun, also dignified by the title of consul, but mere tools to his ambition. In 1800 he placed himself at the head of the army of Italy, crossed the Alps, and gained the battle of Marengo. General Moreau having about the same time beaten the Austrians at Hohenlinden, the peace of Luneville was signed with Austria in 1801, and in the following year the treaty of Amiens with England concluded the second war of the French Revolution. In the same year Bonaparte was proclaimed consul for life: in 1804 he became emperor of the French. Pope Pius VII. went to Paris to assist at his coronation, but Napoleon placed the crown upon his own head, and also crowned his consort Josephine. Six months later he erected the Cisalpine Republic into a kingdom, and crowned himself king of Italy at Milan. About this time he committed an act which forms one of the foulest blot upon his memory. Some time previously, his life had been threatened by a plot, in which the Bourbon princes were implicated. Resolved to make an example of one of them, he caused the young duc d'Enghien to be seized, and after a disgraceful mockery of a trial, the innocent prince was shot at Vincennes. Napoleon gloried in this odious act. "I had never personally offended these Bourbons," he wrote; "a great nation had chosen me to govern it, almost all Europe had sanctioned its choice. My blood, after all, was not ditch-water, and it was time to place it on a par with theirs." In 1805, the destruction of the combined French and Spanish fleets by Nelson, at Trafalgar completely overturned his long-cherished scheme for the invasion of England. In the same year, England, Russia, and Austria entered into a new coalition against France, and the battle of Austerlitz was fought, and terminated so successfully for France, that a large accession of territory was gained, and what she already possessed was confirmed to her by the treaty of Presburg. In 1806 he placed his brother Joseph upon the throne of Naples, Louis becoming king of Holland: the victory of Jena was obtained towards the close of the same year. Russia was next attacked, and the emperor Alexander was compelled to sign the peace of Tilsit. Jerome Bonaparte was then placed upon the throne of Westphalia. In 1808 Napoleon made his unprincipled invasion of Spain, sending Murat and 80,000 men thither. Charles IV. and his family retired to French territory, where they virtually became prisoners of Napoleon, who placed his brother Joseph upon the throne of Spain, and gave Naples to Murat. But Spain resisted the French invader and the defeat and capitulation of Dupont layen, and Junot at Cintra, were the commencement of the declining fortunes of the self-created emperor. Notwithstanding the greatest efforts of Soult, Massena, and Suchet, Cadix, backed by the brilliant genius of Wellington and his fine army, repulsed the French. His struggle cost France, in five years (1803-813), more than 400,000 men. Meanwhile, Josephine, having given no heir to the empire, was divorced by Napoleon, in 1809, and Maria Louisa, daughter of his old enemy the emperor of Austria, became empress of the French. The fruit of this union was a son, who, at his birth, was styled king of Rome. (See NAPOLEON II.) About this time, Fouché, Bernadotte, and several others, began to withdraw from him; Pope Pius VII., who had been stripped of his temporal dominions, excommunicated him; finally, the prohibitive system of continental commerce, which he had organized with the view of ruining England, produced, instead, universal poverty and misery throughout France. Having drained France of her treasure, he next planned a formidable invasion of Russia, which was destined to rob his country of the flower of her youth and manhood. In 1812 he assembled the largest army that was ever led by a European general, and at the head of 500,000 men, passed into Russia, whose army he defeated in several engagements. In September he entered Moscow, which had been previously evacuated and almost totally consumed. After spending a month here, in expectation of overtures of peace from St. Petersburg, the frost and snow of a Russian winter compelled him to commence a precipitate retreat. Harassed by innumerable foes, the French army, deprived of everything, perished in the snow, or found a grave in the icy waters of the Beresina. Hastily returning to France, the emperor succeeded in creating another army, and opened the campaign in Germany, with the victories of Lützen, Bautzen, and Dresden; but Russia, Prussia, Austria, and Sweden were now in arms against him; and at Leipzig, where, in three days, the French lost upwards of 60,000 men, his power received a death-stroke. The allies entered France, and Napoleon, finding his army disorganized, and most of his ministers and generals disaffected towards him, abdicated the throne of France, at Fontainebleau, on the 4th of April, 1814. The Bourbons were re-established in France, Napoleon accepting the island of Elba as his retreat. In less than a year he again appeared in France, and, by the time he had reached the capital, the whole army had declared for him. Immediately, the coalition that had dethroned him was renewed; but Napoleon, at the head of his brave and enthusiastic troops, took the initiative, and defeated the Prussians at Ligny, on the 16th of June; but upon the 18th he suffered defeat at the hands of Wellington, on the memorable field of Waterloo. Four days afterwards, he abdicated in favour of his son. His new reign lasted for, and is generally styled, the Hundred Days. He set out for Rochefort, with the intention, it is stated, of escaping to America; but not being able to evade the English cruisers, he surrendered to Captain Maitland, of the Bellerophon, and claimed the hospitality of England. The English cabinet, however, declared him to be the prisoner of the allies, and he was dispatched to the island prison of St. Helena. For nearly six years did this extraordinary man pine in bondage, the bitterness of which was augmented by the petty tyranny of Sir Hudson Lowe, the governor of the place. The opinions held relative to Napoleon are as numerous and conflicting as his many biographers. A work like the present, however, is not the place for drawing inferences and philosophising; we have only to deal with facts; and must refer those who wish to know the estimates that have been made of this extraordinary man's character to the many works upon the subject. For a philosophic but sternly adverse view of Napoleon's nature, the writings of Emerson may be consulted; for panegyrics, the reader may turn to almost any French writer on the subject. At St. Helena he dictated his Memoirs, which were afterwards published with many interpolations, as the "Memoirs of Las Casas," and again as the "Memoirs edited by Count Montholon." He died and was interred at St. Helena, in 1821; but his remains were brought to France, on board of a ship of war, by Prince de Joinville, in 1840. They now rest under the dome of the Invalides, at Paris, in the midst of the ashes of many who were his companions in victory. B. at Ajaccio, Corsica, 1769.

NAPOLEON II., Francis Charles Joseph Napoleon, duke of Reichstadt, was the son of Napoleon I. and Maria Louisa, and at his birth was styled king of Rome. After the abdication of his father, an attempt was made to proclaim him emperor, but it was soon abandoned. When the allies entered Paris, his mother fled with him to her father's court. He was brought up by his grandfather Francis, emperor of Austria, by whom he was created duke of Reichstadt in 1818, and appointed colonel of a regiment of cavalry. This young prince, who was apparently born to such a brilliant destiny, died shortly after he had attained his twenty-first birthday, of consumption. There were ugly rumours current, that his grandfather deliberately planned his destruction, and employed the gay duke of Salerno to entice him into every form of dissipation, by which his strength was undermined, and his premature death brought about. B. at Paris, 1811; D. 1832.

NAPOLEON III., Charles Louis Napoleon Bonaparte, emperor of the French, was the third son of Louis Napoleon Bonaparte, king of Holland, and of Hortense Beauharnais, daughter of the empress Josephine. Queen Hortense's three sons were decreed to be successors to the French throne in the event of the death of the king of Rome. (See the preceding.) The eldest, Napoleon Charles, who was brought up by Napoleon, died in 1807; the second, Napoleon Louis, died in his brother's arms at Forli, in 1831. In the history of modern times, there are few examples of men who have passed through greater changes of life than the survivor of the queen of Holland's sons. "Born in a palace," says one of his latest biographers, "for a while the heir-presumptive of the greatest monarch in Europe, he was afterwards thrown headlong from that high estate, and condemned, in obscurity and exile, to associate with the sons of tradesmen and farmers; to be to-day the companion of cardinals, popes, and kings, and to sleep to-morrow on a heap of stones in the street, in the disguise of a livery servant; to be hidden during eight days, in a burning fever, in the midst of Austrian troops, who were eager to take his life; to fight as a common soldier and a rebel, in the hope of overthrowing a hateful form of despotism; to have his brother die in his arms; to wander about in sickness, hunger, and dejection; to take refuge in common taverns; to tread the soil of France as an outlaw, at the peril of his life; to organize repeated insurrections; to be in prison; to lie in a dungeon; to write treatises on Pauperism and the Sugar Question; to mingle with the haughty nobles of England at a tournament; to be the president of a republic; to take advantage of the opportunity thus afforded him to make himself emperor; to be the ally, on terms of equality, of the strongest government in Europe; and, in conjunction with Great Britain, to subdue the armies of Russia, and to compel the czar to sue for peace in that capital which, forty-two years before, on that selfsame day, he had entered as a conqueror." After the fall of Napoleon I., Queen Hortense went into exile with her two sons, residing in succession at Geneva, at Aix in Savoy, in the duchy of Baden, in Bavaria, and finally repairing to the château of Arenenberg, on the banks of Lake Constance, where she resided until her death. There Queen Hortense, or duchess of St. Leu, as she was now called, employed herself with the education of her sons. Louis Napoleon displayed the greatest eagerness for study, and distinguished himself by his ardent pursuit of all knowledge bearing upon military matters. After Louis Philippe ascended the throne, Louis Napoleon and his brother asked to be allowed to return to France, but were refused. The brothers next took part in a revolution in Italy; but, their party being defeated by the papal troops, they became fugitives, the elder dying of fever at Forli, and Louis Napoleon only escaping the Austrians by assuming the disguise of a footman. He reached Cannes in safety, and subsequently entered Paris with his mother, who asked permission to remain there a short time, as her son was ill. The king refusing to accede to this request, Hortense and her son repaired to London. In a short time they returned to Switzerland. Until the year 1836, he occupied himself with military studies, and with composing political and military treatises; but, in the last-named year, considering that he had only to present himself to the French soldiery in order to shake their allegiance towards Louis Philippe, he went to Strasburg, where, after an absurd attempt at carrying out his project, he was made prisoner, and placed in a dungeon of the garrison. Louis Philippe regarded the affair with contempt, and shipped off the pretender to the United States. He remained but a short time in America, for, hearing that his mother was dangerously ill, he repaired to Arenenberg, in defiance of the French government. The duchess of St. Leu died two months after his arrival. The French government demanded of Switzerland the extradition of the refugee; and, to prevent a war, Louis Napoleon quitted the country for England in 1837. In London he lived the life of a fashionable loungeur, and wrote his "Napoleonic Ideas;" but, in 1840, he resolved to make another attempt at subverting the government of Louis Philippe. A steamer was hired, a number of disaffected Frenchmen were collected, and Louis Napoleon, provided with a tame eagle, and a carved and gilded effigy of the same emblem of imperialism, steamed from Margate and landed at Boulogne. He presented himself to the officers, displayed his wooden eagle, and set free the living bird; but the soldiers would not listen to the representative of Napoleonism, the eagle refused to soar aloft, and perched upon the top of the Napoleon column. The baffled conspirators next attempted to regain their steamer, Louis himself being captured, after shooting a French soldier who had tried to oppose his retreat. For this absurd affair he was arraigned before the Chamber of Peers, found guilty of high treason, condemned to perpetual imprisonment, and conducted to the castle of Ham, whence he contrived to effect his escape in the disguise of a workman, in 1846. He reached London in safety, and continued to reside there till 1848, at which time the Republic permitted his return to France with the other members of the Bonaparte family. Subsequently, along with Lamar-tine, Cavaignac, and Ledru Rollin, he put himself in nomination for election as president of the republic, and was voted to that office by an overwhelming majority. At the close of the year 1851, he destroyed the last vestige of French liberty, by the celebrated coup d'état, and contrived to secure his re-election, not for four, but for ten years. He was now emperor of France in all things but the name, and this latter title was given to him, after an appeal to universal suffrage, in December, 1852. In the following year he married Eugénie, countess de Teba, who bore him a son. He became the ally of England in the struggle against Russia, which terminated with the fall of Sebastopol and the treaty of Paris in 1856. In the same year he paid a visit to Queen Victoria in London. Two attempts against his life were made; the first by Pianori in 1855, and the second by Felice Orsini, Pierri, and others, at the beginning of 1858. Upon this latter occasion, Napoleon III. demanded of the British government that the English laws affecting political exiles should be altered. This attempt at dictation and interference created a strong feeling against the French emperor, which was heightened by the insults of several colonels of the French army. The Palmerston administration, by appearing disposed to yield, became highly unpopular, and was compelled to quit office. The emperor formed an alliance offensive and defensive with the king of Sardinia; and, at the beginning of the year 1859, Napoleon treated the Austrian ambassador with marked coolness, which clearly foreshadowed what was speedily to occur. Francis Joseph declared war against the king of Sardinia and his French ally. The French army crossed the Alps into Italy, and the emperor, leaving the empress as regent during his absence, hastened to put himself at its head. The Austrians lost battle after battle, till at length they were compelled to evacuate Lombardy. Terms of peace were concluded even more suddenly than war had been declared. At Villafranca the two emperors met: Lombardy was given up to France, and by France ceded to Sardinia; Austria remaining in possession of Venetia and the celebrated Quadrilateral. The reward of these services was the cession of Savoy and Nice to France—a transaction which called forth much severe animadversion, as did also Napoleon's persistence in keeping a French army in Rome to maintain the pope's temporal power. The emperor having declared himself an adherent of the principles of free trade, Mr. Cobden was charged by the British government to effect between France and England a treaty of commerce, which was according concluded, and came fully into operation in 1860.

In 1862, an expedition was sent to Mexico, and in 1864, Maximilian of Austria was made emperor of that country, but Napoleon III. withdrew his troops in 1867, and Maximilian was taken by the Mexican liberals, and shot. In 1866, the French troops which had occupied Rome since 1849 were withdrawn, in virtue of a treaty with the Italian government. b. at Paris, 1803.

NARBONNE, Lara Louis, Count de, nar-bon', a French officer, who was minister of war under Louis XVI., and a Lieutenant of France at the outbreak of the Revolution. He endeavoured to defend the constitutional monarchy, and was outlawed in 1792 by the Mountain Party, and was saved from the guillotine by the exertions of Madame de Staël and Dr. Bollman (by whom Lafayette was afterwards rescued from the clutches of the sanguinary Jacobins), and retired to England and then to Switzerland. After the ascendancy of Bonaparte, Count de Narbonne returned to France, was employed in a military capacity by Napoleon, who held him in high esteem, appointed him one of his aides-de-camp, and had him near his person in nearly all the wars down to the Russian campaign of 1812. In 1813 he was appointed ambassador to Vienna, where he died at the close of the same year. b. 1755.

NARBOROUGH, Sir John, nar'-bur-o, an English naval commander, who served with distinction in the first Dutch war, and was present at the desperate naval engagement between the English fleet and the Dutch under De Ruyter and Van Tromp, in 1666. Three years afterwards, he went out on a voyage of discovery to the South Seas, and explored the Strait of Magellan. In 1672 he again fought against the Dutch at the battle of Solebay, and was for his bravery knighted, and created rear-admiral. In the following year he compelled the Bey of Tripoli to give up all British captives, and to pay 80,000 dollars for the injuries British shipping had received at the hands of Tripoline pirates. He cannonaded the city of Algiers in 1677, and captured five Algerian frigates. In 1670 he became commissioner of the navy, which post he held during the reigns of Charles II. and James II. b. in Norfolk, early in the 17th century; d. about 1698.

NARDI, Jacopo, nar'-de, an Italian historian, who wrote the history of the republic of Florence, which forms a continuation to the work of Machiavelli. He likewise acted as ambassador from Florence to Venice in 1527. b. at Florence, 1476; d. about the middle of the 16th century.

NARES, James, nairs, doctor of music, was one of the children in the royal chapel, and studied under Dr. Pepusch, after which he became organist of York cathedral. In 1755 he succeeded Dr. Green as organist and composer to the king; and was created doctor of music at Cambridge. In 1757 he was appointed master of the choristers of his majesty's chapel. Dr. Nares published, besides his compositions of sacred music, several books of instructions, and "The Royal Pastoral," a dramatic ode. b. 1715; d. 1783.

NARES, Robert, son of the preceding, was a learned theologian and critic. He studied at Westminster School and Christ-church College, Oxford; was successively rector of Sharnford, Leicestershire, preacher of Lincoln's Inn, assistant librarian of the British Museum, prebendary of Lincoln, archdeacon of Stafford, canon of Lichfield, and rector of Allhallows, London. In conjunction with Mr. Beloe, Dr. Nares established the "British Critic," a literary review devoted to the support of high church principles. He also, besides his contributions to this periodical, wrote the following works: "A Chronological View of the Prophecies relating to the Christian Church;" "Elements of Orthoepey;" "A Glossary of Words, Phrases, &c., in the Works of English Authors in the time of Elizabeth," &c. p. 1829.

NARES, Edward, nephew of Dr. James Nares, and son of Sir George Nares, a judge of the Court of Common Pleas, was educated at Westminster School and Christ-church, Oxford, where, in 1788, he was elected a fellow of Merton College. He took orders in 1792, and was appointed by his college to the cure of St. Peter's in the East, London. In 1797, he married a daughter of George, fourth duke of Marlborough, when he resigned his fellowship; and in 1798 was presented to the rectory of Biddenden in Kent, became Bampton lecturer in 1805, and in 1814 professor of modern history at Oxford. He was the author of a variety of works on religious subjects, such as "An Attempt to show how far the Philosophical Notion of a Plurality of Worlds is consistent with the Language of Scripture;" "A View of the Evidences of Christianity," being his Bampton lectures; several series of Sermons, &c.; and in other walks of literature, a novel entitled, "Thinks I to Myself;" "Memoirs of the Life and Administration of Lord Burghley;" "Elements of General History," &c. p. 1762; p. 1841.

NARSES, nar'-ses, king of Persia, succeeded his father Varennes in 296. He conquered Mesopotamia and Armenia. Maximianus Galerius being sent against him by Diocletian, was repulsed; but afterwards defeated the Persians, whom he laid under tribute. p. 303.

NARSES, a Persian eunuch, who became one of the greatest generals of his time, commanded the Roman army against the Goths, whom he defeated in battle in 552, their king, Totila, being slain. As exarch of Italy, he governed with wisdom and discretion, and established order throughout the country. p. at Rome, at a very advanced age, 568.

NARVAEZ, Pamphila de, nar'-va-aitz, a native of Valladolid, in Spain, who went to America soon after its discovery, and was appointed commander of the expedition against Cortes by Diego de Velasquez, governor of Cuba. He sailed, in 1528, with 400 men, intending to establish a colony in Florida; discovered the bay of Pensacola; and, having marched into the country, was never heard of more.

NARVAEZ, Don Ramon, duke of Valencia, a modern Spanish marshal and statesman, who, after the return of Ferdinand VII., entered the army as cadet of the Walloon Guards. In 1822, when the royal party attempted to destroy the constitutional régime, he ranged himself upon the liberal side, and, by his gallantry, contributed to suppress the éméute. Shortly afterwards, while serving against the guerillas of Catalonia, he was severely wounded, upon which he retired to his native city, and lived in retirement during ten years. In 1835 he attained the grade of brigadier, under Espartero. Charged to pursue the notorious Carlist general Gomez, who had hitherto baffled all attempts at capture, Narvaez came up with him near Arcos, and completely routed him. This was the turning point of his fortunes, and he became one of the most popular men in Spain. He now abandoned the constitutional party, became a royalist, and aspired to a rivalry with Espartero. In 1844 he was nominated president of the council, and was created duke of Valencia, but his ministry was overthrown in 1846. In the following year, he was sent as ambassador to Paris, but was recalled after an absence of six months to take the place once more of president of the council, which post he retained, with the exception of one brief interval, till 1851. It was not until September, 1861, that Narvaez again came into power, but his tenure of office was but brief, O'Donnell succeeding him in 1865, to give place once more to his rival in 1868. From this time Narvaez retained office until his death on May 23, 1868, just six months after the decease of O'Donnell. p. in Andalusia, 1800.

NASH, Thomas, nish, an early English dramatist and satirist, was educated at St. John's College, Cambridge, and afterwards resided in London. He was the author of three dramas, still extant, his principal performance being his "Pierce Penniless," which was published in 1599. He was more famous, however, for his scurrilous pamphlets against Gabriel Harvey and a puritan divine named Penry, who wrote under the eponym of "Martin Marprelate." p. about 1564; p. 1601.

NASH, Richard, commonly known as "Beau Nash," received his education at Carmarthen, whence he was sent to Jesus College, Oxford, where he remained but a short time. He afterwards obtained an ensign's commission, but soon left the army, and entered at the Middle Temple, but never followed the law as a profession. A love of pleasure and gaming drew him, in 1704, to Bath, which place of amusement became, through his tact and good management, a centre of fashionable resort. He was chosen master of the ceremonies, and was so much esteemed as to be called King of Bath; but commonly he was termed, from the peculiarity and foppery of his dress, Beau Nash. Though much given to gambling, he was very liberal, and numerous instances are recorded of his benevolence; and to his efforts, combined with those of two other gentlemen, the foundation of Bath Hospital is due. p. at Swansea, Glamorganshire, 1674; p. at Bath, 1761.

NASH, John, an eminent English architect, who studied under Sir Robert Taylor, and about 1792 established himself in London. He soon acquired a high position, and was employed to design mansions for the nobility, both in England and Ireland. In 1812 he designed plans for the new Marylebone, afterwards Regent's Park, and for Regent-street. In 1820 he improved the Opera-house, and designed the Haymarket Theatre. As surveyor to the Crown estates, he was engaged during several years in improving the street architecture of the metropolis, chiefly at the west end of the town. The terraces in the Regent's Park, Buckingham Palace (since altered), Carlton House Terrace, and the improvements in the garden of St. James's Park, were the principal of his subsequent works in London. That whimsical piece of architecture known as the Pavilion, at Brighton, was also from his designs. p. in London, 1752; p. at East Cowes Castle, 1835.

Nasmyth

NASMYTH, Alexander, naí-smít-he, a Scotch landscape-painter, who repaired to London at an early age, and became pupil of Allan Ramsay. He subsequently studied at Rome; after which he went to Edinburgh, and established himself there as a portrait-painter. Ultimately, he abandoned portrait for landscape-painting, and produced some of the best works in that class of which the British school can boast. He had, likewise, a considerable share in suggesting the architectural improvements that were made in Edinburgh. His portrait of Robert Burns is stated to be the only authentic likeness of the poet. B. at Edinburgh, 1788; D. 1840.

NASMYTH, Peter, a Scotch landscape-painter, son of the preceding, who repaired to London in his 20th year, and soon became popular enough to gain the title of the English Hobbinia. All his pictures were painted with the left hand, he having early in life lost the use of his right through an accident. B. 1786; D. 1831.

NASMYTH, James, a practical engineer, and inventor of the steam hammer, steam pile-driver, and other great mechanical contrivances, was brother of the preceding, and from his earliest youth displayed a love for any kind of mechanical employment. After studying at the High School and university of Edinburgh, where he rendered great assistance to the professors by his skill as a mechanical draughtsman and practical mechanic, he, in 1820, set out for London, where he succeeded in obtaining employment in the engineering firm of Maudslay and Co. He remained there until 1832, at which time he returned to Edinburgh, and during two years worked incessantly in the construction of tools and machinery, with the intention of establishing himself in business. In 1834 he took a floor in an old cotton-mill at Manchester, and soon obtained so many orders for machinery, that his shop became too small for his operations. He then removed to Patricroft, near Manchester, and in a few years, so rapidly had his business increased, was in a position to build the well-known Bridgewater foundry, from which establishment emanated those fine mechanical inventions which have made the name of Nasmyth familiar wherever modern mechanism is required. In 1856 he retired from business, having resolved to devote his remaining years to artistic and scientific pursuits. B. at Edinburgh, 1808.

NATHAN, Isaac, or Mordecai, naí-thau, a rabbi, was the first who compiled a Hebrew Concordance, which he began in 1433 and finished in 1448. It was printed at Venice in 1523, and afterwards at Bale in 1632.

NAUDÉ or NAUDÉUS, Gabriel, no-dai, learned French writer, who after studying at Paris, went to Padua, where he took his degrees in physic. He next became librarian to Cardinal de' Bagni at Rome, and, on his death, was patronized by Cardinal Barberini. On being recalled to France in 1642, he was made librarian to Cardinal Mazarin, who conferred on him several benefices. Christina, queen of Sweden, invited him to her court, but he soon returned. Naudé's principal works are, "An Apology for Great Men who have been accused of Magic," "Advice for Forming a Library," "Addition to the Life of Louis XI.," "Bibliographia Politica," and a commentary upon the Rosicrucians. B. at Paris, 1600; D. at Abbeville, 1653.

NAVARETE, Domingo Fernandez, nav'-ar-aít, a learned Spanish friar, who went as missionary to the Philippine Islands in 1617. He afterwards set out for China, where he laboured during many years, but was at last imprisoned by the Chinese authorities. He contrived, however, to effect his escape to Macao, after which he returned to Europe. He was employed to preach against the Jesuits before the pope. His "History of the Moral and Political Condition of China" was published at Madrid, at the end of the 17th century; but the latter volumes of the work were suppressed by the Inquisition. The first volume has since become a scarce book. B. about 1610; D. 1659.

NAVARETE, Juan Hernandez (called El Mudo, from being deaf and dumb from his infancy), a celebrated Spanish painter, who was surnamed the Titian of Spain. In 1666 he was appointed painter to the king; but having introduced a cat and a dog into some of his religious pictures, Philip caused him to enter into a contract never to employ such accessories again. B. at Logrono, Castile, 1524; D. at Madrid, 1577.

NAVARETE, Peter of, na'-rar', a famous Spanish soldier-seaman in the 16th century, was a Biscayan of low extraction. He commenced his career as a sailor, after which he became a menial servant in the family of the cardinal ofragon. He next took service among the Florentine troops; but subsequently returned on board ship, where he displayed great skill and courage. The reputation he acquired recommended him to Gonsalvo de Cordova, who was engaged in the war of Naples. To the taking of that city Navarre principally contributed, by the construction of a mine. The emperor recompensed him for this service by creating him count of Alvitto, in that kingdom, and henceforth he styled himself Count Pedro de Navarre. Being appointed to the command of a naval expedition against the Moors, he took Oran, Tripoli, and other places. On his return to Italy, he served in the army, and was taken prisoner by the French at the battle of Ravenna, in 1512. After remaining in France two years, in hopes of being ransomed, he entered into the French service, and signalized himself on several occasions; but being sent to the succour of Genoa, in 1522, he was taken prisoner by the Imperialists, and conducted to Naples, where he was confined in the castle of L'Efuf. After the treaty of Madrid, he regained his liberty, and, in 1523, served under Lautrec at the siege of Naples; but, in the unfortunate retreat of that general at Aversa, he was again captured, and sent a second time to L'Efuf. The Prince of Orange, by command of the emperor, having ordered a number of prisoners to be beheaded, barbarously included Navarre with the rest; but the governor, as is asserted by some, possessing more humanity, passed him over, and he died there soon after; others pretend that he was strangled in that citadel.

NAYLER, James, naí'-ler, an enthusiast, who, in 1641, became a soldier in the Parliamentary army, which he quitted in 1649, and in 1651 became a disciple of George Fox, the Quaker. In 1656

he began to pretend to be inspired, and committed great extravagances at Exeter, which bringing him into trouble with the Parliament, he was ordered to be whipped, to be branded in the forehead, and to have his tongue bored through with a red-hot iron. This sentence was carried out at London and Bristol, after which Naylor was committed to Bridewell in the former city, where he remained till 1660, and did not long survive his liberation. b. 1616.

NEAL, Daniel, neele, an English Nonconformist divine. After receiving his education at Merchant Taylors school, he went to Utrecht and Leyden. In 1706 he was chosen pastor of an Independent congregation in Aldersgate Street, and afterwards in Jewin Street. He wrote, "A History of New England," "A History of the Puritans," and some sermons. His "History of the Puritans" is a faithful and esteemed work, and has been laid under contribution by almost every historian of the civil war and commonwealth. b. 1678; d. 1743.

NEANDER, Christopher Frederick, nai-an'-duh, a German sacred poet, who, after completing his studies at the university of Halle, acted for a short time as tutor in a family, but was in 1750 appointed pastor of a small country congregation, whence he removed to a more lucrative charge at Gränzhof. In 1784 he was appointed clerical superintendent of the duchies of Courland and Semgallen; but continued to reside at Gränzhof, where he supported a widowed sister and her family. His songs are esteemed as among the best specimens of devotional poetry in the German language. b. at Ekau, Courland, 1724; d. 1803.

NEANDER, John Augustus William, an eminent German historian, who was born of Jewish parents, but, while pursuing his studies at the Johanneum College at Hamburg, became a convert to the Christian faith, and assumed the name of Neander, signifying, in Greek, "a new man." He subsequently studied at the universities of Halle, Göttingen, and Heidelberg. His great attainments led to his being appointed professor of theology at the last-named establishment, and in 1812 he was chosen to fill the chair of theology in the university of Berlin, where he remained until his death. In the same year he published "The Emperor Julian and his Times," which established his reputation as a theological historian. His greatest work, entitled "Universal History of the Christian Religion and Church," was given to the world between the years 1825-1845, and was comprised in five volumes. In 1835 he produced a refutation of Strauss' "Life of Jesus," in a work entitled "The Life of Jesus in its Historical Relations." Both the works above mentioned, as well as some smaller ones, have been translated into English. b. at Göttingen, 1789; d. 1850.

NEARCHUS, ne-ar'-kus, one of the captains of Alexander the Great, who ordered him to lead the fleet he had built upon the Hydaspes to the Persian Gulf. Nearchus wrote an account of this voyage, the original of which is lost; but Arrian, Strabo, and Pliny have preserved a great portion of it: Arrian's extract is, however, the fullest and most correct. Subsequently to the death of Alexander, Nearchus became governor of Lycia and Pamphylia. Flourished in the fourth century b.c.

NECKER, Jacques, nek'-er, a celebrated French financier, who went to Paris at an early age, obtained employment in a banking-house, in which he rose to a partnership, and, in thirteen years, having made a number of successful speculations, retired from business with a large fortune. He commenced his political career by becoming a member of the Council of Two Hundred at Geneva. He was afterwards appointed minister of the republic of Geneva at Paris, where, by decrees, he rose to the highest employments. In 1765 he was appointed syndic of the French East India Company; in 1775 director of the royal treasury; and was twice director-general of the finances of France. But the Revolution, which all his efforts were unable to check, obliged him to retire to Switzerland. Necker wrote three volumes on the finances of France, a book on the influence of religious opinions, and other works. He married the daughter of a Protestant clergyman, a lady of considerable literary ability and great benevolence of heart, who had in early life captivated the historian Gibbon, by whom he had a daughter, Madame de Staël Holstein, the wife of the Swedish ambassador; and who afterwards became celebrated by the name of Madame de Staël. b. at Geneva, 1732; d. 1804.

NEEDHAM, Marchmont, need'-ham, an English writer, who, during the civil war, distinguished himself by his political pamphlets, first against the Parliament, and afterwards against the King; so that, at the Restoration, he obtained his pardon with difficulty. b. 1620; d. 1678.

NEEDHAM, John Tuberville, a learned English naturalist, who was educated at Douay, where he entered into orders as a Roman Catholic divine. His superiors appointed him professor of philosophy in the English college at Lisbon. He afterwards became travelling tutor to a nobleman; and, on his return, settled in London, where he was chosen fellow of the Royal Society. He wrote observations inserted in Buffon's "Natural History;" also, "New Enquiries upon Microscopical Discoveries," the "Generation of Organic Bodies," and "Observations on Spallanzani's Microscopical Discoveries." b. in London, 1713; d. at Brussels, 1781.

NEEF, or NEEFS, Peter the Elder, neef, was a painter of Antwerp, celebrated for his profound mastery of perspective, which was so great that he could exhibit in the small space of a cabinet picture the most vast and magnificent Gothic edifice, so as to induce a belief in the reality and immensity of the space the building represented. All the accessories he touched in with marvellous skill, and to relieve the monotony of uniform lines and tints, he introduced a variety of objects to diversify the scene; and by a judicious management of chiaroscuro, gave a lively effect to what, in most hands, would have had a tame and unmeaning air. He was, however, unsuccessful with figures, which were sometimes executed for him by the elder Teniers and other distinguished artists, a circumstance which adds to the value of his pictures. b. at Antwerp, 1570; d. 1651.—His son, Peter Neef the Younger, painted similar subjects to his father, but in a much inferior style.

NEELE, Henry, neel, a poet and miscellaneous writer, the son of an engraver in the Strand, London, was brought up to the profession of an attorney, which he followed with credit and reputation during his brief career. He was a man of an amiable and mild disposition, and of strong literary tastes, the results of which were a volume of "Poems," "Romance of History," "Dramatic Scenes," and "Literary Remains." His intense application to intellectual labour induced a fit of insanity, and he committed suicide Feb. 7, 1823. b. 1793.

NELDINSKY-MELETSKY, Yuri, nel-e-dins'-ke me-letz'-ke, a celebrated Russian ballad-writer, who at first served in the army, and fought against the Turks during the campaigns which took place between the years 1770 and 1774. He was afterwards attached to the mission dispatched to Constantinople, and was selected by the emperor Paul, in 1797, to accompany him in his journey to White Russia. In 1809 the Czar bestowed upon him the order of St. Alexander Nevski, having previously rewarded his services by the grant of an estate, with several hundred serfs, together with the order of St. Anne. As a song-writer, he was graceful and charming to an extent far beyond anything that had hitherto been attained by the authors of his country. In his writings, the utmost simplicity was combined with tenderness and warmth of feeling. b. 1751; d. 1829.

NELSON, Robert, nel'-son, a pious and learned writer, received his education at St. Paul's School, and at Trinity College, Cambridge. He was strongly attached to James II., and continued to communicate with the nonjurors till the death of Bishop Lloyd, when he returned to the established church. He lived on terms of intimacy with Archbishop Tillotson, and was the zealous promoter of all works of charity. He was the author of many popular books; among which are, "The Practice of True Devotion," "A Companion to the Festivals and Fasts of the Church of England," "The Whole Duty of a Christian," "The Great Duty of Frequenting the Christian Sacrifice," &c. " 1655; d. 1714.

NELSON, Samuel, one of the most ardent of the "Irish patriots" in 1790; and who edited the "Northern Star" which exercised great influence. On the rebellion being put down in 1796, he was sent to prison, where he remained till set at liberty by French interference, at the treaty of Amiens in 1802. He then retired to America, where it is believed he died of the plague. b. 1759.

NELSON, Horatio, Viscount, the greatest of British admirals, was the fourth son of the Rev. Mr. Nelson, rector of Burnham Thorpe, in Norfolk. He received his education at the school of North Walsham; but at the age of 12 years was taken to sea by his maternal uncle, Captain Suckling, of the Raisonné man-of-war. Soon afterwards, the ship was put out of commission, and young Nelson went on board a West Indian man. Southery, speaking of this step taken by Nelson, says, "He returned a good practical seaman, but with a hatred of the king's service, and a saying then common among sailors, 'aft the most honour, forward the better man.'" To remove this objection, he was again placed with his uncle, who had obtained the command of the Triumph. In 1773, a voyage was undertaken for the discovery of a north-west passage, under the command of Commodore Phipps and Captain Lutwidge. The young seaman entered on board the ship commanded by the latter, and distinguished himself in that perilous voyage by his skill, courage, and promptitude. Soon after his return, he was appointed to the Seahorse, in which he sailed to the East Indies. He passed his examination for Lieutenant in 1777, and received his commission as second of the Lowestoffe frigate, in which he cruised against the Americans. In 1779 he obtained the rank of post-captain, and was appointed to the command of the Hinchinbroke, with which he sailed to the West Indies, and while there essentially contributed to the taking of Fort San Juan, in the Gulf of Mexico. His health having given way, he returned home, and after going through a course of Bath waters, was again employed in the Albanarle, and was subsequently appointed to the Boreas, having under his orders the duke of Clarence, afterwards William IV., who was captain of the Pegasus. While thus engaged, he married the daughter of William Woodward, Esq., judge of the island of Nevis, and the widow of Dr. Nesbit, a physician of that island, by whom he never had any issue. On the breaking out of the war with France, he was nominated to the Agamemnon, of 64 guns, on board of which he sailed to the Mediterranean, and was present with Lord Hood before Toulon. He also engaged and captured the Cu-Tra at the siege of Bastia, where he served in the batteries with a body of seamen, as he afterwards did at Calvi; and while employed before that place he lost an eye. He was so active on that station, that his name became dreaded throughout the Mediterranean. Under Admiral Hotham he was in the action with the French fleet, March 15, 1795. In 1796 he was appointed commodore on board the Minerva, in which frigate he captured the Le Sabine, a 40-gun ship; but was compelled to abandon the prize upon the approach of the Spanish fleet. He immediately steered with the intelligence to Sir John Jervis, off Cape St. Vincent. He had scarcely communicated the news, and shifted his flag on board the Captain, of 74 guns, when the enemy were in sight. A close action ensued, which terminated in a complete victory on the side of the British, who were inferior in numbers. On this occasion, Commodore Nelson attacked the Santissima Trinidad, of 130 guns, and afterwards boarded and took the San Nicolas, of 80 guns; whence he proceeded in the same manner to the San Josef, of 112 guns, both of which surrendered to him. For his share in this glorious victory, the commodore was honoured with the order of the Bath, and having soon afterwards hoisted his flag as rear-admiral of the Blue, he was appointed to command the in-shore squadron at the blockade of Cadiz. He there made a bold but unsuccessful attempt to bombard the city, heading his men himself. The next exploit in which he was engaged was an attempt to take possession of Teneriffe, which design also failed, with the loss of Captain Bowen, of the Terpsichore. In this expedition, Admiral Nelson lost his right arm by a cannon-shot, and was carried off to the boat by his stepson, Captain Nesbit, on his back. He now returned to England for the recovery of his health, and received the grant of a pension of £1000 a year. The memorial which he was required to present upon this occasion stated that he had been four times in action with the enemy's fleets (in three with boats, upon cutting-out expeditions); had assisted at the taking of three towns; had served at Bastia and Calvi; had assisted in capturing seven sail of the line, six frigates, four corvettes, and eleven privateers; had taken fifty merchant-vessels; had been in action a hundred and twenty times; had lost his right eye and arm, besides receiving other severe wounds. The brave admiral, however, did not long remain inactive; he rejoined Earl St. Vincent, who, on receiving intelligence of the sailing of Bonaparte from Toulon, detached Sir Horatio Nelson with a squadron in pursuit of him. After exploring the coast of Italy, this indefatigable commander steered for Alexandria, where, to his great mortification, not a French ship was to be seen. He then sailed to Sicily, and having taken in fresh supplies and obtained more correct information, returned to Alexandria, which he deserted August 1, 1798, at noon. The enemy, consisting of one first-rate, three second-rates, nine seventy-fours, and four frigates, were discovered in Aboukir Bay, lying at anchor in line of battle, supported by strong batteries on an island, and strengthened by gun-boats. Notwithstanding this formidable appearance, the British admiral made the signal for battle, and, by a masterly and bold manœuvre, gave directions for part of his fleet to steer inside the enemy, who were thus exposed between two fires. The contest was hot and bloody; several of the French ships were soon dismasted, and at last the admiral's ship, L'Orient, of 120 guns, took fire, and blew up. The firing, however, continued; but, by the dawn of day, only two sail of the line were discovered with their colours flying, all the rest having struck: these two cut their cables and stood out to sea. On the British admiral's honours were deservedly poured: he was created Baron Nelson of the Nile, received the thanks of Parliament, together with the captains engaged, and was granted a pension of £3000 per annum. The king of Naples created him duke of Brontë, and gave him an estate. Soon after this he sailed for Sicily, and thence to Naples, where he quelled a rebellion, and restored the king. Having performed these and other important services, Lord Nelson returned to England, and was received with enthusiastic joy. A confederacy of the northern powers having alarmed the government, he was employed to dissolve it. A fleet was fitted out, the command of which was given to Admiral Sir Hyde Parker, Lord Nelson being appointed second in command. On their arrival off the Cattegat, and being refused a passage, Lord Nelson offered to conduct an attack on the Danish force, which was stationed to oppose an entrance. This being accepted, he shifted his flag to the Elephant, and passed the Sound with little loss. On the 2nd of April the action commenced, at 10 o'clock, and, after a sharp conflict, seventeen sail of the Danes were sunk, burnt, or taken. A negotiation was then entered into between Nelson and the crown prince, in consequence of which the admiral went ashore, and an armistice was settled. He next obtained from the Swedish government an order for taking off the embargo on English ships in the Baltic. Having accomplished these great objects, he returned to England, and was created a viscount. In 1801 he bombarded the enemy's flotilla which had been collected at Boulogne to assist in Napoleon's projected invasion of England. After experiencing some loss, Nelson withdrew, without producing any material effect upon the enemy. Peace having been suddenly concluded, Nelson retired to his seat at Merton, in Surrey; but, hostilities recommencing, he sailed for the Mediterranean, and in March, 1803, took the command of that station on board the Victory. Notwithstanding all his vigilance, the French fleet escaped from Toulon, and was joined by that of Spain, which had for that purpose emerged from Cadiz; on learning which, Nelson pursued them to the West Indies with a greatly inferior force. The combined fleets, however, struck with terror, returned without effecting anything, and, after a partial action with Sir Robert Calder, off Ferrol, re-entered Cadiz. Admiral Nelson returned to England; but soon set sail to join his fleet off Cadiz. The French under Admiral Villeneuve, and the Spaniards under Gravina, ventured out with a number of troops on board, October 19, 1805, and on the 21st, about noon, an action began off Cape Trafalgar. The combined French and Spanish fleets consisted of 33 sail of the line and 7 frigates; the English squadron mustered 27 sail of the line and 4 frigates. It was while bearing down upon the enemy that Nelson hoisted his celebrated signal, "England expects every man to do his duty." Lord Nelson ordered his ship, the Victory, to be carried alongside his old antagonist, the Santissima Trinidad, where he was exposed to a severe fire of musketry; and not having taken the precaution to cover his coat, which was decorated with his star and other badges of distinction, he became an object of aim to the riflemen placed purposely in the tops of the Bucentaur, which lay on his quarter. During the heat of the action, a bullet from one of these wounded him just below the shoulder, of which he died in about three hours. After the fall of Lord Nelson, the command devolved on Admiral Collingwood, by whose bravery and skill the victory was completed. Eighteen French and Spanish ships were taken; eleven escaped into Cadiz, six of which were reduced to mere wrecks; four French line-of-battle ships which hauled off in the action, were afterwards taken by Sir Richard Strachan. "The death of Nelson," says Southey, "was felt in England as a public calamity; yet he cannot be said to have fallen prematurely, whose work was done; nor ought he to be lamented, who died so full of honours and at the height of human fame." His brother, the Rev. William Nelson, was created an earl, with a grant of £6000 per annum. Lord Nelson's sisters were voted each £10,000, with £100,000 for the purchase of an estate. The remains of Lord Nelson were interred in St. Paul's Cathedral, January 9, 1806, a. in Norfolk, 1758.

NEMESIANSUS, Marcus Aurelius Olympius, ne-me-si-ans-us, a Latin poet, who is supposed to have perished in the proscriptions that disgraced the commencement of the reign of Diocletian. He wrote a poem on hunting and four eclogues: these were included in the collection edited by Stern in 1832. Flourished during the latter half of the 3rd century.

NEMESIUS, ne-me-si-us, bishop of Emesa, in Syria, and a learned philosopher. He wrote a work entitled "The Nature of Man," from some passages in which it has been asserted that he was acquainted with the circulation of the blood. The work is certainly a very remarkable one, and is fully commented upon by Sprengel, in his "History of Medicine," and also by Freund and Haller. An English translation of it was made by George Wither, London, 1636. Flourished towards the end of the 4th century.

NEMOURS, Dukes of, ne-moor'. Nemours is an old French title of nobility, derived from the town of that name. A branch of the Armagnac family first bore the title. The last of that line, Louis d'Armagnac, duke of Nemours, was killed while fighting against the S. _____ at the battle of Cerignola, in Apulia, 1503. Gaston de Foix next bore the title. The duchy was subsequently granted by Francis I. to his uncle, Philip of Savoy. The last male descendant in this line was Philip, duke of Nemours.

NEMOURS, Mary de Longueville, Duchess of, was the daughter of the duke de Longueville, and the wife of the last-named duke de Nemours. Her "Memoirs of the Court of France during the Minority of Louis XIV." are written with spirit and fidelity. b. 1625; d. 1707.

NEMOURS, Louis Charles Philippe Raphael, Duke of, second and eldest surviving son of the late Louis Philippe, king of the French. In 1831 he was elected king of the Belgians; but, by the advice of his father, refused the dignity. In 1836 he went to Algeria, as adjutant-general of the French army, and commanded a brigade of infantry at the siege of Constantine. In 1840 he espoused Victoria Augusta Antoinette, duchess of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha, and, in the following year, signalized himself in the decisive campaign against Abd-el-Kader. During the revolution of 1849, he accompanied his brother's widow, the duchess of Orleans, to the Chamber of Deputies. After the year 1848 he principally resided at Claremont. b. at Paris, 1814.

NENNIVS, a British historian, and abbot of Bangor in the 7th century, who when the monks of his house were massacred, fled for refuge to Chester. He composed a work entitled "Historia Britonum," which is printed in "Bohn's Antiquarian Library."

NEOPTOLEMUS, ne-op-tohl-e-mus, king of Epirus. (See PYRRHUS.)

NEOPTOLEMUS usurped the throne of Epirus during the minority of Pyrrhus the Great, but was subsequently put to death by that king after he recovered his kingdom.

NEOPTOLEMUS, a relation of Alexander the Great, was the first to scale the walls of Gaza, when that city was taken by Alexander, after whose death he received Armenia as his province, and made war against Eumenes. He was supported by Craterus; but an engagement with Eumenes proved fatal to his cause. Craterus was killed and Neoptolemus mortally wounded by Eumenes, b.c. 321.

NEROS, Cornelius, ne-pos, a Latin historian in the reign of Augustus, whose patronage he enjoyed. Of all his works there remains only his "Lives of Illustrious Greek Generals." This work contains short biographies of twenty Greek and two Carthaginian generals; the best sketches being those of Alcibiades, Epaminondas, and Pompeius Atticus. He appears to have also written the lives of the Roman generals; but the work has been lost.

NEPOS, Flavius Julius, emperor of the West, was a native of Dalmatia, and having married a niece of Leo I., that monarch gave him the Western empire. Nepos marched to Rome to secure his throne, after which he fixed the seat of government at Ravenna, but was obliged to quit that city by his general, Orestes. He then retired to Dalmatia, where he was assassinated by two officers of his court, in 480.

NERI, naï-re, Philip of, founder of the congregation of the order of the Oratory in Italy, which was sanctioned by Pope Gregory XIII. in 1575, and soon afterwards found members in France and other countries. Their engagements were to relieve poor strangers and pilgrims, to administer to the sick, and to visit prisoners. b. at Florence, 1515; d. 1595.

NERI, Pompeo, an eminent Italian political economist. He became professor of law at Pisa, and was employed in state affairs by the duke of Lorraine and the empress Maria Theresa. He founded the Academy of Dotary at Florence. He wrote "Observations on the Ancient and Present State of the Tuscan Nobility," on the "Imposts of Milan," on the "Legal Value of Coin, and the difficulty of fixing and maintaining the same." b. at Florence, 1707; d. 1776.

NERO, Claudius Cæsar, ne-ro, sixth Roman emperor, was the son of Cains Domitius by Agrippina, daughter of Germanicus. He was adopted by Claudius in a.d. 50, and four years after succeeded him on the throne. The commencement of his reign was characterized by justice and clemency. He was liberal, affable, polished, complaisant, and his heart seemed to possess every excellent quality. But all this was mere exterior, and a mask, which hid the most depraved mind that ever disgraced a human being. He soon laid aside his artificial virtues, released himself from the control of his mother, whom he caused to be assassinated, and vindicated the unnatural act to the senate on a pretence that Agrippina had plotted against him. Many of the courtiers shared the same fate, and Rome was deluged with the blood of her best citizens. Nero plunged himself as deep in debauchery as in cruelty. He turned actor, pretended to excel in music, and even appeared as a competitor in wrestling at the Olympic games, where, though he was defeated, the assessors and spectators, out of flattery, adjudged him the victor. After putting to death his wife Octavia, he sacrificed his tutor Seneca, Lucan the poet, Petronius, and many other eminent persons. He also commenced a dreadful persecution of the Christians, and is stated by Suetonius and Dion to have caused Rome to be set on fire in several places, and during the conflagration to have beheld the scene from a high tower, where he amused himself by singing to his lyre. It is certain that he attributed the fire to the Christians, numbers of whom were torn to pieces by dogs, and burned during the night in the gardens of his palace. His cruelties, extravagance, and debauchery, at length roused the public resentment. Piso formed a conspiracy against the tyrant, but it was discovered and defeated. That of Galba, however, proved more successful, and Nero, being abandoned by his flatterers, was, at his own request, put to death by one of the officers of his court. b. at Antium, in Latium, a.d. 37; d. a.d. 68.

NERVA, Marcus Cocceius, ne-rva, thirteenth Roman emperor, succeeded Domitian, a.d. 96. He became the favourite of the Romans by his mildness and generosity, but would not allow any statues to be erected to his honour. At the close of life, his soldiers mutinied against him; on which occasion he behaved with calmness and intrepidity. He then appointed Trajan his successor, amidst the acclamations of the people. He was the first Roman emperor of foreign extraction, his father being a native of Crete. b. at Narnia, Umbria, a.d. 27; d. a.d. 98.

NESSELRODE, ne-sel-rodt, Charles Robert, Count von, a modern Russian diplomatist, whose ancestors, Hanoverian nobles, settled in Livonia about the latter end of the 17th century. After a short career in the army, he became attached to the diplomatic service, and was employed in a minor capacity at Berlin, the Hague, and other places. In 1807 he went to Paris as ambassador from Russia; and on the accession of Alexander I., was appointed his secretary. In 1814 he accompanied Alexander to Paris, where he signed the famous treaty of the Quadruple alliance. He also acted as the plenipotentiary of Russia at the congress of Vienna, and went with his master to the congresses of Aix-la-Chapelle, Troppan, Laybach, and Verona. During the subsequent half-century, he continued to serve the successive sovereigns of Russia as minister of foreign affairs. b. at Lisbon, 1780. d. 1862.

NESSIR KHAN, nes'-sir-kan, sovereign of Beloochistan, who accompanied Nadir Shah into India and signalized himself there by his bravery and wisdom. He dethroned and killed his brother Hadji Mohammed, khan of the Beloochees, who had rendered himself odious to his subjects, re-established order in the country, encouraged trade and commerce, and caused himself to become so powerful as to proclaim the independence of his kingdom, which he extended by many conquests. d. 1795.

NESTOR, nes'-tor, the father of Russian history, was a monk at Kiev. His principal work is a Chronicle, which dates from the year 862 to 1116, and is the source of the history of the Slaves. It was published at St. Petersburg in 1767, by order of Peter the Great. Flourished at the close of the 11th and beginning of the 12th centuries.

NESTORUS, nes'-tor'-i-us, a bishop of Constantinople in the early part of the 5th century, under Theodosius II. He was a native of Syria, and was deposed from his bishopric for denying the doctrine of the Incarnation, or the two natures of Christ. His opinions spread widely over the East, and still have followers there.

NEUHOF, Theodore von, neo'-hof, called at one time "King of Corsica," was the son of Anthony, Baron von Neuhoft, who, marrying the daughter of a merchant, thereby incurred the displeasure of his relations, and was obliged to emigrate to France, where he entered the army. Theodore was for some time in the suite of the Baron von Gortz, the Swedish minister; but, when that statesman was executed at Stockholm, he entered the Spanish service, and rose to the rank of colonel. He soon afterwards married one of the queen's maids of honour, by whom he had a son, who became known in England as Colonel Frederick. After deserting his wife, whose jewels he carried off, Theodore von Neuhoft went to Sweden, Holland, Italy, France, and England, travelling under different names and titles. In 1736 he engaged with several Corsican leaders, who promised to hail him king of Corsica, on the condition that he should procure aid for the islanders in their struggle against Genoa. Theodore thereupon set out for Tunis, whose Bey he induced to give him ten cannons, 4000 muskets, munitions of war, food, and 10,000 gold sequins. Thus provided, he set out from Tunis with a suite of sixteen persons, and landed upon the east coast of Corsica. Shortly afterwards, the Corsicans elected him their king, and, during several months, he exercised regal power, created an order of Knighthood, and put three persons to death. The state of Genoa, however, declared him and his followers traitors, and, in a short time, the Corsicans grew tired of their monarch. He thereupon quitted the island to seek succour, which he declared had been promised him, but first appointed deputies to manage affairs during his absence. He next travelled in Italy, France, and Holland. At Amsterdam he was imprisoned for debt, but found means to procure his release, as well as to fit out a frigate and three merchant vessels, with which he set sail for Corsica in 1733. The Genoese and French were now, however, almost masters of the island, and the "king" was afraid to disembark. Four years afterwards he again went to Corsica, but could not succeed in obtaining recognition from his former subjects. He subsequently repaired to London, where he was reduced to poverty, and became a prisoner in the King's Bench for debt. In 1756 Horace Walpole procured his release, Theodore registering his kingdom of Corsica for the benefit of his creditors. He died in London in a state bordering upon destitution, 1756. Horace Walpole wrote a singular epitaph for his tombstone, which was set up in St. Ann's, Soho. b. at Metz, about 1696.

NEUKIRCH, Benjamin, noi'-keerah, a German poet, who made a versified translation of Fénelon's "Telemachus," and produced several other works. b. in Silesia, 1665; d. at Anspach, 1729.

NEUKOMM, the Chevalier Sigismund, noi'-kom, a modern German musical composer, was a relative of, and received his first instruction in music from, Michael Haydn, elder brother of the composer of "The Creation." After acquiring a high reputation in Germany and France, he visited England in 1829, and produced there his greatest works, the oratorios "David" and "Mount Sinai." His song of "The Sea" was at one time the most popular song of the day. In 1853, the Society for the Revival of Sacred Music in Scotland published "Twenty Psalms" composed by him, which are classed amongst the most simple and beautiful productions of their kind in existence. In 1851 he acted as one of the jury at the Great Exhibition. b. at Salzburg, 1778; d. 1858.

NEVEUS, Philip Julien Mancini Mazarin, Duke de ne-voir, was the nephew of the Cardinal Mazarin. He distinguished himself as the patron of Pradon against Racine, which provoked sharp controversies among the wits. The duke wrote some sonnets on that occasion, and other poems of little merit. b. at Rome, 1641; d. at Paris, 1707.

NEVILLE, or NEVYLE, Alexander, neo'-il, a poet, supposed to have been educated at Cambridge, was one of the learned men whom Archbishop Parker kept in his family, and to whom he was secretary, in which office Parker's successor, Grindal, continued him, and to these prelates Nevile dedicated his Latin narrative of the Norfolk insurrection under Kett, which was accompanied by an account of Norwich, and a list of the Saxon and British kings. In 1587 he published the Cambridge verses on the death of Sir Philip Sidney, and projected a translation of Livy, which he did not execute. In his sixteenth year he paraphrased the "Ædips" very successfully, and wrote a work entitled "Apologia ad Wallie proceres." b. 1544; d. 1614.

NEVILLE, or NEVIL, Thomas, dean of Canterbury, was an eminent benefactor to Trinity College, Cambridge, where he expended £5000 in rebuilding the fine quadrangle which bears the name of Nevile's court. He was elected a fellow of Pembroke Hall, Cambridge, in 1570, was senior proctor of the university in 1580, became master of Magdalen College in 1582, prebend of Ely and rector of Doddington-cum-Marsh in 1587, vice-chancellor of Cambridge in 1588, dean of Peterborough in 1590, master of Trinity College in 1593, and dean of Canterbury in 1597. He was concerned in various controversies of the period, and was sent by Archbishop Whitgift to Scotland to assure James of the loyalty and affection of the clergy. Besides his beneficence to Trinity College, he was also a liberal patron of Eastbridge hospital, Canterbury; and in the cathedral of that city he was buried in what has since been called Nevil's chapel. B. at Canterbury; p. 1615.

NEWCASTLE, Duchess of. (See CATENDISH, Margaret.)

NEWCASTLE, Henry Pelham Fiennes Pelham Clinton, Duke of, nu-kas'-el, a British statesman, eldest son of the fourth duke of Newcastle, who, after completing his education at the University of Oxford, was elected (as Lord Lincoln) representative of the southern division of Nottinghamshire in 1832. In 1834 he became a lord of the Treasury, and retained the appointment until April of the succeeding year. Between the years 1841 and 1846 he acted as chief commissioner of Woods and Forests, which post he vacated to assume the functions of chief secretary for Ireland. He lost his seat in the last-named year for supporting Sir Robert Peel in the repeal of the corn laws. He was, however, returned shortly afterwards by the Falkirk burghs, and remained in the House of Commons until 1851, at which time he succeeded to the dukedom of Newcastle, upon the death of his father. He became secretary of state for the Colonies in 1852, in the Aberdeen administration. Upon the separation of the War business from that of the Colonies, with which it had hitherto been joined, the duke accepted the duties of the former department; but the mismanagement of the army during the first winter in the Crimea, led to his incurring much odium, before which he was compelled to resign office. Lord Panmure, his successor, stated, however, that the after and more successful arrangements emanating from the War-office were inaugurated by the duke himself. In 1859 he was appointed secretary for the Colonies, and in 1860 accompanied the Prince of Wales in his travels in Canada and in the United States, acquiring, by his judicious and affable bearing, great esteem, both in Canada and in the United States. B. in London, 1811; p. 1864.

NEWCOMB, William, nu'-kom, a learned English divine, who became successively bishop of Ossory and Waterford, and archbishop of Armagh. He published "The Harmony of the Gospels," "Letter to Dr. Priestley on the Duration of Our Lord's Ministry," "Observations on Our Lord's Conduct," an improved version of the twelve Minor Prophets, another of Ezekiel, "Review of the Chief Difficulties in the Gospel History relating to Our Lord's Resurrection," and other important works. p. 1729; p. 1800.

NEWCOMEN, Thomas, nu'-ko-men, a locksmith of Dartmouth, who, about 1695, invented the engine which is called after his name, and which was the first in which steam was employed as a motive power. That engine was perfected by Watt. (See WATT.)

NEWMAN, Rev. John Henry, D.D., nu'-man, a modern English divine, who was educated at the University of Oxford, where, in 1822, he was elected fellow of Oriel College, and subsequently became vice-principal of Alban Hall. In 1833 he assumed a leading position in what was then termed the "Oxford movement;" and, in conjunction with Messrs. Pusey, Keble, and others, commenced the publication of the "Tracts for the Times," which so affected the theological world, and in which an attempt was made to recede from the principles of the English Reformation, and to approach the doctrines of the Roman Catholic church. The last and 90th number was written by Dr. Newman himself; and, after its publication, the bishop of Oxford was called upon to put an end to the series. In 1845, Dr. Newman entered the communion of the Roman Catholic church. He has written many theological and other works, his last book of importance being his autobiography, "Apologia pro Vita Sua," 1864. p. 1801.

NEWMAN, Francis William, a modern English writer, brother of the preceding, like whom he seceded from the Church of England, but upon totally opposite principles. It would be difficult to exactly define the peculiar theological views of Mr. Newman; but, by certain individuals, the term "seceptical" has been applied to them. After completing his education at Worcester College, Oxford, he was chosen fellow of Balliol in 1826, but resigned the office in 1830. During the three succeeding years, he travelled in the East, and, in 1834, became classical tutor in Bristol College, which he vacated in 1840, to assume the professorship of classics at Manchester New College. In 1846 he was nominated professor of the Latin language and literature in University College, London. As a philologist, he ranks as a highly accomplished and acute writer. In this department of knowledge, his most important works have been "A Grammar of the Berber Language," "The Odes of Horace, translated into unrhymed metre," and the "Iliad" of Homer. His peculiar and theological opinions have been expressed in his "Lectures on Political Economy," "The Crimes of the House of Hapsburg against its own Liege Subjects," "The Soul: its Sorrows and its Aspirations," "Phases of Faith," and a "History of the Hebrew Monarchy, from the Administration of Samuel to the Babylonish Captivity." He likewise contributed a number of political and other articles to the Eclectic, Prospective, and Westminster reviews. Some elementary works also emanated from his pen; such as "Difficulties of Elementary Geometry," "An Introduction to Roman History," &c. p. in London, 1805.

NEWPORT, George, nu'-port, a modern English comparative anatomist and physiologist, whose earliest efforts at acquiring scientific knowledge were made under the most disadvantageous circumstances. He was at length enabled to become apprentice to a surgeon at Sandwich, in Kent, and subsequently concluded his medical education at the University of London. At a later period he produced a number of valuable memoirs, chiefly upon the insect tribes, which were read before the Royal Society, and published in the "Philosophical Transactions." In 1844 he was elected president of the Entomological Society; was twice awarded the medal of the Royal Society; and was fellow of the Linnean and Royal Societies. His researches upon the respiration, temperature, and the structure of the blood-globules in insects are of the highest value. p. in Kent, 1802; p. 1854.

NEWTON, Thomas, nu'-ton, an English divine and physician, was educated first at Oxford and afterwards at Cambridge. He taught a school at Macclesfield, and practised physic; after which he obtained the living of Ilford, in Essex. He wrote "The History of the Saracens," "Approved Medicines and Cordial Receipts," "Directions for the Health of Magistrates and Students," "Herbal of the Bible," &c. &c. in Cheshire, 1543; v. 1607.

NEWTON, Sir Isaac, nu'-ton, the greatest of English philosophers, was descended from an ancient family in Lincolnshire. Losing his father in his childhood, his care devolved on his mother, who gave him an excellent education, though she married a second time. In 1654 he was sent to the Grantham school, where, says Brewster, in his "Life" of the philosopher, he made little progress, until one day "the boy who was above him having given him a severe kick in the stomach, from which he suffered great pain, he laboured incessantly till he got above him in the school; and from that time continued to rise until he was the head boy." At the age of 18 he removed to Trinity College, Cambridge, where he had the learned Mr. (afterwards Dr.) Isaac Barrow for his tutor. Under that able mathematician, Newton made rapid progress. After going through Euclid's Elements, the most difficult problems in which were very easy and familiar to him, he proceeded to the study of Descartes' Geometry, with Oughtred's Clavis, and Kepler's Optics, on all of which he made marginal notes as he went along; and this always continued to be his method of study. It was in this early course that he invented the method of series and fluxions which he afterwards brought to perfection, though his claim to the discovery was unjustly contested by Leibnitz, who obtained a knowledge of it in 1676 from the author himself. At the age of 22, Mr. Newton took his degree of bachelor of arts; and, about the same time, applied himself to the grinding of optic-glasses for telescopes; and, having procured a glass prism in order to try the phenomena of colours lately discovered by Grimaldi, the result of his observations was his new theory of light and colours. On the breaking out of the plague in 1665, he retired to Woolsthorpe, his native place, where, secluded from conversation and books, his active and penetrating mind conceived that hint which gave rise to his celebrated system of the universe. He was sitting alone in his garden, when some apples falling from a tree led his thoughts to the subject of gravity; and reflecting on the power of that principle, he began to consider that, as it is not diminished at the remotest distance from the centre of the earth, it may be extended as far as the moon, and to all the planetary bodies. This subject he afterwards resumed on the occasion of the great comet in 1680; and in 1687 the important principle which forms the foundation of the Newtonian philosophy was first published, under the title of "Philosophiæ Naturalis Principia Mathematica." On the author's return to the University in 1667, he was chosen fellow of his college, and took his degree of master of arts. Two years afterwards he succeeded Dr. Barrow in the mathematical professorship, on which occasion he read a course of optical lectures in Latin. These he had not finished in 1671, when he was chosen fellow of the Royal Society, to which learned body he communicated his theory of light and colours, which was followed by his account of a new telescope invented by him, and other interesting papers. The second telescope made "with his own hands" is still preserved in the library of the Royal Society. When the privileges of the University of Cambridge were attacked by James II., Newton was appointed to appear as one of her delegates in the High Commission court, where he pleaded with so much ability that the king thought proper to stop his proceedings. He was next chosen to represent his University in Parliament, in which he sat till it was dissolved in 1689. In 1695 he was made warden of the Mint, and afterwards master of that office; which place he held with the greatest honour till his death. On his last promotion, he nominated Mr. Whiston to fill his chair at Cambridge, with all the profits of the place, and resigned it entirely to him in 1703. The same year he was chosen president of the Royal Society, which office he retained during twenty-five years. He was also a member of the Academy of Sciences at Paris, having been chosen in 1689. In 1704 he published his treatise on the "Reflections, Refractions, Inflections, and Colours of Light," which was afterwards translated into several languages, and went through many editions. The next year, Queen Anne conferred on him the honour of knighthood. In the succeeding reign, he was very often at court, and the Princess of Wales, afterwards Queen Caroline, frequently conversed with him on philosophical subjects. About 1718 he communicated to her royal highness the outlines of his treatise on Ancient Chronology, with which she was so pleased, that she never would part with it. A surreptitious copy of it was, however, obtained and carried to France by the Abbé Conti, who translated and printed it, with observations. On this, Sir Isaac published a paper on the subject in the "Philosophical Transactions," and the work at length in English, in 4to. After enjoying an uncommon share of health, owing to his activity and temperance, till he was fourscore years old, this great man began to be afflicted with a disorder of the bladder. The last twenty days of his life were attended with much pain; yet, amidst the severest agonies, he never expressed the slightest impatience. After his death, his body lay in state in the Jerusalem Chamber, and was interred in Westminster Abbey, the lord chancellor, the dukes of Montrose and Roxburgh, and three earls, bearing the pall. A stately monument was erected over his remains, at the entrance of the choir. Sir Isaac was of middling stature, and his countenance was pleasing and venerable. He was of a very meek disposition, and a great lover of peace; to his other great qualities, he added a serious and devout reverence of religion. His favourite study was the Bible, the prophecies of which he illustrated by his researches. He conformed to the Church of England, but lived in friendship with good men of all communions, and was an enemy to every kind of persecution. Sir Isaac had a great abhorrence of infidelity, and never failed to reprove those who made free with revelation in his presence; of which the following is an instance. The learned Dr. Halley was sceptically inclined, and sometimes took the liberty of sporting with the Scriptures. On one such occasion, Sir Isaac said to him, "Dr. Halley, I am always glad to hear you when you speak about astronomy, or other parts of mathematics,

NEY, MARSHAL.

NEWTON, SIR ISAAC,

because that is a subject which you have studied, and well understand; but you should not talk of Christianity, for you have not studied it: I have, and know you know nothing of the matter." Sir Isaac was never married, and, perhaps, had never time to think of it, being constantly immersed in the profoundest studies, and not being willing to have them broken by domestic concerns. Dr. Pemberton states of him, "that neither his age nor his universal reputation had rendered him stiff in opinion or in any degree elated;" and, shortly before his death, the great philosopher spoke of his sublime efforts in the following humble manner:—"I know not what I may appear to the world; but, to myself, I seem to have been only like a boy playing on the seashore, and diverting myself in now and then finding a smoother pebble, or a prettier shell, than ordinary, whilst the great ocean of truth lay all undiscovered before me." Upon the mantlepiece of the room in which Newton was born, at Woolsthorpe, is placed a marble tablet commemorative of the fact, beneath which are Pope's lines:—

"Nature and nature's laws lay hid in night;

God said, 'Let Newton be!' and all was light."

An English translation of the "Principia" was made by Motte, and published in 1729. For a full account of the philosopher's works, see Sir David Brewster's "Memoirs of the Life, Writings, and Discoveries of Sir Isaac Newton," published in 1835. b. at Woolsthorpe, near Grantham, 1642; d. at Kensington, 1727.

NEWTON, Charles Thomas, was appointed vice-consul at Mitylene in 1852, and in 1856 discovered the site of the magnificent mausoleum or tomb erected at Halicarnassus by Artemisia to the memory of her husband, Mausolus. After sending a fine collection of sculptures to the British Museum, he was appointed, in 1861, keeper of the Greek and Roman Antiquities in that place. b. 1816.

NEWTON, Thomas, an eminent English prelate, whose education was commenced at Westminster school; whence he was elected to Trinity College, Cambridge, of which he was chosen fellow. After entering into orders, he became curate of St. George's, Hanover Square. In 1749 he published an edition of Milton's "Paradise Lost," with notes selected from various authors, and many of his own. He also prefixed a curious and well-written life of the author. In 1756 he was appointed chaplain in ordinary to the king; and about 1762 became bishop of Bristol. His chief work is his "Dissertations on the Prophecies." After his death, were published his Miscellaneous Works, with his Memoirs, written by himself. b. in Staffordshire, 1704; d. 1782.

NEWTON, John, an episcopal clergyman of Calvinistic principles, was originally bred to the sea under his father, who was master of a merchant vessel. He afterwards engaged in the Guinea trade, and led a very irregular life for some years; but at last grew both serious and studious. By great diligence and application he acquired a knowledge of the Latin and Greek languages; and in 1764 was ordained to the curacy of Olney, in Buckinghamshire, where he became intimately acquainted with Cowper, the poet, conjointly with whom he produced the "Olney Hymns." In 1779, Mr. Newton obtained the rectory of St. Mary Woolnoth, London, which he held till his death. He was the author of several works, among which may be numbered a "Review of Ecclesiastical History,"

Ney

"Cardiphonia, or the Utterance of the Heart," "The Messiah, a Series of Discourses," &c. b. 1725; d. 1807.

NEWTON, Gilbert Stuart, a modern English painter and Royal Academician, whose works are full of the grace and freshness of Watteau, but have an energy and expressiveness entirely his own. In 1826 he produced "The Lovers' Quarrel," which at once brought him reputation. In the following year he painted "The Prince of Spain's Visit to Catalina," for which the duke of Bedford paid him 500 guineas. In 1833, his last picture, "Abelard," was exhibited in the Royal Academy, and in the same year he became insane. After remaining in that unhappy condition for about two years, he recovered his reason, but died four days afterwards. His best works were, "The Vicar of Wakefield restoring his Daughter to her Mother," "Shylock and Jessica," "Abelard sitting in his Study," and "Captain Macheath." b. at Halifax, Nova Scotia, 1794; d. at Chelsea, 1835.

NEY, Michael, naï, prince of the Moskowa, duke of Elchingen, and marshal of France, was one of the bravest and most distinguished of Napoleon's lieutenants. In his thirteenth year he was placed with a notary; but this occupation being little in accordance with his adventurous and energetic disposition, he, in 1787, enlisted in a regiment of hussars. His courage and activity were so conspicuous, that in seven years he rose to a captaincy. Attracting the notice of General Kleber, by whom he was surnamed "the Indefatigable," he was created adjutant-general. In 1796 he displayed signal valour at the battles of Altenkirchen, Montabaur, and Dierdorf, at which last he was taken prisoner. Upon being exchanged, he was appointed to the army of the Rhine; while serving with which, he, with only a handful of cavalry, took 2000 prisoners, and made himself master of the town of Würzburg. For that gallant affair he was named general of brigade; and, throughout the campaign, his brilliant courage was only eclipsed by his humane treatment of the French emigrants who fell into his hands, and whom he contrived to put beyond the power of the Directory, who sought their lives. Under General Moreau, he fought at Worms, Frankenthal, Mannheim, and Iller; and to his unyielding bravery was due in great part the victory achieved at Hohenlinden. After the peace of Luneville, he went to Paris, where Napoleon gave him a cordial reception, and, in order to attach him to his cause, brought about a marriage between him and Mademoiselle Augn , the friend of Hortense Beauharnais. Ney went to Switzerland in 1803 as minister plenipotentiary of the French republic. Upon his return, he was nominated to the command of the army encamped near Boulogne, and raised to the dignity of marshal of France. In 1805 he commanded the eighth corps of the army in Germany, and stormed the village of Elchingen, where the Austrians lost 1 killed and wounded, and 2000 prisoners. It was in commemoration of this brilliant deed that Napoleon, who was witness of it, subsequently created Ney duke of Elchingen. He signalized himself still further in the subsequent Prussian campaign. He caused Erfurt to capitulate; took Magdeburg, with 23,000 prisoners and 800 pieces of artillery. At Deppen he destroyed a Prussian corps, cut off the retreat of the Russians at K nigsberg, and defeated the left wing of the enemy at Friedland. In Spain he was placed under Massena; and it was to his persevering skill that the capture of Ciudad-Rodrigo and Almeida was due. Although he greatly assisted Massena in his retreat from the lines of Torre Vedras, the latter and himself became engaged in serious disputes, which led to the recall of Ney. When the grand army set out for Russia, in 1812, Ney was placed in command of the third corps. In that disastrous expedition, he is stated to have urged Napoleon to winter at Smolensko; but, although his counsel remained unheeded by the emperor, he won from him the surname "Bravest of the Brave," by his intrepidity upon every occasion. During the terrible retreat that ensued, Ney performed prodigies of valour. General Dumas relates, that one morning at Gaubinnen, a man in a dark cloak, long beard, and weather-beaten face, entered his room. "I am at last here," said the stranger; "General Dumas, do you recognise me?" General Dumas replied that he did not. "I am the rear-guard of the grand army," continued the stranger; "I have fired the last musket-shot on the bridge of Kowno; I have thrown the last of our arms into the Niemen, and have come here through the woods. I am Marshal Ney!" When Napoleon's star had begun to decline, Ney's courage and ability remained as brilliant as before. He was at Bautzen, Lutzen, and Dresden, helping in all to bring victory to the French standard; but at Danne-witz he was defeated by Bernadotte. The emperor, however, displayed no resentment towards his brave general when he heard of the disaster. Upon the abdication of Napoleon, in 1814, Ney retired to his country seat, from which he was summoned to Paris to assume the command of the eighth military division. When he had reached Paris, he learned for the first time that he was called upon to oppose his old master, who had returned from Elba, and was advancing towards the capital. Unfortunately for himself, he undertook to oppose Napoleon, but gave way before the astute mind of his ancient chief. Instead of capturing, he went over to Napoleon, and his example was followed by almost his whole army. At Waterloo he displayed astonishing bravery, five horses were shot under him; but on foot, his dress torn with balls, he headed the columns of the Guard, and urged them to the charge. All was unavailing, however, and, in the retreat, he was one of the last to quit the disastrous field. After the fall of the emperor, he repaired to Paris, where he was soon afterwards proscribed as a traitor to France. Fouché provided him with a passport, by means of which he was enabled to gain the frontiers in safety; but, unhappily, turning back for some slight cause, he was arrested, brought to trial, and condemned to death. The garden of the Luxembourg was chosen for the place of execution, and there the brave soldier calmly met his death;—there, "he who had fought five hundred battles for France—not one against her, was shot as a traitor." B. at Sarre-Louis, Lorraine, 1769; shot, 1815.

NICANDER, ni-kän'der, a Greek poet, physician, and grammarian, who was a voluminous writer; but only two of his works have come down to us. He is supposed to have been born at Claros, a town of Colophon, and to have lived about 135 B.C.

NICANDER, Charles Augustus, a modern Swedish poet, who commenced his literary career in 1820, with the production of "The Runic Sword; or, the First Knight." In 1827 he visited Italy, and, upon his return, published "Recollections of the South," a prose work, but interspersed with some poems of great beauty and pathos. B. at Strégnaäs, 1799; d. 1839.

NICCOLINI, John Baptist, nek'-o-le'-ne, a modern Italian poet, was the son of humble parents resident in Florence, but, in spite of poverty, he received an education which enabled him, at the age of twenty-two, to become librarian and professor of History and Mythology at the Academy of Arts. On the grand dual restoration, he was so highly in favour that Ferdinand III. gave him the appointment of librarian in his own palace; but Niccolini soon returned to his old functions at the Academy, which afforded him greater independence. His literary attention was given almost wholly to dramatic poetry: and in one of his first tragedies, "Nabuco," the personalities of Napoleon I., Pius VII., Letitia, Maria Louisa, and other great characters of the time, were embodied in the dramatis personæ, the emperor himself appearing through the poetical guise of the king of Babylon. The first edition of Niccolini's tragedies appeared at Florence in 1831, and in 1847 M. Le Monnier published his complete works, with the omission of two dramas, "Arnoldo di Brescia" and "Philippo Strozzi," which were rather too daring to be represented or even printed in Tuscany. Niccolini also wrote several lyric poems which were highly popular, and among them a poem in three cantos, entitled "La Pietà," which celebrates the institution of the fraternity of the Misericordia, and their pious works during the plague and inundation which visited Leghorn early in the nineteenth century. The range of antique themes taken up in rapid succession by Niccolini at the opening of his career, was abandoned in later years for a modern and romantic class of subjects. His prose works consist of philological treatises and academical discourses. Niccolini was an enthusiastic advocate of civil and religious liberty; and it was a severe attack of illness alone which prevented him, in 1847, from taking an active part in the political movements of that epoch. B. 1785; d. 1861.

NICEPHORUS I., emperor of Constantinople, ni-sef'-or-us, was at first chancellor of the empire, but usurped the throne, in 802, from the empress Irene, whom he banished to the isle of Mitylene. The beginning of his reign was marked by wisdom and clemency; but afterwards he committed such cruelties, that his subjects revolted, and proclaimed Bardanes, surnamed the Turk, emperor. Bardanes was defeated, however, and sent to a monastery, where he was deprived of his eyes. The Bulgarians having invaded the empire, and ravaged Thrace, Nicephorus marched against them; but was vanquished and slain, 811.

NICEPHORUS II. (Phocas), a nobleman of Constantinople, whose character was so popular, that he was raised to the Imperial throne in 963. He married the widow of his predecessor, Romanus II., and drove the Saracens out of a great part of Asia. He was assassinated by John Zimiscees and other conspirators, in 969.

NICEPHORUS III., was invested with the purple by the army, which he commanded, in 1078. He was deprived of this dignity in 1081, by his general, Alexis Comnenus, who sent him to a convent, where he died shortly after.

OF BIOGRAPHY.

Nicephorus

NICEPHORUS, Callistus, a Greek historian, who, among other works, produced an "Ecclesiastical History," in twenty-three books, the date of which commences with the year 610. This work was translated into French by Du Duc, and again into Latin by Lange, in the 17th century. Flourished in the 14th century.

NICERON, Jean Pierre, nis'-e-rang, an eminent French biographer entered the religious order of the Barnabites, and became a celebrated preacher. He was also successively professor of philosophy and theology, and librarian to his society. His works are "Memoirs of Men illustrious in the Republic of Letters, with an Account of their Works," a translation of Dr. Hancock's treatise on the "Virtues of Common Water," "The Conversion of England to Christianity." B. 1635; D. 1738.

NICETAS, Acominatus, ni-se'-tās, a Byzantine historian, who wrote the "Annals of the Byzantine Empire," in twenty-one books. He was employed in various posts at the court of Constantinople, until the year 1204, when he retired to Nicæa, where he died, 1216.

NICHOLAS I., Pope, nik'-o-las, was elected in succession to Benedict III., in 853. He excommunicated Photius, patriarch of Constantinople, whose schism led to the separation of the Roman and Byzantine churches. D. 867.

NICHOLAS II. was a native of Burgundy, archbishop of Florence, who succeeded Stephen IX. as pope in 1059. He was opposed by a rival, who styled himself Benedict X.; but being disavowed by the council of Sutri, Benedict was obliged to forego his claim to the papal chair. This pope assembled a council at Rome, and caused a decree to be passed which was very important in the subsequent elections to the tiara. He was succeeded by Alexander II. D. 1061.

NICHOLAS III. was of a noble Italian family, and elected pope in succession to John XXI., in 1277. He obtained from the emperor Rudolph of Hapsburg large grants of Italian territory; among the rest, the exarchate of Ravenna. He dispatched a number of missions to heathen countries, and deprived Charles of Anjou, king of Naples, of the dignity of a senator of Rome. His successor was Martin IV. D. 1280.

NICHOLAS IV. was a native of Ascoli, and was elected to the papal chair upon the death of Honorius IV., in 1288. He excommunicated James of Aragon and his followers in the island of Sicily, and advanced the claims of Charles II. of Anjou to that kingdom. He likewise endeavoured to excite a new crusade, but without success. This disappointment hastened his death, which took place in 1292.

NICHOLAS V., cardinal bishop of Bologna, became pope after Eugenius IV., in 1447. He restored peace to the Romish and Western churches, and caused the sovereigns and states of Italy to forget their feuds. He collected books and manuscripts, and ordered translations to be made of the Greek classics. The Vatican library was also founded by him, and he embellished Rome with numerous fine edifices. D. 1455.

NICHOLAS I., emperor of Russia, was the third son of the emperor Paul, by his second wife, Sophie Dorothea, daughter of Frederick Eugene, duke of Württemberg. His father having been assassinated while Nicholas was only in his fifth year, his education devolved upon his mother, who caused him to be most carefully instructed in letters, the sciences, and the arts. He was taught to speak the French and German languages with as much fluency as his native Russian; while in the theory of the art of war, for the study of which he evinced great aptitude from his earliest years, his progress was rapid and brilliant. He ascended the throne of Russia in 1825, after the death of his eldest brother Alexander, who had no issue, Constantine, the next brother, was the legitimate heir; but he had renounced his claim two years previously. Before becoming emperor, Nicholas had, however, to repress a formidable insurrection, comprising powerful members of the military and nobility. During that critical period, Nicholas displayed a fearless and energetic character, which rapidly awed the insurrectionists, many of whom were shot down or subsequently executed, or banished to Siberia. Shortly after his coronation, he sent his troops against the shah of Persia, whose army was defeated in several engagements by Marshal Paskiewitch. The shah was compelled to sign the treaty of Tourkmanehai, by which the provinces of Erivan and Nakhchivan were ceded to Russia, an indemnity of about three millions sterling in cash being also exacted from him. Nicholas joined with England and France in aiding the Greeks to achieve their independence, and the Russian fleet co-operated with those of the two first-named powers in annihilating the Turkish flotilla at Navarino. In 1828 war broke out between Russia and Turkey; upon which General Diebitsch captured the fortress of Silistria, routed the Turkish army at Shumla, crossed the Balkan, and appeared before Adrianople. In 1829 the treaty of Adrianople was concluded, which gave to Russia, besides large tracts of territory in Asia, the right to trade in all parts of Turkey and upon the Danube, and the free passage of the Dardanelles. In virtue of this concession, Nicholas likewise became the protector of the Danubian Principalities. In 1830 he displayed considerable hostility towards the revolution that had brought about a change of dynasty in France; and in the same year an insurrection burst forth in Poland, which was not repressed until after a terrible struggle of ten months. The brave but unsuccessful Poles were treated with the utmost rigour; many were sent to Siberia or the army of the Caucasus; the universities were suppressed, the libraries and other great establishments were transferred to St. Petersburg; and finally, in 1832, the kingdom of Poland became extinct. In 1839 a formal declaration of war was made against the Circassians, with whom the Russians had long been engaged in a desultory warfare. This struggle was vigorously maintained by the emperor throughout his whole life, but it remained for his successor Alexander to thoroughly subdue the brave mountaineers. Nicholas visited England for the second time in 1844, and was cordially received by her Majesty Queen Victoria. During the Hungarian insurrection of 1849, the troops of Nicholas enabled Austria to triumph over her revolted subjects, and to complete the subjugation of Hungary. In 1853 he dispatched Prince Menschikoff to Constantinople, to exact from the Porte a treaty whereby Russia might be permitted to interfere in the internal affairs of Turkey, and secure to herself the prerogative of protecting the Greek subjects of the Ottoman empire. The result of Prince Menschikoff's mission is well known: Russia occupied the Danubian principalities as "a material guarantee;" the fleet of Nicholas destroyed the Turkish vessels at Sinope; and France and England declared war against the czar, invaded the Crimea, where the Russian arms were subjected to defeat at the Alma, at Inkermann, and at Sebastopol; all the forts upon the southern side of which were captured and destroyed. This last event, however, was subsequent to the death of the emperor, who succumbed to a mortal malady, whilst busily engaged in preparing renewed efforts against the allies. The emperor Nicholas was a man of prodigious industry; his energetic character enabled him to assume the position of defender of order and legitimacy throughout the continent of Europe. Order and legitimacy signified to him, however, a total repression of national liberty. With respect to his own country, he was professedly despotic. "Despotism," he observed, "is the very essence of my government." The great object of his public life was to realize the ambitious projects of Peter I. and Catharine II.—the possession by Russia of Constantinople, and of the territories of the sultan. b. at St. Petersburg, 1796; d. 1855.

NICHOL, J. P., LL.D., nik'-ol, professor of astronomy in the University of Glasgow, was the son of a bookseller in Montrose, and Mr. Nichol's first venture in life was as schoolmaster of Dun in the neighbourhood of that town, when he was only sixteen years of age. He afterwards studied for the church, and was duly licensed as a preacher. Literature and science, however, soon diverted him into a course more suitable to his faculties. Among other literary undertakings, Mr. Nichol for some time edited the "Fife Herald," to a daughter of the proprietor of which, Mr. Robert Tullis, he was married. After obtaining his professorship from Lord Melbourne's ministry, he distinguished himself by his various popular works on astronomy, "The Architecture of the Heavens," "The Solar System," "The Planetary System," "The Planet Neptune," &c.; and by his lectures on the same class of subjects, he was the first to make the public familiar with what is called the "Nebular Hypothesis." b. 1804.

NICHOLLS, William, nik'-ols, an English divine of much learning and piety, was educated at Magdalen Hall, Oxford, after which he became fellow of Merton College, and took his degree of D.D. in 1695; at which time he was rector of Selsey, in Sussex. Dr. Nicholls published several valuable works: the principal of which were, "A Conference with a Theist," "A Defence of the Church of England," and "A Commentary on the Book of Common Prayer." b. 1684; d. 1712.

NICHOLS, John, a learned antiquarian writer, who early in life was placed in the office of William Bowyer, "the last of the learned printers." He was afterwards manager and partner in that printing-office; and at Bowyer's death, in 1777, the establishment fell into his hands. Nichols was author, or editor and printer, of a very large number of learned works. The most important of these were, "Biographical and Literary History of Processions of Queen Elizabeth," and "Illustrations of the Manners and Expenses of Ancient Times." From the year 1778 until his death, he conducted the "Gentleman's Magazine," b. at Islington, 1745; d. 1826.

NICHOLS, John Gough, a modern English antiquarian, was grandson of the preceding. His first important work was produced in 1829, with the title, "Fac-Similes of Autographs, with Biographical Memoirs of Royal, Noble, Learned, and Remarkable Persons." His later productions included, among others, "The Chronicle of Queen Jane," a translation from Erasmus's "Pilgrimage to St. Mary of Walsingham," and "The Chronicle of the Grey Friars of London." During many years he was at the head of the "Gentleman's Magazine," but vacated the post in 1856. Subsequently, however, he contributed to the pages of that periodical "The autobiography of Sylvanus Urban, Esq.," which contained much interesting matter relative to the early writers and affairs of that magazine. b. in London, 1806.

NICIAS, nik'-i-as, an Athenian commander and statesman, who, by his merit, rose to the highest offices in his country. He signalized himself in the war of the Peloponnesus, which he had the honour of concluding. Afterwards he was appointed to command, with Eurymedon and Demosthenes, against Sicily. These three generals laid siege to Syracuse for two years; but, finding it impregnable, they were about to retire, when they were attacked by the Syracusans, and Nicias and Demosthenes, with a great part of their troops, made prisoners. Nicias was put to death by the Syracusans, 413 b.c.

NICIAS, physician to Pyrrhus, king of Epirus, who made an offer to Fabricius, the Roman consul, of poisoning his master for a sum of money, b.c. 280. Fabricius disdained the proposal, and acquainted Pyrrhus with his treachery. Thereupon Pyrrhus is stated to have exclaimed, "This is that Fabricius whom it is harder to turn aside from justice and honour than to divert the sun from its course." Nicias is said to have been put to death, and his skin used for covering the seat of a chair.

NICIAS, a celebrated Grecian painter, who was contemporary with Apelles. His greatest picture was that which illustrated the passage in Homer's "Odyssey" where Ulysses invokes the shades of the departed. Ptolemy I., king of Egypt, offered Nicias sixty talents (about £15,000) for the picture: but the painter preferred to present it to his native city of Athens. One of his pictures was taken to Rome by Augustus, in whose temple it was afterwards fixed. He is likewise stated to have painted some of the statues of Praxiteles. Flourished about the end of the 4th century b.c.

NICOLAI, Christopher Frederick, nik'-o-lai, a learned German bookseller, who taught himself Greek, Latin, and English, and, in the 18th century, established several critical journals at Berlin. The most important of his separate works are "Anecdotes of Frederick the Great," "Essay on the Templars," and "Remarks on the History of the Rosicrucians and Freemasons." b. at Berlin, 1733; d. 1811.

NICOLAS, Sir Harris, nik'-o-las, an English antiquarian writer, whose early years were spent in the English navy. At the conclusion of the great war with France, he devoted himself to the study of the law, and was called to the bar in 1825. As a lawyer, he was almost entirely employed in peerage cases before the House of Lords. His works were both numerous and important; the principal of them being "The History of the Battle of Agincourt," a "Life of Chaucer," appended to Pickering's edition of the poet's writings; "The Dispatches and Letters of Lord Nelson," and two volumes of a "History of the British Navy," which were all that he completed before his death. In 1831 he was created a knight of the Hanoverian Guelphic Order. b. in Cornwall, 1799; d. 1848.

NICOLE, Pierre, nik'-ol, an eminent French writer, who, in 1639, became a member of the Society of Port Royal, where he taught youth with great reputation, and assisted Arnauld in many of his works. In 1679 he quitted France, on account of the persecution against the Jansenists; but, some time after, obtained leave to return to Paris. In his latter years he espoused the cause of Bossuet against the Quietists, and was engaged in other controversies. He was the chief author of the celebrated work known as the "Port Royal Logic." He also translated several valuable works from the Latin; and his moral essays are esteemed; as is also his "Treatise on Preserving Peace in Society." His other works are chiefly polemical. b. at Chartres, 1625; d. 1695.

NICOLZ, Robert, nik'-ol, a Scotch poet, the son of parents in humble circumstances, and whose efforts at self-education were pursued under the most disadvantageous circumstances. At the age of 21 he produced a small volume of poems, which became exceedingly popular, and passed through several editions. He shortly afterwards obtained the post of editor of the "Leeds Times" which, under his control, was more than tripled in its circulation. His prose writings consisted, for the most part, of political articles contributed to the before-mentioned print, and were marked by strongly liberal sentiments and a clear energetic style. His health, which had always been frail, and was probably shattered by his youthful studies, gave way after he had been engaged upon his editorial duties about a year; and he removed to Edinburgh, where he died almost as soon as he had reached manhood. b. in Perthshire, 1814; d. 1837.

NICOLSON, William, nik'-ol-son, a learned English prelate, born at Orton, in Cumberland, was educated at Queen's College, Oxford; became, successively, bishop of Carlisle, Derry, and archbishop of Cashel. He published "The English, Scotch, and Irish Historical Library," the "Leges Marchiarum, or Border Laws," and several other works. He also distinguished himself by the zeal and ability with which he entered into the Bangorian controversy. b. 1655; d. 1727.

NICOMEDES I., nik'-om'-e-dees, king of Bithynia, succeeded his father, Ziphotes, b.c. 278. In the following year he sought the assistance of the Gauls against his brother Zibates, who disputed the throne with him. His barbarian auxiliaries subsequently turned against him, and overran Asia Minor. d. about 250 b.c.

NICOMEDES II., succeeded Prusias II., 149 b.c. During his long reign, he remained the ally of the Romans, and assisted the latter against Aristonicus, king of Pergamus, 131 b.c. The last years of his reign were spent in contending against Mithridates VI., king of Pontus. d. 91 b.c.

NICOMEDES III., son and successor of the preceding, was deposed in the first year of his reign, by Mithridates VI.; but was afterwards restored by the Romans. In 83 b.c. he engaged with the Romans in attacking Mithridates, whose general defeated him in Paphlagonia; whereupon he fled to Italy, where he remained till the conclusion of the war, b.c. 54. Dying without issue, he left his crown to the Romans, 74 b.c.

NICOT, Jean, ne'-ko, a French courtier and writer, who was sent by Francis II. as ambassador to Portugal, whence he brought the plant named tobacco, which, in France, has been called Nicotiana, out of compliment to the importer. He wrote a work upon Navigation, and, in 1606, published "The Treasury of the French Language," which is stated to be the first French dictionary known. b. at Nîmes, 1530; d. at Paris, 1600.

NIEBUHR, Carsten, ne'-door, a celebrated Danish traveller, whose parents died while he was very young. In consequence of this occurrence, he remained until his 21st year in an almost uneducated condition, gaining his subsistence as an agricultural labourer. In 1754, however, he zealously devoted himself to the study of geometry, with the view of gaining the post of land-surveyor in his native district. He afterwards passed to the university of Göttingen; but his pecuniary resources becoming exhausted, he enlisted in the Hanoverian engineers, which he quitted in 1757, on being appointed to a scientific expedition about to be dispatched by the king of Denmark to Arabia. Niebuhr requested to be allowed to increase his scientific qualifications by eighteen months' study; and, when the expedition set out, joined it as mathematician and geographer. After travelling in Arabia, Bombay, Persia, and Asia Minor, Niebuhr returned to Copenhagen in 1767, having been absent six years. His four companions had died in the East; but Niebuhr succeeded in bringing home a collection of notes and sketches, which were subsequently edited, engraved, and printed at the expense of the Danish government, and have been used by every historian of Arabia, from Gibbon until the present day. The most important of these classical works were, "Description of Arabia," "Travels in Arabia," and "Political and Military State of the Turkish Empire." His great services to science were recognised by his government, who appointed him to a civil post in Holstein, and created him councillor of state. Further, when he became incapacitated from discharging the duties of his office through blindness, the Danish government would not accept his resignation, but appointed an assistant to carry on his labours until the end of his life. b. in Holstein, 1733; d. 1815.

NIEBUHR, Barthold George, a celebrated Danish historian, was son of the preceding. After concluding a brilliant academical career, he became private secretary to the Danish minister of finance in 1796; but his studious and retiring disposition being ill suited for administrative functions, he exchanged the post for that of assistant-secretary to the Royal Library of Copenhagen. After spending about two years in Edinburgh, London, and Holstein, he returned to Copenhagen in 1800. Niebuhr was next invited to Berlin, where he arrived shortly before the battle of Jena. Upon the establishment of the University of Berlin, he was appointed therein lecturer on Roman history; and the discourses which he delivered while fulfilling this office formed the germs of the great work upon which his fame rests. The War of Liberation, as it was termed in Germany, called Niebuhr from his studious life; and, during the years 1813-14, he was employed at the head-quarters of the allied army. In 1816 he was sent from Berlin as ambassador to Rome, whence he requested to be recalled in 1822. After spending some time at Naples, he returned to Berlin, but shortly afterwards repaired to Bonn, where he gave lectures upon Roman antiquities and other subjects, in the newly-founded university. After superintending the publication of the works of the Byzantine historians, he occupied himself with the enlargement and completion of his "Roman History." The first volume of this new edition was given to the world in 1827; but, a fire having destroyed all Niebuhr's manuscripts, the publication of the second was delayed until 1830. This great work inaugurated a new and more rational mode of dealing with the misty legends of early tradition; and, although Niebuhr therein displayed a scepticism and a distrust of mystical authorities, he did more than any other man to evolve a truthful and sound basis whereon to erect a rational history of Rome. The "Roman History" has been translated into English by Archdeacon Hare, Bishop Thirlwall, and Dr. Schmitz. Many of Niebuhr's shorter treatises are to be found in the "Classical Journal," the "Philological Museum," &c. In addition to the before-mentioned works, Niebuhr produced "Lectures on the History of Rome," which has been translated into English by Dr. L. Schmitz. b. at Copenhagen, 1776; d. 1831.

NIEL, Adolphe, neel, a modern general and marshal of France, in 1821 became student of the Polytechnic School, which he quitted to study engineering at Metz. He rose but slowly through the subordinate grades of the army. In 1827 he was lieutenant of engineers; in 1835 he became a captain, and won his promotion as chef-de-bataillon for his bravery upon the field of Constantine, two years afterwards. He was made colonel in 1846, and with that rank took part in the expedition to Rome in 1849, as head of the staff of engineers. While at Rome he was promoted to the rank of brigadier-general, and was shortly afterwards charged with the mission of carrying the keys of the city to the pope at Gaeta. Upon his return to Paris, he became a member of the superior committee of engineering and fortifications, and was appointed director of the engineering department in the ministry of war. In 1853 he rose to be general of division, and in that capacity commanded the French engineers in the Baltic, and took part in the siege of Bomarsund. Subsequently he commanded the engineers in the Crimea, having been dispatched thither in 1855, by which time he had attained the distinction of aide-de-camp to the emperor. After the assault and taking of the Malakhoff, he was decorated with the grand cross of the Legion of Honour. In 1859 he was sent on a mission to the court of Victor Emmanuel at Turin, and to make the official demand of the Princess Clothilde's hand for Prince Napoleon. Shortly afterwards he participated in the operations of the French army in Italy, and was created a marshal of France. His reputation as a scientific officer has always stood remarkably high. b. in France, 1802.

NIECE, James, neeld, a philanthropist, was a goldsmith in St. James's Street, London, where he made an ample fortune, a large portion of which, as well as much of his time, he devoted to the alleviation of the sufferings of prisoners confined in the public gaols, which he was in the habit of visiting all over the country, in order to ascertain the condition of the inmates, and relieve their necessities. He founded the society for the Relief and Discharge of Prisoners Confined for Small Debts; the reports of which he prepared, besides contributing papers to the "Gentleman's Magazine" on the same subject. b. in Cheshire, 1744; d. 1814.

NIECIEWICZ, Julian Ursin, neem'-see-vitch, a distinguished Polish poet, historian, and patriot. In 1783, after having travelled in France, Italy, and England, he entered the Polish diet as deputy for Livonia. He subsequently drew up the Polish constitution, which was warmly commended by Fox. In 1794 he served as aide-de-camp to Kosciusko, during the Polish insurrection of that year, and was taken prisoner at the disastrous battle of Maciejowicz. He was kept in confinement at St. Petersburg until 1798, after which he emigrated to America, passing on his way through London, where he was cordially received. When Napoleon created the grand-duchy of Warsaw, in 1806, Niemcewicz was appointed secretary of state; and this and other high offices he continued to hold until the outbreak of the Polish insurrection of 1830. Shortly afterwards he went to London, to request the aid of the English government; but, Russia having taken the capital of Poland in his absence, he was precluded from returning to his native country. He subsequently repaired to Paris, where the last days of this illustrious patriot and author were spent. His chief works were, a collection of spirit-stirring poems, a number of dramas, the "History of the Reign of Sigismund III. of Poland," translations from Pope, Dryden, Byron, and Wordsworth, and a narrative of his captivity in St. Petersburg. b. at Skoki, Lithuania, 1757; d. at Paris, 1841.

NIEPCE DE SAINT VICTOR, Claude François, se'-aips, a modern French photographic chemist, and the discoverer of the process of obtaining images on glass. He was the nephew of that M. Niepce who was the friend and fellow-worker of M. Daguerre: was educated for the military profession, and was acting as lieutenant of dragoons in 1842, when an accident turned his thoughts towards the science of chemistry. Having stained his uniform with some drops of lemon-juice, he undertook a series of chemical experiments for the purpose of restoring the lost colour, and at length succeeded by employing ammonia. Shortly afterwards, the minister of war ordered that the collars and cuffs of thirteen cavalry regiments should be changed in colour. This change had been estimated to cost six francs the suit; but Niepce suggested a plan which would cost only half a franc. His proposal was accepted, and the government was saved an expenditure of 100,000 francs. For this service he received a reward of 500 francs. Three years afterwards, he obtained an exchange into the municipal guard of Paris, which step gave him the means of prosecuting his scientific studies in the capital. During the revolution of 1848, the barrack in which he lodged was destroyed, and with it the whole of his scientific apparatus and collections. Notwithstanding, he contrived to conclude his experiments, and present to the Academy his second memoir upon photography on glass, in the same year. Besides his first great discovery, he made researches upon producing photographic images in colours, and photographically engraved steel plates. In 1855 he published a collection of his scattered memoirs, with the title "Photographic Researches," and another entitled "Treatise upon Engraving upon Steel and Glass." In 1850 Napoleon III. appointed him commandant of the Louvre, for the purpose of enabling him to prosecute more perfectly his photographic researches. n. in France, 1805.

NIEPPERG, Adam Albert, Count von, nee'-pair, a general and chamberlain of the Austrian empire. In 1812 he acted as minister-plenipotentiary at Stockholm; upon which occasion he succeeded in inducing Bernadotte to take part in the coalition against Napoleon. In 1814 he signed, at Naples, with Murat, a treaty of alliance with Austria. When the empress Maria Louisa quitted France, Count von Niepperg became her confidential adviser, and defended her interests at the congress of Vienna. He next contributed towards the overthrow of Murat, and passed some time in France as commandant of the department of Gard. He subsequently repaired to Parma, where he was secretly married to Maria Louisa. His administration of his wife's duchy was characterized by ability and energy: several important reforms, both political and military, likewise emanated from him. n. at Salzburg, 1771; d. at Parma, 1828.

NIGER, Caius Pescennius, ni'-jer, a celebrated Roman general, who, when the empire was sold to Didius Julianus by the Prætorian guards, in 193, refused to acknowledge the new emperor. Niger commanded in Syria, and was chosen emperor by all the provinces of the East; but Septimius Severus, who was at the head of the Roman legions in Pannonia, set up a rival claim, and, marching upon Rome, dethroned Didius. Severus next sent troops against Niger, whose army was twice defeated, and himself abandoned by his followers. He attempted to effect his escape; but was overtaken and slain, 194.

NIGHTINGALE, Joseph, ni'-tin-gail, a dissenting minister of very considerable talent, who settled in London, became an author, and left the Methodist connexion for Unitarianism. Among his writings are, "A Portraiture of Catholicism," "A Portraiture of Methodism," several volumes of the "Beauties of England and Wales," "English Topography," and "Sermons." n. in Lancashire, 1775; d. 1824.

NIGHTINGALE, Miss Florence, an English philanthropic lady, was the daughter of William Edward Nightingale, of Lea Hurst, Derbyshire, and received her education under her parents' direction. In addition to the ordinary accomplishments of an English lady, she acquired a competent knowledge of the modern languages. Early in life, her serious and earnest mind turned towards missions of charity with a natural instinct. After examining the schools and hospitals in the neighbourhood of her father's estate, and, at a later period, extending her observations by visiting the schools, workhouses, and hospitals of the metropolis and the large provincial towns, she, in 1849, entered the Kaiserswerth hospital at Düsseldorf as voluntary nurse, and, after visiting similar establishments in other parts of Germany, returned to London, and founded the Sanatorium for English invalid ladies, in Upper Harley Street. The sickness and distress of the British army in the Crimea induced Mr. Sidney Herbert, then minister of war, to request Miss Nightingale to go thither as superintendent of a staff of voluntary nurses. With a noble devotedness, she immediately complied, her estimable example being followed by forty-two other nurses, many of whom were ladies of rank and fortune. From November, 1854, until the re-embarkation of the army in 1856, did Miss Nightingale minister to the wounded and the sick, her zeal never abating except on one occasion, when she was herself laid upon a sick bed by an attack of hospital fever. Upon her return to England, in the latter year, the whole English nation, from the queen to the peasant, acknowledged her devoted assiduity. A testimonial fund, amounting to £50,000, was subscribed, which, at Miss Nightingale's request, was devoted to the institution of an hospital for the training of nurses. She wrote several excellent works; the last of which was, "Notes on Nursing, what it is, and what it is not." n. in Florence, 1820.

NIKON, ni'-kon, patriarch of Russia, was the son of a peasant, but by his religious zeal and learning obtained the favour of the czar Alexis Michaelovitch. Nikon introduced into the Russian church the method of chanting, and called a council for restoring the sacred text according to the ancient versions. A new edition of the Bible was accordingly published at Moscow, under the direction of the patriarch. He composed a chronicle of Russian affairs to the year 1630. Through the intrigues of his enemies, he was afterwards banished. n. near Nishnei-Novgorod, 1605; d. at Jaroslavl, 1681.

NILEUS, ni'-le-us, a son of Codrus, who conducted a colony of Ionians to Asia, where he built Ephesus, Miletus, Priene, Colophon, Lebedos, &c.

NILUS, ni'-lus, a king of Thebes, who gave his name to the river which flows through the middle of Egypt, and falls into the Mediterranean Sea.

NINUS, ni'-nus, king of Assyria, and a celebrated conqueror, who, about 2069 B.C., succeeded Belus, his father, as king of Babylon and Nineveh. He entered into an alliance with the Arabs, subjugating Egypt and Bactria. He became enamoured of Semiramis, the wife of one of his generals, and married her after her husband's death. Semiramis was supposed to have subsequently poisoned Ninus, who reigned during 52 years, and enlarged Nineveh, to which city he gave his name.

NINUS II., or NINTAS, son of the preceding, and Semiramis, who profited by his youth to assume the regency. According to some, she subsequently voluntarily abdicated, while others state that she was put to death by Ninus. His reign is remarkable for its luxury and extravagance. His successors imitated the example of his voluptuousness; and very little further is known of the Assyrian monarchs until the age of Sardanapalus. His reign is placed between the years 1965 and 1927 B.C.

NITOCRIS, ni-to'-kris, a celebrated queen of Babylon, who built a bridge across the Euphrates, in the middle of the city, and dug a number of reservoirs for the superfluous water of the river.

NIVVERNOIS, Louis Julius Mancini Mazarini, Duke de, né-vain-wei, a French diplomatist, was successively ambassador at Rome, Berlin, and London, in which latter city he negotiated the peace of 1763. He produced several poetical imitations of Virgil, Horace, Tibullus, Ovid, Ariosto, and Milton. He also wrote "Letters on the Use of the Mind," "Dialogues of the Dead," "Reflections on the Genius of Horace, Boileau, and Rousseau," "Fables in Verse," "Dramas," &c. He was imprisoned by the republicans in 1793, and died in 1795. b. 1716.

NOAILLES, Adrien Maurice, Duke of, no-ail, a celebrated French general, came of a noble family, and crined, early in life, eminent talents for the military profession. He served with his father in Catalonia, and afterwards under Vendôme, both in Spain and Flanders. In 1708 he commanded in Roussillon, and gained several advantages over the enemy. In 1710 he made himself master of Gerona, one of the most important places in Catalonia, for which Philip V. created him a grandee of Spain, and Louis XIV. made him a duke and peer of France. In the succeeding reign he was appointed president of the council of finances; but when Dubois obtained the ascendancy in the ministry, Noailles was exiled. On the death of that minister he was recalled, and restored to his posts. In the year 1734 he commanded at the siege of Philipsburg, and obliged the Germans to abandon Worms. He afterwards served with great reputation in Italy. b. 1678; d. 1766.

NOAILLES, Louis Antoine de, uncle of the preceding, devoted himself to the ecclesiastical profession, and, in 1676, was nominated bishop of Cahors; whence he was removed to Châlons, and, lastly, to the see of Paris, in 1695. He made excellent rules for the conduct of his clergy, but his peace was disturbed by the Jesuits, in consequence of the approbation which he gave to Quesnel's "Reflections on the New Testament." In 1700 he was honoured with the dignity of cardinal. He subsequently lost the favour of Louis XIV., through the influence of Father Tellier, the Jesuit. Pope Clement XI. was also set against the archbishop, and issued his famous bull of Unigenitus in condemnation of Quesnel's book, which the latter had sanctioned. The cardinal was exiled; but, after the death of Louis, Tellier was banished in his turn, and the archbishop recalled. b. 1651; d. 1729.

NOBLE, Mark, no-bel, a clergyman of the Church of England, and rector of Barming, in Kent, was the author of "Memoirs of the Protectorate House of Cromwell," "Memoirs of the Illustrious House of Medici, with Genealogical Tables," "The Lives of the English Regicides," a "History of the College of Arms," and a supplementary continuation of "Granger's Biographical History of England." He also wrote several papers in the "Archæologia," and was F.S.A. of London and Edinburgh. 1827.

NODIER, Charles, no-de-ai, a celebrated French author, was the son of the mayor of Besançon, under whose care he received a careful and complete education. He early displayed a love for natural history, and, at the age of 18, published a treatise on Entomology. In 1800 he went to Paris, where he quickly became celebrated by his fine romances and poems; but incurred the displeasure of the first consul, in consequence of producing a satirical poem entitled "La Napoléonade," in which he defended liberty. For this, he was sent back to his native place, and there kept under police inspection. In this condition of forced exclusion from society, he occupied himself with the composition of his "Critical Examination of the Dictionaries of the French Language," in which work he displayed the utmost acuteness and learning. He next commenced a series of journeys over France, in order to escape the watchful annoyances of the police. His mode of life during this period is detailed in his "Painter of Salzburg." He subsequently repaired to Dôle, and commenced the delivery of a series of lectures on French literature, which gained the greatest success. At a later period he obtained, through the influence of Fouché, the post of librarian at Laybach, in Illyria; but the restoration of the Bourbons enabled him to again take up his residence at Paris, where he found employment as a contributor to the "Journal des Débats." In 1818 he produced "Jean Sbogor," and, in the following year, "Thérèse Hubert," two charming romances. In 1824 he received the important appointment of librarian to the arsenal; and in 1833 became a member of the French Academy. Charles Nodier exercised his talents upon the most diverse subjects: fiction, history, poetry, criticism, biography, philology,—all were touched upon and enriched by his writings. He contributed articles to the "Biographie Universelle," and originated the "Grand Dictionnaire Historique." His most attractive works of a lighter order were "Recollections of my Youth," "The Last Banquet of the Girondins," and his last and finest novel, "Francesco Colonna." In all his works, he wrote in the chastest style, and his plots and sentiments were of a similar purity. During the last years of his life, his society was sought by Victor Hugo, Lamartine, and the most distinguished French authors. b. at Besançon, 1790; d. at Paris, 1844.

NOLLENS, Joseph Francis, no-le-kens, an eminent painter, was born at Antwerp, but went young to England. He studied under Tillemans, and afterwards copied Watteau and Paolo Pannini. He painted landscapes, figures, conversation pieces, and particularly the amusements of children. He was much employed by Lord Cobham, at Stowe, and by the earl of Tilney. b. 1706; d. 1748.—His son Joseph was an admirable sculptor, and studied under Scheemakers. He executed several capital works. b. in London, 1737; d. 1823.

NOLLET, Jean Antoine, no-lai, a French divine and philosophical writer, who studied at Beauvais and Paris. In 1734 he visited London, and was chosen a member of the Royal Society. On his return to Paris, he commenced a course of lectures in experimental philosophy, to which he added illustrations of chemistry, anatomy, and natural history. In 1738 he was appointed professor of experimental philosophy at Paris, and, the year following, was admitted a member of the Academy of Sciences. About the same time he went to Turin, on an invitation from the king of Sardinia, who appointed him professor of physiology in the university of that city; but he was recalled in 1744, to give lessons to the dauphin of France. In 1756 he was nominated first professor of experimental philosophy in the college of Navarre: and was also appointed philosophical tutor to the royal family. His "Lectures in Experimental Philosophy" was the best treatise on the subject which had till then appeared. Besides these, he wrote some excellent works on Electricity, the "Art of making Experiments," and several papers in the Memoirs of the Academy. b. 1700; d. 1770.

NOLAN, Captain Lewis Edward, no'-lan, a distinguished soldier, who served for some time as an officer of the Austrian army, in Hungary and Galicia; but, in 1839, joined the British army as ensign in the 4th Foot, whence he was transferred to the 15th Hussars, then stationed in Madras. His soldier-like qualities attracted the notice of Sir H. Pottinger, who appointed him an extra aide-de-camp; and he availed himself of his stay in India to make himself thoroughly acquainted with the Eastern military systems. In 1852 he returned to Europe; travelled in Russia, and, on the breaking out of the Crimean war, was selected to proceed to Turkey, to make arrangements for the reception of the cavalry, and the purchase of horses. When the army landed in the Crimea, he was placed on the staff of the quartermaster-general; and was killed at Balaklava, Oct. 25, 1854, in the memorable light cavalry charge, almost immediately after delivering Lord Raglan's written order to Lord Lucan, of which he had been the bearer. b. 1817. Captain Nolan was the author of a work on the "Organization, Drill, and Manœuvres of Cavalry Corps."

NONNUS, non'-nus, a Greek poet, who wrote an account of his embassy to Æthiopia and among the Saracens; also a work entitled "Dionysiaca;" a paraphrase, in Greek verse, of the gospel of St. John; and a collection of Histories or Fables. Nonnus was a native of Panopolis, in Egypt, and flourished at the beginning of the 5th century.

NORDBERG, George, nord'-baig, chaplain to Charles XII. of Sweden, whom he accompanied in all his campaigns. Subsequently to the death of that monarch, he was appointed by Queen Ulrica Eleonora to write his history, which was completed, and published at Stockholm in 1740. This work is wanting in the lightness and point of Voltaire's well-known biography; but having been composed from the best materials, it is a work of authority, and has the additional advantage of being written by a man who was present at the actions he narrates. Nordberg spent his last years as a pastor at Stockholm. b. 1677; d. 1744.

NORDEN, John, nor'-den, an old English writer, who received his education at Oxford, and wrote some strange books in divinity, with very whimsical titles, as "The Sinful Man's Solace," "Antithesis, or Contrariety between the Wicked and Godly set forth in a pair of Gloves fit for every Man to wear," &c. He was also the author of the "Surveyor's Dialogue," "Labyrinth of Man's Life," a poem; "England, or a Guide for Travellers," and, "Topographical Descriptions of Middlesex, Hertfordshire, and Cornwall." b. about 1625.

NORDEN, Frederick Lewis, a Danish traveller, who, after serving in the navy of his country, and travelling in the East, entered as a volunteer in the English fleet under Sir John Norris, in the Mediterranean. The king of Denmark sent him to Egypt, to make drawings and observations of the ancient monuments of that country. These he executed with great fidelity, and his "Travels," with plates, was splendidly printed at Copenhagen in 1752-55. Being elected a member of the Royal Society of London, he presented to that learned body his drawings of ruins and colossal statues at Thebes. b. in Holstein, 1708; d. 1742.

NORFOLK, nor'-fok, an ancient and illustrious English house, descended from the royal family of Plantagenet, through Thomas Plantagenet of Brotherton, earl of Norfolk, second son of Edward I., and earl-marshal of England. The heiress of the Norfolk family, Margaret, eldest daughter of Thomas de Mowbray, duke of Norfolk, having espoused, at the commencement of the 15th century, Robert Howard, the title of duke of Norfolk passed to the latter, and was transmitted by him to his descendants. The living head of this family takes precedence as premier duke and earl-marshal of England, and follows immediately after the princes of the blood royal. The most remarkable of this house were:—

NORFOLK, Roger Bigod, Earl of, and earl-marshal of England, ambassador of the king and barons of England, in 1245, to the general council at Lyons, where he combated the pretensions of the pope to the title of sovereign of England. He died in 1270, without issue.

NORFOLK, Thomas Howard, fourth Duke of, was eldest son of the earl of Surrey. During many years, he was one of the confidential advisers of Queen Elizabeth, by whom he was charged, in 1568, to hold an interview with Mary Queen of Scots, who had just taken refuge in England. Norfolk was, however, subsequently brought to trial, upon the charge of having conceived the project of liberating and marrying the unfortunate Scottish queen. He was condemned to death, 1572. b. about 1536.

NORIS, Henry, no'-ris, a celebrated Italian cardinal, who was educated at Verona, by his father, a native of Ireland. He afterwards entered the monastic order of St. Augustine, and acquired great reputation for learning and piety. In 1673 he published the "History of Pelagianism," which gave offence to several persons, who accused him to the pope as being heretically inclined; but Clement X. so little regarded the charge, that he made Noris under-librarian of the Vatican. In 1695 he was created a cardinal. His works were published at Verona, in 1729-41, in 5 vols. folio. b. at Verona, 1631; d. at Rome, 1704.

NORMAN-EBRENFELS, Charles Frederic Jacob, Count de, nor'-man ai'-ren-fels, an eminent military officer, who, after attaining the rank of colonel in the Austrian service, became attached to the army of Napoleon, and commanded the light cavalry of the emperor's guard during the Russian campaign of 1812-13. After the battle of Leipsic, he refused to fight against the French, and retired to Saxony. In 1822, when the Greek revolution broke out, he proceeded along with a number of German officers to Greece, and was appointed to the command of the fort of Navarino. He subsequently organized a battalion of Philhellenes at Corinth, joined Maurocordato, contributed to gaining the victory of Cambolti, and was severely wounded at Peta. b. at Stuttgart, 1784; d. at Missolonghi, 1822.

NORMANBY, Constantine Henry Phipps, first Marquis of, nor'-man-be, was eldest son of the first Earl of Mulgrave; and, after concluding his academical career at Cambridge entered the House of Commons as member for Scarborough, in 1818. He took his seat among the liberals, and supported the Roman Catholic claims and Parliamentary reform. In 1831 he succeeded to the peerage, and soon afterwards went out as governor to Jamaica, where he distinguished himself by his philanthropic efforts in carrying out the slave emancipation act. In 1835 he was appointed lord-lieutenant of Ireland. In 1839 he was for a short time secretary for the Colonies, for the Home department subsequently, and in 1841 went to the French capital as ambassador from the English court. He continued to perform the duties of that office until 1852. In 1856 he published a narrative of the events of 1848, in a work entitled "A Year of Revolutions;" and subsequently made himself notorious by advocating in Parliament the cause of the pope and the deposed princes of Italy. b. 1797; d. 1863.

NORRIS, John, nor-ris, an eminent divine and Platonist, was educated at Winchester School, and at Exeter College, Oxford; and became rector of Bemerton, near Salisbury. He ranks as one of the most eminent of the English Platonists, and was a good man, though a visionary. Among his works are, "The DISCOURSES; "AN ESSAY TOWARDS THE IDEAL OF THE Ideal, or Intelligible World," and "Philosophical Discourse concerning the Natural Immortality of the Soul." b. 1667; d. 1711.

NORRIS, Sir John, a gallant naval officer, who served his country nearly sixty years, commencing in 1689, and terminating, with his life, in 1749. The frequent accidents and misfortunes which befel the ships and squadrons under his command, and which could not be warder off by human prudence or sagacity, procured him the appellation of "Foul-weather Jack;" yet in the duties of his profession no man could be more assiduous; and so well did he second the exertions of his friend Sir Cloudesley Shovel in the Mediterranean, that the queen knighted and otherwise handsomely rewarded him.

NORRIS, Sir Thomas, north, knight, was the first translator into English of the "Lives" of Plutarch, but of whose own life no particulars are known. The translation of Plutarch was published in 1579; but North had previously given to the world two other works—1. "The Diall of Princes; compiled by the Rev. Father in God, Don Anthony of Guevara, and Englyshed out of the Frenche; right necessary and pleasaunt to all gentlemen and others which are lovers of vertue," which first appeared in 1557, and was reprinted in 1588 and 1582.—2. "The Morall Philosophie of Doni, drawne out of the auncient Writers; a work first compiled in the Indian Tongue, afterwards reduced into divers other Languages, and now lastly Englyshed out of the Italian," published in 1570. North's translation of Plutarch is professedly taken from Amyot's French version, but, curious enough, is often inaccurate where Amyot is correct. The Lives of Epaminondas, Philip of Macedon, Octavius Cæsar, and some others, are added to those in Plutarch. Lived in the time of Queen Elizabeth.

NORTH, Francis, Lord Guildford, keeper of the great seal in the reigns of Charles II. and James II., was the second son of Dudley, Lord

Northcote

North, and educated at St. John's College, Cambridge, whence he removed to the Middle Temple. After being solicitor and attorney-general, he was made chief justice of the King's Bench, and in 1682 was appointed lord keeper, with the title of Lord Guildford. Of him, Lord Campbell says: "He had as much law as he could contain; but he was incapable of taking an enlarged and commanding view of any subject." He wrote "An Index of Verbs Neuter," printed with Lily's Grammar; "A Paper on the Gravitation of Fluids in the Bladders of Fishes," printed in the "Philosophical Transactions;" "A Philosophical Essay on Music;" several Concertos, &c. b. 1637; d. 1685.

NORTH, Sir Dudley, brother of the preceding, in his youth resided at Smyrna and Constantinople, and after his return to England published some interesting works upon the life, institutions, and languages of the East. Of the Turkish tongue, he observed, "That for scolding and railing it was more apt than any other language." He was subsequently knighted, became sheriff and alderman, and was appointed a commissioner of the Treasury towards the end of the reign of Charles II. At the Revolution he lost this post, and retired into private life. b. 1641; d. 1691.

NORTH, Roger, an English biographer, the sixth son of Dudley, Lord North, and was educated for the profession of the law. He wrote a work against Kennet's "Complete History," in which he defended Charles II. He also left, incomplete, a "Memoir of Music;" but the work by which he is best known is a series of biographies of his brothers, including the lives of the two preceding. He is stated by some to have been attorney-general under James II. b. about 1650; d. 1733.

NORTH, Frederic, Earl of Guildford, a statesman, better known as Lord North, who, in 1769, succeeded Mr. Townshend as chancellor of the Exchequer; and in 1770 was made first lord of the Treasury, in which office he continued till the close of the American war. For his supposed deference to the wishes of George III. in prolonging that struggle, he became exceedingly unpopular, but it is now known that he wished to make peace long before the termination of the contest. He was a man of uniformly good temper, a fair orator, and in his private life was thoroughly amiable. Before his death, he became blind. b. 1732; d. 1792.

NORTHBROOKE, Lord. (See Baring, Sir F. T.)

NORTHCOLE, James, north-kote, an English artist and writer on art, who repaired to London in his 25th year to study painting under Sir Joshua Reynolds. He subsequently commenced as a painter of portraits, and was on the high road to fame and fortune, when his ambitious mind led him to abandon that line of art, and to visit Italy for the purpose of studying the ancient masters of historical painting. After spending five years in that artistic land, he returned to London, and soon became extensively employed by Roydell and others to make drawings for the "Shakspeare Gallery," a series of prints illustrative of the writings of the poet. During the subsequent half-century, he lived almost solitary in his studio in Argyle Street, London, where he produced several fine and very excellent works of art, and also occupied himself with literary composition. In 1813 he published "Memoirs of Sir Joshua Reynolds, with an Analysis of his Discourses." In his 82nd year he gave to the public his "One Hundred Fables, Original and Selected," which were embellished with a number of excellent woodcuts, engraved after his designs. His "Life of Titian" subsequently followed; but this work is said to have been written by Hazlitt from his notes and conversations. Two of his best paintings were "The Murder of the Princes in the Tower," and "Hubert and Arthur." Northcote was never married, but had an affectionate companion in a maiden sister. b. at Plymouth, 1746; d. 1831.

NORTHCOKE, Sir Stafford Henry, took a first-class in classics at Oxford, and was subsequently called to the bar in 1847. He was returned for Dudley in 1855, and sat for Stamford from 1858 to 1866, and for North Devon from May, 1866, to the present time. He was president of the Board of Trade under Lord Derby in June, 1866, and secretary of state for India in March, 1867, which office he retained until the fall of the Disraeli ministry in 1868. b. 1818.

NORTON, Thomas, nor'-ton, an English writer of the 16th century, a native of Bedfordshire, who assisted Thomas Sackville in his tragedy of "Ferrex and Porrex." d. 1584.

NORTON, Hon. Caroline Elizabeth Sarah, a modern English poetess, was one of the three daughters of Thomas Sheridan, son of the celebrated Richard Brinsley Sheridan. Her father dying while she was still very young, her care devolved upon her mother, who gave her a high education. At the age of nineteen she became the wife of the Hon. George Chapple Norton, the barrister and police-magistrate, a union which proved an unhappy one. In 1829 she commenced her career of authorship by publishing anonymously the "Sorrows of Rosalie," a tale, and other poems. In the following year she achieved the greatest success as a poetess, with the production of her "Undying One," and other poems, which the "Quarterly Review" declared to be worthy of Lord Byron. The "Child of the Islands," "Aunt Carry's Ballads for Children," and "Stuart of Dunleath," a novel, were her subsequent works. In 1854 her warm sympathies with the social wrongs of her sex found expression in a work entitled "English Laws for Women in the 19th Century." This work was privately printed; but a very large circulation was obtained for a later effort of the same character, which was named "A Letter to the Queen on Lord Chancellor Cranworth's Marriage and Divorce Bill." In 1862, she published a poem entitled "The Lady of Garaye," which met with considerable public favour. b. 1808.

NORWOOD, Richard, nor'-wood, an English mathematician, who in 1635 measured an arc of the meridian between London and York. Nothing authentic is known of his personal history. His most important works were, "Fortification, or Military Architecture," "The Seaman's Practice," "Trigonometry, or the Doctrine of Triangles," and "Application of the Doctrine of Triangles."

NOSTRADAMUS, Michael, nos-tra-dai'-mus, a notorious French astrologer and physician, who studied medicine at Montpellier, where he took his doctor's degree. Having rendered some eminent service to the inhabitants of Aix when the city was visited by the plague, he received an annual pension from the town during many years. In 1555 he published his prophecies, which, though very obscure and absurd, gained the author a considerable reputation. These were followed by several others, the whole making one volume folio, in barbarous verse. Nostradamus was honoured with marks of distinction by persons of the highest rank, particularly Charles IX., king of France. b. at St. Rémy, 1503; d. 1566.

NORR, John, M. D., not, an elegant poet and oriental scholar, who, after studying surgery at Birmingham, visited Paris for further instruction, and subsequently went out to China as surgeon in an East Indianman. In 1785 he graduated in medicine, and soon after attended the duchess of Devonshire to the Continent, in quality of family physician; in 1793 he returned to England, and settled at Clifton, where he continued to reside till his death. Among his numerous writings are, "Alonzo, a poetic Tale," "Poems from the Italian of Petrarch," the "Cynthia" of Propertius; some elegant translations of the odes of Hafiz; an edition of "Catullus," with the Latin text rendered into English verse, and classical notes; "The Odes of Horace;" a translation of the "Basia" of Johannes Secundus; "Sappho, after a Greek Romance," &c. He also published some professional works, viz. "A Chemical Dissertation on the Springs of Pisa and Asciano," "A Nosological Companion to the London Pharmacopœia," &c. b. 1751; d. 1826.

NORR, Major-General Sir William, one of the heroes in the late Affghan war, was the son of an extensive mail-contractor and proprietor of the Ivy-bush hotel at Carmarthen. He went out to India as a cadet in 1809; but although his talents and gallantry were well known, he was unpatronized, and no event occurring to accelerate his progress, he only obtained a majority after a service of twenty-six years. His health at that time being seriously affected, he returned on leave of absence to England, visited his native place, and there purchased an interesting seat called "Job's Well," where he resided a few years. The failure of the Calcutta bank, in which he had invested the greater part of his savings, having rendered it necessary for him to resume his active duties as a soldier, he, when fifty years of age, returned to India to enter upon a fresh career. A recent writer on Indian affairs thus speaks of General Nott:—"To relate 'the moving accidents by flood and field' through which this gallant officer led the troops under his command, would be to write a volume, for which the materials are alike interesting and abundant. By an exercise of skill, judgment, and valour, not often equalled, and probably never surpassed, he extricated our army from difficulties by which they were surrounded in Afghanistan, and succeeded in conveying them, and several captives whom he released, across the frontier, bringing them with perfect safety, and without any loss of honour, within the limits of her majesty's dominions. The victories which he achieved in Candahar closed the Affghan war, and elicited the gratitude of the whole empire; even the duke of Wellington departed from that peculiar severity of taste which marked his generally sparing eulogium, and with a favour unusual to him, he—the best possible judge of Indian warfare—pronounced in a manner the most emphatic his unqualified admiration of General Nott. The Crown, of course, lost no time in conferring on him the highest military distinction—that of a knight grand cross of the Bath; neither was Parliament slow to give expression to the national sentiment." It is said that when General Nott was proceeding to the rescue of the prisoners in the hands of Akbar Khan, among whom was the heroic Lady Sale, wife of the gallant Sir Robert Sale, Akbar ordered that lady to write to Sir William, forbidding his further approach, upon which she despatched the laconic but expressive mandate, "Advance, Nott." The general understood the equivocal; went forward, and delivered the lady and her companions. The Afghan war concluded, Sir William returned to England, the hardships of a military life and the insalubrity of an Indian climate rendering repose necessary for the restoration of his shattered health; but he had not long regained his native town when the unfavourable symptoms increased, and he died on the 1st of January, 1845. b. 1752.

NOTTINGHAM, Henrice Finch, Earl of, nottingham, an eminent English lawyer and statesman, who, after completing his education at the university of Oxford, was entered of the Middle Temple, and was subsequently called to the bar. He became solicitor-general under Charles II., at the Restoration, and took a prominent part in the prosecution of the regicides, an account of which he published in 1660, in a curious work, entitled "An Exact and Impartial Account of the Indictment, Arraignment, Trial, and Judgment (according to law) of Twenty-nine Regicides." In the following year he was chosen to represent the university of Oxford in Parliament, and was created a baronet. In 1667 he had a principal share in impeaching the earl of Clarendon, and was, three years later, appointed attorney-general. In 1673 he received the great seal of England as lord-keeper; in 1675 he became lord chancellor of England. At the trial of Viscount Stafford, in 1680, he presided as lord high steward, and delivered judgment against that nobleman in a speech of great eloquence. In the following year he was created earl of Nottingham. Besides the work above mentioned, he published several others, the chief of which were "An Argument on the Claim of the Crown to Pardon on Impeachment," "Speech at the Sentence of William, Viscount Stafford," and "Reports of Cases in the High Court of Chancery." Dryden, in his "Absalom and Achitophel," alludes to the earl of Nottingham under the name of Amri:—

"To whom the double blessing does belong, With Moses' inspiration, Aaron's tongue."
The earl's reputation is that of a sound lawyer and upright judge. b. 1621; d. 1682.

NOTTINGHAM, Daniel Finch, Earl of, was eldest son of the preceding, and finished his education at Christ Church, Oxford. In 1680 he was appointed first lord of the Admiralty, and, in 1682, succeeded his father as earl of Nottingham. He opposed the arbitrary measures of James II.; but though he was an adherent of the party of the Prince of Orange, he was against his taking possession of the throne, and strenuously supported the continuation in favour of the regency. However, William offered him the post of lord chancellor, which he declined; but he was, for a short time, secretary of state. On the death of Queen Anne, he was one of the lords justices for the administration of affairs, and, soon after, was made president of the council; but, in 1716, he was dismissed, on account of a speech which he made in the behalf of the Scottish lords condemned for high treason. In 1729 he became earl of Winchelsea, on the death of John, fifth earl, in virtue of his descent from Elizabeth, daughter and heiress of Sir Thomas Henrice, and wife of Sir Moyle Finch, his great-grandfather. He was an able speaker and a man of learning, as appears from his reply to Whiston on the Trinity, for which he received the thanks of the University of Oxford and of the Bishop and clergy of London. b. 1730.

NOTTINGHAM, Charles Howard, Earl of. (See HOWARD, Charles, Lord Howard.)

NOUE, Francis de la, noo, surnamed the Arm of Iron, a celebrated French soldier, who distinguished himself in the wars of Italy, and, upon his return to France, espoused the cause of the Huguenots, then in arms against the Catholics. He took Orleans in 1567, and two years afterwards, signalized himself at the battle of Jarnac; subsequently to which he made himself master of Fontenoy; on which occasion he lost his left arm. He had another made of iron; whence his surname. He was at the siege of Rochelle, and, in 1578, entered the service of the States-general in the Low Countries, where he took Count Egmont prisoner; but was himself taken in 1580, and did not regain his liberty till five years afterwards. In the time of the League he served on the royal side, and was killed by a musket-shot at the siege of Lamballe. He was the author of a "Discourse, Political and Military," which was first printed in 1587. b. in Brittany, 1531; killed, 1591.

NOURJEHAN, noor-ji-han', wife of Jehanghir, the Mogul emperor, was the daughter of a Tartar general, and became sultana in 1611. After the death of her husband, she retired to the palace of Lahore. Her tomb is accounted one of the most beautiful edifices in the city. To Nourjehan has been attributed the discovery of the essence of roses. b. 1585; d. 1645.

NOUR-EDDIN MAHMOUD, noor-ed-din or noor-ed-deen', sultan of Egypt, was the son of Amad-eddin Zenghi. When his father was slain by his own eunuchs at the siege of Jabbar, in 1146, Nour-eddin and his brother Seif-eddin divided his possessions between them. The former obtained the sovereignty of Aleppo, and, by his prudence, became one of the most powerful princes of the East. He distinguished himself against the Christians in the time of the crusades; he defeated Jocelyn de Courtenay, count of Edessa, and Raymond, prince of Antioch, whose head was sent as a trophy to the caliph of Bagdad; after which he made himself master of Egypt. To the qualities of a great warrior he added the virtues of a liberal prince: he patronized the arts and sciences, founded cities and establishments of learning, hospitals, caravanserais, and mosques. To him has been ascribed the first employment of pigeons to carry messages. b. 1117; d. at Damascus, 1173.

NOUR-EDDIN ALI, was the eldest of the seventeen sons of the celebrated Salah-eddin (the Saladin of Christian writers). At his father's death, Damascus, Southern Syria, and Palestine fell to his share; but he was soon afterwards deprived of his kingdom by his brother and uncle. After vainly attempting to recover Damascus from his uncle, he retired to Samosata, where he died. a. 1170; d. 1224.

Nour-eddin

NOUR-EDDIN ARSLAN SHAH, prince of Mesopotamia, succeeded his father in 1193. He was a just and liberal monarch, and, in a great degree, restored the declining power of his dynasty. b. 1210.

NOUR-EDDIN ALI, second sultan of the Tartar Mamelukes in Egypt, ascended the throne upon the assassination of his father Ihek, in 1257. He reigned only two years, being deposed by the emir Kotuz, in 1259.

NOVALIS, Frederick von Hardenberg, usually called nov-al'-is, a celebrated German writer, was the son of Baron von Hardenberg, and was sent in 1790 to the university of Jena; after which he passed to that of Leipsic, in 1792. About the year 1797 he published his "Hymns to Night;" and between that time and the year 1801, when his premature death took place, he produced a number of works displaying a boundless imagination and a love of the mystical and supernatural such as is not to be equalled in any other writer. In 1800 he gave to the world his wild and grotesque romance entitled "Heinrich von Ofterdingen." A complete collection of his writings was made by his friends Tieck and Frederick Schlegel. b. at Mansfeld, 1772; d. 1801.

NOVATIAN, no-vai'-shu-an, a pagan philosopher, who embraced Christianity, was admitted to holy orders, and became the first anti-pope. Being of an ambitious character, he contrived to get himself ordained bishop, which was done in an irregular manner in Italy. He then endeavoured to get possession of the see of Rome, after the death of Pope Cornelius, but was opposed by Lucius. Novatian promulgated the doctrine, that it was sinful to admit persons who had once lapsed into idolatry to communion; a practice then universal in the Church. This produced a schism, in which Novatian had many partisans, who called themselves Catharites, or pure. By others, however, they were named Novatians. To the above error they added many others, particularly those of the Montanists. There are several works by Novatian extant, an English edition of which was published by Jackson at London in 1728. Lived in the 3rd century of the Christian era.

NOVIKOFF, Nicholas Ivanovitch, nov'-i-kof, a Russian gentleman, who devoted his life to the production of standard editions of the authors of his country. He has been called the "Franklin of Russia." The first circulating library in Moscow was established by him; and, among other important works, he produced a "Library of Old Russian Authors," in 30 vols. b. 1744; d. 1818.

NOWELL, Alexander, now'-el, an English divine, was installed prebendary of Westminster in 1551, and in the first Parliament of Queen Mary was returned for Looe, in Cornwall; but the election was declared void on account of his being a dignitary of the church. Soon after this he went to Strasburg, where he remained till the accession of Elizabeth, when he returned; and in 1560 was made dean of St. Paul's. He was prolocutor of the convocation in which the articles of religion were settled; and he published his "Greater" and "Lesser" Catechisms, in Latin, the latter being an abridgment of the former. He is also supposed to have written the chief part of the Church Catechism. Besides founding a free grammar school at Middleton, he endowed thirteen fellowships in Brasenose College. b. about 1507; d. 1602.

NOX, William, noi, an eminent English lawyer, who, at the beginning of the reign of Charles I., sat in parliament, and opposed the court; but, being made attorney-general in 1631, he gave his adherence to the most unpopular measures, particularly that of ship-money, which was of his proposing. He wrote a "Treatise of the Grounds and Maxims of the Laws of England," the "Complete Lawyer," and other works. b. in Cornwall about 1577; d. 1634.

NUCENT, Thomas, nu'-jent, a native of Ireland, but settled in London, where he occupied himself in writing and compiling a variety of publications, among which are, "A French and English Dictionary," which has been often reprinted; "Travels through Germany;" "Observations on Italy and its Inhabitants;" "The Tour of Europe;" "Condillac's Essay on the Origin of Human Knowledge;" "Hennault's History of France," &c. d. 1772.

NUCENT, Robert Craggs, Earl of, a nobleman of poetical celebrity, descended from the Nugents of Carlanstown, Westmeath, was chosen M.P. for St. Mawes, Cornwall, in 1741; was appointed comptroller of the household of Frederick Prince of Wales in 1747; became a lord of the treasury in 1754; one of the vice-treasurers of Ireland in 1759; and a lord of trade in 1766. He was created baron Nugent and viscount Clare in 1767, and earl Nugent in 1778. His second wife was Anne, sister of secretary Craggs, by whom he obtained a large fortune. He had originally been a Roman Catholic, but became a Protestant, and wrote an admirable ode on his conversion, which, although full of excellent reasoning, did not permanently convince the author, for he died a member of the church he had exposed so severely. Indeed, as Horace Walpole says, he was of a somewhat unstable character, and "one of those men of parts whose dawn was the brightest moment of a long life; and who, though possessed of different talents, employed them in depreciating his own fame, and in destroying all opinion of his judgment, except in raising himself to honours." His poems were published anonymously by Dodsley in 1739; he also published "Verses to the Queen," and "Faith," a poem. d. 1793.

NUMA POMPILIUS, nu'-ma pom-pil'-i-us, according to tradition, second king of Rome. He is said to have introduced among his subjects religious festivals and a code of laws. Supposed to have lived in the 8th and 7th centuries B.C., reigning from 715 to 672.

NUMENIUS, nu-me'-ni-us, a Greek Christian philosopher of the 2nd century, was a native of Apamea, in Syria, and followed the opinions of Pythagoras and Plato; but he charged the latter philosopher with having stolen, without acknowledgment, from the works of the Jewish legislator, and therefore called him "the Greek Moses." Fragments of Numenius are extant.

NUMEZ, Fernan de Guzman, noo'-na'iz, a knight and commander of the order of Santiago, in the 16th century, was born at Valladolid, studied at Bologna, and on his return home was appointed Greek professor at the university of Alcalá, by its founder, Cardinal Ximenes, who also employed him on his celebrated Polyglott. He afterwards removed to Salamanca, where he was also appointed Greek professor. His writings chiefly consist of annotations on the works of Seneca, Pliny, and other classic authors. b. about 1470; d. 1553.

NUMS, Philip, nt, a nonconformist divine, who in 1620 became curate of St. Michael's, Cornhill. Becoming a puritan, he went to Holland, and did not return till the civil wars, when he was chosen a member of the assembly of divines. He was a zealous champion of the Solemn League and Covenant; he wrote several sermons and tracts. Butler thus whimsically alludes to this person in his "Hudibras,"—"Philip Nye's thanksgiving beard." b. about 1596; d. 1672.

NYSTEN, Peter Hubert, nis'-ten, an eminent French physician and writer on medicine, who was charged with several important undertakings by the government of his country, and was appointed physician to the hospital for children. His most important works were "New Dictionary of Medicine, Surgery, and Botany," and "Experiments upon the Muscular Organs of Mankind and upon those of Warm-blooded Animals." b. 1771; d. 1818.

OATES, Titus, oats, notorious as the originator of the Popish Plot, was the son of a ribbon-weaver, who afterwards became successively an anabaptist minister and a clergyman of the Church of England, was educated at Merchant Taylors school, and at Cambridge. Having taken orders, Titus became chaplain to the duke of Norfolk, who also gave him a small living: he next was appointed chaplain of a king's ship, from which he was expelled with disgrace, and then became a Roman Catholic, lived some time at the college of St. Omer, and joined the Jesuits, by whom, however, he was soon dismissed. He then returned to London, and re-joined the church; but, not meeting with the preferment he desired, embarked in the trade of political calumniator in which he was so marvellously successful. In September, 1678, he began his disclosures concerning the so-called Popish Plot, by making a statement to Sir Edmundbury Godfrey, a magistrate, which he afterwards repeated before the Privy Council and the House of Commons, to the effect, "That the pope felt himself entitled to the possession of England and Ireland on account of the heresy of the people and prince, and he accordingly assumed the sovereignty of these kingdoms; that power to govern them had been delegated to the society of Jesuits, who, through their general, had issued commissions, appointing various persons whom they could trust to the chief offices of state, both civil and military." All the dignities of the church he alleged to be newly appropriated, many of them to Spaniards and other foreigners; that persons had been hired to shoot the king, and that Sir George Wakeham, the queen's physician, had engaged to poison his majesty, the queen herself being privy to the design. He further alleged that a rising of the Roman Catholics was to take place in various parts of the country, and that every means would be adopted for the extirpation of the Protestants. This statement was confirmed by two persons, named Tongue and Bedloe, and upon it several Jesuits, and men of distinction, suffered death or imprisonment, among them being Lord Stafford, who was executed. The system of denouncing persons of position being profitable, was continued for a considerable time. Oates obtained a pension of £1200 a year, and a residence at Whitehall, which he continued to enjoy till the death of Charles II. On the accession of James II., however, matters changed. Oates was tried for perjury, convicted, the whole story he had concocted being exposed, and he was condemned to be imprisoned for life, and to be whipped, and stand in the pillory four times; but from William III. he managed to obtain a pension of £400 a year. Under Oates's name there were published "A Narrative of the Popish Plot," "The Merchandize of the Whore of Rome," and "Eikon Basilike; or, a Picture of the late King James." b. about 1619; d. 1705.

OBERLIN, Jeremiah James, o'-bair-lin, a learned writer in German and French, who, in 1763, was appointed librarian at Strasburg, and afterwards became professor of logic and metaphysics in the university of that city. He wrote a number of curious and learned works; such as "Dissertation upon the Troubadours of Alsace," "Essays on the Dialects of Lorraine," also several valuable elementary manuals in German, and produced good editions of Horace, Tacitus, and other classic authors. b. at Strasburg, 1735; d. at the same city, 1806.

OBERLIN, John Frederick, a celebrated philanthropist, who, after completing his studies at the university of Strasburg, entered into orders as a Lutheran divine. In 1767 he became pastor of Waldbach, in the Ban-de-la-Roche, then a sterile district, lying on the west slope of a range of mountains to the east of the Vosges. He found the inhabitants of that district in a condition bordering upon barbarism; but succeeded in causing them to make a road to Strasburg, to build a bridge across the river Bruche, at Rothau; to plant fruit-trees, and to convert large tracts of pasture into arable land. He also built school-houses, where reading, writing, arithmetic, and the principles of agriculture were taught; and, at his own expense, printed books and an almanac for the use of the people. Straw-plaiting, knitting, dyeing, and other employments were organized by him. During fifty-nine years he laboured at these noble schemes, creating industry and happiness where he had found ignorance and barbarism. He received the decoration of the Legion of Honour from Louis XVIII., and, in 1818, was voted the gold medal of the Royal and Central Agricultural Society of Paris. After his death, the inhabitants followed the remains of their "dear father" to the grave; and all the Protestant, and several of the Roman Catholic clergy of the district, joined in the funeral procession. b. at Strasburg, 1710; d. 1826.

OBSEQUENS, Julius, ob'-se-que-ens, a Latin author, who wrote a work entitled "De Prodigis," which contained a record of all the wonderful events which took place from the foundation of Rome to the time of Augustus. The following is an example of the contents:—"It rained milk on the Græcostasis. At Croton, a flock of sheep, with a dog and three shepherds, were killed by lightning. At Saturn, a calf with two heads was born. There was an uproar in the city, owing to Græchus proposing his laws." A portion of the book was lost, but was supplied, in an imitation of the author's manner, by Lycostones, in the 16th century. Obsequens is supposed to have lived about the commencement of the 4th century.

OCCAM, or OCKHAM, William, ok'-am, an English scholastic divine of the 14th century,

OF BIOGRAPHY.

Ocariz

was the disciple of Duns Scotus, and obtained the name of the "Invincible Doctor." Occam was a member of the order of Cordeliers, the general of which, Michael de Cezena, appointed him to write against Pope John XXII., who excommunicated both; but Occam was protected by the king of France. After being absolved, he fell a second time under the displeasure of the papal see, and was fortunate enough to find another protector in the emperor of Germany. Fabricius, in his "Bibliotheca Latina," gives a list of Occam's writings. p. at Munich, 1347.

OCARIZ, or OCARTZ, Don Joseph, o-kar'-eth, Chevalier d', a Spanish diplomatist, who distinguished himself by his attempts to prevent the execution of Louis XVI. In 1788 he was sent to Paris as consul-general; and in 1792 was chargé-d'affaires. He addressed two letters to the National Convention, offering the mediation of his sovereign to engage Prussia and Austria to terminate the war with France, on condition of the suspension of judgment against the king. He afterwards occupied other diplomatic situations, and died on his way to Constantinople, in 1805.

OCCELLUS, o-sel'-lus, a Greek philosopher, of the school of Pythagoras, called, on account of his birthplace, Lucanus. He wrote a book on kings and kingdoms, of which only some fragments remain; but his work "On the Nature of the Universe" is extant, and was translated into English by Thomas Taylor, in 1831. The date of his existence is unascertained.

OCHELOM, Sir David, ok'-ter-lo-ne, an officer in the East India Company's service, at the age of 18 went to India as a cadet, and rose to the rank of major-general, which he attained in 1814. In the Nepaulese war he distinguished himself by a series of skilful and successful operations, and was rewarded with the order of the Bath, the dignity of baronet, and a pension of £1000 per annum. B. at Boston, Massachusetts, 1758; p. 1825.

OCKLEY, Simon, ok'-le, a learned English divine, was educated at Queen's College, Cambridge, where he took the degree of B.D., and where, in 1711, he was chosen professor of Arabic. His most important works were, "The History of the present Jews throughout the World," "Introduction to the Study of the Oriental Languages," and "The History of the Saracens." B. at Exeter, 1678; p. 1720.

O'CONNELL, Daniel, o-kon'-nel, called in his day "the Liberator of Ireland" and the "Great Agitator," was the son of a small landed proprietor in Ireland, by whom he was sent to France to be educated for the Roman Catholic priesthood. After residing at both St. Omer's and Douay, he, at the outbreak of the French Revolution, fled from St. Omer's, and reached the shores of England in safety. In 1794 he commenced the study of the law, and four years afterwards was called to the bar. His first public speech was against the proposed union of the Irish and English legislatures, and was delivered at Dublin, in which city he obtained a fair amount of legal practice. But, about the year 1803, he began to take a leading part in urging the claims of the Catholics upon the attention of the English legislature. An account of his labours was furnished by himself, in a letter to Lord Shaftesbury. "For more than twenty years before the passing of the Emancipation Bill, the burden of the cause was thrown upon me. I had to arrange the meetings, to prepare resolutions, to furnish replies to the correspondence, to rouse the torpid, to animate the lukewarm, to control the violent and inflammatory, to avoid the shoals and breakers of the law." In 1828 he was elected to represent the county of Clare in Parliament, but was not allowed to take his seat, in consequence of the civil disabilities under which he, as a Roman Catholic, laboured. The passing of the Emancipation Bill, however, enabled him to enter the House of Commons in the following year. From this period until the year 1843 he laboured incessantly at the great movement he had inaugurated, and which was called by himself "the Repeal of the Union." In the last-named year, however, he was convicted of sedition, sentenced to pay a fine of £2000, and to be imprisoned for a year. An appeal to the House of Lords subsequently led to the reversal of this judgment; but, from that time, his power to excite the political sympathies of his countrymen appeared greatly to decline. Exhausted by his long labours, he went to Italy, in 1847, to recruit his shattered health, but expired at Genoa, on his way to Rome. B. in Kerry, Ireland, 1775; p. 1847.

O'CONNOR, o-kon'-nor, the name of a dynasty of Irish kings who reigned in Connaught before the conquest of Ireland by the English. The most remarkable of the name was Torlogh O'Connor, who sought to gain power over the whole island, but found a formidable rival in Murrough O'Brien. Roderick O'Connor reigned about 1171, when Henry II. of England invaded the country. He protested against that act; but Pope Adrian IV. conceded to the English king the possession of his territory.

O'CONNOR, Charles, a learned Catholic divine and antiquary, who was many years librarian to the duke of Buckingham at Stowe. He wrote "Columbanus's Letters," a "Narrative of the most interesting Events in Modern Irish History," and made a collection of ancient Irish chronicles. p. 1833.

OCTAVIA, ok'-tai'-a, daughter of Caius Octavius, and sister to Augustus, was first married to Claudius Marcellus, by whom she had two children, before his death, which happened a little after the war of Persia. She then married Antony, to whom she behaved with the greatest respect. His conduct, however, was so base as greatly to inflame the people against him. But the loss of her son, Marcellus, an accomplished youth, gave her the deepest concern. p. 10 B.C.

OCTAVIA, daughter of Claudius and Messalina, was betrothed to Lucius Silanus; but that marriage was broken off by the intrigues of Agrippina, and Octavia married Nero, who afterwards divorced her, and, at the instigation of Poppæa, sent her to a small island, where she was put to death, at the age of 20 years, in 62.

OCTAVIUS, a name common to many eminent Romans, but of celebrity inferior to Octavius Cæsar, afterwards Augustus, second Roman emperor. (See AUGUSTUS.)

ODENATUS, od'-e-nat'-tus, king of Palmyra, who made war against Sapor, king of Persia, with great success. The emperor Gallienus associated Odenatus with him in the empire, and conferred the title of Augusta on his wife, Zenobia. Odenatus was assassinated, with his son Herodian, by Meonius, a relation, on whom they had conferred many favours, A.D. 267.

Odescalchi

Zenobia then assumed the government, under the title of queen of the East.

ODESCALCHI, Marco Antonio, o'-dais-kal'-ke, an Italian philanthropist, cousin of Pope Innocent XI., who offered him high preferments in the church, but Odescalchi preferred devoting his life and his ample fortune to works of benevolence. He converted his palace at Rome into an hospital for the reception of the needy outcasts of all nations and creeds without distinction. He fitted up 1000 beds, and fed and clothed all who stood in need of such assistance. Whenever he met with a person who appeared forlorn and in poverty, he would stop, question him, and convey him to his mansion. He left the whole of his property for the support of the hospital he had founded. p. 1670.—Thomas Odescalchi, a relative of the above, was also an eminent philanthropist, and founded the school of St. Michael de Ripegrande, for the education of poor children, which he liberally endowed. p. 1692.

ODEVAERE, Josephus Dionysius, o-de-vair, one of the most distinguished historical painters of modern times, was brought up in the college of the Augustines, at Bruges, and was designed for mercantile pursuits, but evincing a decided predilection for art, was placed in the Bruges Academy, where he obtained the first prize for drawing, in 1796. He subsequently went to Paris, studied under David, and other French masters, obtained the grand prize for painting of the French Academy, in 1804, for a picture of the death of Phocion, and was presented to the emperor. He then resided for eight years in Rome, and sent a picture of the "Coronation of Charlemagne" to the French Academy, which was much admired. In 1814 he established himself at Brussels, and there painted his pictures of the "Peace of Utrecht," and "the Battle of Waterloo, at the moment the Prince of Orange was wounded," for the king of the Netherlands, by whom he had been appointed court painter. A variety of other works followed, among which are, "Bramante introducing Raffaele to Pope Julius II.," "Triumph of Cimabue," "The Battle of Nieuport," "The Establishment of the Power of the House of Orange," "David in his Studio," "The Inauguration of the King at Brussels in 1815," &c., besides several Scripture pieces for churches in the Netherlands. b. at Bruges, 1778; d. 1830.

ODINERON, Walter, od'-ing-ton, called Walter of Evesham, was a monk of that monastery in Worcestershire, and lived in the reign of Henry III. He was an astronomer, mathematician, and musician; on each of which subjects he wrote treatises. "De Motibus Planetarum et de Mutatione Aëris," is attributed to him; and Dr. Burney observes of his treatise entitled "Of the Speculation of Music," which is preserved in the library of Benet College, Cambridge, "that if all other musical tracts, from the time of Boethius to Franco and John Cotton were lost, with this MS. our knowledge would not be much diminished."

ODOACER, o-d'-a-ser, a celebrated Gothic chieftain, who originally served among the barbarian auxiliaries which the emperors of the West had employed to protect Italy. He revolted against the emperor Augustulus, whom he seized at Ravenna and put into prison. Odoacer then proclaimed himself king of Italy, but rejected the imperial titles of Cæsar and

Oehlenschläger

Augustus. He allotted to his Gothic followers a third of the conquered territories; but nevertheless governed Italy with the greatest moderation. In 499, Theodoric, king of the Ostrogoths, marched from the Danube, and in several battles defeated Odoacer, who was compelled to shut himself up in Ravenna, where he held out for more than two years. In 493 he surrendered to Theodoric, who promised to spare his life, but slew him at a banquet shortly afterwards.

O'DONNELL, Leopold, o-don'-nel, Duke of Tetuan, a modern Spanish marshal and statesman, who early entered the military service, and reached the grade of colonel in his 25th year. Upon the death of Ferdinand VII., in 1833, he espoused the cause of Maria-Christina, and was a faithful adherent to her fortunes until her forced abdication of the regency in 1838, when he took refuge in France. In the meanwhile, he had been created general and count of Lucena. After the fall of Espartero, in 1843, General O'Donnell was enabled to return to Spain, and was soon afterwards sent to Cuba, as captain-general; in which capacity he acquired a very large fortune, and was, it is said, far from hostile to the slave-trade. After his return to Spain, he was appointed director-general of infantry. Being implicated in a conspiracy at the beginning of the year 1854, he was compelled to secrete himself; but soon afterwards left his retreat, and put himself at the head of the insurrection, which resulted in a change of ministry, Espartero being commanded to compose a new one, in which O'Donnell held the department of war. After being eclipsed during some time by Narvaez, he at length succeeded in effecting his rival's overthrow, and returned to power in 1853. In the following year he was appointed commander-in-chief of the Spanish forces sent against Morocco. In that command he was successful; he caused the enemy to capitulate, and to cede to Spain some territory, as well as to pay a large sum. Upon his return to Spain, he was created duke of Tetuan. p. 1805; p. Nov. 5, 1867.

ECOLAMPADIUS, John, e-ko-lam-pai'-di-us, a celebrated German divine, who, in 1522, became professor of divinity and principal preacher at Bale, where he exposed the abuses of the Romish church, and exhorted the Swiss to embrace the principles of the Reformation; but, in 1525, he joined with Zwingli against Luther in the dispute relative to the sacrament, and wrote a learned treatise on the subject. Mosheim calls him one of the most learned men of his century, and it was owing to his exertions that the Reformation took root in Switzerland. b. at Weinsberg, Franconia, 1482; d. 1531.

OCUMENTIUS, e-ku-men'-ni-us, an ancient Greek commentator upon the Scriptures, was bishop of Trica, in Thessaly, in the 10th century.

OEHLENSCHLAGER, Adam Gottlob, e(n)-len'-shlag-er, the greatest Scandinavian poet, whose father was German and his mother Danish. His father rose to be steward of the king of Denmark's palace at Fredericksburg, where the early youth of the future poet was spent. He was educated for a mercantile career, and at the age of 16 was placed in a counting-house; but being seized with a desire to appear on the stage, he obtained an engagement in the theatre of Copenhagen. He soon quitted this pursuit, however, and devoted himself to the law, which was in turn deserted for literature. In 1801 he witnessed the attack made by Lord Nelson upon the Danish fleet. "That contest," he afterwards wrote, "inspired the Danes with a taste for poetry, as the battles of Marathon and Salamis did the Greeks, and the destruction of the Spanish armada the English in the time of Elizabeth." In the following year he produced a small volume of poems, which instantly brought him fame. His next work was a play, entitled "Aladdin," which was founded upon the celebrated story in the "Arabian Nights," and which placed him at the head of the poets of his country. In 1805 he was granted a travelling stipend by the government; whereupon he went to Germany, and while in that country composed some of his best works, in the native language of his father. He witnessed the battles of Auerstadt and Jena before leaving Germany, immediately after which he repaired to Paris, where he wrote his finest work, the tragedy of "Palmatoke." He next visited Rome, where he wrote his "Correggio," and became the friend of Thorwaldsen. In 1810 he returned to his native country, and received a cordial reception at the hands of the king and queen of Denmark. Shortly afterwards he married, and during the succeeding five years continued to produce plays, but inferior to those he had already composed. In 1816 he again went to Germany and France, but returned after an absence of twelve months. Eleven years subsequently he lost his father, who, he writes, "was vain of his son; but, like a sensible father, he never allowed me to see it; only sometimes I detected the feeling when he had been reading my poems." In the same year he went to Sweden, where he was received with enthusiasm and was crowned with a laurel wreath. He paid a third visit to Paris in 1844, was invited to court by Louis Philippe, and there met king Leopold, who requested him to come to Brussels. When he had attained his 70th birthday, a grand fête was held in his honour, but in the beginning of the following year he breathed his last. Like Thorwaldsen, Oehlenschläger was honoured with a public funeral, at which the nobility and all the most distinguished persons in Copenhagen attended. One of his fellow-countrymen writes of the poet,—"Small as Denmark is, it must be counted among the great powers of the world of art and poetry, since it has a sculptor to show like Thorwaldsen, whom only the great masters of antiquity can be considered to rival; and a poet like Oehlenschläger, who can worthily take the fourth seat by the side of the three heroes of poetry, Shakespeare, Byron, and Göthe." Besides poems, operas, and comedies, he wrote twenty-four tragedies, nineteen of which are founded upon Scandinavian subjects. He also translated one play of Shakespeare's—the "Midsummer Night's Dream," and one of Otway's—"The Orphan," into Danish. The poet left behind his Autobiography, in the pages of which he evinces a high admiration for his own talents; but those best acquainted with his works state that this was grounded upon sterling merit. Some of his poetical works have been translated into English by Theodore Martin. b. at Vesterbro, Copenhagen, 1779; d. at Copenhagen, 1850.

OERSTED, Anders Sandøe, er-sted, a modern Danish statesman, who received his education at the University of Copenhagen, and afterwards applied himself to the study of jurisprudence, which he subsequently adopted as his profession. Passing through various distinguished positions, he at length attained the office of prime minister of Denmark; but in that capacity displayed a strong tendency towards reactionary measures, which excited so much ill-feeling in the kingdom, that he was driven from power in 1855. The members of the Oersted ministry were next impeached, and brought to trial before the supreme tribunal, but were in the end acquitted. In his retirement, the former minister occupied himself with composing a history of his own career, which was published in 1856, and contained important matter towards the history of modern Denmark. a. in the island of Langeland, 1778; d. 1860.

OERSTED, Anders Sandøe, a modern Danish traveller, and nephew of the preceding, who travelled in the West Indies and South America. He published some works on natural history, and contributed to the Journal of the Royal Geographical Society of London an account of a survey made for a canal through the river Sapea to the port of Salinas, or Bolenos, in Costa Rica. b. at Rudkjøbing, 1816.

OERSTED, Hans Christian, a celebrated Danish philosopher, who originated the science of electro-magnetism, which paved the way for the invention of the electric telegraph. He was brother of the minister with whom he studied at the university of Copenhagen. In 1800 he became doctor of philosophy in that institution. After spending two years in Holland and France, he returned to Copenhagen, and there composed a treatise upon the identity of the forces of magnetism, electricity, and galvanism, which relationship had until then been only surmised. He proved that "there is always a magnetic circulation round the electric conductor, and that the electric current, in accordance with a certain law, always exercises determined and similar impressions on the direction of the magnetic needle, even when it does not pass through, but near the needle." The Royal Society of London presented him with its Copley medal, and the French Institute granted him 3000 francs for this demonstration. In 1809 he published his "Manual of Mechanical Physics," in which several chemical discoveries were announced. The years 1822-23 were passed by him in France and England. In 1846 he was present at a meeting of the British Association at Southampton. Like our own Faraday, he was particularly happy in his delivery of occasional lectures to non-scientific people; and a collection of his discourses was translated into English, and published under the title of "The Soul in Nature." He was likewise a regular contributor to newspapers and magazines, and sought, on every occasion, to popularize the facts of natural science in his country. He was the recipient of several honours, including the Legion of Honour, and of the Prussian order which rewards the distinguished in arts and sciences. a. at Rudkjøbing, 1777; d. near Copenhagen, 1851.

OFFA, of-fa, a king of Mercia, succeeded Ethelbald in 755. He murdered Ethelbert, king of the East Angles, and took possession of his kingdom. To make atonement for his guilt, he gave the tenth of his goods to the Church, made a journey to Rome, instituted the tax called Peter-pence, and built the monastery at St. Alban's. d. 794.

THE DICTIONARY

Offenbach

Olaus

James, of-fen-bak, a modern French musical composer, who made himself famous for his light and sparkling "musical buffooneries," which his troupe performed in Paris, London, and in Germany. The best of these charming little trifles are,—"Les Deux Aveugles," "Une Nuit Blanche," "La Belle Hélène," "La Grande Duchesse de Gerolstein," and "Robinson Crusoe." B. in France, 1822.

Ogilby, or Ogilvy, John, o-gil-be, a voluminous writer, was originally a dancing-master, and employed in the family of the earl of Strafford, as teacher to his children. That nobleman appointed him deputy master of the revels at Dublin, where Ogilby erected a theatre. Upon the outbreak of the Irish rebellion, he returned to England, and settled in Cambridge, where he applied himself to the study of the learned languages. He was appointed, in 1661, to conduct the ceremonies at the king's coronation, and of which he published a pompous account in folio, with plates. Ogilby translated Virgil and Homer into English verse; and published a magnificent Bible, with prints, for which he was remunerated by the House of Lords. He was appointed geographical printer to the king. The other works of this industrious writer were an account of Japan, an Atlas, the Fables of Æsop, in verse, and a "Book of Roads." This last went through numerous editions; but was afterwards superseded by Patterson. B. near Edinburgh, 1600; p. 1676.

Ogilvie, John, o-gil-ve, a pious Scotch divine and poet, received his education at the university of Aberdeen; and was for more than half a century minister of Midmar in Aberdeenshire. Among his works are, "Britannia," an epic poem; "Philosophical and Critical Observations on Composition," "An Examination of the Evidence of Prophecy," and "Sermons." B. 1733 p. 1814.

Oglethorpe, James Edward, o-gil-thorp, an English general, who entered the army as ensign in 1710. He afterwards served under Prince Eugene, to whom he became secretary and aide-de-camp. In 1732 he went to America, where he helped to found the colony of Georgia, and erected the town of Savannah. He again visited that country, and made an unsuccessful attempt upon Augustine, in Florida, belonging to the Spaniards. For this he was tried, on his return to England, and acquitted. In 1745, he was promoted to the rank of major-general, and was sent to the north against the rebels, but did not overtake them; for which he was again brought to a court-martial, and honourably acquitted. B. in London, about 1688; p. 1788.

O'Halloran, Sylvester, o-hal'-or-an, an Irish antiquary, was brought up and practised as a surgeon, and wrote several medical treatises. In 1772 he published an "Introduction to the Study of the History and Antiquities of Ireland," which was followed by a "General History of Ireland." B. 1728; p. 1807.

O'Hara, Kane, o-hal'-ra, an Irish dramatist, who had much musical taste, and a felicitous talent for adapting verses to old airs. His chief productions are "Midas," which was extremely well received, and is still a favourite; "The Golden Pippin," "The Two Misers," "April Day," and "Tom Thumb." p. 1829.

Ojeda, Alphonso, o-hai'-da, a Spanish navigator, who accompanied Columbus in his second expedition, and commanded the flotilla sent out sci, in 1499, and which led to the last-mentioned individual giving his name to the New World. After experiencing a great many varieties of adventure and of changes of fortune, Ojeda died in poverty about 1512.

O'Keefe, John, o-keef, a dramatist, who was destined for the profession of painting, but who, having written a play which was placed upon the stage at Dublin when he was only 18, abandoned the studio for the theatre. He remained in Ireland as an actor and occasional writer for the stage until his 34th year; after which he repaired to London, where he resided for the rest of his life, entirely devoting himself to the composition of plays. Among the best of these productions may be mentioned, "Wild Oats," "The Highland Reel," and "The Agreeable Surprise." Towards the close of his life he published "Recollections of the Life of John O'Keefe," but had ceased to write for the stage, being almost blind. B. 1747; p. 1833.

Oken, Lawrence, o'-ken, an eminent Swiss naturalist, who studied medicine and natural history at Göttingen, and was afterwards professor of medicine in the universities of Jena and Zurich. The aim of all his writings might be summarily said to be an attempt at applying the principles of transcendental philosophy to the facts of natural history. He produced his first work in 1802, with the title, "Elements of Natural Philosophy, the Theory of the Senses, and the Classification of Animals founded thereon." Oken was the first to suggest, in his work on generation, published in 1805, that all animals are built up of vesicles or cells. His remarkable essay "On the Signification of the Bones of the Skull," attracted little attention at the time of its publication, but was nevertheless the forerunner of the investigations of Carus, Geoffroy St. Hilaire, and Professor Owen upon the laws of homology in the vertebrate skeleton. In 1847, his work called "Elements of Physio-Philosophy" was translated into English; and although, like the other efforts of this writer, it is beyond the grasp of the general reader, it would seem to be of the deepest importance to the man of science. B. at Offen-berg, 1779; p. at Zurich, 1861.

Oktaï, ok'-tai, grand khan of the Mongol Tartars, was third son and successor of Genghis Khan. He overran the north of China and Armenia; made himself master of Moscow, of Poland, and of Hungary; and for a time threatened the whole of the Christian world. His chief minister was the sage Yo-lin-tchou-tsai, who ruled with justice, but vainly attempted to subdue the ferocity of the Mongols. Oktaï p. 1241.

OLAUS I. (or III.), o'-la-us, king of Denmark, perished in 814, in combat with the Franks.

OLAUS II. (or IV.) king of Denmark, succeeded his brother, Canute IV., in 1086. A terrible famine desolated the kingdom during his reign. p. 1095.

OLAUS I., king of Norway, ascended the throne in 994. He introduced Christianity in Norway, Iceland, and Greenland. Having been defeated by the kings of Sweden and Denmark, in 1000, he threw himself into the sea.

OLAUS II., king of Norway, energetically propagated Christianity throughout his dominions; but was driven from his throne by Canute in 1030. Two years afterwards, he was killed by the people of Drontheim.

OLAUS III., surnamed the Pacific, reigned, in conjunction with his brother Magnus II., from 1066 until 1068, and singly for nine years afterwards.

OLAUS IV., son of Magnus III., reigned, in conjunction with his two brothers, between the years 1103 and 1116.

OLAUS V., son of Hacon VIII., succeeded to the throne of Denmark in 1376, and to that of Norway in 1380. After his death, in 1387, his mother, Margaret, daughter of Waldemar III., united the three kingdoms of Denmark, Sweden, and Norway under one crown.

OLAUS MAGNUS, a Swedish author of the 16th century, who held the office of archdeacon in the Swedish church until the principles of the Reformation began to spread in the country; upon which he retired to Rome, where he spent the remainder of his life. He was the author of a work upon the antiquities of the North of Europe, which was published at Rome in 1555. b. about 1509; d. at Rome, about 1570.

OLAVIDES, Paul Anthony Joseph, Count de, o-la-vel'-dais, a celebrated Spanish statesman, who became secretary to the Count de Aranda, whom he accompanied in his embassy to France. On his return to Spain, Charles III. created him count, and appointed him superintendent-general of Seville. He afterwards undertook the great work of fertilizing the Sierra Morena, or Black Mountains, a desert region barren to the very summit; but, by his perseverance, aided by the exertions of a colony of Germans, which he encouraged to settle in the place, he succeeded in his task. Notwithstanding the benefits which this worthy man had rendered his country, he was accused of heresy by the Inquisition, was disgraced, and thrown into prison. He escaped to France, where he wrote a book entitled "The Triumph of the Gospel," which was the means of procuring his recall to his native land. b. at Lima, 1725; d. in Andalusia, 1803.

OLBERS, Henry William Matthias, ol'-bairs, an eminent German astronomer, who was educated for the profession of medicine, in the exercise of which, combined with astronomical pursuits, his whole life was passed. He discovered two planets, — Pallas in 1802, and Vesta in 1807. In 1815 he discovered a comet, and subsequently wrote a treatise on the probability that a comet may come into collision with the earth. Among other useful works of his was a proposal to revise the nomenclature of the stars, and a reformation of the constellations. Dr. Olbers was fellow of the Royal Society of London, corresponding member of several learned societies of Europe, and knight of the Prussian orders of the Red Eagle and Dannebrog. b. near Bremen, 1758; d. at Bremen, 1840.

OLDCASTLE, Sir John, Lord Cobham, old'-kas-el, the first martyr and first author among the English nobility. In the reign of Henry IV., he commanded the English army in France, where he compelled the duke of Orleans to raise the siege of Paris. He was an adherent of Wickliffe's doctrines, which he propagated with such zeal, that, in the reign of Henry V., he was sent to the Tower, whence he made his escape, but was taken in Wales. Being conveyed to London, he was condemned to be hanged and burnt; which sentence was executed with circumstances of peculiar barbarity, in St. Giles's Fields, London, in 1417. He wrote "Twelve Conclusions, addressed to the Parliament of England," a number of religious tracts and discourses, and edited the works of Wickliffe. b. in the 14th century.

OLDFIELD, Ann, old'-feeld, a celebrated English actress. Sir John Vanbrugh recommended her to Mr. Rich, patentee of the King's theatre, by whom she was engaged. Her abilities were of the highest order, and her person extremely pleasing. Her remains were interred in Westminster Abbey. b. in London, 1683; d. 1730.

OLDHAM, John, old'-dam, an English poet, who shortly after taking a B.A. degree at Oxford, became usher in the free school at Croydon. Some of his poems being read by the earls of Rochester and Dorset, they procured him the appointment of tutor to the grandsons of Sir Edward Thurlow, and afterwards to a son of Dr. Lower. He subsequently resided with the earl of Kingston. His works were printed in Bell's annotated edition of the English poets. b. at Shipton, Gloucestershire, 1653; d. 1683.

OLDMIXON, John, old'-mix-on, an English political writer and historian. He was a violent opponent of the Stuart family, in the reign of Queen Anne, and attacked the best writers of that period with so much violence, that Pope gave him a conspicuous place in the "Dunciad." He became collector of the customs at Bridgewater. He wrote "A History of England during the Reigns of the House of Stuart," and some other works. b. 1673; d. in London, 1742.

OLDYS, William, ol'-dis, an historical and biographical writer, was the natural son of Dr. Oldys, chancellor of Lincoln and advocate of the court of Admiralty. Of the early life and education of the son little is known; but he is said to have squandered the patrimony which had been left him. He afterwards became keeper of Lord Oxford's library, of which he formed the catalogue when that collection was sold by Osborne, the bookseller. He was also employed to superintend the publication of the Harleian Miscellany. The only public post he ever had was that of Norroy king-at-arms. His principal works are, "Life of Sir Walter Raleigh," some articles in the "General Historical Dictionary," those in the "Biographia Britannica" signed "G," "The British Librarian," "Life of Richard Carew the Antiquary," a translation of Camden's "Britannia," and a number of treatises upon medical and bibliographical subjects. b. 1687; d. 1761.

OLIPHANT, Lawrence, ol'-i-fant, a modern English writer and traveller, who was educated in England, but went out while very young to Ceylon, where his father was chief justice. He afterwards visited Nepal with Jung Bahadur, and, upon his return, published his observations, in a work entitled "A Journey to Katmandu." He next studied law at Edinburgh and at Lincoln's Inn, and was called to the bar. In 1852 he went to Russia, and, among other provinces of that country, visited the Crimea. In the following year he produced an account of his wanderings, in a work entitled "The Russian Shores of the Black Sea." His next occupation was as private secretary to the earl of Elgin, whom he accompanied to Canada; and when the earl was appointed lord high commissioner to China, Mr. Oliphant again acted in his former capacity. Towards the close of the year 1860 he gave to the public an account of his observations in China and Japan, in his "Narrative of the Earl of Elgin's Mission in the Years 1857-8-9." His latest work was entitled:

Olivares

"Patriots and Filibusters; or, Incidents of Political and Exploratory Travel." B. 1832.

OLIVARES, Gaspar Guzman, Count de, o-li-vá-raís, an eminent Spanish statesman, who, during twenty-two years, administered the affairs of the kingdom under the feeble Philip IV. He first became prime minister in the room of the Duke de Uceda, and began his political career by several useful measures; but his haughty conduct at length occasioned a revolt in Catalonia, and the separation of Portugal from Spain. Olivares was disgraced, and died of chagrin at Toro, 1645. B. at Rome, about 1597.

OLIVER of MALMESBURY, ol-i-ver, a Benedictine monk of the 11th century, chiefly memorable as the first Englishman who attempted to travel through the aerial regions. He is said to have been well skilled in mechanics; but in attempting to fly from a lofty tower, with wings of his own construction fastened to his hands and feet, he fell, and broke both his legs.

OLIVER, Isaac, an English painter in the reign of Queen Elizabeth. He painted historical pieces, but chiefly miniatures in a style of exquisite beauty. B. 1556; d. 1617.

OLIVER, Peter, eldest son of the preceding, was an historical and miniature painter, and even surpassed his father. Nineteen of his historical paintings were in the collections of Charles I. and James II. Some of these are still kept in Kensington Palace. B. 1601; d. about 1664.

OLIVER, George, D.D., a catholic divine and ecclesiastical historian, was educated at Sedgley Park and Stonyhurst College, and in 1807 was appointed superintendent of the Roman Catholic mission at Exeter, where he resided for fifty-five years, universally esteemed and respected. He paid great attention to the history and antiquities of the district, and wrote "Historical Collections relating to the Monasteries of Devon" "History of Exeter," "Monasticon Diocesis Exoniensis," "Lives of the Bishops, and History of the Cathedral of Exeter," and "Civil History of Exeter," the last of which he left in MS. B. 1781; d. 1861.

OLIVET, Joseph Thonker d', ol'-e-vat, a learned French critic, who studied under his uncle, a Jesuit, and acquired a great knowledge of the learned languages. In 1740 he published an excellent edition of the works of Cicero, in 9 vols., with notes. Besides the above, he produced a French translation of Cicero's treatise on the "Nature of the Gods," a translation of some of the orations of Demosthenes and Cicero, a "History of the French Academy," of which he was a member, and some other works. B. near Salins, 1682; d. at Paris, 1768.

OLIVETAN, Pierre Robert, o-le-vai-tā, a French reformer, and the first to translate the Scriptures directly from the Hebrew and Greek into French. It is said by some writers that Calvin revised the whole work, which was published at Neuchâtel in 1535, and is called the Bible of the Sword, from the emblem adopted by the printer. Olivetan was banished from Geneva, and went to Rome, where he died in 1539, as is supposed of poison. B. near the end of the 15th century.

OLIVEIRA, Francis Xavier de, ol-i-vai-ra, a Portuguese knight, who became a convert to the Protestant faith; and in order to enjoy his opinions unmolested, went to England in 1748. He published "Memoirs" of his travels, "Familiar Letters," "A Pathetic Discourse to his Countrymen on the Earthquake at Lisbon in 1756," "The Chevalier d'Oliveira burnt in Effigy as an Heretic, why and wherefore?" &c.; and left at his death a great number of MSS., including "Oliveiriana, or Memoirs, Historical and Literary," 27 vols. 4to. B. 1702; d. 1783.

Omar

OLIVIER, Claude Matthew, o-lic-i-ai, advocate of the Parliament of Aix, was one of the founders of the academy of Marseilles, and distinguished himself by his eloquence. His works are,—"History of Philip of Macedon, Father of Alexander the Great," "Memoir on the Succour given to the Romans by the People of Marseilles, in the Second Punic War and in that of the Gauls," and several historical dissertations of less importance. B. 1701; d. 1736.

OLIVIER, Guillaume Antoine, a French entomologist, who was in 1792 sent upon a mission to Persia, and returned at the end of six years with a rich collection of specimens of natural history. He became a member of the French Institute in 1800, and published, among other works, "Dictionary of the Natural History of Insects," in which he was assisted by Latreille and Godard. B. 1756; d. 1814.

OLYMPIA, o-lym'-pi-a, daughter of Neoptolemus, king of Epirus, was the wife of Philip, king of Macedon, and mother of Alexander the Great. She was repudiated by Philip about 336 B.C. Olympia, in revenge, is presumed to have instigated the murder of Philip. After the death of Alexander, she seized the government of Macedonia, and put to death a number of the leading personages of the kingdom; but Cassander at length besieged her in Pydna, and obliged her to surrender. Cassander promised to spare her life, but she was soon afterwards killed by the relatives of those whom she had put to death. D. 315 B.C.

OMAR I., o'-mar, second caliph of the Mussulmans after Abu Bekr, made himself master of Syria, and, in 637, besieged and took Jerusalem, after a defence of several months. In the following year he invaded Persia, and led a powerful army into Egypt, the conquest of which country was completed by the taking of Alexandria in 640. Upon that occasion Omar ordered the famous library founded in that city by Ptolemy Philadelphus to be burnt; for, said he, "if the books of the Greeks agree with the book of God (the Koran), they are superfluous, and need not be preserved; and if they disagree, they are pernicious, and ought to be destroyed." The manuscripts were thereupon given to the four thousand public baths of the city for fuel. This inflexible Mussulman conqueror is said to have taken 36,000 cities or castles, destroyed 4000 temples or churches, and founded or endowed 1400 mosques. He instituted the era of the Hejira, or Flight of Mohammed, from which the Mussulmans compute their years. It commenced with the 16th of July, 622 A.D. His memory is held in the highest veneration by the Sunnite, or orthodox Mohammedans; but the Shiites, or partisans of Ali, regard him as a usurper. Omar was assassinated by a Persian slave, 644.

OMAR II., the eighth caliph of the Omniades, was great-grandson of the preceding, and succeeded Solymán in 717. He laid siege to Constantinople, but was forced to raise it, on account of a violent storm, which destroyed a great part of his fleet. Poisoned, 720.

OMAR, Ben Affas, a Mohammedan monarch of Estremadura and Portugal, succeeded his brother in 1082. He assisted the Mussulman king of Toledo against Alphonso VII., but was defeated by the latter. In 1086 he, with other Moorish monarchs, sought the aid of the sultan of Morocco, who joined his troops with the Mohammedans, and fought a sanguinary battle with Alphonso near Badajoz. The Africans subsequently turned against Omar, who was assassinated by them in 1090.

O'MEARA, Barry Edward, o-meer'-a, the confidential medical attendant of the emperor Napoleon in his last days, and author of "A Voice from St. Helena," was originally a surgeon in the British navy, and happened to be on board the Bellerophon in that capacity, on the 7th of August, 1815, when Napoleon went on board. Napoleon having observed Dr. O'Meara's skill in attending to some of the crew, and his knowledge of Italian, made overtures to him, on being transferred to the Northumberland, to accompany him to St. Helena as surgeon, his own not being able to go with him. Having obtained Admiral Keith's permission, Dr. O'Meara assented, and remained with the ex-emperor till July, 1818, when he was recalled and deprived of his rank. He was latterly an active partisan of Daniel O'Connell. b. in Ireland about 1778; d. 1836.

OMER or OMAR PASHA, o'-mer, a modern Turkish commander, whose former name was Michael Lattas. He, being a native of Austrian Croatia, served at first as cadet in an Austrian regiment, from which he became assistant surveyor of roads and bridges in his native district. About his twenty-eighth year he suddenly left the Austrian service, and went into the Turkish province of Bosnia, where he embraced the Mohammedan faith, adopted the name of Omer, and obtained employment as tutor in the family of a Turkish merchant. Subsequently visiting Constantinople with his pupils, he became master in the new military school. In a short time he attracted the notice of Khosroo Pasha, the minister of war, who attached him to his staff, and afterwards bestowed upon him the hand of his ward, a rich heiress. After serving in the Danubian Principalities, and as aide-de-camp to General Chrzanowski, Khosroo Pasha obtained for him the appointment of writing-master to Abd-ul-Medjid, the late sultan. In 1839 he served with the Turkish army sent against Ibrahim Pasha, and, three years later, was appointed military commandant of a district in Syria. When the Russians passed into Wallachia, in 1848, to act against the insurgent Hungarians, Omer Pasha went to the same place as commander of a Turkish army of observation. His next services were against the disaffected beys of Bosnia, whom he reduced to submission to the authority of the sultan. At the commencement of the year 1853, he marched at the head of 20,000 men against the mountaineers of Montenegro, who were almost completely subjugated by him. In 1853 he was appointed to the command-in-chief of the Turkish army in Bulgaria. Prince Gortschakoff, in command of a powerful Russian army, was upon the opposite bank of the Danube; and against him Omer Pasha executed a series of strategic manœuvres, which completely baffled the skill of the former general. At Calafat, Oltenitza, and Citate, the pasha repulsed the Russians; and finally, at Silistria, he inflicted on them so heavy a defeat that they were compelled to evacuate the Danubian Principalities. In 1855 he went to the Crimea, having a Turkish and Egyptian army under his command, but remained inactive until he was sent into Georgia.—Teflis, the capital of which, he threatened; but the surrender of Kars forced him to beat a retreat to Redoubt Kaleh. In 1862 he was again employed against the Montenegrins, and, in 1867, he was sent to Candia to put down the revolt in that island. b. at Vlsaki, Austrian Croatia, 1801.

ONDAATJE, Michael Jurgen, ou-dô'-che, sprung from a Tamul family of high rank at Arcot, was, like his father, physician to the king of Tanjore, who sent him to Ceylon, at the request of the first Dutch governor of the island, to cure his wife of a dangerous ailment. His success made the governor his friend, and procured him a medical appointment at Colombo, where he settled. He was afterwards converted to Christianity, and became the founder of a Ceylonese family, many of whose members have become distinguished in the learned professions. b. at Arcot; d. 1714.

ONDAATJE, Peter Philip Jurgen Quint, A.L.M., Ph.D., I.U.D., the fifth in descent from the preceding, is unparalleled as being the only native of the East who figures in the history of Europe. Though a native of Ceylon, he was sent to Holland, of which Ceylon was then a dependency, to be educated for the ministry; but the condition of the country induced him to take an active part in politics, and he became an eminent patriotic reformer,—the Hampden of Holland—defending her liberties with his tongue, pen, and sword. The revolution of 1797 drove him into exile, but that of 1795 restored him to render important services to his country by land and sea. In 1811, Napoleon I. made him a member of the Imperial Council of Prizes. Returning to Holland in 1814, under the auspices of William I., he was named a member of the High Court of Justice of the Netherlands, India, where he died 1818. b. at Ceylon, 1758.—A brief memoir of Dr. Quint Ondaatje will be found in the "Leisure Hour" for March, 1867.

OPIE, John, o'-pe, an eminent English painter, who was the son of a poor carpenter in Cornwall. His talents for design were evinced at an early age, but were discouraged by his father, who intended him for his own trade. Despite every obstacle, he continued to improve himself in drawing, and soon attracted great notice in his native district, in consequence of his spirited likenesses of the people who sat to him for their portraits. Dr. John Wolcot, or "Peter Pindar," as he is known in literature, hearing of young Opie's skill, took him into his service, and afterwards provided him with the means of repairing to London. In 1781 Wolcot obtained an introduction for his protégé to Sir Joshua Reynolds, who tendered the self-taught artist some valuable advice. Through Wolcot's management, the Cornish lad became a favourite with the fashionable world of the metropolis, and crowds of wealthy sitters came to his studio. Opie's style, however, was more vigorous and truthful than graceful and flattering, and in time his popularity as a fashionable portrait-painter declined. Meanwhile he had entered into a matrimonial alliance with the daughter of a rich pawnbroker; but the match proving an unhappy one, a divorce was obtained. His second wife, Miss Alderson, was a lady of refinement and intellect, and it was to her judicious advice that the painter's subsequent improvement both as an artist and as a member of polite society was owing. Although he did not abandon portrait-painting, Opie now devoted much of his time to historical subjects. His best works in the latter walk of art were "The Murder of James I. of Scotland," "The Death of David Rizzio," "Juliet in the Garden," and "Hubert and Arthur." Late in life Opie had qualified himself sufficiently, in a literary sense, to aspire to the appointment of professor of painting to the Royal Academy. That post, after a first failure, he ultimately obtained; but his death occurring soon afterwards, he only found time to deliver four lectures, which were published, and are still considered valuable to the student of art. His remains were honoured by being placed near the tomb of Sir Joshua Reynolds in St. Paul's cathedral. b. at Truro, Cornwall, 1761; d. 1807.

Opie, Mrs. Amelia, an English novelist, and wife of the preceding. The daughter of a physician in easy circumstances, carefully educated, handsome, and with considerable musical acquirements, she was the distinguished member of a very refined social circle when she became acquainted with Mr. Opie. After her marriage with the artist, in 1798, she made her first appearance as an author, by producing a moral tale entitled "Father and Daughter." In 1802 she published a sweet and graceful volume of poems, and two years later gave to the public her novel of "Adelaide Mowbray." Her "Simple Tales" were her next production, and after her husband's death she wrote "The Warrior's Return, and other Poems," "Tales of the Heart," and "Valentine's Eve." In 1825 she became a member of the Society of Friends, and subsequently visited France, Belgium, and Switzerland, giving her travelling impressions in "Tait's Magazine" and elsewhere. b. at Norwich, 1769; d. at the same city, 1853.

Opitz, Martin, op-pitz, the father of modern German poetry, distinguished himself by his poems in Latin and German. His chief works were a poem upon the campaigns of Ladislaus IV. against Russia; a version, in German, of the Psalms; and "Consolation in the Disasters of War." b. at Bunzlau, Silesia, 1597; d. at Dantzic, 1639.

OPPIAN, op-pi-an, a Greek poet and grammarian, who wrote three poems on hawking, hunting, and fishing, entitled "Ixeutica," "Cynnetica," and "Halientica," which are extant. A portion of Oppian's works was translated into English by Mower, 1736. Flourished probably towards the close of the 2nd century.

ORANGE, William I., Prince of, or-anj, surnamed William the Silent, succeeded at the age of eleven years to the family possessions and titles in Luxembourg, Brabant, Flanders, Holland, and to the French principality of Orange, in Provence; whence the most celebrated title of the family was derived. His father had embraced the doctrines of the Reformation, and he was at first educated in the same principles; but, at an early age, the emperor Charles V. summoned him to his court, and had him brought up in the Roman Catholic faith. "At fifteen," says Mr. Motley, in his "History of the Rise of the Dutch Republic," "William was the intimate—almost confidential, friend of the emperor, who prized himself above all other gifts, on his power of reading and of using men. The youth was so constant an attendant upon his imperial chief, that, even when interviews with the highest personages, and upon the gravest affairs, were taking place, Charles would never suffer him to be considered superfluous or intrusive. There seemed to be no secrets which the emperor held too high for the comprehension or discretion of his page." The emperor appointed his discreet favourite to the highest posts, as he advanced in years; the command-in-chief of the army upon the French frontier, a post eagerly sought after by many distinguished generals, was given to William of Orange when he had attained his 21st year. When Charles V. abdicated his throne to his son Philip II., he leaned upon William's shoulder; and to him, also, the retiring monarch intrusted the mission of delivering the imperial crown to his brother Ferdinand, at Augsburg. With the gloomy Philip, however, William was soon to become an object of suspicion and hatred. At the peace of Cateau-Cambresis, in 1559, William was one of the Spanish hostages sent to the court of France; and, while hunting with Henry II. in the forest of Vincennes, the French monarch revealed to him the scheme which had been recently formed by Philip and himself, to "extirpate Protestantism by a general extirpation of Protestants." The prince, says Mr. Motley, "although horror-struck and indignant at the royal revelations, held his peace and kept his countenance. The king was not aware that, in opening this delicate negotiation to Alva's colleague and Philip's plenipotentiary, he had given a warning of incalculable value to the man who had been born to resist the machinations of Philip and of Alva. William of Orange earned the surname of the Silent, from the manner in which he received these communications of Henry, without revealing to the monarch, by word or look, the enormous blunder he had committed." Henceforth, William resolved to thwart the designs of Philip, by means of secret intrigues with the leaders of the Protestant party in the Netherlands. During the feeble administration of Margaret of Parma, William, as stadtholder of Holland, Zealand, and Utrecht, and as member of the Flemish council of state, was secretly but indefatigably employed in undermining the tyrannical schemes of the Spanish bigot; but, upon the nomination of the sanguinary Alva to the government of the Netherlands, the prince, to avoid the tragical fate of his fellow-nobles, Counts Egmont and Horn, retired from the Netherlands to his estate of Nassau. In 1568 the wrongs of the people whom he loved awoke the prince into fierce action. He left his retreat, and became the champion of the cause of liberty and Protestantism in the Netherlands. In the ensuing struggles, notwithstanding that his raw and ill-disciplined levies of French and German Protestants were often beaten in the field by the veteran Spanish infantry, then the best soldiers in the world, the statesman-ship of the prince counterbalanced every disaster, enabled him to achieve a victory over his foes, and finally led to the famous Union of Utrecht, in 1578, by which seven Protestant provinces—Holland, Zealand, Utrecht, Friesland, Groningen, Overijssel, and Guelderland—became the nucleus and the lasting basis of the Dutch republic. The Spanish monarch thereupon set a price upon the head of William of Orange. This temptation, combined with fanatical zeal, produced several attempts upon his life, from the first of which (that of John Jauregny, in 1582) he escaped with a wound: the fatal shot was, however, dealt to him two years afterwards, by one Balthazar Gerard, a Burgundian. The tragic incident is thus narrated by Motley, in his excellent history:—"The prince came from the dining-room, and began leisurely to ascend. He had only reached the second stair, when a man emerged from the sunken arch, and, standing within a foot or two of him, discharged a pistol full at his heart. Three balls entered his body, one of which, passing quite through him, struck with violence against the wall beyond. The prince exclaimed in French, as he felt the wound, 'Oh my God, have mercy upon my soul! Oh my God, have mercy upon this poor people.'" The historian concludes his account of the life and labours of the prince as follows:—"He went through life, bearing the load of a people's sorrows upon his shoulders, with a smiling face. Their name was the last word upon his lips, save the simple affirmation with which the soldier, who had been battling for the right all his lifetime, commended his soul, in dying, 'to his great captain, Christ.' The people were grateful and affectionate, for they trusted the character of their 'father William;' and not all the clouds which calumny could collect ever dimmed, to their eyes, the radiance of that lofty mind, to which they were accustomed, in their darkest calamities, to look for light. As long as he lived, he was the guiding star of a brave nation; and when he died, the little children cried in the streets." Thus, in his "History of the Rise of the Dutch Republic," Motley writes of one of the noblest men that ever lived.—William left three sons, two of whom, Maurice and Frederick Henry, became, in succession, stadtholders of the United Provinces. (See MAURICE OF NASSAU.) William, Prince of Orange, was born at Mollenburg, in Nassau, 1533; assassinated at Delft, 1584.

ORDERICUS VITALIS, or-der'-i-cus vi-tal'-is, an old Norman-English chronicler, was the son of a Frenchman who came to England with William the Conqueror, and was born in England, but sent, at the age of 10 years, to be educated in Normandy, where he subsequently gave himself up to a life of study, and only visited his native country once. In 1107 he was ordained a priest. His work, which is entitled "The Ecclesiastical History of England and Normandy," commences with the birth of Christ, and is brought down to the year 1141. The first two books are of little value; but of the third, in which he treats of the lives of the first Norman kings of England, M. Guizot says, "No work contains so much and such valuable information on the history of the 11th and 12th centuries; on the political state, both civil and religious, of society in the west of Europe; and on the manners of the times, whether feudal, monastic, or popular." B. near Shrewsbury, 1075; D. about 1142.

O'REILLY, Alexander, Count, o-ré'-le, a native of Ireland, who entered the Spanish army, where he obtained the favour of Charles III., and was raised to the highest military rank for his services. B. 1735; D. 1794. This is the person referred to by Byron in "Don Juan," when he makes Julia say—

"General Count O'Reilly, Who took Algiers, declares I used him vilely."

O'REILLY, Andrew, Count, a general of cavalry in the Austrian service, was a native of Ireland. He was a brave and skilful officer, and filled in succession all the military grades in the Austrian army, with the exception of that of field-marshal. At the battle of Austerlitz the remnant of the Austrian army was preserved from destruction by his courage and skill; and when, in 1809, he held the post of governor of Vienna, the difficult task of making an honourable capitulation with the French emperor devolved upon him. B. 1740; D. 1832.

ORELLANA, Francis, o-rail'-ya'-na, a Spaniard, who was the first to traverse the continent of South America. In 1521 he accompanied Pizarro to Peru; but, learning that gold, silver, and spices were to be found beyond the mountains east of Quito, he joined an expedition formed by Gonzales, brother of Pizarro, and set forth in the direction indicated. After experiencing great fatigue, the Spaniards reached Zumaco, and then explored the Napo for 200 leagues. Orellana, with a few followers, was next sent forward with provisions in a boat; upon which, instead of returning to Gonzales, he pursued his course down the river; and, after encountering the main stream, continued his navigation of it for upwards of 1000 leagues, until he reached the sea. After he returned to Spain, he gave such marvellous accounts of the countries he had passed through, and of the women dwelling upon the banks of the river (whence the name Amazon was given to it), that he obtained numerous followers, and set forth upon a second expedition, but died at the mouth of the Amazon, 1549.

ORFFYREUS, or ORPHYREUS, Ernest Bessler, surnamed, or-fi-re'-us, was in turn soldier in the service of Austria, quack doctor, mechanic, seeker of treasures, and councillor of commerce at Cassel. In 1719 he proclaimed that he had discovered the perpetual motion, and exhibited at different places in Saxony a machine which he declared successfully solved the problem. But upon the unfavourable report of the philosopher Gravesande, he destroyed his piece of mechanism. He next turned his attention to religion, and endeavoured to found an establishment to be called Gottesburg, "City of God," where Christians, Turks, and Jews were to live in peace and amity. He wrote a treatise entitled "Perpetual Motion Solved," and another upon the union of all religious sects. B. in Alsace, 1680; D. at Furstenburg, 1745.

ORFILA, Matthew, or'-fe-la, a distinguished French physician and toxicologist, was the son of an opulent merchant, and was himself destined for a commercial career; but having been shipwrecked in his 15th year, he resolved to devote himself to the study of medicine. In 1807, so highly had he distinguished himself in the science of chemistry, that he was sent, at the expense of the Spanish government, to complete his studies at Paris. The war which ensued between France and Spain prevented his return to the latter country, and he settled at Paris, where, in 1811, he became a French citizen by letters of naturalization. In 1813 he published his "Treatise on Poisons," which placed him among the best French chemists, and led to his election as member of the Academy of Medicine, and correspondent of the Institute. In 1819 he became professor of medical jurisprudence; and in 1831 he was elected dean of the faculty of medicine. His most important works were "Elements of Chemistry, applied to Medicine and the Arts," "Treatise on Legal Medicine," in four volumes, which is the greatest work on medical jurisprudence extant, and "Lectures upon Legal Medicine." He likewise wrote, in conjunction with M. Leseur, a work "On the Appearances presented by Dead Bodies after Exhumation, Drowning, Suffocation in Cesspools, or by Gases." Orfila may be said to have founded the science of toxicology: in medical jurisprudence he was, while living, the most profound professor in Europe. b. in the island of Minorca, 1787; d. 1853.

ORFORD, Earl of. (See WALPOLE, Horace.)

ORIGEN, or'-i-jen, a Platonic philosopher, who was the disciple and friend of Porphyry. He wrote a panegyric on the emperor Gallienus. Flourished in the 2nd century of the Christian era.—There was an Egyptian of this name, who said that marriage was the invention of the devil.

ORIGEN, a father of the Church. From his earliest youth he devoted himself to the study of the Scriptures, and, by his exhortations, his father was encouraged to endure martyrdom. Origen taught grammar for his own support and that of his mother and brothers. In his 18th year, Demetrius, bishop of Alexandria, appointed him catechist of his church. His austerities were very great, and when only 17 he was with difficulty restrained from offering himself for martyrdom, to become qualified for the kingdom of heaven. From Alexandria he went to Rome, where he began his famous "Hexapla," or the Bible in different languages. At the command of his bishop, he returned to Alexandria, and was ordained. Soon after this he began his "Commentaries on the Scriptures;" but Demetrius, who was envious of his reputation, persecuted him with violence, and in a council, assembled in 231, it was decreed that Origen should desist from preaching, and quit the city. Upon this, he went to Caesarea, where he was well received by the bishop, and permitted to preach, which gave additional offence to his persecutors, who excommunicated him. Though he was thus treated at home, he met with the greatest respect wherever he went. He was consulted in several episcopal synods; but in the persecution under Decius, in 250, he was thrown into prison, and put to the torture. On his release, he applied himself to his ministerial labours and to writing. His most valuable works were editions of the Hebrew text and Greek version of the Old Testament, and "Stromata" and "Principia," wherein he commented upon the doctrines of Christianity, and illustrated them by a reference to the opinions of philosophers. Jerome styles Origen "a man of immortal genius, who understood logic, geometry, arithmetic, music, grammar, rhetoric, and all the secrets of the philosophers; so that he was resorted to by many students of secular literature, whom he received chiefly that he might employ the opportunity of instructing them in the faith of Christ." The allegorical mode employed by Origen in interpreting the Holy Scriptures led, however, to violent controversies in the 4th century; but many of his errors are said to be owing to heretical interpolations of his writings. The best edition of his works is that of De la Rue, Paris, 1733. b. in Egypt, about 185 A.D.; d., probably at Tyre, about 254.

Orleans

three times originated in the younger son of the king, and has given two monarchs to France.

ORLEANS, Louis, first duke of, was the second son of Charles V., and was assassinated at Paris by his cousin John, duke of Burgundy, in 1407.

ORLEANS, Charles, second duke of, was eldest son of the preceding, during whose lifetime he bore the title of duke of Angoulême. In 1415 he was made prisoner at the battle of Agincourt, and remained in England during twenty-five years. Upon his return to France, he undertook the conquest of the duchy of Milan, to which he conceived himself entitled in right of his mother, Valentina Visconti. He was, however, unsuccessful in this enterprise. During his captivity in England, he wrote some poetical pieces, which have been printed. b. 1391; d. 1465.

ORLEANS, Louis, third duke of. (See LOUIS XII. of France.)

ORLEANS, Jean Baptiste Gaston, first and only duke of the second branch of, was the younger son of Henry IV. and brother of Louis XIII. He passed his life in intrigues and conspiracies, and formed several plots for the assassination of Cardinal Richelieu, but barely saved himself by denouncing, at different times, his accomplices, the duke of Montmorency, the marquis of Cinq-Mars, and François de Thou, son of the celebrated historian. After the deaths of Louis XIII. and Richelieu, he was restored to favour at court, but became involved in the Fronde commotions, wherein he played a despicable and vacillating part, until he was banished to Blois, where he spent the remainder of his life. He left no male issue; but his daughter, Mademoiselle de Montpensier, signalized herself during the Fronde insurrection against Mazarin. (See MONTPENSIER, Mademoiselle.) b. 1603; d. 1660.

ORLEANS, Philip, first duke of the third and existing branch of the house of, was the younger son of Louis XIII. and Anne of Austria. Upon the death of his uncle Gaston, he inherited the title of duke of Orleans, and obtained the duchy of Montpensier at the death of Mademoiselle Montpensier in 1693. His first wife, Henrietta of England, was married to him in 1661; and by that princess he had two daughters, one of whom became wife of Charles II. of Spain, and the other the queen of Victor Amadeus II., of Savoy. He is stated to have cultivated letters with some success, while in the field he displayed great courage during several of the campaigns of his brother Louis XIV. b. 1640; d. 1701.

ORLEANS, Philip, second duke of, was son of the preceding, by his second marriage. He is known in French history as the Regent Orleans, and is declared by Voltaire "to be famed for his courage, his wit, and his pleasures. He was born for society even more than for public affairs, and was one of the most amiable men that ever existed." The general verdict of history is, notwithstanding, that the Regent Orleans was an unbounded personal and political profligate. He was certainly endowed with brilliant talents, but his mind was early tainted by the debasing lessons of his preceptor, the infamous Cardinal Dubois. (See DUBOIS.) He distinguished himself in command of the French armies in Spain and Italy. In 1715 he was nominated regent, and during his administration France became bankrupt and miserable. The wild schemes of Law brought ruin upon thousands of families (see LAW), and the country was reduced to the most abject condition. B. 1674; p. 1723.

ORLEANS, Louis, third duke of, was son of the preceding. In his youth he led a dissipated life; but, upon his marriage with a princess of Baden, to whom he was devotedly attached, he renounced his former course. At the death of this princess, which occurred prematurely, in 1728, he retired from the world, and devoted himself to works of piety, and to the study of religion and science. In 1730 he entered the abbey of St. Génervière, where he practised extreme austerity, and performed numerous acts of humility and charity. He understood the Hebrew, Greek, and Latin languages, and was versed in ecclesiastical and civil history, botany, geography, and the fine arts. He translated the Psalms from the original, and wrote paraphrases upon several books of the Old Testament, a literal translation of St. Paul's epistles, and other works. B. 1703; p. 1752.

ORLEANS, Louis Philippe, fourth duke of, was son of the preceding. He took part in the campaigns of 1742-4, and fought at the battles of Dettingen and Fontenoy. Like his father, he was a learned and benevolent prince. In 1756 he contributed to the introduction of inoculation into France, and is stated to have distributed as much as £1000 per annum in charity. B. 1725; p. 1735.

ORLEANS, Louis Philippe Joseph, fifth duke of, surnamed Philippe Egalité, was the only son of the preceding. During the lifetime of his father he was known by the title of duke of Chartres. In 1778 he served on board the fleet commanded by Count d'Orvilliers; but in the action with Admiral Keppel, off Cape Ushant, he went down into the hold, and would not come up till the engagement was over. For his cowardice, he became an object of contempt with the French court. His conduct afterwards was extremely dissipated; and he joined the revolutionary party against the court, for which he was exiled. On the death of his father, he took the title of duke of Orleans. In the beginning of the Revolution, he displayed the greatest hatred to his royal relations, and became a member of the National Assembly. He also assumed the title of Citizen Egalité, and voted for the death of Louis XVI.; but, some time afterwards, was abandoned by his partisans, seized at Marseilles, whence he was removed to Paris, where he was condemned by the revolutionary tribunal to suffer death; which sentence was executed in 1793. B. at Paris, 1747.

ORLEANS, Louis Philippe, sixth duke of. (See LOUIS PHILIPPE, king of the French.)

ORLEANS, Ferdinand Philip, seventh duke of, eldest son of Louis Philippe, king of the French, was sent, in his fifth year, to the College of Henry IV., where he was distinguished by his intelligence and his amiability of disposition. In 1825 he was appointed colonel of hussars, and was serving with the French army when the revolution of 1830 burst forth. He immediately repaired to the capital with his regiment, and was received with enthusiasm. When his father received the crown, he was sent into the provinces to obtain the recognition of the new order of government. In 1835 he went to Algiers, where he signalized himself by his bravery and skill. The organization of the celebrated chasseurs de Vincennes was due to him. He unhappily met his death by a fall from his carriage. Affable, generous, brave, a friend of liberal ideas, protector of the arts—the death of this prince was regarded throughout France as a great calamity. His two sons (by the Princess Helen of Mecklenburg-Schwerin), the Count de Paris and the Duke de Chartres, resided in England for some years after the revolution of 1843. B. at Palermo, 1810; killed, 1842.

Orloff

ORLEANS, the Bastard of. (See DUNOIS.)
ORLEANS, Marie, Princess of, daughter of Louis Philippe, ex-king of the French, from her earliest years evinced a remarkable love of the fine arts, and more especially of sculpture, which she cultivated with a zeal and assiduity that soon gave her a prominent place among the most distinguished artists of her time. Her statue of Joan of Arc, in the museum of Versailles, was finished before she had reached her twentieth year; and besides this she produced numerous bas-reliefs, busts, and statuettes, of rare beauty and excellence. In 1837 she married Alexander, duke of Württemberg; but was prematurely cut off by consumption in 1839. B. 1816.

ORLOFF, or Orlov, a celebrated Russian family, founded by Ivan Orel, one of the archers, or Strélitzes. When this body, which was analogous to the Turkish Janissaries, was destroyed, Ivan saved his life by his cool courage. Peter the Great was himself engaged in decapitating the archers, who in turn came forward, knelt down, and placed their heads upon a beam. When Ivan came up, a head was still remaining upon the beam. "If this is my place," said he, "it ought to be clear;" and thereupon he kicked away the head. Peter, struck with this coolness, spared his life, and appointed him to an infantry regiment; after which he became an officer and a noble. The most celebrated of his descendants were:—

ORLOFF, Gregory, Count, served at first in the army; but attracting the attention of the grand-duchess Catharine, he became her favourite. In 1762 he was engaged in the conspiracy which brought about the assassination of Peter III., and the accession of his wife to the throne as the empress Catharine II. From that time honours were showered upon him by the empress, the father of whose child he was. Orloff, however, desired to become the husband, and to share the throne of Catharine. At length, growing tired of his tyrannical sway, the empress banished him to his seat at Gatchina, but created him prince. After living in oriental splendour for several years, he died at St. Petersburg a lunatic in 1783. B. 1734.

ORLOFF, Alexis, Count, brother of the preceding, was a soldier in the Russian guard when his brother became the favourite of Catharine. In 1762 he was one of the murderers of Paul I.; after which Catharine created him an admiral, and showered honours upon him. In 1770 he held the command in chief at the battle of Chesme, having under his orders the English officers Elphinstone, Greig, and Dugdale, and in that occasion destroyed the Turkish fleet. At a later period, while travelling in Italy, he met the Princess Tarakanova, daughter of the empress Elizabeth, at Leghorn. The princess, a girl of 16, was enticed on board Orloff's frigate by means of a pretended marriage, after which she was sent a prisoner to Russia. Catharine, fearing that she might, at some future period, set up a claim to the Russian throne, kept her ever afterwards in confinement. When his brother had been supplanted by Potemkin, Alexis Orloff retired to his palace at Moscow, whence he was summoned in 1796, by the emperor Paul, to act as pall-bearer to the remains of Peter III., whose body had been exhumed, in order that it might be honoured with a magnificent public funeral. Orloff is stated to have betrayed great emotion upon that occasion, perhaps expecting to be sent to execution by the son of his victim. He escaped, however, and immediately left St. Petersburg for a tour in Germany; nor did he return until Paul had himself met a violent death. b. in 1707; d. in 1803.—There were other brothers of Ivan. The eldest was surnamed by Catharine "The Philosopher," and lived a retired life; he died 1791. Vladimir was president of the Academy of Sciences of St. Petersburg, and died 1832. Feodor served in the army, and signalized himself in the war against Turkey in 1770; d. 1796. This last left four children, who, although illegitimate, were allowed to take the family name, and to inherit the vast estates of their relatives. Two of these have become celebrated.

ORLOFF, Michael, served in the Russian army against Napoleon, and went to Paris in 1814 with the allied armies. Towards the close of Alexander's reign, he incurred the emperor's displeasure, and was sent to command the army of the south. He was deeply implicated in the military insurrection of 1825; was imprisoned, but escaped further punishment through the influence of his brother Alexis, who had become the favourite of the new emperor, Nicholas. (See NICHOLAS.) From that period till his death, he lived in retirement. b. 1785; d. 1841.

ORLOFF, Alexis, a Russian diplomatist and statesman, brother of the preceding, entered the military service, and shared in the campaigns against Napoleon; but his great power and popularity dates from the year 1825, when Nicholas had been proclaimed emperor, and when the troops revolted against the new ruler. On that occasion, Orloff led his regiment against the mutineers, and was the chief instrument in deciding the events of that critical period in favour of Nicholas, who, throughout his life, retained the deepest sense of the services Orloff had rendered him. Nicholas created him a count, adjutant-general, and gave him the command of a division of cavalry. After signalizing himself in the Turkish campaign of 1829, he signed the treaty of Adrianople, and was sent ambassador extraordinary to Constantinople. Two years afterwards, he was dispatched by Nicholas to inspect the operations of Marshal Diebitsch against the insurgent Poles. Very soon after his arrival, both the marshal and the grand-duke Constantine died suddenly, and for a long time subsequently the name of Orloff was held in odium with the Russians, as the suspected author of their deaths; but the suspicion has now become rejected as baseless and absurd. In 1833 he signed the treaty of Unkiar-Skelessi with Turkey, which gave to Russia the key of the Dardanelles. In 1841 he accompanied Nicholas to London; and, upon the outbreak of the war between Russia and the Western powers, was sent to Vienna to demand the assistance of Austria, but without success. Nicholas, before his death, recommended him to his successor as his personal and tried friend. He represented Russia in the congress of Paris in 1856; and subsequently acted as chief of the grand council of the empire. b. 1787; d. 1861.

ORLOFF, Gregory Vladimirovitch, a Russian nobleman, distinguished by his attachment to literature and the sciences, whose chief works are "Mémoires Historiques, Politiques, et Littéraires sur le Royaume de Naples," 5 vols.; "Histoire des Arts en Italie." b. 1773; d. 1826.

ORRIS, Robert, orm, an English historian, who was the son of a surgeon of the Bombay army, received his education at Harrow school, after which he went to India as a writer in the service of the East India Company. He returned to England in 1752, with Captain, afterwards Lord Clive, with whom he lived many years on terms of intimacy. In 1755 he went to Madras as fourth member of the council. He also held the office of commissary-general; but in 1759 returned to England with a small fortune. Soon afterwards he commenced writing the "History of the Military Transactions of the British Nation in India," the first volume of which appeared in 1763, the second in 1775. The Court of Directors appointed him historiographer to the Company, at a salary of £300 per annum. He completed his History in 3 vols.; and also published "Historical Fragments of the Mogul Empire during the reign of Aurangzebe." b. in Bombay, 1728; d. 1801.

ORMOND, James Butler, Duke of, or'-mond, a celebrated Irish nobleman, who was descended from an ancient family of Tipperary, which had retained the hereditary dignity of earl-heritor to the English sovereigns from the beginning of the 13th century. Upon the outbreak of the Irish rebellion in 1610, he was appointed to command the royal troops, at the head of which he defeated the rebels at Dublin, Drogheda, Killybeg, and Ross. During the struggle between Charles I. and the Parliamentarians, Ormond, who had been previously nominated lord-lieutenant of Ireland, held that country for the king; but after Charles had been taken prisoner, he resigned the command, and repaired to London, when he had an interview with the captive monarch at Hampton Court. went to France; but at the invitation of the Roman Catholics, returned to Ireland, and for some time endeavoured to overcome the Parliamentary forces in that country. In 1650, however, he was compelled by Cromwell to evacuate the island; upon which he again retired to France. After rendering a number of important services to Charles II. while in exile, he accompanied that monarch to England at the Restoration. During the reigns of Charles II. and James II., he was twice; animated viceroy of Ireland, and twice lost the post through court intrigue. In 1674, the notorious Colind Blood, instigated, it is said, by Ormond's bitter enemy, the duke of Buckingham, waylaid and dragged him from his coach, with the intention of conveying him to Tyburn, and there hanging him. This infamous project was, however, frustrated by the rescue of the duke. (See PRINCE COLIND.) The earl of Ossory, the brave son of the duke, afterwards addressed Buckingham in the king's presence:—"My lord of Buckingham, I know well that you are at the bottom of this late attempt upon my father, and therefore I give you fair warning, that if my father comes to a violent end by sword or pistol, if he dies by the hand of a ruffian, or by the more secret way of poison, I shall not be at a loss to know the first author of it. I shall consider you as the assassin: I shall treat you as such, and wherever I meet you I shall pistol you, though you should stand behind the king's chair. And I tell you now, in his majesty's presence, that you may be sure I shall keep my word." Subsequently, when Charles II. had most unaccountably pardoned blood, his majesty sent to Ormond a request that he should also forgive the ruffian. Ormond thereupon replied, "that if the king could pardon the offender for stealing the crown, he might easily forgive the attempt upon his life." n. 1610; p. 1633.

ORMOND, James Butler, second Duke of, was grandson of the preceding, and distinguished himself as a soldier under William III. and Anne; but upon the accession of George I., he embraced the cause of the Pretender, was attainted in consequence, and thenceforth passed his life abroad. n. 1695; p. 1747.

ORMANO, Alphonso, or-nu'-no, a Corsican leader, who was brought up at the court of Henry II. of France, but returned to his native country when he had attained his 18th year, and maintained a struggle with his compatriots against the Genoese, until the signature of peace in 1563. Thereupon he retired to France with 500 followers, and was appointed colonel-general of the Corsican troops in the service of Charles IX. For his subsequent services to the French monarch, he became marshal of France and lieutenant-general of Guienne. n. 1610.

ORMANO, Jean Baptiste, son of the preceding, was at first appointed superintendent-general of the household of Gaston, duke of Orleans, brother to Louis XIII., and was afterwards created marshal of France; but, for his share in the intrigues against Richelieu, he was, in 1626, imprisoned at Vincennes, where he was subsequently either strangled or poisoned. n. 1541.

OROSIUS, Paul, o-ro'-si-us, a Spanish divine, who was sent to St. Augustine to counsel him on some controverted points concerning the nature and origin of the soul. By the advice of the same father, he undertook a "History of the World" to A.D. 416. He also wrote a treatise on Free Will, and other works. Flourished in the 5th century. His "History of the World" was translated into the Anglo-Saxon language by King Alfred; and of this an English version was made in 1773.

ORPHEUS, or'-fe-us, of Thrace, a Greek poet, who flourished before Homer. He was the disciple of Linus, and the master of Musæus. His works are lost, except a few fragments; and their authenticity is doubted.

ORRERY, Roger Boyle, Earl of, or'-re-re, a British statesman, who, after concluding his education at Trinity College, Dublin, went abroad, and on his return married the daughter of the earl of Suffolk. After the execution of Charles I. he repaired to England; when, being suspected of acting as an agent of Charles II., the committee of safety were about to send him to the Tower, but were prevented by Cromwell, who prevailed upon him to accept a commission under him in his Irish campaigns. His conduct gave Cromwell such satisfaction that, when he became protector, he made him one of his privy council. After the death of Cromwell, Boyle withdrew to Ireland, where he took measures for the restoration of monarchy.

Orsini

Charles II., on his accession, created him earl of Orrery, and appointed him one of his privy council. He was shortly afterwards constituted one of the lords justices of Ireland, and commissioned to call a Parliament, before the meeting of which he drew up the celebrated Act of Settlement. On the fall of Lord Clarendon, he was offered the place of chancellor, but refused it. The earl wrote several poems and plays, and his Correspondence was printed in 1742. n. in Ireland, 1621; p. 1679.

ORRERY, Charles Boyle, Earl of, a British statesman and writer, the son of Roger, the second earl, received his education at Christ Church, Oxford, under Dr. Atterbury, and, while there, engaged in a famous dispute with Dr. Bentley, on the Epistles of Phalaris, a new edition of which was published by Dr. Boyle in 1695. On the death of his brother, he succeeded to the earldom. During the treaty of Utrecht, he was envoy-extraordinary to the states of Flanders and Brabant, and, on his return, was created a British peer, by the title of Lord Boyle. At the accession of George I. he retired from court, and, in 1722, was sent to the Tower on suspicion of treason; but after six months' confinement was discharged. The astronomical instrument called an "orrery" was named after him by the inventor, Graham, in gratitude for favours received from his lordship. n. 1676; p. 1731.

ORSINI, or'-se-ne, a celebrated Roman family during the middle ages, the rival of the Colonna. The first Orsini known became cardinal in 1145. Matthew Orsini, his nephew, was prefect of Rome in 1153. Gaetano Orsini was made pope in 1277, under the name of Nicholas III. Another of the family was elected pope in 1724, with the name of Benedict XIII. The family has had many cardinals and other distinguished personages among its members.

ORSINI, Felice, a modern Italian patriot, in his 20th year was sent to prison for taking part in the proceedings of a secret society. The amnesty granted by Pius IX., in 1846, gave him his liberty. He afterwards took part in the defence of Rome and of Venice, but was banished from Sardinia, in 1853, for trying to excite a revolt at Genoa. Upon this he repaired to London, where he became the intimate friend of Mazzini. In 1851 he went as agent of the revolutionary committee to Parma, and proceeded thence to Milan, Trieste, Vienna, and Hermanstadt; in which last town he was arrested, and, after undergoing an examination at Vienna, was sent to the fortress of Mantua. In 1856 he effected his escape from that stronghold, under the most extraordinary circumstances, and contrived to reach England, where he commenced the delivery of public speeches, which became exceedingly popular. In the same year he produced a narrative of his life in captivity, under the title of "The Austrian Dungeons in Italy." At the commencement of the year 1858, he, with Pierri and other accomplices, made an attempt upon the life of the emperor of the French. That attempt failed, although the plot which had produced it was carefully concealed during some length of time. Orsini and Pierri were executed; and it having been asserted that the plot was organized in England, the emperor of the French made a demand upon the English nation that its laws respecting the right of asylum to foreigners should be altered. This demand was indignantly refused. Orsini was n.

ORTELLIUS, Abraham, or-tel-li-us, a Dutch geographer, who travelled in England, France, Germany, and Italy, and was generally accounted the first geographer of his time. In 1570 he produced "Theatrum Orbis Terrarum," or Universal Geography, the success of which led to his obtaining the appointment of geographer to Philip II. of Spain. He composed other works of the same nature, and corresponded with most of the learned men of his time. b. at Antwerp, 1527; d. 1598.

ORTUES, Henri d'Apremont, Viscount of, or-tas, was governor of Bayonne, under Charles IX. of France. Having received an order to destroy all the Huguenots in the city on St. Bartholomew's day (25th August, 1572), he replied to the king, "Sire, I communicated the letter of your majesty to the garrison; but, although I could find everywhere good soldiers and loyal citizens, I could not obtain a single executioner."

OSBORN, Shernard, os-born, a captain in the Royal Navy, who went to the Arctic regions in 1849 in search of Sir John Franklin. He served in the Black Sea, in the Russian War in 1854, and in China. In 1862 he entered the service of the emperor of China to suppress piracy on the Chinese coast, but withdrew in 1863. He has written some excellent accounts of his voyages. b. 1823.

OSBORNE, Lord Sidney Godolphin, third son of the first Lord Godolphin, and brother of the present duke of Leeds, a clergyman who obtained considerable celebrity for his letters in the "Times," on important social subjects of the day, under the signature "S. G. O." b. 1808.

OSCAR I., Oscar Joseph Francis Bernadotte, os'-kar, king of Sweden and Norway, was the only son of the celebrated French general Bernadotte, who became king of Sweden under the title of Charles XIV. When his father was elected heir presumptive to the Swedish crown, in 1810, he accompanied him to that country, where he received an education in conformity with the high position he was destined to fulfil. He abjured Catholicism for the Lutheran faith, was created duke of Södermanland, and began to display considerable aptitude for the military sciences, with which, and political economy, he chiefly occupied himself. In 1811 he entered the army as lieutenant-colonel, and soon afterwards rose to the high grades of grand admiral of Sweden and Norway, and general commandant of the fourth corps of artillery. In 1824 he was nominated viceroy of Norway, and became regent during the illness of his father in 1828. Meanwhile, he had married Josephine, daughter of Eugene de Beauharnais, duke of Leuchtenberg. In 1844 he succeeded to the throne. During the war with Russia, although Sweden took no part in the struggle, he manifested the strongest sympathy with the cause of the allied Western powers. In 1855 a treaty between Sweden and France was signed, by which the former power engaged not to cede any portion of her territory to Russia. The health of the king having become frail, he, in 1857, made a tour in Germany, Switzerland, and Italy. b. at Paris, 1799; d. 1859.

O'SHAUGHNESSY, Sir William Brooke, o-shaw'-nes-se, a gentleman to whom is due the great merit of introducing the electric telegraphic system into India. The descendant of an ancient Irish family, he was sent, at an early age, to the university of Edinburgh, where he graduated M.D. In his 21st year he entered the service of the East India Company, with the grade of assistant-surgeon. After being transferred to civil employment by the governor-general in 1833, he acted as physician to Lord Metcalfe while the latter commanded at Agra. It was whilst holding the professorship of chemistry in the Medical College at Calcutta, that he first began to investigate the capabilities of the electric telegraph as a mode of communication between widely-separate places. In 1839 he published a work, wherein he urged the government to adopt a telegraphic system which was calculated to afford immense services to the civil and military administrations of India. But Lord Aneklund, the governor-general of that day, gave the indefatigable man of science little encouragement; and the succeeding governors, Lords Ellenborough and Hardinge, were too much engrossed with warlike operations to give thought to any measure for the improvement of the internal resources of the country under their rule. In Lord Dalhousie, however, Dr. O'Shaughnessy found an appreciative patron: that nobleman authorized the projector to lay down an experimental line of electric telegraph, and to furnish a report of its working. That report was so satisfactory, that the court of East-India directors authorized the immediate construction of telegraphic lines between Calcutta, Agra, Bombay, Peshawur, and Madras. The lines were commenced in November, 1853, and so energetically did Dr. O'Shaughnessy pursue his labours, that, in less than six months, a line in full working order was completed between Calcutta and Agra, a distance of 800 miles. Early in 1855, the line was 3050 miles in length, and Calcutta and Madras were placed in instantaneous communication. In February, 1856, the line was laid down throughout 4000 miles. To justly appreciate the gigantic labours of the doctor, it must be borne in mind that there was no iron road, few bridges; that the wires cross seventy broad rivers, and pass through dense jungles, to enter which is death during six months of the year; but the chief difficulty that he had to contend with was the sudden and simultaneous training of 300 persons, who were to be employed in the many offices connected with the working of the system. In 1856 he went to England, where he was nominated a knight commander of the Bath, in acknowledgment of his great services. b. at Limerick, Ireland, 1809.

OSIANDER, Andrew, o-ze-an'-der, a German divine, who studied at Wittenberg and Nuremberg, was one of the first disciples of Luther, and became minister and professor at Königsberg, where he distinguished himself by a peculiar doctrine on justification, which he asserted to be effected in man by the union of God with our souls. This doctrine he zealously defended, and opposed Luther with great fury. He was the author of several Latin works, the most important of which were, "On the Harmony of the Gospels," and "Epistle to Zuinglius on the Sacrament of the Eucharist." b. in Bavaria, 1498; d. 1552.

OSIUS, o'-si-us, bishop of Cordova, in Spain, became the confidant of Constantine, who by his persuasions convened in 325 the council of Nice, where Osius presided. The emperor Constantius II. persecuted him with so much cruelty to make him turn Arian, that Osius, at the age of 100, was induced to sign a confession of faith prescribed to him. He was then permitted to return to his diocese, where he died soon after, extremely penitent for his weakness, and renouncing the Arian heresy with great fervour. B. 257; D. about 358.

OSMAN or OTEMAN I., os'-man, surnamed El-ghazi, "The Victorious," the founder of the dynasty at present reigning at Constantinople, was at first the chieftain of a small territory in Bithynia; but, in 1289, he invaded the whole country of Nicæa, and subsequently extended his conquests as far as the Black Sea. B. at Sukut, Bithynia, 1259; D. 1326.

OSMAN or OTEMAN II., sultan of the Turks, was the son of Achmet I., and succeeded his uncle Mustapha in 1618. He declared war against Poland in 1621; but, after several defeats, was obliged to conclude a disadvantageous peace. Attributing his failures to the Janissaries, he resolved to substitute a militia of Arabs in their room, which so provoked them that they deposed him and placed Mustapha on the throne. Osman was strangled in 1622.

OSMAN or OTEMAN III., became sultan in 1754, but reigned only three years, during which time he behaved with the utmost cruelty towards his subjects. D. 1757.

OSMOND, Str. os'-mond, a Norman prelate, who, in 1066, followed William the Conqueror to England, and was made chancellor of the kingdom and Bishop of Salisbury. For this diocese he reformed the liturgy, which became general throughout the kingdom, under the name of the Liturgy of Salisbury, and was commonly used throughout England until the Reformation. At his death, he was canonized by Pope Calixtus III. B. in Normandy, in the 11th century; D. in England, 1099.

OSORIO, Jerome, o-so'-re-o, a Portuguese bishop, who became professor of divinity at Coimbra, and afterwards bishop of Sylves. His works were published at Rome in 1592. On account of the elegance of his Latin style, he was called the Cicero of Portugal. B. at Lisbon, 1508; D. 1580.

OSSAT, Arnaud d', os'-sa, an eminent French cardinal, who, by the kindness of a gentleman, received a good education, and was appointed tutor to some young noblemen. He afterwards practised the law, but forsook that profession, and became secretary first to Cardinal d'Este, and next to Cardinal de Joyeuse. He was ambassador of France at Rome, and obtained the papal absolution for Henry IV., for which he was made bishop of Reunes in 1596. In 1598 he became a cardinal. B. 1536; D. 1604.

OSSIAN, os'-si-an, an ancient Scotch bard, was the son of Fingal, whom he accompanied in several military expeditions. He lived to an advanced age, and, at the close of life, became blind. Mr. Macpherson published a translation of poems, in a sort of poetical prose, which he ascribed to Ossian; but their authenticity has been disputed by several critics, and as zealously defended by others. (See MACPHERSON, James.) Supposed to have flourished in the 3rd century.

OSSOLI, Sarah Margaret Fuller, Marchioness of, os'-so-le, a modern American authoress, whose father gave her so high an education, that, even as a child, "she knew more Greek and Latin than half the professors." In 1835 this parent died suddenly, and, her means becoming straitened, Miss Fuller sought employment as teacher of Latin, German, Italian, and French in a school at Rhode Island. Subsequently, she joined the "Brook Farm" community, and began to exercise her pen by contributing to the periodicals. In 1839 she produced a translation of Eckermann's "Conversations with Göthe." About the same time, her great conversational powers induced some ladies of Boston to request her to form "conversational classes" under her direction. This singular scheme became highly successful, and five-and-twenty ladies met to discuss such topics as "the genealogy of heaven and earth," "the celestial inspiration of genius and transmission of divine law." In 1840 Mr. Emerson commenced his "Dial," to which Miss Fuller contributed some philosophical articles on the "Fine Arts." At a later period, she went to reside at New York, on being appointed to the direction of the literary department of the "Tribune." In 1846 she set out upon a tour of Europe, a project which had long been cherished in her mind. London and Paris were visited, the literary circles in both cities being her resort. At Rome, while attending divine service in St. Peter's, she met a young Italian nobleman, and, after a short acquaintance, became his wife in 1847. The marriage was, however, kept secret until the siege of Rome, which took place in the following year. During that struggle, she acted as nurse in one of the hospitals. When the French succeeded in entering the city, she, with her husband and infant child, retired to Leghorn, and, after remaining in that place several months, embarked for America; but, after a stormy passage, the vessel was wrecked upon the coast of Long Island, and herself, husband, and child, were drowned. A narrative of the Roman revolution, in manuscript, was lost with her. Her essays were collected and published in a work entitled "Papers on Literature and Art." B. in Massachusetts, 1810; drowned, 1850.

OSSORRY, Thomas Butler, Earl of, os'-so'-ry, son of the duke of Ormond. Cromwell sent him to the Tower; whence he was released, after eight months' confinement, and then went to Flanders. At the Restoration he was appointed lieutenant-general of the army in Ireland, and in 1666 created an English peer, by the title of Lord Butler. He was a volunteer under Lord Albemarle in the great fight with the Dutch; for which, in 1673, he was made sole admiral of the fleet, in the absence of Prince Rupert. In 1677 he commanded the English forces in the town of Mons. B. in Ireland, 1613; D. 1680.

OSSUNA, Tellez y Giron, Duke of, os'-soo'-na, a celebrated Spanish statesman, who attracted notice at court by his sarcastic wit, and thereby incurred the displeasure of Philip II. Banished from his native country, he went into Flanders, where he assumed the command of a regiment, which he had equipped at his own expense, and fought with so much success on the Spanish side, that he thereby obtained his recall. He became the favourite of the duke of Lerma, and was appointed viceroy of Sicily in 1610, which post he retained during five years. In 1618 he was appointed viceroy at Naples, and in that capacity defeated the Venetians; but refused to establish the Inquisition in Naples,

He conceived a plan of obtaining Venice for the Spanish crown, or, as some assert, as an independent monarchy for himself. He succeeded in deceiving the court of Madrid for some time, but was superseded as viceroy of Naples by Cardinal Borgia; upon which he was imprisoned in the castle of Almeida, where he died in 1624. b. at Valladolid, 1579.

OSTADE, Adrian van, os'-tad, one of the most celebrated painters of the Dutch school, studied under Frank Hals and Rembrandt, and drew his subjects from low life. In his pictures we generally find people smoking and drinking in alehouses and kitchens, or indulging in rural sports. b. at Lübeck, 1610; d. 1685.

OSTADE, Isaac van, was brother of the preceding, and was, like him, an excellent painter. Pictures by this artist are in the collections of Lord Ashburton, Sir Robert Peel, and the Bridgewater Gallery. b. at Lübeck, 1617; d. 1671.

OSTERVOLD, John Frederic, os-ter'-vold, a Swiss Protestant divine, who wrote "A Catechism of the Christian Religion," "Arguments and Reflections on all the Books of the Bible," and other works, and produced a translation of the Bible in French, much in use among French Protestants. b. at Neuchâtel, 1663; d. 1747.

OSWALD, os'-wald, king of Northumberland, was obliged, after the death of Ethelfrith, his father, to take refuge in Ireland, his uncle, Edwin, having possessed himself of the throne. He became a Christian in his retreat, and returning to his own country, defeated Cerdwalla, king of the Britons, who lost his life. Oswald reunited the two kingdoms of Northumberland; but was slain in a battle with Penda, king of Mercia, 643 A.D. Monkish historians relate that many miracles were performed by his relics, for which he was canonized.

OSYMANDIAS, o-si-mun'-di-as, an Egyptian king, was the first monarch who formed a library. He caused a colossal statue of himself to be erected, on which was this inscription: "I am Osymandias, king of kings; whoever will dispute this title with me, let him surpass my works." He is said to have reigned at Thebes between the 20th and 16th centuries B.C.

OTHO, Marcus Salvius, o'-tho, a Roman emperor, was of a family descended from the ancient kings of Etruria. Nero, whose companion he was in his debaucheries, elevated him to the highest offices in the empire. After Nero's death he attached himself to Galba; but that emperor having adopted Piso as his heir, Otho excited an insurrection, murdered Galba and Piso, and ascended the throne in 69; was opposed by Vitellius, who was supported by the German army; and in a battle between the two rivals near Cremona, Otho was defeated; on which he slew himself, after reigning three months. b. at Rome, A.D. 31 or 32; d. 69.

OTHO I., emperor of Germany, called the Great, o'-to, was the eldest son of Henry the Fowler, and was crowned in 937, at the age of 14. Berenger having usurped the title of emperor in Italy, Otho entered Rome, where he was crowned by John XII. That pontiff afterwards entered into a league with Berenger; on which Otho caused him to be deposed, and put Leo VIII. in his place, in 963. On the emperor's return to Germany, the Romans revolted, and imprisoned Leo; for which Otho again visited

Otho

Rome, where he inflicted severe vengeance on the senate. He next turned his arms against Nicephorus Phocas, emperor of the East, whose army he defeated, and after cutting off the noses of his prisoners, sent them to Constantinople; but John Zimisces, the successor of Nicephorus, made peace with Otho. b. 923; d. 973.

OTHO II., surnamed the Bloody, succeeded his father, the preceding emperor, in 973. His mother Adelaide opposed his accession; on which he caused her to be put to death. He died the Danes and Bohemians. He afterwards marched into Italy, in order to expel the Saracens from Sicily, but fell ill at Rome, where he died, 983; b. 961.

OTHO III., the son of the preceding, was only three years old at the death of his father; but his empire was administered by his grandmother Adelaide, conjointly with the archbishop of Cologne. At the age of 16 he assumed the reins of government, and went to Italy, which was in a state of confusion, owing to the opposition of different popes. Otho having re-established order, returned into Germany, and made Boleslas king of Poland. He was obliged again to pass into Italy to quell a revolt, and died soon afterwards. b. 980; d. 1002.

OTHO IV., called the Superb, the son of Henry, duke of Saxony, was chosen emperor in 1208. He was excommunicated by the pope for seizing the lands which the Countess Matilda bequeathed to the Holy See. In 1212 the princes of the empire elected Frederic, king of Sicily, in the room of Otho, who, after struggling against his rival until 1215, resigned the crown, and retired to Brunswick. b. 1218.

OTHO I., king of Greece, was the second son of Louis I. of Bavaria, and was, in his 17th year, offered the throne of the new Greek kingdom in 1832. After being assisted in his government by a regency, he, in 1835, became the unassisted monarch of Greece. In 1836 he married Amelia, daughter of the grand-duke of Oldenburg, a marriage offering some peculiarities. The king was a Roman Catholic, the queen Protestant, while any children that might be born were to be educated in the faith of the Greek church. After some internal dissensions, the king, in 1844, promulgated a new constitution, modelled upon that adopted in France in 1830. At the commencement of the war 1817, a public insult addressed to M. Ansurus, the Turkish minister at the court of Athens, had nearly provoked a rupture between the two powers. In that affair, both the interests of the nation and the dignity of the throne were compromised. In 1850 the commerce of Greece was materially injured by the obstinate attitude of the king with respect to the indemnity claimed for M. Pacifico, an English subject, by England, whose fleet was sent to blockade the Greek ports. During the war with Russia, numerous bands of brigands were organized at the Greek capital, which, taking advantage of the troubled condition of Turkey, committed great ravages upon the frontiers. Both England and France protested against the proceedings of these predatory hordes, and an Anglo-French division was sent to the Piræus. The Western powers also demanded the retirement of the ministry; after which period the administration was frequently and apparently capriciously changed until 1862, ORNO VENIUS, a painter, and the instructor of Rubens, was born at Leyden, and after residing at Rome several years, went to Germany, where he was employed by the emperor. n. 1556; n. 1634.

OTILEY, William Young, F.R.S., F.S.A., and keeper of the prints in the British Museum, ot'-le, devoted himself to the fine arts, and was known as an artist, a collector, and an author. When scarcely 20 years of age, he proceeded to Italy, where he employed his own talents and those of others in taking copies of the most esteemed paintings. There he remained about ten years; and on his return to England, produced a series of facsimiles of the original drawings of the best masters, under the title of the "Italian School of Design," a magnificent work, consisting of 84 plates. His other chief works are, "The Florentine School," the "Origin and Early History of Engraving," "The Stafford Gallery," and "The Critical Catalogue of the National Gallery." n. 1771; n. 1836.

OTTO, Louis Guillaume, Count de Mosley, ot'-to, an eminent French diplomatist, was educated in the university of Strasburg. He was appointed, in 1779, secretary and chargé d'affaires to the United States of America, where he remained till 1792. He was then employed by the committee of public safety in the foreign department of the state; but, on the fall of the Girondists shortly after, was sent to the Luxembourg prison, where he remained till the revolution of the 9th Thermidor. In 1800 he was sent to England, and remained there as minister-plenipotentiary till the peace of Amiens. In 1809 he was named ambassador to Vienna, where he negotiated the marriage of Napoleon with Maria Louisa, and remained there till 1813, when, on his return to Paris, he became minister of state. At the restoration, in 1814, he was in disgrace; but, in 1815, during the Hundred Days, Bonaparte made him secretary for foreign affairs. After the battle of Waterloo he was employed by Napoleon to negotiate for his personal security with the English government; but the project failed, through Otto not receiving passports. n. at Baden, 1754; n. 1817.

OTWAY, Thomas, ot'-wai, an English dramatic writer, who was educated at Winchester school, whence he removed to Christ Church, Oxford, which he left without taking a degree, and went to London, where he became a performer, and writer for the stage, producing his first tragedy, "Alcibiades," in 1675. The earl of Plymouth procured him a cornetcy in a regiment in Flanders; but Otway, having little taste for the army, returned to London, where, in great poverty, he re-commenced writing plays. Having been compelled by his necessities to contract debts, and being haunted by the emissaries of the law, he retired to a public-house on Tower Hill, where, according to one account, he died of suffocation, from swallowing, after a long fast, a piece of bread which charity had supplied. Otway excels in depicting the tender passions in tragedy; of which his "Orphan," and "Venice Preserved" are proofs. A complete edition of his works, which were numerous, was published in 1814. n. at Trotten, Sussex, 1651; n. 1685.

OTTOCAR II., ot'-to-car, surnamed the Conqueror, succeeded Venice-lus III., and united the kingdoms of Bohemia, Austria, and Styria, in 1253, and in the following year made some conquests in Prussia. He founded cities, encouraged trades and manufactures, and protested against the election of Rudolph of Hapsburg. Placed under the ban of the empire in 1275, he was abandoned by his allies, and in the succeeding years deprived of Austria. He re-commenced the war in 1277, but perished at the battle of Marchfeld, in 1278.

OUDINOT, Charles Nicholas, oo'-de-no, marshal of France and duke of Reggio, at the age of 16 entered upon his military career, and in 1792 obtained the command of a battalion. In the same year he performed his first great feat of arms,—the repulse of the Prussians from the fort of Bitsch, with the loss of 700 prisoners. In 1794, while in command of a distant outpost, he, with a single regiment, kept in check a corps of the Austrians numbering 10,000 men. For that service he was appointed general of brigade; and, after being severely wounded in a subsequent attack, was taken prisoner by the Austrians. On obtaining his exchange, he performed signal feats of bravery at Trèves, Nordlingen, and Donauwerth, and was created general of division in 1799. At Zurich, the siege of Genoa, the battle of Pozzolo, and the passage of the Mincio, he maintained his great reputation for skill and bravery. Napoleon presented him with a sword of honour, and when, in 1805, he established an élite corps of grenadiers, he entrusted the command to Oudinot. At the head of this corps, he was the first to enter Vienna, and likewise contributed to the victory of Austerlitz. In 1807 he gained the battle of Ostrolenka, in Poland; and at Friedland, soon afterwards, performed his greatest deed. With one corps, he kept the whole Russian army in check until Napoleon came up. After Wagram, the emperor created Oudinot a marshal, and duke of Reggio; and, upon the flight of Louis Bonaparte from Holland, he was sent to occupy that country, where he remained for two years, governing to the complete satisfaction of the Dutch people. Throughout the battles of 1812, 1813, 1815, Oudinot's name shone with all its old lustre; but, after the emperor's abdication, he gave in his adherence to the Bourbons, to whom he afterwards steadfastly submitted. In 1839, Louis Philippe nominated him grand chancellor of the Legion of Honour, and governor of the Invalides. Discreet, loyal, and brave, he merited the title bestowed upon him by his compatriots, "the Modern Bayard." n. in France, 1767; n. at Paris, 1847.

OUDINOT, Nicholas Charles Victor, a modern French general, and eldest son of the preceding, was first a page to the emperor Napoleon I., and was created lieutenant of hussars for the bravery exhibited by him at the passage of the Danube in 1809. His next employment was as aide-de-camp to Marshal Massena, in Portugal. Throughout the final campaigns of Napoleon, he signalized himself as the worthy son of a brave parent; and, at the abdication of the emperor, took service under the restored Bourbon dynasty, and remained faithful to it during the Hundred Days. For this fidelity he was, after the fall of Napoleon, created commandant of the grenadiers of the Royal Guard. At the revolution of 1830, he tendered his resignation of his varied appointments, and kept aloof from the government of Louis Philippe until the year 1835, when he was appointed to the command of an African brigade. After the revolution of 1818, he was nominated to the command of the army of observation at the foot of the Alps. In that command he was succeeded by Marshal Bugeaud, in 1849; but was soon afterwards sent, at the head of a French expeditionary corps, to compel the Romans to accept the authority of the pope. The city was stoutly defended by Garibaldi, and only submitted after an obstinate struggle. Created a grand cross of the Legion of Honour after the fall of Rome, Oudinot returned to France, and took his seat in the Legislative Assembly. At the coup d'état, he was arrested, and remained for some time a prisoner in the fortress of Vincennes. After his liberation, he retired into private life. He wrote several valuable works on military tactics, and upon cavalry. B. 1791; p. 1863.

OUVRY, Jean Baptiste, oo'-dre, a French painter of portraits and historical subjects, whose skill in delineating animals, particularly dogs, was such, that Louis XV. is said to have recognised his favourite ones whenever he saw them in the groups of Oudry, who was pensioned by that monarch, and had apartments in the Tuileries. B. 1686; p. 1755.

OWSERED, William, ow'-tred, an English divine and mathematician, was educated at Eton, whence he was elected to King's College, Cambridge, where he obtained a fellowship. About 1603 he was presented to the living of Aldbury, Surrey; after which he devoted himself to mathematical pursuits, and wrote several treatises, particularly his "Clavis," the plan of which was adopted by Sir Isaac Newton. In the civil war he suffered considerably for his adherence to the royal cause; indeed, according to Fuller, he died of joy at hearing of the Restoration of Charles II. Fuller states that "this aged Simeon had a strong persuasion, that before his death he should behold Christ's anointed restored to his throne; which he did accordingly, to his great joy, and then had his 'dimittis' out of this mortal life." Oughtred enjoyed the very highest reputation in his day, and was called "the prince of mathematicians." B. in Buckinghamshire, 1573; p. 1660.

OWLOV-BEG, oo'-loo-beg, grandson of Tamerlane, to whose empire he succeeded in 1446. He resided at Samarcand, where he erected a fine observatory. Passionately fond of astronomical pursuits, he compiled a series of tables in Persian, and likewise produced some other writings upon astronomical science. B. 1394; killed, 1449.

OUTRAM, Sir James, oo'-tram, a modern British general, who, after passing through his collegiate career at Aberdeen with considerable distinction, obtained an appointment as military cadet in India, whither he proceeded in 1819. He had not long been there when his abilities and energy attracted the attention of his immediate superiors, and he was appointed lieutenant and adjutant of the Bombay native infantry, which he subsequently quitted, in order to assume the command of the 10th Corps, for organizing and disciplining which he obtained great commendation. Afterwards, he became political agent in Guzerat, British resident at Hyderabad, Sattara, and Baroda, and eventually succeeded the late Sir William Sleeman as commissioner at Lucknow. In 1853 he was dispatched to Persia, armed with diplomatic powers as commissioner, with the forces sent thither, enjoying, at the same time, the local rank of lieutenant-general. He was present at the capture of Bushire, and gained the victory at Khooshab, in 1857. Returning to India shortly before the outbreak of the mutiny, he was appointed resident at Rajpootana, and a provisional member of the Council of India. The chivalrous part which he played during the outbreak of the mutiny, as the colleague of Havelock, Lawrence, and Lord Clyde, as well as his controversy with the late Sir Charles James Napier, relative to the cause of the amercers of Seinde, need no more than a passing allusion here. In India, long before the mutiny, he was well known to fame as an officer of long experience and high distinction, and had earned for himself the title of the "Bayard of the Indian army, sans peur et sans reproche." In 1856 he was nominated a civil knight commander of the Bath, and in the following year a military grand cross of the same order. His later honours were a baronetcy, the grade of G.C.B., and the appointment of lieutenant-general of her majesty's Indian forces. B. 1802; p. 1863.

OUVRARD, Julien, oov'-ran, was a grocer at Nantes at the era of the first French revolution. Being an excellent calculator, and of great address and boldness, he rapidly made a fortune. He was a contractor under the republicans, the imperial, and the restored Bourbon régimes; he had the provisioning of the foreign armies during their occupation of France by the allied troops in 1816, and of the French army in Spain during the war in 1823. He was often denounced for his contracts during the revolution, and escaped the guillotine in 1794, by General Boivin concealing him in his house at Nantes. Under the successive régimes, he owed many an escape to the influence of his friend Fouché. In 1810 he was sent on a secret mission by the latter to England, while Napoleon also sent a mission to negotiate a peace. The two ambassadors counteracted each other; the British government evaded what it considered a trap; the rival ambassadors were dismissed; and, on their return, Fouché was disgraced, and Ouvrard imprisoned by Napoleon. He subsequently became bankrupt, but lived in such extraordinary luxury in prison, that his creditors held him confined there for a long time. Great complaints were made in the chamber of deputies in 1824, of the intrigues, extravagance, and material deficiencies of his contract for supplying the French army in Spain; but no inquiry into these financial operations was made. He subsequently resided in England, where he died. B. 1772; p. 1847.

OVERBECK, Frederick, o'-rer-bek, an eminent German artist, who, with Cornelius, J. Von Schorn, and other painters, created as great a revolution in German art as we have seen occur in England at a later period, in consequence of the efforts of Millais and his fellow "Pre-Raphaelite" brethren. At the beginning of the 19th century, the pictorial art of his country was under the domination of French taste, combined with an imitation of the later masters of the Italian schools. With Cornelius, Overbeck took up his residence at Rome, in 1811, and devoted himself to Christian art, adopting the principle enunciated by Schlegel, that in all religious themes the treatment should be spiritual and symbolic, rather than human and dramatic. Four years after his journey to Rome, he embraced the doctrines of the Roman Catholic church. His best works are illustrative of scriptural subjects; the most important of them accompanied Columbus on his first voyage to Hispaniola. In the war of Naples he rendered great services to Spain, for which Ferdinand appointed him inspector-general of the commerce of the New World; in which capacity he went to Hispaniola, where he made a vast collection of materials for the work which he subsequently produced, with the title "General History of the Indies." It is a book of immense learning, although it has been denounced by Las Casas as being "as full of lies, almost, as pages." There is also another important work by him, relating to the genealogy, revenues, &c., of the grandees of Spain; but it remains in MS., and is preserved in the National Library of Madrid. n. 1478; p. about 1658, but this is uncertain.

OWAIN, o-wain', son of Cadwgan ap Bleddyn, a prince of Powys, who, having carried off Ness, the wife of Gerald, constable of Pembroke, was obliged to fly with his father to Ireland; but they afterwards returned to their own country. Owain's father died in 1110, and, the year following, Owain was in Normandy with Henry I., who knighted him. He was killed by Gerald, the husband of Ness, in 1114.

OWAIN, the son of Maxen Wladig, an eminent character in the Welsh annals, broke off the connexion between Britain and the Romans, and was, in consequence, chosen sovereign of the country. He was also accounted a saint in the British church.

OWAIN, commonly called Sir Owen Tudor lord of Penmynydd, in Mona, or Anglesea, and said to be the descendant of the ancient sovereigns of Wales. He studied the law, which profession he quitted, and went abroad. Katharine, the wife of Henry V., after her husband's death, fell in love with Owain, and privately married him, in 1426. They had three children, one of whom, Edmund, became earl of Richmond in 1452, and was the father of Henry VII. After the death of Katharine, Owain was confined in Newgate; whence he effected his escape, but was retaken; however, he soon obtained his liberty, and died on his estate, about 1385.

OWEN, George, o'-en, a physician, was educated at Oxford, and became fellow of Merton College in 1519. Henry VIII., to whom he was physician, left him a legacy of one hundred pounds. He served in the same capacity to Edward VI. and Queen Mary. He was the author of a work entitled "A Meete Diet for the New Age." p. 1558.

OWEN, John, a Latin epigrammatist, who was educated at Oxford, whence he is sometimes styled Oxoniensis; after which he became schoolmaster, first at Trylegh, in Monmouthshire, and next at Warwick. His Latin epigrams possess great point, and are inferior only to those of Martial. n. about 1580; p. 1622.

OWEN, John, a learned Independent divine, was educated at Queen's College, Oxford. During the civil wars he was a zealous advocate for the Parliament against the King. Cromwell made him his chaplain, and took Dr. Owen with him on his expedition to Ireland. He afterwards appointed him to the deanery of Christ Church, Oxford, where he served the office of vice-chancellor in 1652, and the year following took his doctor's degree. He is said to have been of tolerant principles, though a rigid Calvinist. At the Restoration he was deprived of his deanery; on which he retired to his estate in writer. His greatest works are, "An Exposition of the Epistle to the Hebrews," "Discourse on the Holy Spirit," and "Treatise on Original Sin." Clarendon, in his "History of the Rebellion," extols Dr. Owen's mild disposition, and declares him to have been one of the most learned and rational men of his time. n. at Stadham, Oxfordshire, 1616; p. 1683.

OWEN, Henry, a divine of the Church of England, was educated at Ruthin School and Jesus College, Oxford, where he took his degree of M.D., but afterwards entered into orders, and was appointed to the vicarage of Edmonston, in Middlesex, and St. Olave, Hart Street, London. His works are, "Observations on the Scripture Miracles," "Remarks on the Four Gospels," "An Inquiry into the Septuagint Version," "Sermons preached at Boyle's Lecture," and "An Introduction to Hebrew Criticism." n. 1715; p. 1795.

OWEN, Robert, a modern English philanthropist, and the founder of the political system called "Socialism." He was the son of parents in a humble condition of life, but who, nevertheless, gave him a fair education. After filling the situation of draper's assistant at Newton, Montgomeryshire, and at Stamford, he repaired to the metropolis, and there so distinguished himself by his business talents; that at 18 he was enabled to become a partner in a small cotton-mill. His success increasing, he removed to the Chorlton Mills, near Manchester, which, under his management, became a very prosperous establishment. In 1797 he married Miss Dale, the daughter of David Dale, a wealthy and influential manufacturer of Glasgow. He soon afterwards became part proprietor and sole manager of his father-in-law's works, the "New Lanark Twist Company," the management of whose mills upon his own peculiar principles soon spread his name far and wide. In this factory, where not only cotton-spinning, but other branches of manufacture were carried on, as many as 4000 persons were at one time employed. Over that large number of individuals he presided with a highly benevolent care; built schools and improved dwellings; taught the children various practical arts; provided both parents and offspring with the means of healthful recreation, and promoted by every possible means the welfare of his great charge. From 1810 to 1815 he published his "New View of Society; or, Essays on the Formation of the Human Character," which, with his practical exemplification of his theories, introduced him to such men as Mr. Wilberforce, Mr. Zachary Macaulay, the first Sir Robert Peel, Mr. James Mill, Sir James Mackintosh, Mr. Malthus, and Lord Brougham. As he said himself, "From these political economists, often in animated discussion, I always differed; but our discussions were maintained to the last with great good feeling, and a cordial friendship. They were liberal men for their time, friends to the rational education of the poor." Mr. Owen was now fairly launched before the world as a social reformer. In 1817 he addressed memorials to the sovereigns assembled at the Congress of Aix-la-Chapelle, confiding their presentation to Lord Castlereagh, and became a celebrity. Among other notable persons who visited his infant-school at New Lanark, was the late emperor Nicholas of Russia, then the grand-duke. At that time there was great commotion about the doctrines of Malthus, and Mr. Owen relates that, "in a two hours' conversation with the grand-duke, before he left me, he said, 'As your country is overpeopled, I will take you and two millions of population with you, all in similar manufacturing communities.'" This was in reference to the establishment at New Lanark, and was certainly a most extraordinary offer on the part of the most arbitrary despotic monarch in the world; for Mr. Owen's community was based upon "liberty, equality, fraternity." Mr. Owen, however, declined, as he thought his hands were full enough of work at the time. In 1823 he quitted the factory of New Lanark and went to North America, where, in the state of Indiana, he purchased a large tract of land, and founded a community called by him "New Harmony." It proved a failure, however, and in 1827 he returned to his native country. His later experiments at carrying out his new view of society were an establishment at Orbiston, in Lanarkshire; another at Tytherley, in Hampshire; and a labour-exchange in London; but all were complete failures. In his later years, as his mind began to fail, he accepted the doctrine of spirit-rapping, and lectured and published works upon that delusion. The last appearance of the philanthropist was at the Social Science Congress of Liverpool. He was a gentleman of ample means, and disposed of a large fortune in promulgating his principles. Whatever opinion may be held as to his theories, there can be but one, and that the very highest, with respect to his energy, moral integrity, business talents, and disinterested philanthropy. n. at Newton, Montgomeryshire, 1771; n. 1858.

OWEN, Richard, a celebrated English naturalist, who at first served as midshipman in the royal navy, but quitted it upon the conclusion of the war with America in 1814. After resuming his studies, he was sent to the university of Edinburgh, in order to take a degree in medicine. In 1825 he repaired to London, and became a student of St. Bartholomew's Hospital. In the following year he received his diploma as member of the Royal College of Surgeons; and, resolving to again enter the naval service, he called on his late professor, Dr. Abernethy, to bid him farewell. "What is all this?" said Abernethy.—"Going to sea, sir." "Going to sea?—going to the devil!"—"I hope not, sir." "Going to sea! you had better, I tell you, go to the devil at once," reiterated the downright doctor, who insisted upon another interview at the end of a week. Owen revisited his rough but honest friend at the expiration of that time, when Abernethy proposed an appointment at the College of Surgeons. This was accepted; the youthful anatomist found himself happily associated with one congenial mind, and so the navy lost a good officer, and science gained one of her brightest ornaments. His first task in the Royal College of Surgeons, was the preparation of a complete and accurate catalogue of the great museum of John Hunter, which had been obtained by the institution. That work cost Owen thirty years of incessant toil, but it enabled him to become the greatest anatomist of the age. During more than twenty years he held the Hunterian professorship at the College of Surgeons; he received the Royal and Copley medals of the Royal Society, a pension and residence from her Majesty, and became a member of almost every learned body in Europe and America. The limits of this notice will not permit of even the bare enumeration of the titles of his many invaluable works. That information may be found in the "Bibliographia Zoologica et Geologica," published by the Ray Society. These works are the true records of his life—a life of devotion to science, wherein he has fairly earned the title which has been bestowed upon him—viz., the "Newton of Natural History." n. at Lancaster, 1814.

OXENSTIERNA, Axel, Count, ox'-en-sti-er'-na, a celebrated Swedish minister, who received his education in Germany. On his return to Sweden, he entered upon a career of diplomacy, and was employed by Charles IX. When Gustavus Adolphus ascended the throne, in 1611, he nominated him his chancellor or prime minister; and to that monarch Oxenstierna rendered the greatest services by his statesmanship. When Gustavus was killed at the battle of Lutzen, in 1632, Oxenstierna put himself at the head of the Protestant coalition, and, by his sagacious measures, brought success to the league during two years. After the battle of Nordlingen, in 1634, he went to Paris to hold an interview with Richelieu; and, in 1648, he directed from Stockholm the preliminary negotiations which, by producing the peace of Westphalia, put an end to the Thirty Years' War. His son was one of the envoys who signed that treaty; and it was to him that the count wrote, in answer to a letter wherein the young man betrayed diffidence because of his inexperience in diplomatic affairs, this answer, since become proverbial:—"Nescis, mi fili, quantula prudentia homines regantur." ("You do not yet know, my son, with how little wisdom mankind are governed.") While Queen Christina was in her minority, he was at the head of the council of regency; and, after she assumed the government, he resumed his old office of prime minister; but not succeeding in dissuading the queen from abdication her crown, he retired into private life. The second volume of the Swedo-Germanic War" is attributed to his pen. n. at Fano, Upland, 1583; n. 1654.

OZHOFF, Vladislav Alexandrovitch, os'-er'-ov, a Russian tragic poet, who, after serving in the army, in which he attained the rank of major-general, obtained a civil appointment. He was the author of tragedies entitled "Fingal," "Demetrius Donskoi," "Edipus," and "Polyxena," besides some lyric poems. n. 1770; n. 1816.

'ACCA, Cardinal, pa-k'-ka, minister of Pius VII., drew up the bull of excommunication promulgated against Napoleon in 1809. He retired from Rome shortly afterwards, and remained at Fenestrella until 1813, when he rejoined Pius VII. at Fontainebleau. He returned to Rome in 1813, and in 1816 re-established there the order of the Jesuits. He left some interesting "Memoirs" of his Life and Times. n. at Benevento, 1756; n. 1844.

but Wolsey, being jealous of his rising merit, procured his disgrace. He was held in great esteem by the most learned men of his time, particularly Erasmus, Sir Thomas More, and Cardinal Pole. He wrote some Commentaries upon the Scriptures. b. 1492; d. 1532.

PACHECO, Juan de, pa-chai'-ko, marquis de Villena, the favourite and prime minister of corrupted him by a pension, and this perfidious minister betrayed his master's interests in the peace of 1413, by many articles prejudicial to the kingdom of Castile. Henry, having discovered his treachery, reproached him with it, which so provoked Pacheco that he conspired against him, and proclaimed Prince Alphonso king of Castile, in 1465; but caused the young king to be poisoned soon afterwards, and was reconciled to Henry, whose favour he retained till his death, in 1473.

PACHECO, Francisco, a celebrated Spanish painter and censor of pictures. In 1594 he painted two flags for the Spanish fleets of New Spain. They consisted of crimson damask, and were each 30 yards by 50, bearing, besides rich borders and other decorations, St. Iago and the royal arms of Spain. The decorations of the cathedral of Seville at the funeral of Philip II. were also from his brush. In 1618 he received the appointment of censor of pictures from the Inquisition, it being one of his duties to prohibit the sale of pictures containing any nude figures. Says Mr. Ford, "Nothing gave the holy tribunal greater uneasiness than how Adam and Eve in Paradise, the blessed souls burning in purgatory, the lady who tempted St. Anthony, or the last day of judgment, were to be painted; circumstances in which small-clothes or long-clothes would be highly misplaced." Pacheco was nevertheless an accomplished personage; and it is to his lessons that the great Velasquez owed much of his great skill as a painter. A portrait of Cervantes was one of his best works. b. at Seville, 1571; d. 1654.

PACHYMERUS, George, pak-i-merr-us, a Greek writer, whose talents procured him the favour of Michael Palaeologus, who conferred on him several offices in church and state. He wrote a valuable "History of the East," which is inserted in the collection of Byzantine historians, and was published at Rome in 1669, with a Latin translation. b. about 1250; d. 1310.

PACORUS, pak-o-rus, son of Orodes, king of Parthia, signalized himself by the defeat of Crassus, whose army he nearly cut to pieces, b.c. 53. He embraced the cause of Pompey, and declared himself for the assassins of Cæsar. After ravaging Syria and Judæa, he was defeated by Ventidius b.c. 39, and fell in the battle.

PACER, Ferdinand, pa'-air, a celebrated Italian composer, who produced an opera, entitled "Circe," at Venice, when only in his 10th year. After visiting Padua, Naples, and Rome, in each of which cities he composed musical works, he returned to Parma, where the grand-duke bestowed a pension upon him. In 1795 he repaired to Vienna, and afterwards to Dresden, where he was appointed chapel-master. Having been introduced to Napoleon, after the battle of Jena, the emperor took him into his service, and, at a subsequent date, nominated him imperial composer and conductor of chamber music to the empress Maria Louisa. At the restoration of the Bourbons he became director of the Italian Opera of Paris; but lost the post in 1818, through professional intrigue. Pacer was a voluminous composer; some of his works, such as "Griselda" and "Agnesse," ranking very high. He was a member of the French Institute. b. at Parma, 1774; d. at Paris, 1850.

PAGAN, Blaise François, Count of, pa'-gâ, a celebrated French mathematician and military engineer, who bore arms in his youth, and displayed great valour during the campaigns in Italy and Flanders. Louis XIII. made him a general, and sent him as envoy to Portugal in 1612. The same year he became entirely blind, by the loss of his remaining eye at the siege of Montauban, having before been deprived of the sight of the other by illness. He then turned his attention to mathematical studies, and wrote a treatise on Fortification, "Geometrical Theorems," "Theory of the Planets," "Astronomical Tables," "An Historical Relation of the River of the Amazons." His treatise on Fortification is, even at the present day, an able work upon the subject of which it treats; but his mathematical works have lost their value. b. at Avignon, 1604; d. at Paris, 1665.

PAGANI, Gregorio, pa-ga'-ne, an eminent Italian painter, of Florence, whose pictures have been sometimes taken for those of Michael-Angelo Buonarroti. b. 1558; d. 1605.

PAGANINI, Nicholas, pa'-ga-ne'-ni, a celebrated Italian violinist, whose talents were so precocious, that, at the age of eight years, he played in a church at Genoa, and at the public concerts. He was subsequently placed under Costa, an eminent violoncellist, and received lessons in harmony from the composer Pacer. He was next invited, to Lucca by Eliza Bacciaroli, sister of Napoleon I., to assume the direction of the court concerts. Subsequently he made a tour over Europe, exciting everywhere the greatest enthusiasm. After producing an enormous sensation at Paris in 1831, he went to London, where he demanded, and occasionally received, enormous sums for his services. His great power over the violin was only excelled by his thirst for gold: in one instance, his avarice led him to demand £1000 for three performances, which terms were rejected. Paganini was a marvellous performer: the purity of his tone, his feeling, harmony, and expression, were perfection; but his habit of playing upon one string, although an extraordinary feat, saved too much of sleight-of-hand to be creditable to so great an artist, who could have done much better with the four which naturally belong to the instrument. His harsh and eccentric character would seem to have made him many enemies. At Vienna he was charged with having murdered his wife; but he demanded proofs of his ever having had one; then he was accused of having stabbed his mistress, which charge he also refuted. At his death he left a fortune of upwards of £20,000, which devolved upon his son, sisters, and mother. b. at Genoa, 1781; d. at Nice, 1840.

PAGET, William, first Lord, pa-jet, was the son of a serjeant-at-law in the reign of Henry VIII., who, taking favourable notice of the son, made him clerk of the signet, afterwards of the council, and of the privy seal. In these employments he conducted himself with so much discretion and skill, that Henry sent him as ambassador to the French court, and on his return conferred upon him the honour of knighthood.

He also made him secretary of state, and appointed him one of the executors of his will. At the beginning of the reign of Edward VI., he was sent on an embassy to the emperor Charles V.; and on his return received fresh dignities, of which he was deprived and sent to the Tower, in consequence of his connexion with the duke of Somerset. Paget was reinstalled in his employments by Queen Mary, and continued in favour during the reign of Elizabeth. b. 1561.

PAGI, Antoine, pa'-zhe, a French monk, who undertook the laborious work of examining and correcting the "Ecclesiastical Annals" of Cardinal Baronius. The first volume of his work appeared at Paris in 1639; the three remaining volumes were printed after his death, at Geneva. b. at Rogues, Provence, 1624; d. at Aix, 1690.

PAGI, Francois, nephew of the preceding, whom he assisted in editing Baronius, and published the three posthumous volumes. He was also the author of a "History of the Popes."—There was a Jesuit of this name, who was a nephew of the above, and wrote a "History of Cyrus the Younger," the "Retreat of the Ten Thousand Greeks," and a "History of the Revolutions in the Low Countries." d. 1721.

PAULEN, Peter, Count, pai'-len, descended from a noble Livonian family, was appointed military governor of Petersburg by the emperor Paul; but fearing to fall a victim to the capricious disposition of that monarch, formed a conspiracy against him, caused him to be strangled in 1801, and proclaimed his son Alexander emperor. Soon afterwards he withdrew from public life. b. 1760; d. 1826.

PAINE, Thomas, pain, an English writer, who was the son of a Quaker, and was brought up to the trade of a staymaker. After working for some time at this occupation in London, he obtained a place in the excise, at Sandwich, in Kent. About the year 1761 he found employment as teacher in a school in the suburbs of London, but quitted that post to again enter the excise. Having drawn up a statement of grievances under which his fellow excisemen laboured, it was submitted to one of the commissioners, who was so struck by the excellence of the style in which the paper was written, that he gave Paine a letter of introduction to Benjamin Franklin. The latter recommended him to emigrate to America. Thither he accordingly went; and, after contributing articles to the periodicals for a short time, became editor of the "Philadelphia Magazine" in 1775. In the following year he produced a work entitled "Common Sense," of which Burke afterwards spoke as "that celebrated pamphlet which prepared the minds of the people for independence." This small work was the means of obtaining for its author the sum of £500 from the legislature of Pennsylvania, the M.A. degree from the university of that province, and the membership of the American Philosophical Society. Whilst the American war was in progress, he produced a series of patriotic appeals to the people; and in 1781 was chosen to accompany Colonel Lawrence to France, in order to negotiate a loan. In this affair he was perfectly successful, and, upon his return to America in 1785, he obtained the appointment of clerk to the Assembly of Philadelphia, a gift of 3000 dollars, and a small estate near New Rochelle. Upon the conclusion of the war, he engaged in mechanical speculations, the prosecution of which led him first to Paris and afterwards to London. There he remained several years, and in 1791-2 published his "Rights of Man," in answer to Burke's "Reflections on the French Revolution." This work was condemned as a "false, scandalous, malicious, and seditious libel," and Paine, as its author, was brought to trial in the Court of King's Bench. Notwithstanding an eloquent defence made for him by the Hon. Thomas Erskine, he was found guilty. (See ERSKINE.) Paine, however, contrived to effect his escape to France, where he became a member of the National Convention; but, having written a pamphlet in favour of preserving the life of Louis XVI., he was thrown into prison by Robespierre; upon whose fall he was restored to liberty. He remained in France until the year 1802, his pen constantly engaged in producing social, political, and theological works, the title of one of which may be given, as affording a notion of the Utopian character of at least a portion of Paine's efforts. It was called, "Agrarian Justice opposed to Agrarian Law and to Aristarian Monopoly; being a plan for meliorating the condition of man, by creating in every nation a national fund, to pay to every person, when arrived at the age of twenty-one years, the sum of fifteen pounds sterling, to enable him or her to begin the world; and also ten pounds sterling during life to every person now living of the age of fifty years, and to all others when they arrive at that age, to enable them to live an old age without wretchedness, and go decently out of the world." In 1802 his friend Mr. Jefferson, who had been elected president of the United States, offered Paine a passage to America in a sloop of war, which Paine accepted. The latter years of his life were spent in producing works upon the building of ships of war, iron bridges, &c. Several years after his death, Cobbett caused his remains to be brought to England, where he expected to find them greeted with enthusiasm; but the undertaking brought only ridicule upon himself. In his political writings, Paine displayed a clear and vigorous style; but his religious treatises are defaced by scurrility of language, and betray great ignorance. b. at Theftord, Norfolk, 1737; d. in America, 1809.

Paisiello

PAISIELLO, Giovanni, pai'-se-ail'-lo, a celebrated Italian composer, who was sent, at an early age, to the Jesuits' College of Tarento, to receive his education, and manifested such a decided taste for the musical art, that his father was prevailed upon to place him at the Conservatory at Naples, where the future composer made great progress under the tuition of the eminent musician Durante. Having produced a comic interlude, while a student of the above-named institution, he was employed to compose an opera for the Marsigli theatre at Bologna. This was the commencement of his professional career, and his reputation became so great, that he was in a few years commissioned to write operas for nearly every great city in Italy. In 1776 he accepted an invitation from Catharine II. to go to Russia, where he resided during nine years. In 1785 he returned to Naples, where he remained, although he received flattering invitations from Russia, France, and England. Upon the decease of Hoche, the celebrated French general, he wrote a funeral symphony, for which Napoleon made him a rich present. In 1799 a revolution burst forth at Naples, which resulted in the establishment of a republican form of government, under which reinstated in them after a short absence. He subsequently became chapel-master to Napoleon when first consul; for whom, also, when he constituted himself emperor, Paisiello produced a coronation "Te Deum." After spending nearly three years in Paris, he returned to Naples, and when Joseph Bonaparte became king, he nominated the composer to several high appointments, affixing to them a liberal salary. Napoleon I. created him chevalier of the Legion of Honour, and the French institute elected him an associate. Of this great composer, the Chevalier Le Sueur writes, "Paisiello was not only a great musician: he possessed a large fund of information, was well versed in the dead languages, and conversant with all the branches of literature. Endowed with a noble mind, he was above all mean passions; he knew neither envy, nor the feeling of rivalry." Two of his melodies, "Hope told a flattering tale," and "For tenderness formed," have attained to a world-wide popularity. n. 1741; n. 1816.

PAIXHANS, Henry Joseph, paiz'-han, a celebrated French general of artillery, and the inventor of the guns and projectiles which bear his name, was educated at the Polytechnic School, and selected the artillery, in which service he rose to the rank of general. The Paixhans guns are adapted to throw shells and hollow shot. These guns and projectiles were used on board the Russian fleet at the battle of Sinope, where the Turkish ships were annihilated by their deadly effects. General Paixhans wrote several works, chiefly on the subject of his inventions. n. at Metz, 1783; n. 1854.

PAIRON, Claude Pierre, pa'-zhoh, a distinguished French soldier, who entered the army in 1791, served in all the campaigns of the Republic, and rose to the highest military honours. Nominated general of division in 1812, he commanded the vanguard in the Russian campaign, when he took Minsk and some other towns; was left for dead at the battle of Leipsic in 1813, recaptured Montreuil from the allies in 1814, and had gained possession of Namur at the moment when the battle of Waterloo decided the fate of Bonaparte. He then retired from the service of his country, but re-entered it in 1830, when the revolution of July broke out, and directed the attack of the Parisians upon Rambouillet, which led to the flight of Charles X. For these services he was made a peer of France. n. 1772 n. 1844.

PAKINGTON, Sir John S., pa'-king-ton, a Conservative statesman who represented Droitwich from 1837 to 1869. He served under Lord Derby in three administrations, having been colonial secretary in 1852, first lord of the Admiralty in 1853 and 1866, and secretary of state for war in 1867. n. at Powick Court, Worcestershire, 1760.

PALEOLOGUS, pal'-le-oh'-o-gus, the name of a celebrated royal house, which gave a monarch to Constantinople, in the person of Michael VIII., in 1260. Between this year and 1453, when the Greek empire fell, there reigned seven princes of this house; viz., Michael VIII., Andronicus II. and III., John V., Manuel II., John VII., and, last of all, Constantine XII. Two members of the same family afterwards reigned at Patras and Argos, but were dethroned by Mahomet II. in 1439 and 1461.

PALAFOX, Jean de, pal'-a-fox, a Spanish prelate and historian, who studied at Salamanca, after which he was appointed a member of the council of war, and next of that of the Indies; but renouncing civil distinctions for the ecclesiastical state, he was made a bishop in Spanish America, with the title of judge of the administration of the three viceroys of the Indies. While there he administered justice with strict impartiality; but, through the intrigues of the Jesuits, was compelled to return to Spain. He wrote the "History of the Siege of Fontarabia," "History of the Conquest of China by the Tartars," and some religious works. n. in Aragon, 1600; n. 1619.

PALAFOX, Don Joseph, famous for his heroic defence of Saragossa in 1808-9, was sprung from an old Aragonese family, and having entered the military service of Spain at an early age, accompanied Ferdinand to Bayonne; but, on the resignation of that monarch, he returned to Aragon, and lived in retirement at a short distance from Saragossa. Proclaimed governor of Saragossa by the people, he took instant measures to sustain the siege; and such was the effect of his combined intelligence and determination, that with a comparative handful of men, the city manfully resisted an overwhelming force, and at length compelled the French general to retreat after a siege of sixty-one days and the loss of thousands of his men. But Marshals Mortier and Monecy marched in November of the same year, at the head of a large army, to recommence the siege. After suffering two defeats before Saragossa, Palafox once more retired within its walls, and commenced the same vigorous course of action which had been previously crowned with success; but on this occasion the besiegers were backed by a force more terrible than themselves: an epidemic fever was raging in the garrison; and Palafox, who was attacked by it, was obliged to resign the command on the 20th February, to General St. Marc, who signed a capitulation the next day. Palafox was sent into France, and was kept a prisoner at Vincennes till the restoration of Ferdinand. In 1814 he became captain-general of Aragon, but took little part in public affairs for many years before his death. n. 1780; n. 1847.

PALAYE, N. de la Curue, pa'-lay', a French historical writer, who became a member of the French Academy, and of that of Inscriptions and Belles-Lettres. He wrote "Memoirs of Ancient Chivalry," a work of curious research, and was also the author of a "Memoir upon the Chronicle of Glibet," in the Memoirs of the Academy of Inscriptions. n. at Auxerre, 1697; n. 1791.

PALEARIUS, Aodinus, pal'-e-air'-i-us, a learned Italian writer, who, after studying at different places, became professor of Greek and Latin at Sienna; but being suspected of Lutheranism, found it necessary to withdraw to Lucca, and thence to Milan, where he was arrested and sent to Rome. The Inquisition caused him to be burnt for heresy in 1578. He wrote a Latin poem on the "Immortality of the Soul," and some theological works, which were condemned by the council of Trent. n. at Veroli, near Rome.

PALESTRINA, John Peter Louis, pa'-lais-tre'-na, a celebrated Italian composer, whose musical education was completed under Claude Goudmel, an eminent French musician, and a Huguenot, who was one of the victims of St. Bartholomew. In 1551 Palestrina became chapel-master to Pope Julius III., but lost the post when Paul IV. attained the tiara in 1555. After remaining for some time in a poor and neglected condition, he obtained the office of director of chapel music to Santa Maria Maggiore. The Council of Trent having resolved to reform the music of the church, by getting rid of the vulgar melodies which had crept into the sacred service, Palestrina was engaged to write a mass of a grand and solemn nature. He entered upon his task with religious enthusiasm, and produced a work which set a great example for later musicians to follow, and which is one of the most beautiful masses to be found in the whole catalogue of Roman Catholic church music. Soon after he had completed this mass, he was reinstated in his former post at the Vatican. The subsequent years of his life were spent in composing sacred music for the Roman church. Dean Aldrich adapted three of his motets to the 41th, 63rd, and 115th Psalms, the first and third of which are frequently heard in English cathedrals, viz., "We have heard with our ears," and "Not unto us." After death, his remains were interred in St. Peter's, and were attended to the tomb by the most distinguished persons in Rome. b. near Rome, 1524; d. in the same city, 1594.

PALEY, Dr. William, pai'-le, a learned English divine and theological writer, who received his elementary education under his father, who was master of Giggleswick school, in Yorkshire. He was afterwards sent to Christ's College, Cambridge, where, in 1763, he took the degree of B.A., and was elected fellow in 1766. He distinguished himself as a tutor, and became the friend of Dr. Law, bishop of Carlisle, who gave him a living in Cumberland, and afterwards that of Appleby, in Westmoreland. He also obtained a prebendal stall in the cathedral of Carlisle, with the living of Dalston. About 1780 he became chancellor of Carlisle. In 1785 he published his "Elements of Moral and Political Philosophy." His next work was "Horæ Paulinæ," or "Observations upon the Epistles of St. Paul;" in which he draws a comparison between the epistles and the history of the apostle as given in the Acts; and from what he terms the "undesigned coincidences," seeks to prove the genuineness of revealed religion. His "Evidences of Christianity" appeared in 1794. After this, Dr. Paley obtained a prebend of St. Paul's from the bishop of London, the subdeanery of Lincoln from the bishop of that diocese, and the living of Bishop-Wearmouth from the bishop of Durham. To the last-mentioned prelate he dedicated his book entitled "Natural Theology," which was given to the world in 1802. This work, one of the best-known and most delightful in the English language, was edited and annotated by Lord Brougham and Sir Charles Bell in 1845. Lord Brougham, in his preliminary discourse, states that he undertook the task of producing an edition of Paley, in consequence of an observation that he had often made, that scientific men are apt to regard the study of revealed religion as little connected with philosophical pursuits. "Many of the persons to whom I allude," he says, "were men of religious habits of thinking; others were free from any disposition to scepticism; but the bulk of them relied little upon natural theology." b. at Peterborough, 1743; d. 1805.

PAIGRAVE, Sir Francis, pül'-grain, an eminent

Palladius

English historian and historical antiquary, who first became known in literature as the editor of some learned works published under the sanction of the commissioners of public records. In 1831 he produced a valuable little work, entitled "History of England.—Anglo-Saxon Period," for the series named "The Family Library;" and in the following year was knighted for his services to constitutional and parliamentary literature. His valuable "Rise and Progress of the English Commonwealth.—Anglo-Saxon Period; containing the Anglo-Saxon Policy and the Institutions arising out of the Laws and Usages which prevailed before the Conquest," was produced in the same year. In the preliminary inquiries which led to the reform of the municipal corporations of England and Wales, he took an energetic and distinguished part, and was soon afterwards created deputy keeper of her majesty's records. Whilst worthily filling that post, he published a series of works of the greatest value to the students of English literature; some of the most important of which were, "Calendars and Inventories of the Treasury of the Exchequer," "Documents Illustrating the History of Scotland," and "Truths and Fictions of the Middle Ages." The first volume of his greatest work, the "History of Normandy and England," was given to the public in 1851. b. in London, 1783; d. 1861.

PALISSY, Leonard, pal'-lis-se, a celebrated French potter and chemist, who, for his ingenuity in painting on glass and other works, was patronized by Henry III., who endeavoured to persuade him to become a Roman Catholic. But Palissy was an inflexible Calvinist, and would not comply; for which he was, in his old age, imprisoned in the Bastille. He wrote several works upon natural philosophy, and upon subjects connected with the art of pottery. The best edition of his works, which are full of valuable and enrious experiments, is that of Paris, 1843, with the notes of M. Faujas de St. Fond. His pottery has become celebrated, and few things are more prized by the connoisseur than the famous "Palissy ware." b. about 1500; d. in the Bastille, 1593.—Mr. Morley has written an interesting biography of "Palissy the Potter."

PALLADIO, Andrew, pal'-la-de-o, a celebrated Italian architect, who at first commenced the study of the art of sculpture, but Trissino the poet advised him to apply himself to architecture, and sent him three times to Rome, where Palladio studied and designed after the ancient monuments of that city. In these pursuits he discovered the true principles of an art which, in his time, was buried in Gothic barbarity. Among the noble structures which this illustrious architect built, one of the principal is the theatre called the Olympic, at Vicenza. He published a valuable treatise on architecture in 1570, with plates; and after his death was published a work of his on the antiquities of ancient Rome. b. at Vicenza, 1518; d. 1580.

PALLADIUS, pal'-la-di-us, an early Christian father, who became a hermit in 333, and in 401 was chosen bishop of Helenopolis, in Bithynia. For his attachment to St. Chrysostom he was greatly persecuted, and driven from his diocese. At the desire of Lausus, governor of Cappadocia, he wrote the "History of Anchores." There is also attributed to him a Life of Chrysostom, in a dialogue, Greek and Latin.

Pallas

PALLAS, pál-lis, a freedman of the emperor Claudius, over whom he had so great an ascendancy, as to persuade him to co-*p*ouse Agrippina, his niece, and to adopt Nero for his successor. Pallas, in concert with Agrippina, is charged with having hastened the death of Claudius by poison. Nero subsequently caused him to be secretly put to death, confiscated his treasure, amounting to upwards of two millions sterling; but erected a superb monument to his memory. Pallas was brother to the Felix before whom St. Paul pleaded.

PALLAS, Peter Simon, pál-las, a celebrated German naturalist and traveller, who was educated for the medical profession. In his youth he likewise evinced a great aptitude for the acquirement of languages, and for any knowledge bearing upon the natural sciences. After visiting the universities of Halle, Göttingen, and Leyden, he proceeded to London in 1761, and there assiduously studied the collections of natural history. In 1763 he went to the Hague, and published a work upon zoology, which acquired him great reputation, and led to an invitation from the empress Catharine to St. Petersburg. Thither he proceeded in 1767, and was appointed professor of natural history in the Imperial Academy of Sciences. Shortly afterwards he formed a member of the expedition despatched to Northern Russia and Siberia, for the purpose of investigating the natural history of those regions. After an absence of six years, during which his companions and himself penetrated as far as the frontiers of China, he returned to St. Petersburg in 1774, with a large mass of notes and observations, to arrange and publish which cost him several years of intense application. For his services he was ennobled, and appointed preceptor to the grand-dukes Alexander and Constantine. In 1791 he proceeded to the newly-conquered province of the Crimea, where he resided during fifteen years, busily engaged in accumulating facts and preparing his scientific works for publication. At length, feeling the advance of age, he requested permission to return to Germany; and, this being granted, he arrived at Berlin after an absence of forty-two years. Pallas was an untiring observer of natural phenomena, and a most voluminous writer. His works, says Cuvier, "have placed the name of their author in the first rank of naturalists, who are constantly referring to and quoting from every page of them." They are also read and consulted with equal interest by the historian, the geographer, and the student of languages or of nations." The most valuable of his works are: "Travels through different Provinces of the Russian Empire;" an uncompleted work on the animals of European and Asiatic Russia, entitled, "Zoographia Rosso-Asiatica;" a "History of the Mongolian Nations;" and "Travels through the Southern Provinces of the Russian Empire." He likewise contributed a number of papers on geology and natural history to the "Transactions" of the Academy of St. Petersburg, and to those of the Royal Society of London and the Institute of France, of which learned bodies he was a member. b. at Berlin, 1741; d. 1811.

PALLAVICINO, Sforza, pal-lap-pe-cho-no, an eminent Italian cardinal, who, though the elder son of a noble family, renounced the advantages of birth, and entered the order of the Jesuits. After his novitiate, he professed philosophy and theology in his society. Innocent X. employed him in several important affairs, and Alexander VII. made him cardinal. His principal work is a "History of the Council of Trent," written in opposition to that of Father Sarrpi. The style is good, but the book is partial. He was also the author of a treatise on "Style in Written Composition," and a philosophical "Treatise on Happiness." b. at Rome, 1607; d. 1667.

PALLAVICINO, Ferrante, an Italian writer, who became a canon regular of the order of St. Augustine; but, having written some severe satires against Pope Urban VIII. and his relatives the Barberini, he found it expedient to retire to Venice, as a price was set upon his head. A Frenchman, who pretended to be his friend, persuaded him to go to France, promising him a brilliant career. Ferrante followed his advice, but was no sooner out of the Venetian territory than he was seized and conducted to Avignon, where he was put to death. The man who had betrayed him was assassinated some time afterwards by a friend of Pallavicino. His works were printed at Venice. The principal is entitled, "The Celestial Divorce; or, the Separation of Christ from the Roman Church." b. at Parma, 1615; executed, 1611.

PALLISSER, Sir Hugh, pál-lis-er, an English admiral, who early in life distinguished himself in the navy, and was made post-captain in 1746. He was at the taking of Quebec, and was made comptroller of the navy, and created a baronet in 1773. Serving as second in command under Admiral Keppel, in the famous engagement off Ushant, July, 1778, a misunderstanding arose between them, and Sir Hugh preferred a challenge against Admiral Keppel, who was acquitted. Sir Hugh was then tried in his turn and reprimanded. He was, however, a brave and experienced officer, and became governor of Greenwich Hospital. b. 1721; d. 1796.

PALMER, Samuel, pal-mer, a learned printer, who exercised his profession with great reputation in London, and in whose office the celebrated Dr. Franklin was employed. He wrote a "History of Printing." d. 1732.

PALMER, Sir Romell, an eminent lawyer who, after a successful career at Rugby and Oxford, was called to the bar in 1837 and became Q.C. in 1849. He first entered Parliament for Plymouth in 1847, and became solicitor-general under Lord Palmerston in 1861. He held office as solicitor-general from 1861 to 1866. He has gained distinction as a poet, and edited the "Book of Praise," a selection of hymns in 1862. b. 1812.

PALMER, John, the first projector of mail-coaches, was a native of Bath, where he was brought up as a brewer, but subsequently solicited and obtained a patent for a theatre in his native city, which soon proved eminently successful under his management. Being much in the habit of travelling from place to place, the idea occurred to him that a better mode of conveying the mails was desirable, and he accordingly matured the plan of transmitting letters by coaches with guards, now superseded by railways. He succeeded in his object, though not without great opposition; but the utility of the plan soon became manifest, and he was made comptroller-general of the post-office, with a salary of £1500 a-year.

Some disputes, however, occurring, he lost his situation in 1792; and though he afterwards, through petitions, was reimbursed by Parliament, the compensation was very inadequate to the percentage he was to have received in case his plan succeeded. D. 1818.

PALMERSTON, Henry John Temple, Viscount, pal-mer-ston, a modern English statesman, whose family, the Temples, are descended from a Saxon earl, anterior to the Conquest, although the title belongs to the Irish peerage. Sir William Temple, diplomatist, friend of William III., and patron of Dean Swift, is one of the most famous members of the same family. The future prime minister was first sent to Harrow school, afterwards to the university of Edinburgh, and finally to St. John's College, Cambridge; where, in 1806, he took a M.A. degree. In his twenty-first year he sought to enter the House of Commons as the representative of the University of Cambridge, but was defeated by Lord Henry Petty, afterwards Marquis of Lansdowne. Shortly afterwards, however, he was returned to Parliament for the borough of Bletchingley, and at a later period succeeded in securing the suffrages of the university of Cambridge. From the very outset of his parliamentary career, his ability and business talents were conspicuous, and in 1807, although only in his twenty-fifth year, he became a junior lord of the treasury in the Tory administration of the duke of Portland and Mr. Perceval. In the following year he made his first great speech in Parliament, in opposition to a motion of Mr. Ponsoby for the production of papers relative to Lord Cathcart's expedition to Copenhagen. In 1809 he was appointed secretary at war, upon the resignation of Lord Castlereagh. In this office he remained through the various Tory administrations for nearly twenty years. But in this interval his political views had undergone considerable modification, and after Canning's death he found himself unable to co-operate with the Tories. Between May, 1828, and March, 1830, he was without office; and, as an independent member, signalized himself so much upon foreign questions, that when the Whigs came into power, he received the appointment of foreign secretary, and kept it until the year 1834. After the fall of the Conservative ministry of Sir Robert Peel, in the following year, Lord Palmerston again resumed his functions in the Foreign Office. He remained in office until 1841, and it was during these six years that the name of Palmerston became so celebrated as a foreign minister. Throughout the continent, from Spain to Turkey, his name represented the power and influence of England—an object of fear and execration with some governments, of admiration with others; synonymous with alertness, brilliancy, and foresight with all. Between the years 1841 and 1846, he was in opposition to the Conservative ministry of Sir Robert Peel; but in the last-mentioned year was again appointed foreign secretary under the Whig administration of Lord John Russell. His too ready acknowledgment of the coup d'état effected by Louis Napoleon in 1851, led to serious differences between himself and his colleagues, and, in consequence, he was compelled to resign. His secession, however, speedily led to the fall of the Russell ministry, and upon the accession of the Coalition administration, in the following year, he took the office of home secretary. The mismanagement of affairs in the Crimea brought about the fall of the Coalition ministry in 1855; immediately after which Lord Palmerston reached the apex of power as first lord of the Treasury, and prime minister of Great Britain. His too great deference to the wishes of a foreign potentate, in the matter of the "Conspiracy Bill," introduced to the House of Commons shortly after the attempt upon the life of the emperor of the French by Orsini and others, aroused the strongest feelings in this country against his cabinet. Before that expression of public indignation he was compelled to retire, and to give place to the Conservative ministry of Lord Derby. In 1859, however, he overcame the Conservative party, and returned to power as premier. The tendency and results of his long political career may be studied with advantage in two works, entitled, respectively, "Opinions and Policy of the Right Hon. Viscount Palmerston, as Minister, Diplomatist, and Statesman; with a Memoir by G. H. Francis," and "Thirty Years of Foreign Policy: a History of the Secretaryships of the Earl of Aberdeen and Lord Palmerston." B. at Broadlands, Hampshire, 1784; D. 1865.

PAMPHILUS, pam-fi-lus, a painter of Macedon, who flourished under King Philip. He was the first who applied the laws of proportion and of perspective to his art, which he honoured by his manners and his talents. He founded a school at Sicyon, the most famous of all the ancient academies of painting, and procured an edict that none but those of noble birth should be instructed in painting. The same law was afterwards extended throughout Greece. Apelles was the disciple of this master. Flourished in the 4th century B.C.

PAMPHILUS, St., bishop and martyr, of Cæsarea, in Palestine; to which city he presented a library, consisting of most of the works of the ancients. He transcribed the Bible with his own hand, and with the utmost exactness. He was put to death about 300.

PAMPHILUS. (See EUSEBIUS.)

PANÆTIUS, pan-æ-shi-us, a Stoic philosopher of Rhodes, who studied at Athens under Diogenes the Stoic with such credit as to be offered the rights of citizenship, which he refused, saying, "A modest man is content with one country." He afterwards went to Rome, where he had numerous disciples; among the rest, Lælius, Scipio, and Polybius. Panætius accompanied Scipio in his expeditions, and rendered eminent services to the Rhodians by his interest with that commander. Cicero mentions a work of his on the Duties of Man, which is lost. Flourished in the 2nd century B.C.

PANCKOUCKE, André Joseph, pan-kook', a French writer, who produced, among other numerous works, "Studies for Young Ladies," "History of the Counts of Flanders," "A Collection of Bon-mots," "Dictionary of French Proverbs," and "Essays on Philosophers." B. at Lille, 1700; D. at Paris, 1753.

PANCKOUCKE, Charles Joseph, son of the preceding, was a publisher at Paris, and his skill in typography made him celebrated all over Europe. He established the "Moniteur" newspaper and the celebrated "Encyclopédie Méthodique." His works are, "Mathematical Memoirs," addressed to the Academy of Sciences; translations of Lucretius, of Tasso's "Jerusalem," and of the "Orlando Furioso" of Ariosto; a "Philosophical Discourse on Beauty," and another on "Pleasure and Grief." n. at Lille, 1736; d. at Paris, 1795.

PANIGAROLA, Francis, pa'-ne-ga-ro'-la, an eminent Italian prelate, whom Sixtus V. created bishop of Asti, and sent with Bellarmine and Cardinal Gaetano to France, to strengthen the party of the League against Henry IV. On that occasion Panigarola displayed great zeal and eloquence. On his return he set about reforming his diocese, which is said to have given such offence that he was poisoned. He was the author of some fine sermons, which were printed at Rome; but his principal work is a treatise on the eloquence of the pulpit, under the title of "Il Predicatore." n. 1548; d. 1594.

PANIN, Nikita Ivanowitch, Count de, pa-nin, a Russian statesman, whose father, who was lieutenant-general in the service of Peter I., came originally from Lucca, in Italy. Panin commenced his career in the cavalry-guards of the empress Elizabeth; but having secured the patronage of Prince Kourakin, he became gentleman of the chamber. By his address he gained the favour of his sovereign, who sent him, in 1747, to Copenhagen, and afterwards to Stockholm, with the title of minister plenipotentiary. On his return he was made governor of the grand-duke Paul, and lastly prime minister to Catharine II. He was a man of considerable powers and enlarged views, and during his stay in Sweden conceived a great admiration of the more liberal form of government existing in that kingdom, and which he afterwards attempted to introduce into Russia, but without success. n. 1718; d. 1782.

PAOLI, Pasquale de, pa'-o'-le, a famous Corsican patriot, whose father, Giacinto de Paoli, was in 1735 elected one of the chief magistrates of the island, and subsequently acted as a leader in the revolt against the Genoese. On being compelled to quit Corsica, he retired to Naples with Pasquale, who was placed in the military college of that city. After serving for a short time as lieutenant in the Neapolitan army, he was invited by the Corsicans to become their captain-general. In 1755 he put himself at the head of his countrymen, and, during twelve years, waged a fierce war with the Genoese, who were in the end driven from almost every fort in the island. Meanwhile, Paoli had to contend against a powerful chief named Matra, who, bribed by Genoa, excited civil dissensions amongst the Corsicans; but the patriot at length defeated and killed him, and forced his brother to seek refuge in Italy. Paoli established a legislative assembly, in which sat 500 deputies, elected by the country. This assembly elected an executive body of nine members, of which Paoli was the president, with the titles of general of the kingdom and chief of the supreme magistracy of Corsica. He organized a well-trained militia of 30,000 men, and established a fleet, which constantly harassed the Genoese vessels. Genoa, however, gave up the island to France in 1763; and soon afterwards a large force was landed, under the command of Count Marseus, against whom Paoli and his followers fought desperately, and in two engagements defeated the French with great slaughter. But large reinforcements arriving to the invaders, the Corsicans were totally routed at Pontenovo; whereupon the island submitted. Paoli went first to Leghorn and afterwards to England, where he remained until 1789, in which year, Mirabeau having moved in the National Assembly the recall of all Corsican patriots, Paoli repaired to Paris. He was received with enthusiasm in the French capital, and was appointed by Louis XVI. military commandant in Corsica. Whilst the government of France was monarchical, Paoli remained faithful; but, at the outbreak of the Revolution, he requested the assistance of the English in driving the French out of Corsica. The crown of the kingdom was subsequently offered to the king of Great Britain, and Sir Gilbert Elliot named viceroy. The Corsicans had desired that Paoli should have been appointed to that office; and, to avoid dissensions, the patriot quitted the island and went to England, where he resided until his death, living upon a pension allowed him by the British government. His remains were interred in Westminster Abbey, where there is a monument to his memory. n. at Rostino, Corsica, 1726; d. near London, 1807.

PAULUCCIO, Paul Anafesto, pa'-o'-loot-che'-o, the first doge of Venice, before whose time the republic was governed by tribunes chosen every year. The Venetians elected Pauluccio doge in 497. d. 717.

PAPIRUS, pa-pi'-ri-us, surnamed Cursor, or the Courier, from the swiftness of his riding, was at first master of the horse to Crassus, and became dictator of Rome about 326 B.C. He defeated the Samnites several times, and appropriated the spoils to the building of a temple to Fortune. Livy declares Papius Cursor to have been the most illustrious general of his time, and worthy of contending with Alexander the Great, had the latter turned his arms against Rome after the subjugation of Asia.

PAPPUS, Alexandrinus, pap'-pus, a philosopher and mathematician of Alexandria, whose most important writings are, "Mathematical Collections," a Latin version of which appeared in 1588; a comment upon the "Almagest" of Ptolemy; "Description of the Rivers of Libya;" "Treatise on Military Engines;" "Commentaries on Aristarchus, concerning the Magnitudes and Distances of the Sun and Moon," a translation of which last was published by Halley. Flourished at the close of the fourth century.

PARACELSUS, par'-a-sel'-sus, an extraordinary individual of the 16th century, generally so called, but who styled himself Philippus Aureolus Theophrastus Paracelsus Bombast. His father was the natural son of a prince, and gave him an excellent education. Paracelsus, who had a fertile genius, applied himself to the study of medicine, in which he made great progress. He went to France, Spain, and Italy, for improvement, and on his return to Switzerland, settled at Bale, where he acquired great reputation by his practice, in which he first made use of those two powerful medicines, mercury and opium. His charges, however, like those of empirics in general, were exorbitant, and, having cured a canon of a dangerous complaint, his demand was so great that the patient refused to pay it, which produced a hearing before the council, who ordered the canon to pay only the accustomed fee. This so irritated Paracelsus, that he left Bale and went into Alsace, where he became noted as an alchemist, and pretended to have found not only the philosopher's stone, but the elixir of life. He, nevertheless, died poor and at a comparatively early age. The best edition of his works is that of Huser, at Basel, 1600. Brandt thus speaks of his labours: "His original discoveries are few and unimportant, and his great merit lies in the boldness and assiduity which he displayed in introducing chemical preparations into the Materia Medica: but though we can fix upon no particular discovery on which to found his merit as a chemist, and though his writings are deficient in the acumen and knowledge displayed by several of his contemporaries and immediate successors, it is undeniable that he gave a most important turn to pharmaceutical chemistry; and calomel, with a variety of mercurial and antimonial preparations, as likewise opium, came into general use." B. in Switzerland, 1493; D. at Salzburg, in the Tyrol, 1511.

PARADISI, Agostino, Count, pa'-ra-dé-se, an eminent Italian poet, whose verses obtained for him admission to the Academy of Reggio at the early age of sixteen. After visiting Genoa, Venice, and Bologna, he in 1772 became professor of belles-lettres in the university of Mantua. In 1776 the duke of Mantua created him a count. His lectures were attended not only by his countrymen, but by distinguished persons from France and Germany. He returned to Reggio in 1780, and held a high official appointment there, giving his leisure to literary pursuits until his death. B. at Vignola, 1736; D. 1793.

PARMO, Louis de, pa'-ra-mo', a Spanish inquisitor, who published at Madrid, in 1593, a curious work, called the "Holy Office," a history of the Inquisition, written with great candour and accuracy. D. about 1619.

PARENTS, Ignatius Gaston, par'-de, an eminent French mathematician, who entered the order of the Jesuits at the age of sixteen, and afterwards became professor of rhetoric in the College Louis-le-Grand at Paris. His principal works are, "Dissertation on the Nature and Course of Comets," "Discourse on Local Motion," "Elements of Geometry," and "Discourse on the Knowledge of Beasts." B. 1636; D. 1673.

PARDON, Miss Julia, par'-do, a modern English authoress, who, in her thirteenth year, composed a volume of verse, and shortly afterwards an historical romance entitled "Lord Moreau of Hereward," the action of which took place in the time of William the Conqueror. Her health being delicate, she was sent to Portugal, where she remained for some time, and, upon returning to England, produced a series of tales and sketches in a little work entitled "Traits and Traditions of Portugal," which ran through several editions. Encouraged by this success, she resolved to devote herself to literature, and produced, in quick succession, "Speculation," and "The Mardons and the Daventrys." During the terrible visitation of the cholera to Constantinople, in 1835, Miss Pardoe was a resident of the city. Of that sojourn the literary fruits were, "The City of the Sultan," "The Romance of the Harem," and "The Beauties of the Bosphorus." "The River and the Desert" was also the result of her Eastern experiences. An historical sketch of Hungary and its institutions subsequently emanated from her pen, under the title of "The City of the Magyar." Some historical works of a more ambitious character succeeded; the most important of which were, "Louis XIV.; or, the Court of France in the 17th Century," "The Life of Francis I.," and "The Life of Marie de Medici." These last, however, met with less success than her works of imagination.

tion, and to that path Miss Pardoe afterwards returned, producing "The Confessions of a Pretty Woman," "The Rival Beauties," "The Jealous Wife," &c. B. at Beverley, Yorkshire, 1806; D. 1862.

PARÉ, Ambrose, pa'-rai', the most celebrated of the old French surgeons, who, after completing his education, went to Italy with the French army, and served during several campaigns, gaining so great a reputation that, in 1552, Henry II. appointed him his surgeon. Though a Protestant, he was afterwards surgeon to Francis II., Charles IX., and Henry III.; and, at the time of the massacre of St. Bartholomew, Brantôme tells us that Charles IX. saved him by shutting him up in his own bedroom. Paré made several discoveries in anatomy, and wrote some esteemed books on surgery. B. 1511; D. 1590.

PARÉDES, Diego Garcia de, pa'-rai-dais, an eminent Spanish general, usually styled "the Spanish Bayard," who, entering the army at an early age, fought gallantly against the Moors at Baza, Velez, and Malaga, in 1485. When the Moorish war was concluded by the capture of Granada, in 1492, he sought further distinction on the battle-fields of Italy. He was appointed to a high rank in the army of Pope Alexander VI., and served with distinction under the papal banner during seven years. In 1501 he assisted at the capture of Cephalonia from the Turks, was taken prisoner, but contrived to effect his escape. During the war between the French and Spaniards in Naples, Paredes was one of the most undaunted and skilful soldiers in the ranks of the latter power. At the battle of Cerignola, he commanded the Spanish centre, and during the fight contended alone against a number of French knights until his own men came up. Some assert that he subsequently cruised in the Levant as a corsair; but this is doubtful. At the famous battle of Pavia, however, he greatly signalized himself, and it is said assisted in taking Francis I. prisoner. B. in Spain, 1466; D. 1530.

PARÉJA, Juan de, pa'-rai-ha, an eminent Spanish painter, who was a West Indian half-caste, and became the slave of Diego Velasquez. In the absence of his master, Pareja laboured assiduously in drawing and copying his works; but secretly, for fear of giving offence. Philip IV., king of Spain, coming one day to visit Velasquez, Pareja contrived to place in his way one of his own pictures, with which his majesty was extremely pleased. The slave then fell on his knees, and besought the king to ask his master to forgive him. Philip not only did this, but obtained him his liberty. The faithful Pareja, however, would not quit Velasquez, and, after his death, continued to serve his daughter. His portraits are very fine, and were so close a copy of his master's style, that they could not be distinguished from them. B. in the West Indies, 1610; D. 1670.

PARENIN, Dominic, pa'-ren'-nā, a celebrated Jesuit, who was a missionary in China, where he was greatly esteemed by the emperor Kang-Hi, for whom he translated into Chinese several articles upon scientific subjects. A difference arising between the Chinese and Russian courts, Parenin was charged to negotiate a reconciliation, which he effected. After his death, his remains were magnificently interred by order of the emperor. In Duhalde's "China" are several curious maps and letters PARENT, Antoine, pa'-rang, an eminent French mathematician, who was educated for the law, which he renounced for science, and became a member of the Academy, whose memoirs he enriched with many valuable papers. His most important works are "Mathematical and Philosophical Researches," "Theoretical and Practical Arithmetic," "Elements of Mechanics and Natural Philosophy." p. at Paris, 1666; p. 1716.

PARENT-DUCHATLET, Alexandre Jean Baptiste, doo-shut'-e-lui, an eminent French physician and writer, who, upon the conclusion of his medical studies, commenced the practice of his profession at Paris, in 1811. After spending some years in that pursuit, his attention was directed to questions concerning the public health. He laboured at this task with great devotedness during fifteen years, and to his exertions, some of the most useful and efficient reforms in the sanitary arrangements of Paris were due. He wrote extensively on subjects connected with the public health, and, in 1824, produced a great work upon the common sewers of the French capital, and another upon the cholera. p. at Paris, 1790; p. 1836.

PARENT, Joseph, pa-re'-ne, an eminent Italian poet, whose pursuit of knowledge in early life was sustained under considerable difficulty. In his 23rd year he produced a volume of poems, which attracted the notice of the Borromei family, in which he became tutor. His next work was the first portion of a poem entitled "Il Giorno," a famous piece in Italian literature. This gained him the patronage of Count Firmian, the Austrian minister in Lombardy, and through his influence Parini subsequently became professor of eloquence in the college of the Brera at Milan. When Bonaparte entered Milan at a later period, he caused him to be chosen magistrate; but the poet soon retired from the office. p. 1729; p. at Milan, 1796.

PARRIS, Matthew, par'-is, an English historian, was a monk of the order of Benedictines, at St. Albans. He was a man of great knowledge and integrity, and was employed by the pope in reforming the monasteries of Norway, which service he discharged with wisdom and zeal. His principal work is a "History of England from the Conquest to the death of Henry III.," of which an edition, by Archbishop Parker, was published in London, in 1571. p. about 1196; p. 1250.

PARRIS, John Ayrton, an eminent English physician, who commenced the study of medicine in his 14th year, at the Westminster Hospital. He next passed to Caius College, Cambridge, and there graduated M.D. In his 23rd year he became physician to Westminster Hospital, but subsequently went to Penzance, in Cornwall, where he remained in the exercise of an extensive practice until the year 1817. About two years later, he published a "Treatise on Diet," which, although superseded at the present time by works embodying the discoveries of eminent chemists, was a valuable treatise at the period of its production, and attracted much attention from the public. Upon the death of Sir Henry Hallford, in 1814, he became president of the Royal College of Physicians. Among many other works, he was the author of the "Life of Sir Humphry Davy," and "Philosophy in Sport made PARK, Joseph, pa'-rai-doo-rat'-nai, a French financier of the 18th century, who reduced the national debt in France by nearly one half. In 1724 he proposed a measure for the abolition of pauperism, and afterwards suggested to Louis XV. the marriage with Maria Lezinski. In 1726 he was imprisoned in the Bastille; but afterwards regained his liberty, and was reinstated in the favour of the court. This capitalist helped both Voltaire and Beaumarchais to make considerable fortunes.

PARK, Mungo, park, a distinguished African traveller, was the son of a substantial Scotch farmer, who gave him a good education. Mungo, while a boy at the parodical school of Kirk, was indefatigable in his application, and was always at the head of his class. "Even at that age," says his biographer, "he was remarked for being silent, studious, and thoughtful; but some sparks of latent ambition occasionally broke forth, and traces might be discovered of that ardent and adventurous turn of mind which distinguished him in after-life." In his 15th year he was apprenticed to a surgeon at Selkirk, and remained in that capacity for three years. In 1780 he went to the University of Edinburgh, and after completing his professional education there, repaired to London, where, through the introduction of Sir Joseph Banks, he obtained an appointment as assistant-surgeon to the Warrender East India man. In this vessel he sailed for Sumatra in 1792, and upon his return, in the following year, published an account of some new fishes which he had observed upon that coast. Soon afterwards, Sir Joseph Banks introduced him to the African Association, by whom Park was engaged to solve a problem which was engaging the minds of geographers; viz., the existence and course of the River Niger. In 1795 he left England, and reached Pisania, some 200 miles up the river Gambila, at which place he stayed several months, acquiring the Mandingo language. Settling out at length, he penetrated as far as Yarra, a frontier town of Ladannar, where he was detained by the chief for five months; at the end of which time he made his escape with a horse, a few articles of clothing, and a pocket compass. Thus scantily equipped, he pushed on to Sego, and thence explored the river Joliba down to Saba; after which he proceeded as far as Kamalia, a Mandingo town 500 miles from any European settlement. There he was prostrated by fever which passed away in a month; but it was five more before Park could obtain the means of travelling to Pisania. This last place was reached, however, after an absence of nineteen months, and he was there welcomed by a friend "as one risen from the dead." After his return to London, where he was warmly received by the scientific public, he commenced the preparation of a narrative of his travels. The work was completed and published in 1799, and was highly successful. In 1801 he commenced practice as a surgeon at Peebles, in Scotland; having in the meanwhile married the daughter of his old master at Selkirk. In 1805 the government sent him to Africa, in command of an expedition, the object of which was to prove whether the Congo and the Niger were one stream. Park proposed to cross from the Gambia to the Niger, and then to sail down that river to the ocean. In May, 1803, Park and his party, consisting of his brother-in-law, a surgeon, a draughtsman, five artisans from the royal dockyards, thirty-five privates of the royal African corps, under the command of Lieutenant Martyn, and a Mandingo guide, left Pisania. After penetrating beyond the Gambia, the party went on to Foulah Dougon, by which time eleven white men had died. In an eight days' march from Foulah Dougon to Sego, twenty-six men were lost by the rains, damps, &c. Upon his departure from Sansanding, Park wrote to the colonial secretary: "I am sorry to say that of forty-four Europeans who left the Gambia in perfect health, five only are at present alive; viz., three soldiers (one deranged in his mind), Lieutenant Martyn, and myself. We had no contest whatever with the natives, nor was any one of us killed by wild animals or any other accidents. Your lordship will recollect that I always spoke of the rainy season with horror, as being extremely fatal to Europeans; and our journey will furnish a melancholy proof of it." After leaving Sansanding, Park proceeded towards Haoussa, and, from that time, neither he nor his companions were ever again seen. Their fate was narrated by their guide, who declared that, after Park had quitted Yaouri, the chief of that place falsely stated that the white men had gone away without leaving the usual present. The king became enraged at this, and put the guide, who had been left behind, in prison, and sent a number of armed men to intercept Park and his companions at the narrows of the river. When the guide obtained his release, he gathered from a slave who had been with Park, that the white men's boat had been drawn into a rapid whilst they were endeavouring to effect their escape from a party of the natives who were attacking them. Mungo Park was possessed of many qualities calculated to raise him to high distinction as a traveller, had his career not been so unhappily and so prematurely brought to an end. He was of an athletic frame, had a fair share of scientific knowledge, was cool, courageous, and self-possessed, and, above all, was scrupulously veracious in his observations. n. at Fowlishels, near Selkirk, Scotland, 1771; d. at Boussa, 1805.

PARKER, Matthew, par-ker, an eminent English prelate, who was educated in Corpus-Christi College, Cambridge, of which he became fellow. Through the interest of Anne Boleyn, he was made chaplain to Henry VIII., and, in the succeeding reign, was chosen master of his college; but in that of Mary he was deprived of his preferments. On the accession of Elizabeth, Dr. Parker was preferred to the archbishopric of Canterbury. The archbishop was zealous in promoting the Reformation and in restraining the encroachments of the Puritans. He superintended the improved translation of the Scriptures, called the Bishops' Bible, which was completed in 1568. He was particularly versed in Saxon literature and early English history, and published an edition of Matthew Paris, a treatise on the "Antiquity of the English Church," and other works. n. 1504; d. 1575.

PARKER, Samuel, an English prelate, who received his education at Wadham College, Oxford. His father was a member of the High Court of Justice, and one of the barons of the Exchequer during the Commonwealth; but, at the Restoration, became king's serjeant-at-law.

Parker

The son followed his example, by complying with all changes. He was at first a zealous Puritan, but conformed to the Church of England, and obtained preferment. In the reign of James II., he was made, for his servility in supporting the king's arbitrary measures, bishop of Oxford and privy councillor. He was also constituted president of Magdalen College, in violation of the privileges of that society. He wrote the "History of His Own Time." Andrew Marvell, in his "Rehearsal Transposed," held Parker up to ridicule. The bishop replied, but with little effect. He is said to have contemplated, with James II., the placing of the English church under the authority of the pope. n. at Northampton, 1629; d. 1687.

PARKER, Richard, an English seaman, who was the chief of the mutineers at the Nore in 1797. He was a native of Exeter, and had received a good education; after which he entered the navy, and became a midshipman, but was reduced in rank for some misconduct. Having a good address and great fluency of speech, he was chosen principal of the delegates when the sailors rose on account of their wages and prize-money: on which occasion he assumed the command of the fleet, and was called Admiral Parker. He ruled with great authority for some time, to the alarm of the nation; but, when the insurrection was suppressed, was tried and executed on board the Saulwich, in 1797.

PARKER, Sir William, a distinguished English admiral, who entered the navy at a very early age, and, in 1706, assisted in the attack made upon St. Domingo. In 1801 he obtained post rank; and in the year 1806 he, with the Amazon frigate, engaged the Belle Poule and Murongo, two French vessels, both of which he captured after a long running fight. This and other acts of bravery won for him the order of the Bath. In 1830 he became rear-admiral, and was sent with an English fleet to the Tagus. Between the years 1831 and 1841, he acted as a lord of the Admiralty, but in the latter year succeeded Admiral Elliot in the command of the naval operations in China. With the co-operation of Lord Gough, he captured Chusan, Ningpo, and, forcing the entrance of the Yellow River, appeared before Nankin. For these services he was created a baronet in 1814. During the revolutions of 1813, he commanded the Mediterranean fleet, and in the autumn of 1819 was sent with an English fleet to the Dardanelles, to encourage the sultan in his resistance to the demands of Austria and Russia with respect to the Hungarian refugees. In 1854 he became post-admiral at Plymouth. n. at Alington Hall, Staffordshire, 1781; d. 1866.

PARKER, Theodore, an eminent American theologian, received his education at Cambridge, Massachusetts, and afterward became pastor of a Unitarian congregation at Roxbury. Between the years 1810 and 1843, he contributed extensively to the "Christian Examiner," and about 1811, formed a collection of his most important articles, which were published under the title of "Critical and Miscellaneous Writings." He shortly afterwards gave to the public a "Discourse on Matters of Religion," wherein he declared his views relative to the authority of the Church, the infallibility of the Scriptures, and as to the divine attributes of our Saviour. For this expression of his sentiments, the Unitarian communities of Boston rejected him; upon which, he placed himself at the head of a congregation called the Twenty-eighth Congregational Society of Boston. A rationalist minister belonging to no sect, a theoretical politician belonging to no party, his sermons, delivered occasionally to very large congregations, were filled with allusions to every possible topic,—questions of politics or morality, political or domestic economy, war, reform, or slavery. In 1852 he published "Sermons of Theism, Atheism, and Popular Theology," and "Discourses, Addresses, and occasional Sermons." His latest works were, "Ten Sermons on Religion," and "Old Age." b. in Massachusetts, 1810; n. at Florence, 1859.

PARKURST, John, par-kur-st, a learned English divine, who was educated at Cambridge, and afterwards settled at Epsom, in Surrey. He was the intimate friend of Bishop Horne, with whom he shared in admiring the opinions of Hutchinson. He published a Greek and English, and a Hebrew and English lexicon, and wrote an answer to Dr. Priestley on the Pre-existence of Christ, and a pamphlet against John Wesley. b. at Catesby, Northamptonshire, 1728; d. at Epsom, Surrey, 1797.

PARRA, Alexander, Duke of. (See FARNES, Alexander.)

PARMENIDES of Elis, par-men-i-dee, a Greek philosopher, and the disciple of Xenophanes. He asserted the rotundity of the earth, which he placed in the centre of the solar system. He also maintained that heat and cold were the principles of all things. In metaphysics, he held that ideas are real, and have no dependence on the will. Flourished about the 5th century b. c.

PARMENIO, par-me-ni-o, a celebrated Macedonian general under Philip and Alexander, who contributed to the victories of the Granicus and Issus, and served with fidelity until advanced in years. After the battle of Arbela, Parmenio was appointed governor of Media; but his son Philotas having been accused of conspiring against the king's life, was put to the torture, and stoned to death. Orders were next sent to the subordinates of Parmenio to put him to death, which was done by Cleander, one of his officers. 329 b. c.

PARMENTIER, John, par-men-te-ai, a French navigator, who was the first who conducted vessels to the coast of Brazil. He was well skilled in astronomy, and drew several good maps. b. at Dieppe, 1192; d. at Sumatra, 1543.

PARMENTIER, James, a French historical and portrait painter, who settled in England, and resided chiefly in Yorkshire. He executed, among other works, the altar-piece of St. Peter's, at Leeds. b. 1655; d. 1730.

PARMIGIANO. (See MAZZUOLI, Francesco.)

PARNELL, Thomas, par-nel, an Irish poet and divine, who was educated at Trinity College, Dublin, where he took his degree of M.A. and entered into orders. He obtained a living in Ireland, and the archdeaconry of Clogher. He was the friend and correspondent of Pope, Swift, Gay, Arbuthnot, and other eminent wits of the time of Queen Anne. Dr. Parnell wrote the Life of Homer for Pope's translation. His poems were published in one volume; the principal is that entitled "The Hermit." He also wrote some papers in the "Spectator." b. at Dublin, 1679; d. at Chester, 1717.

PARNY, Evariste Désiré Desforges, par-ne, a French poet, usually styled "the Tibullus of France," was destined for the church, but entered the army, became captain of dragoons, and, as aide-de-camp, accompanied the governor-general of the French East Indies to Pondicherry. In 1786 he quitted the military service and retired to an estate in France, where he gave himself up to depicting, in verse, an all-absorbing passion for a young and beautiful creole lady. On her side, however, the attachment was of an evanescent nature; for she shortly afterwards married a planter, who had more money than the poet. Parny's chief works were included in a collection of the French classics made by Lefevre, in 1827. b. in the Isle of Bourbon, 1733; d. 1814.

PARR, Catherine, par, sixth wife of Henry VIII., was the daughter of Sir Thomas Parr, and received, according to the custom of that age, a learned education. She was a friend of the Reformation, on which account Bishop Gardiner and other zealots of the Romish church endeavoured to effect her ruin; but, by her prudence, she preserved the king's favour till his death. In 1547 she married Sir Thomas Seymour, lord admiral of England, who is said to have treated her so ill as to cause her death. She wrote Prayers, Meditations, and other religious pieces. b. 1543.

PARR, Thomas, a Shropshire peasant, who lived to the age of 152 years and 9 months. At the age of 100 he did penance for an illegitimate child, and at 120 he married a second wife, by whom he had issue. In 1635 he was brought to London by Lord Aumond, and introduced at court to King Charles I.; but the change of air, and mode of living, particularly drinking wine, occasioned his death the same year. b. 1483.

PARR, Samuel, a learned English divine, who was destined for the profession of surgery; but a decided inclination for the study of the ancient classics induced his father to send him to Cambridge, where he pursued a very brilliant career, which was, however, cut short by the death of his parent, in 1707. He next became assistant in Harrow school, and after the death of the master, Dr. Sumner, offered himself as candidate for the appointment. He was unsuccessful, and thus led him to retire to Norwich; after which, he, in 1756, settled at a small living in Warwickshire, where the remainder of his life was spent. He was a man of vast learning and strong political views; but although he left a mass of writings of great erudition, no great work emanated from his brain. b. at Harrow-on-the-Hill, 1746; d. 1825.

PARRHASIUS, par-rat-se-us, a celebrated Greek painter, who was a native of Ephesus, but became a citizen of Athens, and was the contemporary and rival of Zenxis. He studied under Socrates; by which means he was enabled to give to his figures the expression of strong passions. In an allegorical picture, he represented the people of Athens with all the distinctive traits of their national character. He styled himself the "Prince of Painters." Flourished about the 5th century b. c.

PARROCEL, Joseph, par-ro-sel, an eminent French painter and engraver, who studied first under one of his brothers, and afterwards under Bournignon, the famous battle-painter. He was a member of the French Academy of Painting. Parrocel painted portrait, history, and battles; he also engraved in a good style. b. at Brignolls, Provence, 1618; d. 1701.—His son Charles was an excellent painter, and a member of the Academy. n. 1752.—Peter Parrocel, nephew and pupil of Joseph, was an historical painter of great merit. n. at Arignon, 1739.

PARRY, Sir William Edward, par'-re, an eminent English navigator, who, in 1803, entered the royal navy on board the Ville de Paris, flag-ship of the Channel fleet. After seeing a good deal of service in the Baltic, in the Northern seas, and upon the American coast, he became lieutenant, returned to England in 1817, and shortly afterwards was appointed to the command of the Alexander, one of two ships sent out under Captain Ross, for the purpose of ascertaining the probabilities of a north-west passage from the Atlantic to the Pacific. The expedition set sail from the Thames in April, 1818, and, on the 30th of August, in the same year, reached Lancaster Sound, which was found to be free from ice; but, instead of proceeding, Ross retraced his course, and set sail for England. The Admiralty subsequently discovered that Lieutenant Parry's views were totally opposed to those of his late commander; whereupon he was appointed to the command of another expedition, during which he discovered Barrow Strait, Melville Island, Prince Regent's Inlet, and the Wellington Channel. He also gained a reward of £5000 for penetrating within the Arctic circle. In November, 1820, he reached England, and was soon afterwards promoted to the rank of commander, and elected F.R.S., &c. His experiences were given to the world in the following year, in a work entitled "Journal of a Voyage for the Discovery of a North-West Passage," which was produced under the authority of the Lords of the Admiralty. In May, 1821, he went out in command of a second expedition to the Arctic regions, during which he discovered the Fury and Hecla Strait, and, after an absence of nearly three years, returned to England. A record of this voyage was given in his work entitled "Journal of a Second Expedition for the Discovery of a North-West Passage." In 1824 he again sailed northwards as commander of a third expedition, which, however, met with much less success than his former ones. He was absent little more than a year, during which one of the two exploring vessels was wrecked. In 1826 Captain Parry published his third journal, and soon afterwards became hydrographer to the Admiralty. In 1827 he submitted a proposal for reaching the north pole by means of a land expedition in flat-bottomed boats, and was accordingly sent out in command of the Hecla, in 1827. When the expedition reached Treurenberg Bay, on the north coast of Spitzbergen, two flat-bottomed boats were dispatched across the ice, one under the orders of himself, the other under Lieutenant Ross. After undergoing great hardships, the boats were drawn over the ice until the latitude of 82° 45' was attained,—the nearest point to the pole then reached. After an absence of 61 days from the ship, the boats returned, and shortly afterwards the Hecla sailed for England. A narrative of this expedition, which closed the labours of Captain Parry in the Arctic regions, was published in 1827, with the title, "Narrative of an Attempt to reach the North Pole in Boats fitted for the purpose." In 1829 he went out to Australia as commissioner of the Agricultural Company of that colony, and remained there until the year 1834.

Pascal

Meanwhile he had been created a knight, and, in 1837, was appointed to supervise the packet service between Liverpool and Ireland. Between the years 1837 and 1846, he acted as comptroller of the steam machinery for the royal navy. In 1852 he was promoted to the rank of rear-admiral of the White, and, in 1853, became lieutenant-governor of Greenwich Hospital, an office he filled until his death. He received the degree of D.C.L. from the University of Oxford at the same time as the gallant Sir John Franklin. n. at Bath, 1709; d. 1855.

PARSONS, or PERRONS, Robert, par'-sons, a celebrated English Jesuit, who was educated at Balliol College, Oxford, of which he became bursar and dean in 1572, but being charged with embezzling the college money, went to Rome and turned Catholic. He there obtained leave from the pope to establish a seminary for the education of English students designed for missionaries for the propagation of the Roman Catholic faith in their native country. Parsons frequently visited England, where he endeavoured to foment sedition, and a price was set upon his head. He was a subtle disputant, and wrote several polemical books, and others on practical divinity. n. 1546; d. at Rome, 1610.

PARTHENAY, Catharine de, par'-te-nai, heiress to the lordship of Soubise, was married in 1668 to the Baron de Pons, and in 1675 to René, Viscount Rohan. The famous duke de Rohan, who so courageously defended the Protestant cause in France during the civil wars of Louis XIII., was her eldest son. Catharine, one of her daughters, who married the duke of Deux-Ponts, made the following answer to Henry IV., who solicited her favours: "I am too poor, sire, to be your wife, and too proud to be your mistress." Catharine de Parthenay was at Rochelle in the time of its siege, and when the place surrendered, she and her daughters were sent to the castle of Niort. She published poems in 1673, and two years afterwards a tragedy, entitled "Judith," was performed at Rochelle. She also translated the "Precepts of Isocrates" into French, and wrote some other pieces. b. 1554; d. 1631.

PARROT, Mrs. Sarah, par'-ton, was the sister of Mr. N. P. Willis, an eminent American littérateur. She contributed for many years articles to several American serial publications under the well-known nom-de-plume of Fanny Fern. n. about 1910.

PASCAL, Blaise, pas'-kal, a celebrated French philosopher, whose father, the president of the Court of Aids in Auvergne, superintended his education; but though he was himself a mathematician, he interdicted his son from that study. Young Pascal, however, in secret applied to geometry, and, without any assistance, demonstrated one of the most difficult propositions in Euclid. His father then permitted him to pursue his inclination, and, at the age of 16, the youth published his treatise on conic sections, which Descartes could not believe to be the production of a mere youth. At 19 he invented an arithmetical machine, which, though simple, was unequalled. The Torricellian experiment next engaged his attention, and, at the age of 24, he made considerable improvements upon it. Not long afterwards, he solved a problem proposed by Mersennus, which had perplexed all the mathematicians in Europe. His great mind was now suddenly diverted to religious studies. Becoming more abstracted from the world, he retired to the congregation of the Port Royal, where he applied to the reading of the Holy Scriptures. But he was not altogether indifferent to the passing scenes of society. He his bold and original principles and practices of that celebrated order were exposed in a fine strain of ridicule, and with the irresistible force of truth. Boileau and Voltaire have pronounced them the finest productions in the French language. The life of this remarkable man was written by his sister, Madame Perier. The first complete edition of his works was produced at Paris by M. Fougère, in 1811. Paschal was justly called by Bayle "one of the sublimest spirits in the world." b. in Auvergne, 1623; d. at Paris, 1662.

PASCHAL I., Pope, päs'-kal, was a Roman, of the name of Paschasius, and succeeded Stephen V. in 817. He crowned Lothaire, the emperor, at Rome. d. 824.

PASCHAL II. was a native of Tuscany, and succeeded Urban II. in 1099. He had a contest with the emperor Henry IV., and also with Henry I., king of England, respecting the right of investitures. The former visited Rome to be crowned by the Pope, who refused to perform the ceremony unless he yielded the matter in dispute. On this, Henry caused Paschal to be seized by his troops, which gave so much offence to the Romans, that they rose in behalf of their pontiff, and Henry retired from Rome, but carried the pope with him. Paschal, after a captivity of two months, renounced his claim to the investitures. This concession was afterwards cancelled in two councils. d. 1118.

PASCHAL III. became pope in opposition to Alexander III., in 1165, through the influence of the emperor Frederick I. He remained in possession of the papal chair while Alexander was absent at Benevento. d. 1168.

Ivan Fedorowitch, vitsh, a Russian general, who was descended from an ancient Polish family, but was educated at St. Petersburg, and afterwards became aide-de-camp to the emperor Paul. His first service in the field was at the battle of Austerlitz, in 1805; in the following year he was the bearer of the Russian ultimatum to the Porte, and narrowly escaped death at Constantinople. At the assault of Brailov he was left; but was picked up, and was shortly afterwards promoted to the rank of colonel for his gallantry. In 1812 he fought against the French at Borodino; was subsequently nominated to the command of a division of the Russian army, amounting to 30,000 men, and, after fighting in the campaign in Germany, assisted at the capture of Paris. Subsequently to the peace, he made a three years' tour in Europe, as the companion of the grand-duke Michael; and, after the accession of the emperor Nicholas, was appointed to the command of the Russian army on the Persian frontier. War broke out between Russia and Persia about the same time, and Paskewitch defeated the shah's army at Elizabethpol and at Erivan. The treaty of Turkmanchai restored peace between the belligerents; but war against Turkey almost immediately followed. In 1829 he took Kars, and, in the following year, Erzeroum; for which services the emperor Nicholas created him field-marshal. In 1830 he fought against the Circassians, and, in the year following, succeeded Marshal Diebitsch as commander of the Russian army acting against the Poles. His invariable good fortune attended his efforts, and he was soon the master of Warsaw. Elevated to the rank of Prince of Warsaw, and created governor-general of Poland, he spent the subsequent sixteen years in crushing the nationality of that country, and in converting Warsaw into a strong fortress capable of overawing the Poles. In 1849 he went into Hungary as commander of a powerful Russian army, and was soon afterwards able to commence a dispatch to Nicholas with the words, "Hungary is at your feet." When war broke out between Turkey and Russia, Paskewitch was summoned to the field; but was slightly wounded at the repulse of the Russians at Silistria. He was shortly afterwards seized with an illness which terminated in his death. As a military commander, he was held, by the most competent judges, to be only mediocre; but the large and well-equipped armies he led against the Persians, and, at a later period, against the exhausted Hungarians, enabled him to achieve successes which were little dependent upon his own skill in warfare. b. at Pultowa, 1782; d. at Warsaw, 1856.

Passesment

PASLEY, Sir Charles William, päs'-le, an eminent British engineer officer, who at first served in the artillery, but subsequently exchanged to the engineers. He was at the defence of Gaeta in 1806; at the siege of Copenhagen in the following year; was aide-de-camp to Sir John Moore in Spain in 1808-9; and chief engineer to the marquis of Huntley's division in the Walcheren expedition. At the siege of Flushing he received a wound in the thigh and an injury to the spine. He subsequently served in the Peninsular war. Among his most important publications may be mentioned—"Course of Military Instruction, for the Use of the Royal Engineer Department," "Exercise of the New-decked Pontoon," invented by himself; "Rules for Conducting the Practical operations of a Siege," and a very valuable work to architects and many sections of the general public, entitled "Observations on Limes, Cements, Mortars, Stuccoes, Concretes, &c." In 1853 he was named colonel-commandant of the royal engineers, having previously been created lieutenant-general, and a knight commander of the Bath, as well as receiving the degree of D.C.L. from the university of Oxford. b. about 1781; d. 1861.

PASQUIER, Stephen, pas'-kear, an eminent French lawyer, who pleaded so ably against Versoris, the defender of the Jesuits, that Henry III. made him and Versoris equal to the Chamber of Accounts. His works are, "Researches relative to the History of France," an authority upon the civil history of the old French monarchy; letters, portraits, epigrams, and epitaphs. The most celebrated of his poems is that called "Puce," over which the author's seeing a flea on the forehead of a lady. b. at Paris, 1520; d. 1615.

PASSEMANT, Claude Simon, pass'-mont, a French mechanician, who was bred to trade, but having a great inclination to scientific pursuits, devoted himself to the construction of mathematical instruments. He published an account of a large reflecting telescope, made by him in 1733, and also constructed an astronomical pendulum surmounting a celestial sphere, which he presented to Louis XV. n. at Paris, 1702; p. 1769.

PASSERI, John Baptist, pas'-se-re, an eminent Italian painter and poet, was the disciple of Domenichino. He wrote, "Lives of the Painters, Sculptors, and Architects" of his time, a work containing thirty-six lives. n. at Rome, about 1610; p. 1679.

PASSERONI, John Charles, pas'-se-ro'-ne, an eminent Italian poet, who was educated under the Jesuits at Milan, and was afterwards ordained a priest. He went to Rome with Lucini, the papal nuncio, but constantly refused all preferment, choosing rather to live a studious life in a condition almost bordering upon destitution. Returning to Milan, he became a member of the Institute of the Cis-Alpine Republic, and wrote a poem entitled "The Cicerone," in which he ridiculed the follies and vices of society. The poem is highly original in style and treatment, and is so flowing and natural, that its author has been compared to Ovid. He also wrote several volumes of fables in verse, after the manner of Æsop, Phædrus, and others. n. at Condamine, Nizza, 1713; p. at Milan, 1803.

PASSIONEI, Dominic, pas'-se-o-nai'-e, an eminent Italian cardinal, was of an illustrious family at Fossombrone, in the duchy of Urbino. He formed a rich library and collection of manuscripts. In 1706 he went to Paris, where he was much respected, particularly by Montfaucon: thence he went to Holland, and was at the congress at Utrecht in 1712. He was employed in various negotiations, particularly in Switzerland; of which he published an account, under the title of "Acta Legationis Helveticæ." He pronounced the funeral oration of Prince Eugene, and was made archbishop of Ephesus. His library was purchased by the Augustine monastery, which, thus increased, became one of the finest at Rome. n. 1683; p. 1761.

PASTA, Judith, pas'-ta, a celebrated Italian singer, who was of Hebrew extraction, and studied music at the Conservatoire of Milan. In 1816 she appeared at the Italian Opera of Paris, and afterwards passed to London, but obtained only a small amount of success in both these cities. This partial failure caused her to return to Italy for the purpose of increasing her musical knowledge. In 1820 she again sang at several of the principal Italian opera-houses, and everywhere met with an enthusiastic reception. At Paris, where she reappeared in the following year, she achieved the greatest triumphs as a vocalist, and when she reappeared in London, was greeted with a brilliant reception. After reigning as the queen of song during fifteen years, she, in 1836, retired to a magnificent villa on the Lake of Como. n. near Milan, 1793; p. 1867.

PATEL, Pierre, pu'-tel, an eminent French painter, commonly called by his countrymen the French Claude, from his imitation of that master. His landscapes are very beautiful. n. in France, 1654; killed in a duel, 1703.

PATERCULUS, Caius Velleius, pai'-ter'-ku-lus, a Roman historian, who commanded the cavalry in Germany under Tiberius, and was rewarded with the prætorship. He wrote an epitome of Roman history, which is extant, and which commences with a period anterior to the foundation of Rome, and concludes with the times of Tiberius and Sejanus. n. about 19 B.C.; p. it is supposed, 81 A.D.

PATERSON, William, pät'-er-son, the originator of several celebrated projects in the 17th century, of whose early life scarcely anything is known. By some he is stated to have belonged to the clerical profession; to have acted as a missionary in the West Indies, and afterwards as a buccaner. He first came into notice as the projector of certain schemes in trade and banking, which he submitted to the merchants of London, after having proposed them, without success, to the trading communities in the Low Countries. His banking projects are said to have been the foundation of the Bank of England, which was incorporated in 1694; but it is asserted that the rich capitalists quarrelled with and discarded him, after they had availed themselves of his suggestions. His next scheme was the famous Darien expedition, for the purpose of establishing, on that isthmus, a trading colony, which should rival the English East India Company. Paterson obtained an act of the Scottish Parliament, in 1694, for the incorporation of "The Company of Scotland trading to Africa and the Indies." The scheme was stoutly opposed in England, and as warmly supported in Scotland, where it became quite a national speculation. The principles upon which the company proposed to trade, appear to have been sufficiently sound, and likely to render Scotland, as was represented in the English Parliament, "the general storehouse for tobacco, sugar, cotton, hides, and timber;" but the selection of the isthmus of Darien as a central point where the commerce of the East and the West was to meet, proved a most disastrous choice; for the expedition ended in total failure. Paterson was deeply afflicted at the unfortunate termination of his scheme, and returned to Scotland in a condition bordering upon insanity. His after-life was spent in obscurity. n. in Scotland, about 1660; p. unrecorded when.

PATKUL, John Reinhold, pat'-kul, a Livonian gentleman, who defended the liberties of his country against the oppressions of Sweden with great firmness, and in 1689 was deputed to address a memorial on behalf of the distressed people of Livonia to Charles XI., who took it as an act of treason, and caused a process to issue against Patkul, who was condemned to be beheaded. Thereupon he fled to Russia, and afterwards to Poland. When Charles XII. forced Augustus to make peace, he made it one of the conditions that Patkul should be delivered up; and this brave and unfortunate man was broken on the wheel in 1707.

PATON, Sir Joseph Noel, pai'-ton, a modern Scotch painter, who studied at the Royal Scottish Academy, and first attracted notice by his cartoon of "The Spirit of Religion," which obtained one of the £200 premiums given at the cartoon competition at Westminster Hall in 1845. Two years later, he won the second class prize of £300 for his paintings "Christ bearing the Cross," and "The Reconciliation of Oberon and Titania." His best works were "Quarrel of Oberon and Titania," purchased for the Scottish National Gallery for £1100; "Dante Meditating the Epistle of Francesca," "The Pursuit of Pleasure," and "Home." n. at Dunfermline, Fifeshire, 1823.

PATRICK, St., the apostle of Ireland, pat'-rük, is asserted by some to have been a native of Scotland, and by others, of Wales. In the "Catalogue of British Saints," he is said to have been principal of a college in Wales; but was taken captive by some pirates of Ireland, the inhabitants of which country he converted to Christianity. It appears certain that he was a bishop, and founded many churches and schools of learning. D. towards the close of the 5th century.

PATRICK, Peter, a native of Thessalonica, who was employed by Justinian in important negotiations, for which he was made master of PATRICK, Simon, a learned English prelate, who was educated at Queen's College, Cambridge, and, on entering into orders, obtained the living of Battersea, in Surrey, and afterwards that of St. Paul, Covent Garden. During the plague of 1665, he continued in London, administering the offices of religion to his parishioners. He became dean of Peterborough in 1673, and, in 1689, bishop of Chichester; whence he was translated to Ely in 1691. He is well known for his valuable commentary on the Old Testament, usually published with Louth on the Prophets, and Whitby on the New Testament. He was also the author of some controversial tracts against the Romanists and dissenters, and several books of practical divinity. B. in Lincolnshire, 1626; D. 1707.

PAUL, Oliver, po-troo, an eminent French lawyer, whose talents procured him a place in the French Academy in 1640; on which occasion he made an eloquent speech, which gave rise to the custom for all new members to deliver introductory orations. The critical judgment of Paul was so great that he was called the Quintilian of France; it also gained him the friendship of Racine and Boileau. His works consist of Memoirs, Letters, and Discourses. B. at Paris, 1604; D. 1681.

PATTISON, William, pat'-ee-son, an English poet of great genius, whose imprudence, however, made his life miserable and his death premature. Having quarrelled with his tutor at Sidney College, Cambridge, and fearing expulsion, he went to London, where he plunged into all the pleasures of the metropolis, was soon reduced to indigence, and died of small-pox in his 21st year. D. 1706.

PAUCON, Alexis, poke-trang, a French mathematician, who received his education in the mathematical and naval academy at Nantes, after which he went to Paris, where his integrity and talents procured him patronage and a place. His works are, "Metrology; or, a Treatise on the Weights, Measures, and Monies of all Countries, Ancient and Modern,"—a much-esteemed volume; "Theory of the Laws of Nature, with a Dissertation on the Pyramids of Egypt." B. in France, 1736; D. 1798.

PAUL I., Pope, pori, was the successor of Stephen, in 757. He engaged in disputes with Desiderius, king of the Lombards, but was supported by Pepin, king of the Franks. D. 767.

PAUL II. succeeded Pius II. 1464. He sought to organize a league of the Christian princes against the Turks, who, at the time, threatened to invade Italy, and also endeavoured to establish peace among the different Italian states. He had a great dislike to profane learning, and set up an academy which had been formed at Rome for the cultivation of Greek and Roman learning, many members of which were imprisoned and tortured. D. 1471.

PAUL III., whose name was Alexander Farnese, was elected to the papal chair, in succession to Clement VII., in 1534. In his reign the Council of Trent was called. He established the Inquisition, confirmed the Society of Jesuits, condemned the Interim of Charles V., and acted with rigour against Henry VIII. of England. D. 1549.

PAUL IV., John Peter Caraffa, was elected in 1555, at the age of 89. He was a bigoted prelate, and when Queen Elizabeth announced to him, by the English ambassador, her accession to the throne, he haughtily declared that the kingdom was a tief of the Holy See, and that she had no right to assume the crown without his leave, particularly as she was illegitimate. D. 1559.

PAUL V., Camillo Borghese, was elected in 1603, after the death of Leo XI. He had a dispute with the senate of Venice, over which he pretended to have a right; but it was so firmly resisted that the pope excommunicated the doge and senate. He also raised forces against the republic; but by the interference of the emperor and other states, peace was restored in 1607. He embellished Rome with many excellent works of sculpture and painting, and an aqueduct. The Borghese family, one of the wealthiest in Italy, owed its rise mainly to him. D. 1621.

PAUL I., emperor of Russia, was the son of Peter III. and Catharine II. He married Wilhelmina, daughter of the landgrave of Hesse-Darmstadt, who died two years after their union, in 1776. Paul took for his second wife a princess of Wurtemberg, and niece of the king of Prussia. Upon the death of Catharine II., in 1796, he succeeded to the throne, and for some time gave promise of proving a great prince; he released Kosciusko, the Polish patriot, Niemcewicz, and others who had been confined during the previous reign; but his real character soon afterwards displayed itself. In 1799 he entered into an alliance with Austria against France, and sent Suwarow with a large army into Italy; suddenly changing his views, he recalled his forces, formed a northern confederacy, and seized the persons and property of the English in his dominions. His conduct to his also became capricious and violent, and just as the northern coalition had been dissolved by Lord Nelson's destruction of the Danish fleet at Copenhagen, a plot was formed among the officers of his court. The conspirators entered the emperor's apartments at night, and presented to him an act of abdication for his signature. On his refusal, a scuffle ensued, and Paul was strangled. When the people of St. Petersburg heard of his death there were general rejoicings. B. 1754; strangled, 1801.

PAUL, called "THE DRAGON," wrote "The History of the Lombards," "Lives of the Saints, and of the Bishops of Metz;" also a work called "Historia Miscella," and a "History of Rome," in 24 books. He was secretary to Desiderius, king of the Lombards, and was afterwards in the service of Charlemagne. The Prince of Benevento invited him to his court, and on the death of that prince, Paul embraced the monastic life. B. about 740; D. 799.

PAUL DE SANTA MARIA, a learned Spanish Jew, who is said to have been converted to Christianity by reading the works of Aquinas. After the death of his wife, he entered into orders, and became preceptor to John II., king of Castile, who made him bishop of Cartagena, and afterwards of Burgos. B. at Burgos, about 1375; D. 1445.—His three sons were baptized with him; the eldest became bishop of Burgos, and wrote a "History of Spain;" the second was bishop of Placentia; and the third, Alvarez, wrote "The History of John II., King of Castile."

PAUL, FATHER. (See SARPI, Peter.)

PAUL of SAMOSATA, an heresiarch of the 3rd century, who received his surname from the place of his birth, a city on the Euphrates, and became patriarch of Antioch in 260. Being entertained at the court of Zenobia, queen of Syria, he endeavoured to gain her to the Christian faith, by explaining away its mysteries. For this purpose, he held that Christ was a mere man, and that the Trinity consisted not of persons but attributes. His errors were condemned by the council of Antioch, A.D. 270, and Paul was excommunicated. His disciples were called Paulinists. Lived in the 3rd century.

PAUL VERONESE. (See VERONESE, Paul.)

PAULA, St., pa'-o'-la, an eminent Roman lady, who was descended from the Scipios and the Gracchi. On becoming a widow, she retired to Bethlehem, where she founded a monastery and houses of hospitality, of which St. Jerome had the management. She practised the severest austerities and self-denial, which Jerome in vain endeavoured to moderate. She was acquainted with the Scriptures in the original Hebrew, in which she had Jerome for her master. B. 347; D. 407.

PAULDING, James Kirke, pau'-ding, an eminent American writer, who in 1807 began a career of authorship in collaboration with his brother-in-law, Washington Irving. With this gentleman, he wrote a series of satirical papers, entitled "Salmagundi." In 1813, he produced a burlesque poem, called, "The Lay of a Scotch Fiddle," and soon afterwards published a brilliant reply to some aspersions cast upon the American people in the "Quarterly Review." His next effort was an imitation of Swift, in a work entitled "The Diverting History of John Bull and Brother Jonathan," published in 1816. During the subsequent twenty years he continued to labour industriously with his pen, and in 1837 was appointed secretary of the navy, under the presidency of Van Buren. When that president retired in 1841, Paulding resigned the post, and again took up his pen. His best works are "Letters from the South," "The Dutchman's Fireside," "The Old Continental," "John Bull in America," "The New Pilgrim's Progress: a Satire," and "Tales of a Good Woman, by a Doubtful Gentleman." One of his finest novels, descriptive of life in the hackwoods, and entitled "Westward Ho," was published in 1832. This title has since been taken by Mr. Kingsley; but there is no further resemblance between the works. B. at Pawlings, Dutchess county, New York, 1779.

PAULINA, pau'-le'-na, the wife of the philosopher Seneca, who attempted to kill herself when Nero condemned her husband to death. The emperor, however, prevented her, and she survived for several years in the greatest melancholy.

PAULINUS, pau'-li-nus, a learned German missionary, whose real name was John Philip Werdin. He studied at Prague, and acquired a knowledge of some of the Oriental languages at Rome. In 1774 he went as missionary to the court of Malabar, where he remained during fourteen years. After his return to Rome, in 1790, he was employed in superintending the printing of religious works for the use of missionaries to Hindostan. He wrote a Sanskrit grammar, and various works upon the religion and literature of India. B. 1748; D. 1806.

PAULINUS, St., bishop of Nola, discharged the office of consul in 378, and about the same time married a Spanish lady, by whose means he embraced Christianity. He then retired to Spain with his wife, where he bestowed his goods in charity, and led a life of mortification. In 393 he entered into orders, and going to Italy, was chosen bishop of Nola. He was the author of some Discourses on practical charity, and Poems and Letters. B. at Bordeaux, 353; D. 431.

PAULINUS, St., patriarch of Aquileia, distinguished himself at the council of Frankfort in 794. He wrote a treatise on the Trinity. D. 804.

PAULMY, Mare Antoine René de Voyer, Marquis of, pole'-me, minister of state, and a member of the French Academy, was the son of the Marquis d'Arzenson. He collected one of the most magnificent libraries in Europe, which was sold to the Count d'Artois, brother to Louis XVI. M. de Paulmy published "Mélanges d'une grande Bibliothèque," in sixty-nine volumes. To him also is attributed a work entitled "Essays in the Style of those of Montaigne," B. at Valenciennes, 1722; D. 1787.

PAULUS ÆMILIUS. (See ÆMILIUS, Paulus.)

PAUSANIAS, pau'-sai'-ni-as, the son of Cleombrotus, king of Sparta, governed the kingdom for his cousin Pleistarchus during his minority. He also displayed great skill and valour against Athens, which city he took, and expelled the ten tyrants. Pausanias afterwards served against the Persians with equal glory, but being discontented with his country, he entered into a secret treaty with the king of Persia, which being discovered by the Ephori, he, to avoid the punishment due to his treason, fled into the temple of Minerva, which being held sacred, the Lacedæmonians blocked it up with stones, the first of which was placed by the mother of Pausanias. He was there starved to death, B.C. 407.

PAUSANIAS, a Greek historian and orator, who settled at Rome in the reign of Antoninus the Philosopher. Pausanias wrote "Travels in Greece," wherein he most minutely describes the buildings, monuments, statues, and paintings, as they existed 500 years after the most flourishing period of Greek art. Fuseli thus speaks of this valuable work: "The minute and scrupulous diligence with which what fell under its author's eye is there described, amply satisfies us, although there is a want of method and judgment. His description of the pictures of Polygnatus at Delphi, and of the Jupiter of Phidias at Olympia, are perhaps superior to all that might have been given by men of more assuming powers. They are inestimable legacies to our arts." Flourished in the second century.

PAUSTIAS, pau'-si-as, a painter of Sicily, who studied under Pamphilus, and was the fellow-pupil of Apelles and Melanthius. He worked in colours upon wood and ivory, according to the method now called encaustic painting. He drew a beautiful picture of his mistress Glycera, which was bought by Lucullus for two talents

Pauw, Cornelius. pon, a learned Dutch writer, who is known by his discourses on the Greeks, the Americans, the Egyptians, and the Chinese. These works are curious, and show considerable ability, but they are too conjectural. m. at Amsterdam, 1739; p. at Xanten, 1799.—There was another of this name who lived at Utrecht, and published several valuable editions of Greek authors, particularly Anacreon, in 1732.

PAXTON, Sir Joseph, pax'-ton, an eminent modern gardener, the designer of the building for the Great Exhibition of 1851, and of the gardens, terraces, and fountains of the Crystal Palace of Sydenham. Born of parents in moderate circumstances, he devoted himself to the pursuit of gardening, and was fortunate enough to attract the attention of the duke of Devonshire, who employed him first at Chiswick, and afterwards at Chatsworth. He subsequently became, besides chief gardener at Chatsworth, manager of the duke of Devonshire's large estates in Derbyshire. At Chatsworth he constructed a grand conservatory of iron and glass, which covers an acre of ground; and when the building committee of the Great Industrial Exhibition of 1851 seemed almost to despair of getting an appropriate design, Mr. Paxton submitted one prepared on similar principles: this design was accepted, and, with some slight modifications, carried out. The new style of architecture which he had thus created, was from the outset immensely popular. He afterwards prepared an improved design for the reconstruction of the same glass palace at Sydenham. For his services he received the honour of knighthood, and in 1854 was returned to Parliament as member for Coventry without opposition. He wrote many works on horticultural subjects, the chief of which are "Paxton's Flower Garden," and "The Pocket Botanical Dictionary."

French chemist, was the son of a gentleman largely engaged in industrial enterprises, and was sent to study chemistry under Vanquelin and Chevreul. About 1815 he assumed the directorship of a large manufactory of sugar from beetroot, and subsequently applied himself to the discovery and application of new manufacturing processes, by which he greatly contributed to reduce the price of many articles of food ordinarily used. Between the years 1827-44 he acted as member and reporter of juries on French industry. In 1836, he was appointed member of the council and professor of the school of arts and manufactures, and afterwards received a similar appointment at the Conservatoire des Arts et M^{ti}ers. In 1847 he was created officer of the Legion of Honour. M. Payen wrote extensively on subjects more or less intimately connected with agricultural and industrial chemistry. Among his most important works are "Course of Applied Chemistry," "Mthods on Vegetable Development," and "Manual of Organic Chemistry applied to Agriculture and Industy."

PAYAN, Roger, pain, an English bookbinder, who was remarkable for the elegance and strength of his binding. He was chiefly employed on scarce books, for the binding of which he received extraordinary prices. For an Æschylus, bound by him for earl Spencer, he was paid fifteen guineas. Payne lived in a cellar, and never worked while he had money. He made all his own to never suffer any person to see him in London, 1797.

PRANOV, (1807-1874), a charitable American broker, who settled in London in addition to providing ample fund-blishment of various institutions in parts of the United States, he died in 1874, portions of a sum of £500,000 to be expended for the benefit of the poor of London. The monies of the trustees of the fund was laid out by the dwelling-houses in London and in other cities and elsewhere.

PEACOCK, Resimund, pe'-kōk, an English prelate, was successively bishop of St. Asaph and Chester, by the favour of Henry, the good duke of Gloucester; but he was deposed for resisting the papal authority, and denying transubstantiation, with other articles of the Roman Catholic faith. He was obliged to retract his views, and his books were publicly burnt. He then retired to an abbey, where he died, about 1186.

PEARCE, Nathaniel, peerse, an English traveler, who spent many years in Africa, and lived for several years at Abyssinia. His manuscripts, which he gave to Mr. Sall, contain much valuable information relative to the manners and customs of the last-named country. B. near London, 1780; d. at Alexandria, 1820.

PEARCE, Zachary, a learned English divine, who received his education at Westminster school, whence he was elected to Trinity College, Cambridge, where he wrote some papers for the "Guardian" and "Spectator." He published an excellent edition of Longinus in 1734.

When Woolston attacked the miracles of our Saviour, he was replied to by Dr. Pearce in an anonymous pamphlet, entitled "A Vindication of the Miracles of Jesus," which went through several editions. He was preferred to the deanery of Winchester in 1730, advanced to the see of Bangor in 1748, and, in 1756, translated to Rochester, with the deanery of Exeter. Some time before his death he solicited leave to resign his preferments; as this, however, was unequal, it was refused with respect to the bishopric, but he was permitted to give up the deanery. Besides the above, he published "A Review of the Text of Milton," "On the origin of Peoples," "An account of Trinity College, Cambridge," and her works. After his death were published his "Commentary on the Gospels and Acts," and Sermons. 2*v.* in London, 1690: 2*v.* 1771.

PEARSON, Edward, per's-on, a learned English divine, who was educated at Cambridge, and afterwards fellow and tutor of Trinity college, in that university. He wrote several books, but is chiefly known for his controversies, wherein he wrote against Dr. Heyrick's theories as to moral obligation. He was likewise a staunch opponent of Calvinism, and entered into a long controversy thereupon with Dr. Shute, of the university of Cambridge. He died at Ipswich, about 1700; D. 1811.

PEARSON, John, an eminent English bishop, who received his education at Eton, whence he was elected to King's College, Cambridge. He was promoted to the bishopric of Chester in 1673. Bishop Pearson is principally known by his valuable "Exposition on the Creed," of which there have been several editions. He also wrote a "Defence of the Epistles of St. Ignatius," and other learned works. b. in Norfolk, 1613; d. 1686.

PECCHIO, Joseph, pek'-ke-o, a modern Italian author, who was educated for the law, and afterwards became assistant councillor of finances at Milan, which post he lost at the Austrian occupation in 1814. Seven years afterwards he was forced to fly, on account of the part he had taken in a conspiracy against the Austrian rulers of Milan. He travelled a great deal upon the continent; but eventually repaired to England, where, in 1825, he was commissioned by the Philhellenic committee to convey a large sum of money to the Greeks, then struggling against the Turks. He subsequently married an English lady, and devoted himself to literature, composing, among other valuable works, a series of sketches of English habits and manners, which were as humorous as they were just and discriminating. b. at Milan, 1735; d. 1835.

PECHANTE, Nicholas de, pe'-kantr, a French poet, who three times gained the poetical prize from the Académie des Jeux Floraux. His tragedy of "Geta" was performed at Paris in 1637 with great applause. This was followed by "Jagurtha," "The Death of Nero," and some others. b. at Toulouse, 1638; d. 1703.

PECK, Francis, pek, an eminent English antiquary, who received his education at Cambridge, where he took his degrees in arts. He obtained the living of Gisleby, in Leicestershire, where he remained until his death. He wrote, among many other learned works, "The Annals of Stamford," "The Life of Milton," "Memoirs of Cromwell;" and published a collection of historical tracts, entitled "Desiderata Curiosa," b. at Stamford, Lincolnshire, 1692; d. 1713.

PECORONE, Giovanni Fiorentino, pek-o-ro'-nai, a Florentine novelist of the 14th century, who, according to some, was a notary, and to others, a Franciscan monk. He belonged to the party of the Guelphs, and was an ardent follower of the pope. His "Novelli," which have been often reprinted, are little inferior to Boccaccio, and are valuable for the view they afford of the opinions and manners of his land. b. about 1380.

PECQUET, Jean, pek'-ai, an eminent French physician, who discovered the lacteal vein that conveys the chyle to the heart, and which is therefore called the reservoir of Pecquet. In 1654 he published a work entitled "Experimenta Nova Anatomica," and, in 1661, another, "De Thoracis Lacteis." b. 1622; d. 1674.

PEDRO I., Don Antonio, pe'-dro (pai'-dro), emperor of Brazil, was the son of the regent of Portugal, afterwards John VI. In the interval between 1805-21, his father found a refuge in Brazil, having been driven from Portugal by Napoleon I.; but, a year after John had left the country for Portugal, Brazil declared itself independent, and elected Don Pedro as its emperor. The death of John VI., in 1826, left Don Pedro the crown of Portugal: he soon afterwards established a liberal government in that country, and granted it a charter. After abdicating the crown of Portugal in favour of his daughter, Donna Maria, he nominated his brother, Don Miguel, regent; but scarcely had he quitted Portugal, than Don Miguel took possession of the throne. In 1831 Pedro was compelled to abdicate the throne of Brazil in favour of his son, Don Pedro II. Returning to Europe, he raised troops in France and England, with which he, in 1833, drove Don Miguel from the throne of Portugal, and placed the crown upon the head of his daughter. He was twice married; his first wife being Maria Leopoldina, archduchess of Austria, and the second, Amelia, daughter of Prince Eugene de Beauharnais. b. 1763; d. 1834.

PEDRO II., Don John Charles, emperor of Brazil, was son of the preceding, who abdicated the throne in his favour when he was only in his 6th year. Until 1841, Brazil had been governed by a council of regency; but at that period he was compelled to ascend the throne in his 15th year. The beginning of his reign was much troubled; but José Feliciano, the last of the insurgents, was totally defeated in 1842, after which time he reigned in peace. In 1851 the war between Brazil and Buenos Ayres was terminated with the fall of Rosas. Under Don Pedro II. the Brazilian empire made rapid advances both in the arts of peace and commerce. b. 1825.

PEDRO V., king of Portugal, was the son of Donna Maria II. and Fernando of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha, king consort. After visiting France and England during his father's regency, he ascended the throne in 1855. In 1857 he married the Princess Stephanie Wilhelmina Antoine, of Hohenzollern Sigmaringen, who died two years afterwards. b. 1837; d. 1861.

PEEL, Sir Robert, pek, first baronet, and father of the British statesman, was brought up to the cotton trade, and in 1773, he being then in his 23rd year, entered into partnership with Mr. William Yates, at Bury, in Lancashire. Ten years afterwards, he married the daughter of his partner, and from that time his career was one of uninterrupted prosperity. In 1790 he entered the House of Commons as member for Tamworth. Seven years afterwards, when the capitalists of the nation were called upon to subscribe to the "Loyalty Loan," the firm of which he was the head contributed the considerable sum of £10,000. He also distinguished himself by his zeal in the volunteer movement of the period, and was appointed lieutenant-colonel of the Bury Loyal Volunteers, consisting principally of his own workmen. In 1800 he was created a baronet, and shortly before had made a speech in Parliament, advocating the union with Ireland, which was published, and circulated in large numbers throughout that country. He retired from Parliament in 1820, and went to reside on his estate of Drayton Manor, Staffordshire. His large landed property was entailed upon his eldest son, the great statesman, to whom also he left, it is supposed, about half a million of money. To his younger sons he left £150,000, and to his daughters £50,000 each. He had previously allowed his eldest son an annual income of £8000, and had added upon his other children about £240,000. b. at Peel's Cross, near Lancaster, 1750; d. at Drayton Manor, Staffordshire, 1830.

PEEL, Sir Robert, second baronet, a distinguished British statesman, was eldest son of the preceding. His early education was received under the eye of his father, a man of great energy and clearness of intellect. When he arrived at a sufficient age, he was sent to Harrow, where he showed himself a docile and submissive schoolboy, but, at first, by no means an advanced one. After a short time, however, he progressed rapidly and securely, and soon left all competitors behind. Lord Byron, his contemporary at Harrow, has given the following record of his school-days:—"Peel, the orator and statesman (that was, or is, or is to be), was my form-fellow, and we were both at the top of our remove. We were on good terms, but his brother was my intimate friend. There were always great hopes of Peel amongst us all,—masters and scholars; and he has not disappointed them. As a scholar, he was greatly my superior; as a declaimer and actor, I was reckoned at least his equal. As a schoolboy, out of school, I was always in scrapes, and he never; and, in school, he always knew his lesson, and I rarely; but when I knew it, I knew it nearly as well." When Peel had completed his 16th year, he became a gentleman commoner of Christ Church, Oxford, where he took his degree of A.B. with unprecedented distinction, taking the honours of a double first class,—first in classics, first in mathematics. In the year 1809 he attained his majority, and also entered the House of Commons as member for Coshel, in Tipperary. He began his Parliamentary career as a supporter of Mr. Perceval. In the following year he seconded the address in answer to the speech from the throne, and had so greatly distinguished himself among the Tory party, that he soon afterwards entered office as under-secretary for the Home department. He continued in the Home department until the death of Mr. Perceval, in 1812, when certain changes in the ministry took place, and Mr. Peel was appointed chief secretary to the lord-lieutenant of Ireland. In the same year he was elected for Chippingham, in Wiltshire. He held the secretaryship of Ireland for six years, during which he introduced several measures tending to preserve peace in that country, and also established the constabulary force. In 1817 he was chosen as one of the Parliamentary representatives of the University of Oxford. Two years later, he sat as chairman on the celebrated committee which resulted in the return to cash payments. On the retirement of Lord Sidmouth, in 1822, Peel became Home secretary. When Canning became premier, in 1827, Peel retired, in consequence of still retaining his opinion that the demands made by the Roman Catholics should be resisted. In the following year, however, he again entered the ministry, this time under the duke of Wellington. Both the duke and himself were subsequently brought to see that the claims of the Catholics could no longer be withstood, and he accordingly moved the Relief Bill, which was carried, after a long and arduous struggle, in 1829. In the following year he succeeded to the baronetcy, upon the death of his father. He opposed, with all his power, the great movement for Parliamentary reform, which was brought to a triumphant close in the year 1832. Under the reformed Parliament the Tory party was in a decided minority; but Sir Robert was, nevertheless, summoned to form a Conservative ministry. Much against his own inclination, he did so; but, as he had predicted, the Conservatives held power for a few months only. This happened in the early part of the year 1835. The Whig party having regained office, Sir Robert went into opposition, and devoted himself to the careful organization of his forces, so as to take advantage of the first great check the Whigs might receive. In 1839 the Whig ministry resigned; Sir Robert Peel was "sent for," and submitted to her Majesty a list of his coadjutors, at the same time requesting that certain ladies of the bed-chamber, who were near relatives of the Whigs, should be removed. This request was not acceded to; whereupon Sir Robert abandoned his idea of forming a cabinet. The Whigs, accordingly, retained power until 1841, when, having been repeatedly defeated in the House of Commons, they resigned, and made way for their great opponent, who became first lord of the treasury, the duke of Wellington accepting a seat in his cabinet without office, but taking the leadership of the House of Lords. The limits of this article preclude anything like a detailed account of the great events which followed, and which caused Sir Robert Peel to be regarded by the British nation as the greatest and most disinterested statesman it has ever had. Sir Robert Peel's ministry was formed on the strictest protectionist principles; but, nevertheless, the leader of that great and powerful party contrived to effect considerably more in the way of fiscal and financial reforms than could be even attempted by the Whigs, who were supposed to be the more liberal and more progressive party. Sir Robert Peel, during his celebrated tenure of office, between the years 1841-46, effected the repeal of the corn laws, the relaxation of the whole commercial code; passed the Bank Charter Act, and established the general financial policy of the country on a firmer basis than was ever before the case. For these great services, which were only effected by a fundamental change of the policy to which he had hitherto pledged himself, Sir Robert Peel incurred the odium of his party, most of the members of which abandoned him. In 1846 he was compelled to resign office; and from that period until his death he continued to assist the Whig Administration. Henceforth he never sought to weaken any of the existing parties in the House, but continued to give his adherence to whatever measure he thought best calculated to advance the general good. "He had known enough of place and power," it has been said; "he was jealous of his influence, and cared for little beyond. Time had chastened the few prejudices he possessed, and his clear head was undisturbed by any of those clouds with which the passions or promptings of the heart obscure the judgments of most public men. On the night before the occurrence of the fatal accident which terminated the life of Sir Robert Peel, the House of Commons, which for more than forty years had witnessed his triumphs and reverses, was filled with an extraordinary assemblage, anxious for the result of a great political crisis." That result would, most probably, have been the return of the great statesman to the power he no longer coveted; but, on the very next day, while riding through St. James's Park, his horse suddenly shied, and threw Sir Robert over its head. He was taken up, and conveyed to his residence in Whitehall Gardens, where, three days afterwards, he breathed his last. This notice of the great statesman's life is necessarily short and meagre; but students of his career may find every detail requisite for the full comprehension of his policy in all its bearings, in two works, entitled respectively, "The Political Life of Sir Robert Peel," by Thomas Doubleday; and "The Life and Acts of Sir Robert Peel," by M. Guizot, a translation of which work was published by Mr. Bentley. After an able characterization of Sir Robert's political genius, M. Guizot thus concludes:—"He was a great and honest servant of the state; proud with a sort of humility, and desiring to shine with no brilliancy extrinsic to his natural sphere; devoted to his country, without any craving for reward. . . . Severing himself from the past without cynical indifference, braving the future without adventurous boldness; solely swayed by the desire to meet the necessities of the present, and to do himself honour by delivering his country from peril or embarrassment. He was thus, in turn, a Conservative and a Reformer, a Tory or Whig, and almost a Radical; popular and unpopular; using his strength with equal ardour, sometimes in making an obstinate resistance, sometimes in yielding concessions which were perhaps excessive; more wise than provident, more courageous than firm, but always sincere, patriotic, and marvellously adapted, in a period of transition like ours, to conduct the government of modern society as it has become, and as it is becoming more and more, in England as elsewhere, under the influence of the democratic principles and feelings which have been fermenting in Europe for fifteen centuries." B. at Chamber Hall, Bury, Lancashire, 1788; D. in London, 1850—His sons, Robert (see trait) and Frederick, embraced political life, and held office in connexion with the Liberal party.

PEEL, Sir William, was the third son of the statesman, and entered the navy in 1828, as midshipman on board the Princess Charlotte, in which vessel he took part in the bombardment of Acre. After serving on board other vessels in the China seas and elsewhere, he, in 1844, passed his examination for lieutenant in so brilliant a manner as to call forth the warmest eulogiums of Sir Charles Napier and Sir Thomas Hastings. In the same year he became lieutenant of the Winchester, on the Cape of Good Hope station. In 1846 he was promoted to the rank of commander, and remained upon the North American and West India stations until the commencement of the war with Russia. During that war he greatly distinguished himself in the naval brigade before Sebastopol. In 1856 he went out to the China station as captain of the Shannon frigate; but had scarcely arrived there when he was ordered to Calcutta with troops, to afford assistance in suppressing the mutiny in India. Upon his arrival he organized a naval brigade, and went ashore with 24 and 68-pounder guns, with which he and his sailors performed great deeds of skill and bravery at Cawnpore and Lucknow. At the storming of Lucknow he was severely wounded; but was recovering from this hurt when he was attacked with small-pox, which, to the profound grief of the English nation, carried him off. "There was something about Peel which, it is said, recalled the great Nelson. He had the daring and the dash, the frankness of heart and buoyant courage of the hero of Trafalgar: it was impossible not to love him. Drowsy seamen wept bitterly when they heard that he was wounded, and young midshipmen longed for the honour of serving under his flag." Sir William Peel, in short, like Nelson, was a popular hero." For his distinguished services during the Crimean war he was created C.B., and afterwards K.C.B. for his Indian exploits. He was also an officer of the French Legion of Honour, and had received the war medal of Sardinia. B. 1825; D. at Cawnpore, 1858.

PEELE, George, peel, an English dramatic writer, who was student of Christchurch College, Oxford, where he took his degree of M.A. in 1579. After leaving the University, he went to London, where he gained a poor and precarious subsistence as an actor and writer for the stage. He was a good pastoral poet, and his plays were acted with great applause in the University. B. supposed in Devonshire, 1550; D. about 1597.

PEIGNOT, Stephen Gabriel, pan-yo, a learned French bibliographer, who was educated for the legal profession, but who became, in 1813, librarian to the college at Dijon, and devoted his life to the production of valuable and important works connected with the history and classification of books. His "Manual of Bibliography," "Philological Amusements," and "Dictionary of Suppressed Works," are of considerable importance. B. in France, 1765; D. at Dijon, 1845.

PEIRESC, Nicholas Claude Fabri, Seigneur de, pan-resk, an eminent French antiquary and learned writer, who studied at first under the Jesuits; after which he visited various universities, and took the degree of doctor of laws at Aix in 1604. His thesis on that occasion was greatly admired. Visiting Paris soon afterwards, he obtained the friendship of the most learned men in that city, particularly De Thou and Casaubon. In 1606 he went to England in the suite of the French ambassador, and was received with marks of distinction by James I. He next went to Holland, and became acquainted with Julius Scaliger and Grotius. On his return to France, he was admitted a councillor of the Parliament of Aix. The learning of Peiresc was various and profound; and he particularly excelled in the knowledge of medals. He wrote extensively on mathematics, medallist science, languages, and antiquities, and was a great collector of literary treasures, which he generously distributed among the learned of his acquaintance. B. in Provence, 1580; D. at Aix, 1637.

PELAGIUS I., pe-lat'-ji-us (pope), was a native of Rome, and ascended the papal chair, in succession to Virgilius, in 555. He endeavoured to reform the clergy; and when Rome was besieged by the Goths, he obtained from Totila, their general, many concessions in favour of the Christians. D. 560.

PELAGIUS II. ascended the papal chair, in succession to Benedict I., in 578. He opposed John, patriarch of Constantinople, who had assumed the title of œcumenic or universal bishop. D. of the plague, 590.

PELAGIUS, the founder of Pelagianism, in the 5th century, is supposed to have been a native of Britain. His real name was Morgan, which he changed to the Greek appellation of Pelagius. He went to reside at Rome about 400, where he denied the doctrine of original sin, and maintained free will. He afterwards retired, with his friend Celestius, to the Holy Land, but subsequently returned to his native country. His opinions were condemned by the council of Carthage. B. in Britain towards the close of the 4th century; D. it is supposed, in Wales, about 432.

PELAYO, pan-lu-o-o, first king of the Asturias, was the chief of the Gothic Christians, who, after the sanguinary battle of Guadalete, in 711, fled from the resentment of the Moors to the mountains of the Asturias. In 718 the Moslems attacked him and his followers, but were signally defeated at Covadonga. He then took the title of monarch; and, in 723, drove the Moors out of the city of Leon, where his successors reigned. After firmly establishing the small kingdom of Asturias by many victories over the Moors, he died, 737.

PELISSIER, Aimable Jean Jacques, pe-lis-sé-ai, marshal and duke of Malakoff, was the son of a respectable farmer, and, after receiving a liberal education, was sent, in 1814, to the military school of St. Cyr, which he left to join the army as sub-lieutenant during the Hundred Days. Precluded from active employment by the peace which soon afterwards ensued, he devoted himself assiduously to the study of his profession. In 1823 he took part in the Spanish campaign, and won several orders and crosses for his bravery and efficient conduct in the field. In 1828 he became captain in the King's Guards, and, two years later, formed a member of the great Algerian expedition. After two years of service in Algeria, his health gave way, and he was compelled to return to France. During the subsequent seven years he was employed in the War department at Paris, and in 1810 was again sent to Africa. His bravery and capacity during the different campaigns which took place, gained for him the rank of colonel in 1845. In that year he was sent in pursuit of one of the most fierce of the Kabyle tribes. Being closely pressed, the Arabs took refuge in their caves: Pelissier summoned them to surrender, offering to spare their lives if they would come forth from their retreat. The Arabs refused; whereupon he ordered fascines to be lighted and placed close to the mouths of the caves, in order to compel them to come out; still they remained stubborn. He next sent in to them some Arabs, and afterwards a flag of truce, which was fired upon. Thereupon the lighted fascines were pushed still closer to the cavern mouths, and kept burning for some time. In the end, nearly 600 dead bodies were found in the caves, and about 200 more Arabs died after being drawn out. This operation excited general horror throughout Europe, and was strongly denounced by Marshal Soult, at Paris; but Marshal Bugeaud defended his subordinate, and termed the dismal act "a necessity of war." Notwithstanding this affair, Pelissier was created lieutenant-colonel in 1848, and remained in Algeria until 1855, when he was ordered to take the command of a division of the French army in the Crimea. At first, second in command under General Canrobert, his superior energy led to differences between himself and his chief. Shortly afterwards, Canrobert asked to be allowed to resign, which request was conceded, and Pelissier was nominated to the chief command. The expedition to Kertch, the advance upon the Tchernaya, and many bold and successful attacks upon the Russian works, were all carried out under his command, which was brought to a triumphant termination by the storming and carrying of the great fort of the Malakoff, the key of the Russian position on the south side of Sebastopol. For these services the emperor Napoleon created him marshal of France, grand cross of the Legion of Honour, and duke of Malakoff; Queen Victoria also conferred upon him the grand cross of the Bath. In 1858, during a period of some diplomatic difficulty, he replaced M. Persigny as ambassador of France at the court of St. James's; but after filling that post for a short period, during which, however, he secured the highest opinions of those with whom he came in contact, by his frank and cordial bearing, he retired; and was subsequently named governor-general of Algeria. b. near Rouen, 1791; d. 1861.

PELL, John, pel, an eminent English mathematician and divine, who was educated first at Cambridge, and afterwards at Oxford. In 1643 he went to Amsterdam, to assume the professorship of mathematics there; but afterwards removed to Breda, upon the invitation of the Prince of Orange. In 1652 he returned to England, and was sent by Cromwell as resident to the Protestant cantons of Switzerland. In 1661 he was ordained by the bishop of Lincoln, and, the same year, was presented to the rectory of Fobbing, in Essex. He wrote "An Idea of the Mathematics," "A Tale of 10,000 Square Numbers," "Demonstration of the Second and Tenth Books of Euclid," and other works. b. at Southwick, Sussex, 1610; d. 1685.

PELLEGRINI, Camillus, pel-lai-gré-ne, a celebrated Italian antiquary, who was the first to collect into a regular series the scattered, partial, and isolated histories and chronicles of the middle ages, which design was afterwards more completely carried out by Muratori and others. His sketch of the "Antiquities of Capua," and his "History of the Lombard Kingdom," are among the most valuable works treating of the middle ages of Italy. b. 1588; d. 1663.

PELLERIN, Joseph, pel-lé-rä, an eminent French numismatist, who was commissary-general, first clerk of the French marine, and afterwards commissioner of the navy. He devoted his leisure to the collection, arrangement, and classification of medals. His cabinet of medals, in the purchase of which he was assisted by the king, was very large and valuable. He published nine quarto volumes illustrative of medals, with plates. b. 1681; d. 1752.

PELLICO, Silvio, pel-lé-ko, an eminent Italian writer, who was the son of an official in the department of war at Milan, and afterwards at Turin. After spending some time in France, he joined his father at Milan, and was appointed professor of the French language in the seminary for military orphans in that city. Ardently devoted to literature and to liberty, he formed the acquaintance of Ugo Foscolo, the poet, and others, and likewise allied himself with a number of distinguished men, who hoped to free Lombardy from Austrian domination. In 1819 he wrote a tragedy, entitled "Francesca da Rimini," which was enthusiastically received in the chief cities of Italy. After writing other works, he, in 1819, established, with the assistance of Manzoni, Sionardi, and others, a journal intended to be conducted upon liberal principles, entitled "Il Conciliatore." This print was, however, soon afterwards suppressed by the Austrian government. Towards the close of the year 1820, he was suddenly arrested on the charge of plotting against the established order. He was at first confined in the prison of Santa Margherita, at Milan; but was afterwards sent to a dungeon on the island of San Michele, near Venice. While there, in 1822, he was tried and condemned to death, which sentence was, however, commuted to fifteen years of "carcere duro"

Pellisson-Fontanier

(severe imprisonment) in the fortress of Spilberg. Speaking of this sentence, he says, "Those condemned to 'carcere duro' are obliged to labour, to wear chains on their feet, to sleep on bare boards, and to eat the poorest food. Those condemned to 'carcere durissimo' (very severe imprisonment) are chained more heavily, and with a band of iron round the waist, the chain being fastened to the wall; so that they can only walk just by the side of the boards which serve them for a bed. Their food is the same, though the law says only bread and water." For the first eighteen months of his imprisonment he was fortunate enough to be placed under an indulgent gaoler, by whom he was permitted the use of pen, ink, and paper, and to read the Bible, Homer, Dante, Petrarch, Shakespeare, Göthe, Scott, Byron, Schiller, and other authors; but this personage having been sent to another prison, Pelliso's situation became very severe during the four subsequent years, and almost led to the complete destruction of his health. Between the years 1827-30 he was treated with more clemency; and in the latter year he received the intimation that he was to regain his liberty, which, in reality, followed soon afterwards. In 1831 he produced a work entitled "Le Mie Prigioni" (My Prisons), which was written in a style of touching simplicity, was translated into every language of Europe, and was everywhere admired. After his release he repaired to Turin, where his parents were residing, and devoted himself to literary composition, producing, among other works, three tragedies, and a prose treatise on the "Duties of Man." After his death, his memoirs, correspondence, and inedited works, were published. n. at Saluzzo, Piedmont, 1739; n. 1851.

PELLISSON-FONTANIER, Paul, pel'-less-sawng-fon-ta'-nie-ai, a French historian, who was educated for the legal profession, but quitted it for a life of retirement in the country, where he occupied himself with literary studies. Having written the history of the origin of the French Academy, he was chosen a member. Subsequently, the minister Fouquet became his patron; but, when he was disgraced, Pellisson was sent to the Bastille, where he was confined during four years. On his release he received a pension, and became a favourite of Louis XIV., whom he attended in his campaigns. He wrote "The History of Louis XIV.," "The Life of Anne of Austria," "History of the Conquest of Franco-Comté," "Historical Letters," Poems, "Reflections on Differences in Religion," and "Treatise on the Eucharist." n. at Béziers, France, 1624; n. at Versailles, 1693.

PELOPIDAS, pe-lop'-i-das, a Theban general, who inherited from his father Hippocles a large fortune, which he disposed of liberally among his fellow-citizens. Between himself and Epaminondas there existed the closest friendship, from which the Thebans derived the most important benefits. When the Lacedæmonians gained the sovereignty of Thebes, Pelopidas went to Athens, where he assembled a number of his exiled countrymen, with whom, in 379 B.C., he returned, seized upon Thebes by night, and threw off the Spartan yoke. He afterwards defeated the Lacedæmonians at Tegyra; and, with Epaminondas, shared the great victory of Leuctra, 371 B.C. He was next sent by his countrymen on an embassy to Artaxerxes, king of Persia, who received him with honour, and, through his means, entered into a treaty with the Thebans, very advantageous to them. On his return, he persuaded his countrymen to make war against Alexander, tyrant of Phæzæ, but fell shortly after in battle, 361 B.C.

PENGELLY, William, pen-gel'-le, one of the most eminent geologists of the nineteenth century, who formed a fine collection of Devonian fossils, now in the University Museum at Oxford. He has always taken an active part in the advancement of science. n. at East Looe, Cornwall, 1812.

PENNY, Sir William, pen, an English admiral, who commanded the fleet, and Venables the land forces, at the taking of Jamaica from the Spaniards, in 1655. The same year he was elected member of Parliament for Weymouth. He was sent to the Tower by Cromwell, for quitting his command without leave, but was soon released. After the restoration he became a knight, commissioner of the navy, and a vice-admiral. Under the duke of York, he fought in the naval action in which the Dutch were defeated, in 1665. In the following year he retired from the service. n. at Bristol, 1621; n. 1670.

PENNY, William, an eminent Quaker, and founder of the state of Pennsylvania, was the son of the preceding. He received a good education, which was completed at Christ Church, Oxford; but he disappointed his father's expectations by turning Quaker, and was disowned by him. Sir William afterwards relented, and sent his son abroad. Young Penny visited France and Italy, and returned to his native country in 1681. He spent two years in the study of the law at Lincoln's Inn, and was then sent to Ireland to manage his father's estates; but, happening to hear a discourse at Cork, by Thomas Lee, a leading Quaker, he reverted to his former opinions, and travelled to propagate this new faith. He was taken up for preaching, and sent to prison; but was released through the interest of his father. After his return to England, he was sent to the Tower, on account of a book which he had written; and, while there, he composed his principal work, entitled "No Cross, no Crown," intended to show the benefit of suffering. On his release, he resumed his former labours, and was apprehended with some others, and tried for preaching at a conventicle in Gracechurch-street. The jury persisted in finding them not guilty, and were fined for acting contrary to the dictates of the judge. Admiral Penny was reconciled to his son before his death, and left him all his property. He continued firm in his attachment to the Society of Friends, and, in 1677, went on a mission to Holland and Germany, with Fox and Barclay. In 1681 he obtained from the crown, in lieu of the arrears due to his father, the grant of the province in North America now called Pennsylvania. Permeated with a colony of Quakers, and situated Philadelphia; but before he entered upon possession, he made a treaty with the Indians. The code of laws which he formed for the government of his province was simple, but would have done honour to the profoundest legislators. After spending about two years in the administration of the new colony, he returned to England in 1681. Upon the death of Charles II. Penny attracted to himself the favour of James II.; and this intimacy led to his being several times arrested after the king had been dethroned. His accusers charged him with being a Papist and a Jesuit; but although he, during several years, remained in seclusion, and did not refute the calumnies of his enemies, he at length defended himself before William III. and his council, and was honourably acquitted. In 1696 he married his second wife, and, three years afterwards, again set sail for Pennsylvania. In 1701 he returned to England, and, being encumbered with debts, endeavoured to negotiate the sale of Pennsylvania to the crown for £12,000. This negotiation was interrupted in 1712, through his being attacked by an apoplectic fit, which, happening twice afterwards, greatly impaired his mental faculties. He survived for six years longer, but with a constitution much shattered, and quite unfitted for any serious employment. Lord Macanlay, in his History, charges Penn with uttering "something very like a lie, and confirming it with something very like an oath;" with being a species of court agent for the sale of pardons with endeavouring to persuade the fellows of Magdalen College, Oxford, to accede to James II.'s illegal acts; with seeking to bring about the king's return by means of a foreign army; and with other "scandalous acts." These charges, however, have been met by Mr. Hepworth Dixon, in his "Biography of William Penn." In one instance he shows the great historian to have been wrong; viz., that in which he declares Penn to have sold pardons to the maidens at Taunton who had been condemned for presenting the duke of Monmouth with a standard. Mr. Dixon proves that it was not William Penn, but George Peinne, who pursued that kind of traffic. The question is an interesting one, the details of which may be found in the third and fourth volumes of "Macanlay's History," and in the Historical Biography above mentioned. After Penn's death, his sons held the proprietary governments of the state of Pennsylvania. After the American revolution, the claims of his descendants upon the state of Pennsylvania were bought up for £130,000. Montesquieu calls Penn "the modern Lycurgus." Penn wrote a number of works, which were collected and published in 1728. s. in London, 1641; p. at Ruscombe, Berkshire, 1718.

THE DICTIONARY

PENNANT, Thomas, pen'-nant, an eminent British naturalist and antiquary, who, after receiving his grammatical education at Wrexham school, was sent to Oxford, where he principally applied himself to the study of natural philosophy. After travelling over England, he went abroad, and was introduced to Voltaire, Buffon, Linnaeus, and other eminent men. In 1750 he published the "British Zoology," a work of considerable merit. In 1771 appeared his "Tour in Scotland," which passed through several editions. This was followed, at different periods, by a number of similar works; as "A Tour in Wales," "A Journey from Chester to London," "An Account of London," &c. He also published "Genera of Birds," "Arctic Zoology," "Literary Memoirs;" and, at the time of his death, was engaged on a description of India, of which one volume was printed. s. at Downing, Flintshire, 1726; p. 1798.

PENNFATHER, General Sir John Lysaght, pen'-fa'-ther, entered the army at eighteen, in 1818, rising through the various grades until, in the year 1830, he became lieutenant-colonel. In 1843 he served as brigadier under Sir Charles James Napier, and greatly contributed to the victory over the Amers of Scinde at Mamee, where he received a severe wound. Upon the outbreak of the Russian war in 1854, he was appointed to the command of the first brigade of the second division, and was mentioned in the most flattering terms by Lord Raglan for his bravery at the Alma. At Inkermann he commanded the entire division, in the absence of Sir De Lacy Evans, who had been ill on board ship. In that battle he maintained his high reputation for skill and bravery, and contributed in no mean degree to the victory which was gained over the Russians. He was shortly afterwards appointed to the permanent command of the division, was created a major-general, a K.C.B., and member of the Legion of Honour. In 1861 he was made lieutenant-general, and subsequently became general and G.C.B. s. in Tipperary, Ireland, 1860.

PENNY, John Francis, pen'-ne, an eminent Italian painter, who was the disciple of Raffaele, to whom he became steward; on which account he obtained the title of Il Fattore. Dr. Waagen considers that many parts of the Raffaele cartoons at Hampton Court were executed by him. s. at Florence, 1488; p. at Naples, 1528.

PENYCUK, Alexander, pen'-u'-kuk, a Scotch physician, who, after spending his youth abroad, returned to his native country, and occupied himself with literature. He wrote a topographical account of Tweeddale, and a number of poems descriptive of the manners of the gentry and peasantry in his time. He is also said to have given to Allan Ramsay the plot of his "Gentle Shepherd," the scenes of which were laid on his estate of New-hall. s. 1652; p. 1722.

PENNINGTON, Isaac, pen'-ing-ton, lord mayor of London in 1604, who headed most of the riots against Charles I., and was one of that king's judges. In 1660 he was tried and condemned, but respited, and died in the Tower.

PENZANCE, Lord (see WILKIE, James Plaisted).

PEPE, William, pei'-pai, a modern Italian general, who, in 1791, entered the ranks of the republican army formed in Naples by the French, when they proclaimed the Parthenopean republic; but was taken prisoner, and banished at the restoration of Ferdinand, which shortly afterwards followed. (See FERDINAND IV.) He next served in the Italian legion of the French army, but was permitted to return to Naples in 1801. Under Murat he was appointed officer of the ordnance, and, in 1806, served in the campaign of Catalonia, under Marshal Suchet, who created him general of brigade. He was made a baron by Murat in 1814. After the death of Murat, he remained at Naples; and became one of the chiefs of the great secret society called the Carbonari, which, in 1821, compelled Ferdinand IV. to grant a constitution similar to that of Spain, and to avow a Parliament at Naples. The Austrian government took umbrage at these measures, and sent two armies towards Naples. Pepe, at the head of some ill-disciplined volunteers, met them, but suffered a defeat, and, being abandoned by his followers, was compelled to fly. He went first to Spain, and afterwards to England, in both of which countries he endeavoured to raise corps of volunteers in the cause of Italian liberty. During his absence he was condemned to death; but he remained safe in London, where he married a rich heiress. In consequence of certain expressions made use of by Lamartine in his "Last Canto of Childe Harold," relative to the national character of the Italians, General Pepe sent a challenge to the poet, who was wounded in the duel which followed. In 1818 the amnesty permitted him to return to Naples, and the king, submitting to the popular feeling, appointed him to the command of an army sent to co-operate with Charles Albert of Piedmont against Austria; but, shortly afterwards, recalled his troops. Pepe, however, instead of obeying, led the Neapolitans to assist in the defence of Venice. After covering himself with glory by his heroic defence of the fort of Malghera, he, upon the capitulation of Venice, made his escape to Corsu on board a French vessel, and subsequently repaired to Paris; but, having little sympathy with the character of the French people, he shortly afterwards left their capital to take up his residence at Nice, where he resided until his death. He was the author of several works, chiefly descriptive of the events from the unpublished Italian manuscript, and published in London, in 1820. p. in Calabria, 1780. p. 1780.

PEPE, Florestan, a modern Italian general, and brother of the preceding. At the proclamation of the Parthenopean republic, he took service under its flag. In 1806 he was with the Neapolitan brigade in Spain, and, in the Russian campaign, covered the retreat of the French rear-guard with his Neapolitan cavalry. Severely wounded, he became, notwithstanding an obstinate resistance, prisoner to the Russians; but was shortly afterwards liberated. Murat created him lieutenant-general in 1815, and, after serving against the Austrians in Upper Italy, he returned to Naples, which he held until the arrival of the latter. Subsequently to the Neapolitan revolution of 1820, he retired from his native country, and remained abroad during several years; but returned at a later period. He took no part in the events of 1848, but continued to live as a private citizen. p. in Calabria, 1780.

PEPIN THE SHORT, pe'-pin, king of France, was the first of the Carolingian kings. He was at first Mayor of the Palace under Childeric III.; but in 750 dethroned that monarch, and confined him in a monastery. Having requested and obtained the sanction of the pope, Pepin was constituted king. He assisted Pope Stephen III. against the Longobards, defeated the Saxons, Bavarians, and other German nations, and united Aquitaine to his crown. After a reign of 17 years, he died at St. Denis, 768. His son Charlemagne succeeded him as king of the Franks.

PEPIN, grandson of Charlemagne, and son of Louis le Débonnaire, became king of Aquitaine in 817. p. 838 or 839.

PERPUS, John Christopher, pe'-poosh, an eminent Prussian musician, who, at the age of 16, had the honour of teaching the Prince-royal. He afterwards settled in England, and was engaged as composer at Drury-lane Theatre. The University of Oxford conferred on him the degree of doctor of music. He acquired a considerable fortune by teaching, and by his marriage with an Italian singer. He adapted the music, and composed an overture for the "Boggar's Opera," and wrote a treatise on Harmony. p. at Berlin, 1687; p. in London, 1752.

PERPUS, Samuel, peps, an English writer, who was secretary to the Admiralty in the reigns of Charles II. and James II., having been nominated to a clerkship in that establishment through the interest of his relative the earl of Sandwich. His knowledge of naval administration was very large, and it was by his energy that the affairs of the Admiralty were reduced to order and method. His "Memoirs relating to the Navy" is a well-written work, and his collection of MSS., with his library, now at Magdalen College, Cambridge, is an invaluable treasure of naval knowledge. In 1681 he became president of the Royal Society. But his celebrated "Diary" forms his best claim to remembrance. This work, after lying undeposited in shorthand characters during 170 years, was published by Lord Brasbrooke in 1825. It is one of the most delightful books in the English language, and a perfect treasury of facts and incidents relative to the time of Charles II. p. in London, 1632; p. 1703.

PERCIVAL, Thomas, per'-se-vil, an English physician and philosophical writer, who received his education in the Warrington grammar-school; after which he went to Edinburgh, where he applied himself to the study of physic. In 1761 he was chosen fellow of the Royal Society, and about the same time went abroad. Having passed some time at Paris, Hamburg, and other places, but principally Leyden, where he took his doctor's degree, he returned, in 1765, to England, and in 1767 settled at Manchester, where he continued in considerable practice till his death. His most important works were, "Instructions to his Children," "Moral and Literary Dissertations," "Medical Ethics," essays, chemical and medical, and several excellent papers in the "Memoirs of the Manchester Society," of which he was one of the principal founders and ornaments. p. at Warrington, 1740; p. at Manchester, 1804.

PERCEVAL, Spencer, an English statesman, second son of the Earl of Egmont, a lord of the Admiralty, was educated for the legal profession, and was elected a member of the House of Commons in 1797. His advance was rapid. He became solicitor and attorney-general, and chancellor of the Exchequer, in quick succession. Finally, he, in 1810, attained the summit of power as first lord of the Treasury. He retained this office until the year 1812, when he was assassinated in the House of Commons by Bellingham. p. 1762.

PERCY, the Family of, per'-se, one of the most distinguished in England. Its founder was William de Percy, who accompanied the Conqueror to England, and received several lordships in Lincoln and York. A descendant of his was one of the barons who obtained the Great Charter from King John. In the reign of Edward I., Henry de Percy obtained Alnwick and other possessions in Northumberland, with which county the name of Percy henceforth became intimately connected. In the reign of Edward III., a Henry de Percy married Mary of Lancaster, daughter of a grandson of Henry III. Another Henry de Percy was created earl of Northumberland by Richard II. in 1377. He distinguished himself against the Scots, and took Berwick. Some years later, the Scots, by corrupting the governor, again made themselves masters of it; on which the duke of Lancaster brought an accusation against the earl in Parliament, and he was sentenced to lose his life and estates. But the king having revoked this sentence, the earl laid siege to Berwick and took it. When Bolingbroke assumed the crown, with the title of Henry IV., he created the earl constable of England. In the fourth year of that reign, the earl and his son, commonly called Hotspur, defeated the Scots at Halidon Hill, and took the earl of Douglas prisoner. Having demanded the pay due to him as keeper of the Marches, and not receiving a satisfactory answer, the earl took up arms against the king, and placed Hotspur at the head of his troops; but he was slain at the battle of Shrewsbury in 1403; upon which Percy made his submission and received the royal pardon. Notwithstanding this, he collected another army, but was defeated and slain in Yorkshire in 1408. Henry V. restored the title to a son of Hotspur. This second earl was slain at the battle of St. Albans, in 1555; and the third at Towton, in 1560. The fourth earl was killed 1559; the fifth died in 1527. The sixth died in 1557 without issue, and the title of Northumberland remained out of the family until it was restored to the Percies by Queen Mary. The seventh earl was put to death by Queen Elizabeth, in 1572, and his brother, who succeeded him, was shot in the Tower. The eighth earl, in whom the chief male line of Percy became extinct, died at Turin in 1670, in his twenty-sixth year. At that period several persons claimed to be of the blood of the Percies; and one of them, a trunkmaker at Dublin, endeavoured to obtain the family titles, but without success. Lady Elizabeth Percy, daughter of the eleventh earl, who married Charles Seymour, duke of Somerset, had a son Algernon, who was created earl of Northumberland in 1743. His daughter, Lady Elizabeth Seymour, married Sir Hugh Smithson, who took the name of Percy on becoming earl of Northumberland, at the death of his wife's father. He was created duke of Northumberland in 1766, and from him is descended the existing peer.

PERCY, DR. THOMAS, a prelate of the Irish church and a distinguished antiquary, received his education at the university of Oxford; and, upon taking orders, obtained a living. His first work was a translation of a Portuguese translation of a Chinese novel, which was followed by "Miscellaneous Pieces relating to the Chinese." Between the years 1761-63, he produced some translations of Icelandic poetry, and in 1764 a new version of the "Song of Solomon," with a learned commentary. His "Key to the New Testament" followed; in 1765 he produced the celebrated collection of old English ballad literature, known as the "Reliques of Ancient Poetry." In the following year he became chaplain to the duke and duchess of Northumberland, the name of whose family he bore; and, after receiving other preferment, was created bishop of Dromore in 1782. The "Northumberland House Book," and "The Hermit of Warkworth," both connected with the history of the Percy family, were also published by him; his last work being a translation of M. Mallet's "Northern Antiquities." After he was ordained a bishop of the Irish church, he relinquished his pen, and devoted himself exclusively to the affairs of his diocese. n. in Berkshire, 1728; p. in Ireland, 1811.

PERDUECAS, per-dik'-kas, one of the generals of Alexander the Great, after whose death he aspired to the crown of Macedonia; to accomplish which design he endeavoured to form a matrimonial alliance with Cleopatra, sister of Alexander. His project being discovered by Antigonus, he entered into a league with Antipater, Craterus, and Ptolemy, governor of Egypt, against Perduecas, who marched to Memphis, but was slain in his tent by some of his soldiers, n.c. 321.

PERKINS, Jonathan, per-ri'-na, a distinguished English physician, who was apprenticed to a surgeon in his fourth year. At eighteen he became a student at St. Bartholomew's Hospital, and about a year later, obtained the appointment of apothecary to the Aldersgate-street Dispensary, London. After spending several years as private tutor to medical students, he, in 1825, obtained his diploma from the Royal College of Surgeons. His great work, entitled "Elements of Materia Medica," was first published in 1830, and was founded upon the lectures he had delivered in the Aldersgate-street School of Medicine, while holding the appointment of chemical lecturer. In the meanwhile, he had lectured upon chemistry and botany at the London Hospital, of which institution he became a student physician in 1810. Five years afterwards, he was elected Fellow of the College of Physicians, before which time he had produced an important work upon "Food and Diet." His later appointments were physician to the London Hospital, examiner at the London University, and fellow of the Royal and Linnean Societies. His valuable life was brought to a sudden termination through a melancholy accident, which was thus described:—"He had been to consult Professor Quekett (of the College of Surgeons) on a scientific question, and whilst descending a staircase leading to the Hunterian Museum, made a false step, fell, and ruptured the rectus femoris muscle of both legs. In all probability at the same time some internal injury was sustained by the heart or larger vessels; but as only local inconvenience was experienced, no danger was apprehended; but whilst getting into bed on the 20th of January, he felt a violent throb in the region of the heart, when he became fully aware that a speedy termination of his life was at hand, and this impression was within twenty minute after." n. at Alditch, London, 1834; n. 1835.

PERKINS, NUNO ALVAREZ, "the Portuguese Cid," was created councillor of state by John I. of Portugal in 1383, and subsequently reduced several cities of Montego, for which services he was nominated constable of the kingdom. In 1385 he commanded a wing of the army at the battle of Aljubarrota, and at a later period rendered the most important services to his sovereign. After an energetic career, both military and diplomatic, he retired to a monastery in the year 1421, where he remained secluded from the world until his death. n. about 1399; p. 1431.

PEREZ, ANTONIO, pai'-rait, a Spanish writer and statesman, was the natural son of Gonzalo Perez, secretary of state to Charles V., and himself became secretary to Philip II. He was employed in state affairs, but afterwards fell into disgrace; on which he retired to England, and afterwards to France. His "Letters" and "Narrative," in which he gives an account of his transactions with Philip, and his subsequent trial and tortures, are curious and important. His "Relaciones," or memoirs, were printed at Paris in 1598. p. at Paris, 1619.

Gaetano Greco, one of the ablest musicians in Italy; after which the Prince of Stigliano took him under his protection. His countrymen style him the Domenicohino of music. His "Salve Regina," "Stabat Mater," and "Gloria in Excelsis," are his most admired compositions. b. near Naples, 1704; d. 1766.

PERIANDER, per-i-ân'-der, the tyrant of Corinth, who was called, by his flatterers, one of the seven sages of Greece, began by overturning the constitution and liberty of his country, and usurping the sovereignty, b.c. 625. The commencement of his reign was mild, but he soon showed himself a thorough despot. He committed fearful cruelties on the Corinthians, put to death his wife Melissa, and banished his son Lycophron for lamenting her fate. According to Aristotle, he was the first who reduced despotic rule to a system. d. 585 b.c.

PERICLES, per-i-klêz, a celebrated Athenian, who distinguished himself as a general, statesman, and orator. Having acquired great popularity among his countrymen, he prevailed upon them to alter their government; and caused Cimon, and his other rivals, to be banished; thus constituting himself sole master of Athens. He commanded the army in the Peloponnesus, and gained a great victory, near Nemea, over the Sicyonians. He next took Byzantium and Samos, at the siege of which place were invented several warlike machines. Pericles advised the Athenians to continue the war against Sparta, for which he was censured and disgraced; but he recovered his popularity and the government, and died of the plague which desolated Athens, b.c. 429. Pericles was a great patron of arts, letters, and, indeed, luxury. In his age, all three flourished to their highest extent.

PERIER, Casimir, per'-e-ai, a famous French banker, and subsequently a statesman, at first entered the army, and served with reputation in the campaigns of Italy (1799 and 1800), but on the death of his father, a merchant, abandoned the profession of arms for commercial pursuits. In 1802 he established a banking-house in company with his brother, Scipio Perier, in the management of which he acquired an intimate acquaintance with the most difficult and important questions of public credit and finance. At the revolution of 1830 he took a decided part in favour of the national liberties, was subsequently chosen president of the chambers, and finally formed one of the first cabinet of the new king, without holding the portfolio of any department. In March, 1831, he became president of the council. b. 1777; d. 1832.

PERKIN WARBECK. (See WARBECK, Perkin.) PERKINS, William, per'-klus, an English divine, who received his education at Christ's College, Cambridge, of which he became fellow. He was a rigid Calvinist, and published several works on that form of faith; some of which, being translated into Dutch, were replied to by Arminius, and occasioned those famous disputes for the settling of which the Synod of Dordt was called. b. in Warwickshire, 1558; d. 1602.

PERRAULT, Claude, per'-rolle, a celebrated French architect, who studied medicine, and wrote some works on that subject, but did not practise. His taste for the fine arts, particularly architecture, drew him from his first profession. He designed the east front and colonnades of the Louvre, the Observatory at Paris, the grotto at Versailles, and other great works. He also translated Vitruvius into French, which he illustrated with fine designs of his own. Perrault was admitted a member of the Academy of Sciences, though Boileau satirized him as a physician turned mason. His other works are "An Abridgment of Vitruvius," "Description of Machines of my Invention," "On the Ancient Columns of Architecture and their Ornaments," "Memoirs for a Natural History of Animals." b. at Paris, 1613; d. 1689.

PERRAULT, Charles, brother of the preceding, had, from his youth, a fine taste for literature, particularly poetry. Colbert appointed him comptroller-general of the public buildings; and Perrault made use of the influence he had with that minister in promoting the arts and assisting worthy men. He became a member of the French Academy, and was one of the institutors of that of Belles-lettres and Inscriptions. He also contributed to the Memoirs of the Academy of Painting, Sculpture, and Architecture. After the death of Colbert he was discharged from his post; on which he devoted himself wholly to letters. His poem on the "Age of Louis the Great," in which he exalted the modern authors over all the ancients, was highly censured and ridiculed. He then ventured to publish his "Parallel of the Ancients and Moderns," which gave still greater offence, and occasioned a violent controversy between him and Boileau. The celebrated fairy tales, known in England as "The Stories of Mother Goose," are said to have been written by him, although they are usually ascribed to his son, Perrault d'Armanecourt. b. 1628; d. 1703.

PERRON, Jacob Davy du, per'-ranng, a celebrated cardinal, was born of Calvinist parents, and was educated under his father, acquiring a great knowledge of the Latin, Greek, and Hebrew languages, as well as of the mathematics, philosophy, and history. His proficiency was such that Philip Desportes, abbot of Tryon, reported him to Henry III. of France as a prodigy of memory. Having renounced the Protestant religion, he entered into orders, and became famous as a preacher, but more as a controversialist. His success in converting Protestants was great; and among others whom he brought over to his church, were Henry and John Spiondaus. In 1603 he became bishop of Evreux; and, in 1600, had a conference on matters of religion with d'Aubigné and Mornay, in the presence of the king, in which Perron was equally matched. This

PERIZONIUS, James, per-i-zô'-ni-us, a learned Dutch writer, who studied first at Deventer, and afterwards at Leyden, under Gravius, by whose means he obtained the rectorship of the Latin school at Delft, and the professorship of history and eloquence at Franeker. In 1693 he removed to Leyden, where he filled the chair of Greek and history with reputation. Among other works, he wrote "Animadversiones Historice," and "Dissertations on several Points of conference procured him the dignity of cardinal. He was employed in several important negotiations, and was made grand almoner of France and archbishop of Sens. Du Perron was a man of great policy and ambition, and his learning was various and profound. His favourite authors were Rabelais and Montaigne. He wrote a treatise on the Eucharist, another against King James I. of England, Letters, &c.; which were all collected into 3 vols., with his life prefixed. n. 1556; n. at Paris, 1618.

PERRONER, Jean Rodolphe, per-ro-nai, an eminent French engineer, who was instructed by Beamsire, architect to the city of Paris, under whom he made great progress. About 1745 he became inspector of the school of engineers, of which he was afterwards director. France is indebted to him for several of its finest bridges and best roads, the canal of Burgundy and other great works. For his public services he was honoured with the order of St. Michael, was admitted a member of the Academy of Sciences at Paris, of the Royal Society of London, and of the Academy of Stockholm. He wrote a description of the bridges which he had constructed, "Memoirs on the Method of Constructing Grand Arches of Stone from 200 to 500 feet." n. at Surènes, 1708; n. 1791.

PERRON, Nicholas. (See ANLANCOURT.)

PENROT, Sir John, per-rot, an eminent English statesman, was one of the knights of the Bath at the coronation of Edward VI., who had a great partiality for him. At the beginning of the reign of Mary he was sent to prison for harbouring Protestants; but, by the good offices of friends, he was discharged. He assisted at the coronation of Elizabeth, who sent him, in 1572, to Ireland, as lord-president of Munster, which was in a state of rebellion, but, by his promptitude, was quickly reduced to obedience. He was afterwards appointed admiral of a fleet on the coast of Ireland, which was threatened with invasion by the Spaniards; and continued cruising there till the necessity for such an enterprise was over. In 1583 he was made lord deputy of Ireland, where he carried things with so high a hand as to give great offence, and he was recalled in 1588, and sent to the Tower. In 1592 he was tried by a special commission, found guilty of high treason, and sentenced to death. The queen, however, was persuaded of his innocence, and respited him; but he fell ill, and died in confinement the same year. n. in Pembrokeshire, 1527.

PERRY, John, per-re, an English engineer, who was invited to Russia by Peter the Great, and was there employed in forming a communication between the Volga and the Don; also in making some other rivers navigable, and improving the Russian navy; for which services he was badly requited. In 1712 he returned to England, and was engaged in stopping the Dagenham breach, in Essex, of which he published an account. He was also the author of "The Present State of Russia." n. 1733.

PERRY, James, an eminent political writer, who received his education at the grammar-school and Marischal College, Aberdeen. After being employed in an advocate's office at Aberdeen, he went to Edinburgh, and next to Manchester; finally, he repaired to London in 1771, where he obtained employment upon the newspapers. Subsequently he became part proprietor and editor of the "Morning Chronicle," which, under his management, assumed very PERSIUS, king of Macedon, per'-see-oos, succeeded his father, Philip V., n.c. 179. He endeavoured to form an alliance of the Greek states against the Romans, who thereupon marched an army into Macedonia. In 168 n.c., the Romans, under Paulus Æmilius, met Persius, who was totally defeated at Pydna. The king fled to Thrace, but afterwards surrendered to the Romans, and was conveyed to Rome. He was then sent to Alba, where he died.

PERSIGNY, Jean Victor Gilbert Fialen, Due de, pair-sen'-je, a modern French statesman, an enthusiastic supporter of the acts and general policy of Napoleon III. He was minister of the interior in 1860 and 1862, and from 1855 to 1858 was French ambassador at the court of St. James's. He was made a duke in 1863. n. 1812.

PERSIUS, Annius Flaccus, per'-see-us, a Latin satirical poet, who studied, with Lucan, under Cornutus the Stoic, for whom he had a great regard. Persius wrote in the reign of Nero, whom he satirized with great severity. His works are enigmatical, and have been compared, in this respect, to the Greek Lyophron. They have been translated and annotated by Gifford, Dryden, Sir William Drummond, and others. n. at Volterra, Etruria, 34; n. 62.

PERTINAX, Christopher Frederick, per'-tin-es, an eminent German bookseller, who, after experiencing many difficulties in early life, established himself in ss at Hamburg, in 1769. In 1822 he left his shop at Hamburg and went to Gotha, where he commenced the publication of the "Almanach de Gotha," and was employed to e the works of Neander, Hensen, and other celebrated writers. The "General History of the States of Europe," to which many of the first German writers contributed, also issued from his establishment. After organizing a most extensive business concern, he retired from the management about 1838. His correspondence with almost all the celebrities of his day has been published, and is very interesting. n. at Rudolfs-tadt, 1772; n. 1813.

PERTINAX, Publius Helvius, per'-ti-nax, a Roman emperor, who was the son of a dealer in charcoal. He, however, obtained a good education, and was some time an instructor of youth in Liguria; after which he entered the army, and by his bravery obtained rapid preferment. The emperor Aurelius made him consul, and on the death of Commodus, in 193, he was elected to the imperial dignity by the soldiers. He distributed his lands among the people, and sold the property accumulated by his predecessor to pay off the public debt. He also abolished the heavy imposts which had been laid on by Commodus. But although these virtuous acts pleased the senate and the people, the Pretorians rose against and killed him, after he had reigned only a few months. n. about 128.

PERUGINO, Peter, per-roo-je'-no, an eminent Italian painter, was the disciple of Andrea Verocchio, but is chiefly celebrated for being the master of Raphael. He was employed by Sixtus IV. to paint several pieces for his chapel. Perugino was very avaricious, and amassed considerable wealth, of which being robbed, the loss occasioned his death in 1524. There are

PERUZZI, Balthasar, poi-roof-ee, a celebrated Italian painter and architect, who was employed at Rome by Popes Julius II. and Leo X.; by the former in ornamenting his palace, and by the latter as one of the architects of the church of St. Peter. He was taken prisoner when Rome was sacked by the Constable de Bourbon, but obtained his liberty on painting a picture of the captor. Two of his works are in the National Gallery. n. at Volterra, 1481; p. 1536.

PESCEMNIUS NIGER, Caius, pes-cent-i-cos ni'-jer, a Roman emperor, was a native of Aquino. He was appointed governor of Syria, and commander of the legions in Asia, by Commodus; and on the death of Pertinax, in 193, the troops of Pescennius appointed him emperor. He was defeated at Issus, in 195, and was killed by some soldiers, as on his flight to the Parthian dominions.

Pestalozzi, John Henry, pes-ta-lot'-ee, a celebrated Swiss school teacher, and the founder, upon the continent, of the mutual-instruction or monitorial system, which was about the same time inaugurated in England by Lancaster. (See LANCASTER, Joseph.) After completing his education, he devoted himself to the instruction of poor children, and established schools at several places in Switzerland, the last of which was founded at Yverdon, in the canton of Vaud, and became celebrated throughout Europe; but ultimately, through the dissensions of its teachers, it declined in prosperity. He was the author of a large number of works, more or less closely bearing upon education. n. at Zurich, 1746; p. at Drugg, Switzerland, 1827.

PETAU, Denis, pet'-o, an eminent French writer, who entered the society of Jesuits at the age of 23, and became a great ornament and defender of that order. His knowledge was general; but he particularly excelled in chronology, in which science he stood unrivalled. Philip IV. of Spain and Pope Urban VIII. solicited him to settle in their respective states, with the most flattering promises, which he declined, preferring a tranquil life in a monastery. His principal works are "De Doctrina Temporum," in which he applies chronology to history, ancient and modern; "Rationarium Temporum," an abridgment of the former; and the Psalms, translated into Greek verse. He had several controversies with Scaliger, Salmassius, and Casaubon; and published editions of some of the works of the ancient fathers. n. at Orleans, France, 1583; p. at Paris, 1652.

PETER I., of Aragon, pe'-ter, was proclaimed king after the death of his father, in 1094. He gained the battle of Alvaraz, and subsequently subdued Barbastro and other places. p. 1104.

PETER II., of Aragon, was the son and successor of Alphonso II., in 1196. He drove away the Vaudols, who had taken refuge in his kingdom, entered into an alliance with Alphonso IX. against Sancho VII., king of Navarre, and in 1213 defeated the Almohades at Tolosa. He was himself subsequently defeated and slain by Simon de Montfort, at Muret, 1213.

PETER III., king of Aragon, succeeded to the throne upon the death of his brother, James I., in 1276. He laid claim to the kingdom of Navarre, but was unsuccessful. Having married the daughter of Manfred, king of Sicily, he resolved to make himself master of that island, and, to effect his purpose, contrived the terrible massacre known as the "Sicilian Vespers," or the murder of all the French in the island at the hour of vespers, on Easter-day, 1282. For this crime, Pope Martin IV. excommunicated him, and the Sicilians laid Aragon under an interdict, and gave Sicily to Charles of Valois; but Peter defended himself successfully against Charles, as well as his own son James, king of Majorca, until his death, which occurred 1285.

PETER IV., king of Aragon, was son and successor of Alphonso IV. He dethroned James II. of Majorca, fought against the Moors of Portugal and Castile, between the years 1340-42, and in 1353 defeated the Genoese at sea, near Alghero. In 13 9 he entered into an alliance with Peter the Cruel, king of Castile, against his brother, Henry of Trastamare. He founded the University of Huesca, but his reign was troubled by several revolts. p. 1357.

PETER ALEXIOVITZ I., czar of Russia, called the Great, was the son of Alexis Michaelowitz, and was placed on the throne after the death of his elder brother Theodore, or Feodor, to the prejudice of his other brother Ivan, who was as weak in his intellect as in his constitution. The Strelitzes, a militia which greatly resembled the Janissaries of Turkey, being excited by the Princess Sophia, the sister of Peter, revolted in favour of Ivan; and, to avert a civil war, it was resolved that the two princes should reign in conjunction, with the ambitious Princess Sophia as regent. Russia was at that time in a condition little better than barbarism. In his 17th year Peter married; and when it became apparent that his wife was pregnant, Prince Galitzin rose in insurrection, but was defeated and banished, the Princess Sophia being also sent to a convent, where she remained for the rest of her life. Peter then commenced to reign alone, and his first acts were to reform the army and government, in which, notwithstanding the difficulty of the task, he had great success. In 1696 he took Azof, which he placed in a state of defence against the Tartars. He next turned his attention to the finances, and corrected many gross abuses. The year following he undertook a journey into various parts of Europe, for the purpose of acquiring a knowledge of arts, sciences, and mechanics. After passing through Germany, he visited Amsterdam, where he entered himself in the company of shipwrights in the dockyard, and worked with great diligence, under the name of Peter Zimmerman. In 1698 he went to England, and paid attention to manufactures and to every public institution. Having conceived the idea of forming a junction between the Don and the Volga, he engaged some English engineers to enter his service for the accomplishment of that great undertaking. From England the czar went to Vienna, intending to go to Italy; but the news of an insurrection in Russia obliged him to hasten home. Several of the insurgents were executed, and the greatest part of the Strelitzes decapitated or sent to Siberia. (See ORLOFF.) In 1699 Peter instituted the order of St. Andrew, by way of exciting a spirit of emulation among his subjects, and, in 1703, founded the city of St. Petersburg. The next year he declared war against Charles XII. of Sweden, but met with small success. This, however, did not discourage Peter, who said, "I knew that the Swedes would beat us at first; but they will, in time, teach us to beat them." This was verified in 1700, by the important victory of Pultowa, in which the greatest part of the Swedish troops were made prisoners, and their king obliged to seek an asylum in Turkey. Peter availed himself of this advantage to seize Livonia, Ingria, Finland, and part of Swedish Pomerania.

The prisoners was a young girl, whose husband, a sergeant in the Swedish army, whom she had only married the day before, was killed. This young girl subsequently became first Peter's mistress, and afterwards his wife.

He declared czarina in 1711, under the name of Catharine Alexina. In the mean time, the Turks, at the instigation of Charles XII., broke their truce with the czar, whom they completely hemmed in, with his army, on the banks of the Pruth, in 1711. In this perilous situation, he was saved by the presence of mind of the Czarina Catharine. She secretly opened negotiations with the grand vizier, who consented to the terms, and a peace was settled. In memory of this event, the female order of St. Catharine was instituted, of which the czarina became the head. At the close of 1713 Peter had taken all Pomerania, with the exception of Stralsund, from the Swedes. The restoration of tranquillity enabled the czar to make another tour in Denmark, Germany, Holland, and France. When in the latter country, he visited the tomb of Cardinal Richelieu, on the sight of which he exclaimed, "Great minister, why were you not born in my time? I would have given you one half of my dominions for teaching me how to govern the other." Meanwhile, Prince Alexis, his son, having joined a party of malcontents, who were displaced at the changes which had taken place both in ecclesiastical and civil matters, the czar caused him to be tried, and the judges sentenced him to death. This decree was not executed; but the prince soon after died, as was said, of an apoplexy. Some degree of suspicion, however, fell upon the father, which was not lessened by the rigorous execution of several of the friends of Alexis.

The Tartars having massacred a Russian garrison on the borders of Persia, Peter, in 1722, embarked on the Caspian Sea, and took the city of Derbend, with three provinces, which were afterwards recaptured by Nadir Shah. After this expedition, the czar devoted himself to the internal regulation of his empire; and of the many important establishments and improvements of which he was the author, the following were the principal: a reform among the clergy, and the abolition of the patriarchal dignity; the organization of a numerous army; the formation of a formidable navy; fortifications in all the principal towns, and an excellent civil government in the cities; an academy for naval education; colleges at Moscow, Petersburg, and Kiev; a college of physicians, and a dispensary at Moscow; public lectures in anatomy, a branch of science in which the czar himself had made great progress under Ruysch, at Amsterdam; an observatory, which was also a repository of natural curiosities; a botanical garden, stocked with plants from all parts of the world; printing-offices, and a royal library. But one of the most extraordinary acts of this great man was the founding, upon piles, in a morass, of the city of St. Petersburg. By his last will, he constituted the empress Catharine his successor. "He gave a polish," says Voltaire,

Peter

"to his people, and was himself a savage; he taught them the art of war, of which he was himself ignorant; from the sight of a small boat on the river Moskwa he created a powerful fleet, made himself an expert and able shipwright, sailor, pilot, and commander; he changed the manners, customs, and laws of the Russians, and lives in their memory as the 'Father of his country.'" After his death, Catharine was proclaimed empress, and ruled during two years. n. at Moscow, 1672; n. 1725.

PETER II., emperor of Russia, was the son of Alexis and grandson of Peter the Great. He reigned in 1727, the empress Catharine who had succeeded him grand-duke of Russia the year preceding. The most remarkable event of his reign was the disgrace of the prime minister Menschikoff, who was banished to Siberia. n. 1711, p. 1730.

PETER III., the son of Charles Frederick, duke of Holstein-Gottorp, and of Anna Petrovna, daughter of Peter the Great, was declared grand-duke of Russia in 1742, by his aunt, the empress Elizabeth, whom he succeeded in 1762. He was a warm admirer of the character of Frederick the Great, king of Prussia, and would have imitated him, had his abilities been equal to his wishes. Peter was weak, passionate, and irresolute, and, a few months after his accession, was dethroned by his wife Catharine, who was proclaimed empress, and who caused him to be strangled by her favourite, Count Orloff. n. 1729; strangled, 1762.

PETER NOLASQUE, founder of the Order of Mercy for the Redemption of Captives, was in the service of James, king of Aragon, and by his interest with that prince instituted a religious and military order in 1229, whose province it was to rescue Christian slaves from the infidels. He was very successful in this good work. n. in Languedoc, 1189; p. 1256.

PETER OF SEICLY, an historian, who wrote a History of the Manicheans, which contains many curious and important facts. Flourished in the 9th century.

PETER RUIZ CERVAS, king of Castile, succeeded his father, Alphonso XI., in 1350, and commenced his reign by several acts of wanton barbarity. He caused Leonora de Guzman, his father's mistress, to be put to death, and having married the daughter of Philip, duke of Bourbon, repudiated her shortly afterwards, and sent her to prison, in order that he might renew his connexion with Maria de Padilla, his former mistress, who in turn was abandoned, upon his seeking a marriage with Donna Juana de Castro, a noble lady, who was also cast off shortly after this union; whereupon her brother, a powerful Gallician noble, headed a revolt against Peter. His cruelties provoked his subjects to take up arms against him in 1366, and after three years of sanguinary warfare, Henry of Trancamar, who was as cruel and cold-blooded as his brother, besieged him in the town of Montiel. Peter requested of Duguessin, who had joined Henry's standard, to aid his escape; and upon the Frenchman's enticing the king to his tent, he was set upon and murdered by Henry, 1369.

PETER THE HERMIT, a French gentleman of Amiens, in Picardy, who renounced a military life to embrace that of a pilgrim. At the end of the 11th century, a general alarm was spread that the last day was approaching; on which numbers of persons flocked to the Holy Land from all countries, with a view of ending their days near the holy sepulchre. Peter was of the number, and on his return to Europe made so pathetic a representation of the state of the Christians in Palestine, to Pope Urban II., that he gave Peter leave to preach up the necessity of a crusade throughout Christendom. The appearance, zeal, and eloquence of the hermit, produced a prodigious effect, and all ranks and ages, of both sexes, pressed eagerly into the service. With a motley army, estimated at 100,000 men, Peter passed through Hungary. In his absence, his followers attacked Solymán's army at Nicaea, and all, except a few thousands, perished, "and," says Gibbon, "a pyramid of bones informed their companions of the place of their defeat." Peter remained in Palestine, and was at the siege of Antioch, in 1097; but on his attempting to make his escape, shortly afterwards, was brought back, and compelled to take a new oath of fidelity and obedience to the holy cause. Two years later he was present at the siege of Jerusalem, where he displayed great bravery, and when the place was taken, was made vicar-general. Peter, on his return to France, founded the abbey of Neumoutier, in the diocese of Liège, where he died, 1115.

PETER, commonly called the Wild Boy, was found in the woods near Hameln, in Hanover, in 1725. He was supposed to be then about 12 years of age, and had subsisted in those woods upon the bark of trees, leaves, berries, &c., for a considerable time. How long he had been in that state could never be ascertained; but, when found, the remains of a shirt-collar were about his neck. In the following year he was brought to England by order of Queen Caroline, but he could never be taught to speak. He was placed under the care of a farmer at North Church, in Hertfordshire, where he lived on a stipend of £35 a year allowed by government. Notwithstanding his remaining so long in a savage state, and his being quite an idiot, he was harmless and tractable. d. 1753.

PETERBOROUGH, Charles Mordaunt, Earl of, pe'ter-bur-o, an eminent English general, who entered the navy, and distinguished himself at Tangier, when it was besieged by the Moors. In the reign of James II. he went to Holland, attached himself to the Prince of Orange, and accompanied him on his expedition to England in 1688. The year following he was created earl of Monmouth, and appointed first commissioner of the Treasury; from which post he was removed in 1690. In 1697, on the death of his uncle, the earl of Peterborough, he succeeded to that title. In the reign of Queen Anne he displayed the greatest bravery and skill as commander of the English forces in Spain, where he took Barcelona, and brought several provinces to acknowledge Charles III. as their king. He was afterwards employed on various embassies, and in 1711 appointed governor of Minorca. Some of his letters are in the works of Pope, with whom he was intimate. It was said of him that he had "seen more kings and more postillions than any man in Europe." b. 1659; d. 1735.

PETERMANN, August Heinrich, pe'ter-man, a modern German geographer, and superintendent of the celebrated map-establishment of Justus Perthes at Gotha. Destined for the church, he was educated at the college of Nord-hansen; but a strong predilection for geographical science caused him to become, in 1839, a special pupil in the academy which the learned Berghaus had established at Potsdam. There he made the acquaintance, among other distinguished men, of Humboldt, for whom he executed the "Map of Central Asia." When it was resolved to issue an English edition of the celebrated "Physical Atlas" of Berghaus, Petermann was invited to Edinburgh, where he spent two years in preparing and revising the work. In 1847 he repaired to London, where he became a member of the Royal Geographical Society. He subsequently produced an "Atlas of Physical Geography," with the assistance of the Rev. Thomas Milner; and an "Account of the Expedition to Central Africa," giving reports of the most recent explorations. In 1854 he accepted the invitation of the duke of Saxe-Coburg to occupy the chair of geography in the university of that place, and soon afterwards established the "Geographical Journal," which Sir Roderick Murchison described, in 1857, as "exercising powerful and salutary influence on the progress of geographical science." b. at Bleicherode, Prussia, 1822.

PETERS, Hugh, pe'ters, an English divine, who was educated at St. John's College, Cambridge; whence he was expelled for irregular behaviour. He afterwards went on the stage, where he acquired that theatrical action which subsequently distinguished him in the pulpit. He was ordained by Bishop Montaine, and was for some time lecturer of St. Sepulchre's, London; but, having an intrigue with another man's wife, he fled to Rotterdam, where he joined the Independents. He went thence to New England; and, at the beginning of the civil war, returned to London, where he became a zealous preacher in the cause of the Parliament. For his share in the events of the time, especially the execution of Charles I., he was hanged and quartered in 1660. b. in Cornwall, 1599.

PETERSEN, Niels Matthias, pe'ter-sen, a modern Danish antiquary, who, after completing his education at the University of Copenhagen, earned a subsistence as teacher; but, having gained the prize offered by the Society for the Promotion of Danish Literature for the best essay on the history of the Scandinavian languages, he resolved to devote himself to history and philology. In 1829 he obtained the appointment of assistant librarian to the Univer-

Ancient Northern Geography," and "Voyages and Travels of the Explorers at Home and Abroad." b. in Funen, 1791; d. 1867.

PETION, Alexander Sabes, pe'ti-on, a negro, who became president of the republic of Hayti, at first served in the French army during the revolt at St. Domingo, and rose to the grade of adjutant-general. He held the fort of Janel against Toussaint l'Ouverture, and, after the defeat of his party, repaired to France. He returned with the expedition under General Leclerc; but afterwards quitted the French ranks to join General Desaulines, and became commandant of Port-au-Prince, under king Christophe, in 1803. In the following year he revolted against Christophe, and proclaimed himself President of Hayti, retaining the post until his death. b. 1770; d. 1818.

THE DICTIONARY

Petion

PETION, Jerome, was mayor of Paris at the outbreak of the French revolution, and was for a time the idol of the people of Paris; but was proscribed with the Girondins, in 1793. He escaped from Paris, and fled to the Landes of Bordeaux, where his body was afterwards found, half-devoured by wolves.

PETIS DE LA CROIX, François, pet-e'-kroa-wa, an eminent French orientalist, who was the son of a professor of the oriental languages. Having been so fortunate as to attract the favourable notice of Colbert, he was sent, in his 16th year, to reside and study in the East. He lived at Aleppo, Constantinople, and Ispahan, and acquired, during his stay, the Arabic, Persian, and Turkish languages. Returning to Paris in 1680, he was attached to the embassy about to be sent to the sultan of Morocco, before whom he delivered an oration in Arabic, which excited the admiration of the court, in consequence of its fluency and purity. During two years he acted as interpreter to the French expedition against Algiers, and indeed officiated as chief diplomatist in all the transactions which took place about that time between his native country and the eastern courts. In 1693 he received the appointment of Arabic professor at the Royal College of France, and, three years later, was nominated royal interpreter. He wrote extensively; but his works remain, for the most part, in manuscript. The most important of these were a "History of the Conquest of Syria," translated from the Arabic; "History of the Ottoman Empire;" a dictionary of the Armenian language; "The Antiquities and Monuments of Egypt;" and a small work entitled "Ancient and Modern Jerusalem." B. at Paris, 1653; D. at the same city, 1713.—His son Alexander was also an eminent orientalist.

PETIT, Jean-Louis, pet-e', an eminent French surgeon, who studied under Lettice, Castil, and Marceschal, and in 1726 was invited to attend the king of Poland, whom he cured, as he also did the Prince of Spain in 1731. He was admitted a member of the Academy of Sciences, rector of that of Surgery, and was regarded as the first surgeon in Europe during his time. He invented several surgical instruments, and wrote "A System of Surgery," "Treatise on Diseases of the Bones," and dissertations in the "Memoirs of the Academy of Sciences." B. at Paris, 1674; D. 1700.

PETIT, Pierre, a French mathematician, who became geographer to the king, and intendant of the fortifications of France, to which office he was appointed by Cardinal Richelieu. He was the intimate friend of Descartes, and was author of treatises on the Proportional Compass, on the Construction and Use of the Calibre of Artillery, on Sight, on Eclipses, on Preventing the Inundations of the Sea, and on Comets. B. at Montignon, 1598; D. 1677.

PETITON, John, pet-e-to, an unrivalled painter in enamel, who was brought up to the trade of a jeweller; but having made several successful attempts at producing enamels for that branch of industry, he resolved to entirely devote himself to the pursuit. After studying in Italy, he visited England, where he was greatly patronized by Charles I., after whose death he went to France, and was employed by Louis XIV. He painted the face and hands of his portraits, and his brother-in-law, Bordier, added the drapery. The most celebrated works of this distinguished artist were portraits of Charles I. and his family,

Petrarch

Charles II., Louis XIV., Anne of Austria, and Maria Theresa. Fifty-six of his portraits are in the museum of the Louvre, but his finest production is a copy of Van Dyck's portrait of the Countess of Southampton, in the collection of the duke of Devonshire. He was a zealous Protestant, and resisted the greatest efforts made by the eloquent Bossuet to induce him to embrace Romanism. B. at Geneva, 1607; D. 1691.

PETÖFI, Alexander, pet-o'-fe, a celebrated Hungarian poet, was at first a strolling player, but had long been in the habit of composing songs for his own amusement. In 1813 he became acquainted with the editor of the "Pesth Athenæum," and was by him engaged to compose short lyrics for his paper. These poems soon attracted notice, and speedily became the favourites of the entire nation. Upon the outbreak of the Hungarian revolution, he recited one of his songs, "Up, Magyars, up!" to the students of the University of Pesth, who were thereby excited to enthusiasm. Two other of his songs, "Now or Never," and "Battle Song," stirred to fierce action the whole Hungarian people, during the same momentous period. Soon afterwards he became aide-de-camp to General Kém, with whom he served in the campaign against the Russians.

and after a great battle there was never seen again. The Hungarian refugees in London declared that he was still living, but he was never afterwards heard of. A collection of his fine songs, under the title of "Sounds from the Past," was published in Leipzig in 1851. B. in Hungary, 1823; D. as supposed, in 1849.

PETRARCH, Francis, pet'-a'-rach, a celebrated Italian poet. On account of the dissensions which raged in his native country, his father removed with him to Avignon, and afterwards to Carpentras, where Petrarch began his education, which was completed at Montpellier and Bologna. He was intended for the law; but Virgil had more charms for him than Justinian. On the death of his parents he returned to Avignon, where, in 1327, he saw a young lady in church, and became passionately in love with her. The name of the lady was Laura de Noves; she was 19 years of age at the time, and the wife of Hugh de Sade, a gentleman at Avignon, who had been a prisoner of the pope.

At the poet's hand, and person, impassioned pleading, and flattering verses, he could make no impression upon her heart. After struggling in vain to overcome his passion, he retired to Vaucluse, a romantic spot, where he poured out his amorous complaints in several pieces. He afterwards travelled in different countries; but with his return to Vaucluse his passion for Laura returned. Again he celebrated her charms, and the delights of his retreat. His name became famous; and he received invitations from the senate of Rome, from the king of Naples, and the University of Paris. He accepted the former, and on Easter-day, 1311, was crowned with laurel in the Capitol, with great pomp: he was also declared a Roman citizen. In 1349 he received the news of the death of Laura. He was then at Parma; but immediately set out for Vaucluse, where he passed some time in grief. In his copy of Virgil he thus records the fact: "It was in the early days of my youth that Laura, distinguished by her virtues, and celebrated in my verses, first blessed my eyes in the church of Santa Clara, at Avignon, and it was in the same month of April, at the same time of the morning, in the year 1348, that this bright luminary was withdrawn from our sight, whilst I was at Verona, alas! ignorant of my calamity." In 1352 he returned to Italy, and, at Padua, obtained a canonry; but many years of his life were spent, by invitation, at the courts of the pope and other great Italian potentates. The sonnets of Petrarch are tender and melodious to the greatest degree; but, besides being a great poet, he was a profound scholar and patron of learning. His Latin poems are inferior to the Italian; and he wrote extensively upon theological and philosophical subjects. B. at Arozzo, 1304; D. 1374.

PETRE, Sir William, pe'-ter, an eminent English statesman, whose abilities recommended him to Thomas Cromwell; by whom he was employed in state affairs, and appointed a member of the commission for visiting the monasteries. He obtained a large share of the church lands, which he contrived to retain even during the reign of Mary, to whom he was councillor, as he had been to her father and brother. This complying courtier found means to ingratiate himself with Queen Elizabeth, who appointed him one of her secretaries of state, and member of the privy council. His manners in Essex were very considerable, and are possessed by Lord Petre, his descendant. B. about 1503; D. 1571.

PETRONIUS ARBITER, Titus, pe'-tro'-ni-us, a Latin poet, who was said to be one of the favourites of Nero, and became proconsul of Bithynia; but being accused by Tigellinus, another of Nero's friends, of being engaged in a conspiracy against that tyrant, he sought a voluntary death by opening his veins as he sat in the bath conversing with his friends. One of his pieces, a supposed satire against Nero, is extremely well written, though very licentious. His other works are a poem on the "Civil War between Caesar and Pompey," on the "Education of the Roman Youth," on the "Corruption of Eloquence," and on the "Causes of the Decline of the Arts," "The Shipwreck of Lycas," &c. The best edition of his works is that by Burmann, 1743. The style of his writings is as good as their subject-matter is bad. Supposed to have been born near Marseilles, about the commencement of the 1st century A.D.; D. 66.

PETRONIUS MAXIMUS, emperor of Rome, was born of an illustrious family, and, after being a senator and consul, he seized the throne, by assassinating Valentinian III., in 455. He then married the widow of his predecessor, Eudoxia, who was, however, ignorant of his crime. On becoming acquainted with it, she applied to Genseric, king of the Vandals, who entered Italy with fire and sword, took Rome, and slew the usurper. The Romans were so enraged with Maximus, that they dragged his body about the streets, and threw it into the Tiber. B. 385.

PETTY, Sir William, pet'-te, a celebrated English writer on political economy, was the son of a clothier, and received the first part of his education at the school of his native town, after which he went to the university of Caen, in Normandy. On his return to England he began the study of physics and anatomy, to perfect himself in which he went to Leyden, Amsterdam, and Paris. In 1647 he returned to England, and soon afterwards went to Oxford, where he became assistant to the professor of anatomy, and fellow of Brasenose College. He was also chosen one of the council of the Royal Society, upon its establishment. In 1652 he was appointed physician to the army in Ireland, where he became secretary to Henry Cromwell, lord-lieutenant of that kingdom. He was one of the commissioners for dividing the forfeited lands; but, in 1658, was dismissed from his employments on a charge brought against him in the House of Commons. At the Restoration he was knighted, and made surveyor-general of Ireland. He wrote a great number of books on subjects of practical or political utility, the most important of which were "Political Arithmetic," "The Political Anatomy of Ireland," and a treatise on Money. B. at Romsey, Hampshire, 1623; D. 1637.

PETTY, William. (See SHELburne, Earl of.) PEUCER, Gaspard, poi'-ser, a German physician and mathematician, who became medical professor at Wittenberg, where he married Melancthon's daughter. He was imprisoned for ten years on account of his opinions; and, while in confinement, wrote his thoughts on the margins of old books, with ink made of burnt crusts soaked in wine. His principal works are a treatise on Divination, and a History of his Imprisonment. B. at Bautzen, 1525; D. 1602.

PETREUS, Isaac, pai'-vair, the author of a book endeavouring to prove that Adam was not the first man, for which he was sent to prison at Brussels. By the interest of the Prince of Oudé, to whom he was librarian, he obtained his liberty and went to Rome, where he abjured his errors. He also wrote a book on the Restoration of the Jews, an Account of Greenland, and other works. D. 1676.

PETRONNEL, Charles de, pai'-son-nel, a learned French writer, who accompanied the French ambassador to Constantinople in 1735, a secretary, and afterwards travelled through Asia Minor, collecting medals and identifying the geographical positions of ancient places. He wrote several dissertations inserted in the Memoirs of the Academy of Inscriptions, of which he was a member. He was also the author of an eulogy on Marshal Villars, a Discourse on Corals, and other pieces. B. at Marseilles, 1700; D. 1757.

PETRONNEL, Charles de, son of the preceding, became consul at Smyrna, and wrote, among other works, "Historical Observations on the barbarous People who inhabit the Borders of the Danube and the Euxine," and "Treatise on the Commerce of the Black Sea." B. 1727; D. at Smyrna, 1790.

PEZENZAS, Esprit, pez'-e-na, a learned French esuit, who became professor of philosophy and hydrography at Marseilles. Among other works he translated Maclaurin's Algebra and Fluxions into French, "Baker on the Microscope," Vard's "Young Mathematician's Guide," Smith's "Optics," and other works from the English. His own works consisted of several treatises upon mathematical philosophy. B. at Vignon, 1692; D. at the same city, 1776.

PFEIFFER, Madame Ida, fi'-fer, a celebrated German traveller, who states that from her earliest years she was possessed with a longing to travel; but, having married, family cares and utility prevented her from gratifying her passion until she had attained the age of 47 years. At that time her husband was dead, and her resources were established in life, one as an artist, and the other as a government official.

Accordingly, in 1842, he set forth towards Palestine, that she might "have the ineffable delight of treading those spots which our Saviour hallowed by his presence." In the following year a narrative of her journey was published, under the title of "Journey of a Vienna Woman in the Holy Land." She next went to Sweden, Norway, and Iceland, in 1845, and again published a narrative of her wanderings. In the summer of the following year she left Hamburg for her first journey round the world. Her route, courageously pursued through every form of danger incidental to such an undertaking, was from Vienna to Brazil, Chili, Tahiti, China, Hindostan, Persia, and Asia Minor. She had been absent from Vienna two years and three months, during which time she had travelled about 40,000 miles by water, and 2760 by land. In 1850 she published her account of this great journey, in a work entitled "A Woman's Journey round the World," which was speedily translated into French and English. In 1851 she went to London, when, after witnessing the opening of the Great Exhibition of Industry, she left the Thames, on board a sailing-vessel, for the Cape of Good Hope. From the Cape she proceeded to Singapore, Borneo, the island of Sumatra, Java, the island of Celebes, Batavia, which last place she left for California. The "execrable city" of St. Francisco was visited: after which she proceeded to Panama and Lima, crossed the Andes, visited the sources of the river Amazon, and returned to Panama. New Orleans, the Mississippi, Lakes Superior, Huron, Erie, and Michigan, and the Falls of Niagara, were the scenes of her subsequent wanderings; Canada and New York succeeded; till, at length, she crossed the Atlantic, and arrived in London at the commencement of 1855. "A Lady's Second Voyage round the World" contained the records of this journey, and, like its predecessors, found great favour with the reading public of France and England. Towards the close of the year 1856, having resolved to visit the island of Madagascar, she set forth upon one of the most perilous of her journeys. In a letter to a friend, she thus wrote:—"I often smile as I think what strange notions people, who only know me through my works, must form of me. Of course they picture me to themselves as more a man than a woman. How wrong they are! You, who are acquainted with me, know that instead of being six feet high, an Amazon, with pistols in my girdle, I am as simple, peaceable, and unassuming as the best of my sex who have never set foot beyond their native village." n. at Vienna, 1795; n. 1858.

PHEDON, fé-don, a disciple of Socrates, who purchased him of some pirates. After the death of his master, Phedon returned to Elis, his native country, where he founded a sect of philosophers called Eleans. Plato affixed his name to a dialogue on the death of Socrates. Flourished in the 5th century n.c.

PHEDRUS, fé-drus, a Latin poet, was a native of Thrace, and appears to have been the freedman of Augustus. Under Tiberius he was persecuted by Sejanus, to which circumstance he has alluded in his Fables, which possess considerable merit, and are written with great purity of style, though they are evidently borrowed from the popular fables of the Greeks. Flourished about the 1st century a.d.

PHILIS, fil'-a-ris, became the tyrant of ruled of Agrigentum, in Sicily, n.c. 570. From his youth he showed a cruel and ambitious temper, and delighted in the invention of new instruments of torture. At his command, Perillus, an artist, made a brazen bull, which was hollow, and so contrived that when a fire was kindled under the body, the cries of the unhappy victim within resembled the roarings of the animal it represented. Phalaris, after commending the work, ordered Perillus to be the first to make trial of it. The tyrant was himself put to death by his subjects in the same way, n.c. 564. The letters of Phalaris have caused several literary disputes, particularly that between Boyle and Bentley. The best edition of the letters (probably the work of a Sophist in the time of the Cæsars) is that of Schäfer, Leipzig. n. in Crete, in the 6th century n.c.

PHAROMOND, far'-a-mawng, according to many historians, was the name of the first king of France, who reigned at Trèves about a.d. 419. To him is attributed the celebrated Salique law, by which females were excluded from the succession to the throne. n. 423.

PHARNACES I., far'-na-aces, king of Pontus, was the son of Mithridates IV., and grandfather of Mithridates the Great. He made war against the king of Pergamus, and reigned between 190 and 156 n.c.

PHARNACES II., king of the Cimmerian Bosphorus, was son of Mithridates VI., king of Pontus, and revolted with the army against his father, who slew himself in despair, n.c. 63. Pharnaces cultivated the friendship of the Romans, and, in the war between Cæsar and Pompey, he remained neutral; but Cæsar declared war against and defeated him, n.c. 47, after a struggle of three days only. It was on that occasion that Cæsar wrote to the Roman senate, in allusion to his easy triumph: "I came, saw, and conquered." (Veni, vidi, vici.) Pharnaces died shortly afterwards.

PHRECRATES, fo-rek'-ra-tess, a Greek comic poet, was contemporary with Plato and Aristophanes. None of his comedies have come down to us in a complete form, and of the seventeen plays which he wrote, only some fragments have been preserved by Heretelus and Grotius. There is in Plutarch a piece of his on the music of the Greeks. Flourished in the 5th century n.c.

PHILECUTUS, fil'-e-s'-dus, a philosopher of the isle of Syros, was the disciple of Pythagoras and the first who wrote upon natural science and the essence of the gods. He was the master of Pythagoras, who regarded him as a father. There are different accounts of his death; some assert that he died in the island of Delos, and others that he threw himself from the top of Mount Corycius, near Delphi. It is most probable that he died of extreme age. Diogenes Laertius ascribes to him the invention of prosody. Flourished about 511 n.c.—He is not to be confounded with a historian of this name who lived at Athens, between 490 and 456 n.c.; Vossius, however, says they are the same.

PHIDIAS, fid'-ias, a sculptor of Athens, and one of the most celebrated artists of antiquity. He constructed a beautiful statue of Minerva; but being accused of embezzling some of the gold entrusted to him for that work, he was, according to one account, banished. On this he went to Elis, where, by way of revenge, he made a colossal statue of Jupiter Olympius, which infinitely surpassed his Minerva, and was deemed one of the wonders of the world. n. about n.c. 432.

PHILEMON, fil'-e-mon, a Greek comic poet, who was contemporary with, and the rival of, Menander, and is asserted to have been the author of 97 comedies. Plautus imitated some of his works. His death is said to have been occasioned, at the age of 97, by laughing at seeing an ass eat figs. n.c. 274.

PHILETAS, fil'-e-tas, a Greek grammarian and poet of Cos, and preceptor to Ptolemy Philadelphus. He wrote elegies and epigrams, which are lost. n. about n.c. 250.

PHILIP, fil'-ip, was the name borne by several kings of Macedon, the most celebrated of whom were:—

PHILIP II., (the son of Amyntas, who succeeded his brother Perdiccas 359 n.c., in his youth displayed great military talents, which were improved by studying under Epaminondas at Thebes. At the beginning of his reign he had to oppose the Illyrians, Pæonians, and Thracians. The two former he disarmed by presents and promises, and the latter were not able to act against him. He then made war against Athens; and, having gained a great victory over the troops of that republic, he restored all the prisoners without a ransom, which generosity produced a peace. Philip then turned his arms against the Illyrians, whom he defeated. After this he took Crenides, a city belonging to the Thracians; and, having made himself master of the gold mines near that place, he employed a number of men in working them, and was the first who had gold coin stamped with his name. His ambition now became boundless: he formed the design of subduing all Greece, and began by besieging Olynthus, a city belonging to Athens, and, having corrupted the principal inhabitants, obtained possession of the place. The Athenians were roused against Philip by the eloquence of Demosthenes; but all the efforts of the orator proved ineffectual when opposed to the arms and gold of the king of Macedon. After vanquishing Greece, Philip resolved to attempt the conquest of Persia, and was for that purpose elected commander-in-chief of the expedition in a general assembly of the Grecian states; but, while preparing for the enterprise, he was assassinated by Pausanias, one of his guards, leaving his vast designs to be accomplished by his son Alexander. Assassinated 336 n.c.

PHILIP V., king of Macedon, obtained the crown at the age of 17, upon the death of his cousin Antigonus, 220 n.c. The beginning of his reign was brilliant, owing to the conquests of his general Aratus, whom Philip, out of jealousy, caused to be poisoned. After the battle of Cænna, 216 n.c., he joined Hannibal against the Romans; but the consul Lævinus marched into Macedon, and compelled Philip to sue for peace. The Roman senate being apprised of a secret treaty between Philip and Hannibal, sent Flaminius against the former, who was defeated, and obliged to concede dishonourable terms. At the instigation of his son Perseus, he put to death his eldest son Demetrius, who was accused of designs upon the throne. n. 179 n.c.

PHILIP I., king of Spain, surnamed the Hard-some, was the son of Maximilian I., emperor of Germany; and, by his marriage with the heiress of Ferdinand V., king of Aragon, and Isabella, queen of Castile, he obtained the crown of Castile. n. 1493; n. at Burgos, 1500.

PHILIP II. was the only legitimate son of Charles V. In 1554 he became king of Naples and Sicily, by the abdication of his father, and in the same year married Mary, queen of England. In 1556 his father resigned to him the crown of Spain, having in the previous year given him the government of the Netherlands. He declared war against France, and was present at the battle of St. Quentin, where, it is said, he made two vows, the one never again to hazard his person in an engagement, and the other to build a palace to the honour of St. Lawrence. This last he executed at the village of Escorial, near Madrid, and gave to the building the form of a gridiron, in commemoration of the instrument of the saint's martyrdom. In 1559 he made peace with France, and, on his return from the Netherlands to Spain, caused an auto da fé to be celebrated, by which several unfortunate victims of the Inquisition were burnt alive. Resolved to extirpate heresy in his dominions, he employed fire and sword with unsparing bitterness in his Italian possessions; but the Netherlands resisted the attempt to establish the Inquisition, and, led by William the Silent, seven provinces succeeded, after a long and terrible struggle, in throwing off the Spanish yoke. (See ORANGE, Prince of.) In 1588 Philip fitted out his famous expedition called the Invincible Armada, for the invasion of England. This fleet, consisting of 130 ships in all, manned by troops, sailors, and galley-slaves, to the number of nearly 30,000 men, together with 2000 Spanish nobles and their retainers, was almost totally destroyed by storms or by the English ships. When Philip tacked England he gave his assistance to the Roman Catholic league in France, against Henry IV., hoping thereby to eventually subjugate that country. Philip is accused of sacrificing his son Don Carlos to what he called his "regard for the welfare of the state." The precise reasons for his conduct towards him are not established; but it is certain that the unfortunate young man perished miserably in a dungeon in his 23rd year. The greatest praise that can be accorded to this cold-hearted bigot is, that he gave a certain amount of encouragement to arts and sciences. n. 1527; n. 1598.

PHILIP III., the son of Philip II. and of Anne of Austria, succeeded his father at the age of 20. His reign was unfortunate and imprudent; the king himself being too indolent to rule his dominions, resigned the entire guidance of affairs to his favourite, the duke of Lerma. Spinola took Ostend, after a siege of three years, but with the loss of 80,000 Spaniards. The United Provinces, taking advantage of the exhausted condition of Spain, established their independence under the house of Nassau, and extorted from Philip an acknowledgment of their freedom. In 1609 he issued a decree that all the Moors should quit his kingdom in three days, by which Spain lost above a million of its most useful inhabitants. The lavish expenditure and confused management of the finances during this reign, were among the chief causes of the decline of the Spanish power. n. 1575; n. 1621.

PHILIP IV. succeeded his father Philip III.,

THE DICTIONARY

Philip

at the age of 16. The same year war was renewed with Holland, and the Spaniards, under Spinola, gained some advantages; but at sea they were totally unsuccessful. In 1635, Philip, at the instigation of his favourite and minister, the Duke (Olivarez, declared war against France, which proved very disastrous. He lost Artois; the Carolonians revolted, and put themselves under the protection of France; and Portugal, taking advantage of the distracted state of Spain, secured its independence, and placed on the throne the house of Braganza. Olivarez, the author of these disasters by his negligence and mismanagement, was disgraced; and, in 1659, a disadvantageous peace was concluded with France. b. 1605; p. 1665. Lord Macaulay, in his fifth volume of the History of England, gives us a painfully real portrait of this list of a race of bigots:—"Sometimes he starved himself, sometimes he whipped himself. At length a complication of maladies completed the ruin of all his faculties. His stomach failed. Nor was this strange; for in him the malformation of the jaw, characteristic of his family, was so serious that he could not masticate his food. While suffering from indigestion, he was attacked by ague. Every third day his convulsive tremblings, his dejection, his fits of wandering, seemed to indicate the approach of dissolution. His misery was increased by the knowledge that everybody was calculating how long he had to live, and wondering what would become of his kingdoms when he should be dead."

PHILIP V. duke of Anjou, the second son of Louis, dauphin of France, and of Marie Anne of Bavaria, assumed the crown of Spain in 1700, by virtue of the will of Charles II. His claim, however, was contested by the house of Austria, in favour of the archduke Charles. This produced the grand alliance, in which Austria was supported, against France and Spain, by England, Holland, Savoy, Portugal, and Prussia. The beginning of this war, memorable in history as the War of the Spanish Succession, was very disastrous to Philip, who lost Aragon, Gibraltar, and the islands of Minorca and Majorca, also Sardinia and the Kingdom of Naples. In this extremity he was about to retire to Spanish America, when the duke de Vendôme arrived with succours, and by gaining the battle of Villaviciosa, gave a more favourable turn to affairs. The victories of that great general, and those of Marshal Villars, in Flanders, confirmed Philip on the throne, and restored peace to Europe by the treaty of Utrecht, in 1713. The war was renewed in 1717, and the Spanish fleet was defeated in the Mediterranean by Sir George Ruyg. Peace was restored in 1720, after which, Philip became a victim to confirmed melancholy, and in 1724 abdicated the throne to his son Louis, and retired to a monastery. Louis died a few months after, of the small-pox, and Philip was compelled to resume the government. His subsequent conduct was characterized by greater spirit and judgment. In 1733 he entered into an alliance with France against the emperor, and his son Don Carlos conquered Sicily and Naples, of which he became king. In 1734 the royal palace was burnt, and a number of fine paintings destroyed. In 1736 peace was concluded; but a new war broke out in 1739. b. 1683; p. 1746.

PHILIP I. king of France, succeeded his father, Henry I., in 1060, under the regency of Baldwin V., count of Flanders. Philip at the age of 15 lost his faithful guardian. The young king showed at first a warlike spirit, but afterwards gave himself up to licentious pleasures. The most important incident of his reign was his divorce of his wife Bertha, and marriage with Bertrade, the wife of the count of Anjou, for which he was excommunicated by the Council of Autun, in 1091; but ten years afterwards he was absolved by the pope, who also approved his marriage with Bertrade. b. 1053; p. 1108.

Philip

PHILIP II. surnamed Augustus, succeeded his father, Louis VII., in 1180, at the age of 15. Henry II. of England, taking advantage of his youth, invaded France; but Philip put himself at the head of his forces, and compelled Henry to renew the ancient treaties between the two kingdoms. After this, he turned his attention to the regulation of abuses in the government, and to the improvement of the city of Paris. He expelled the Jews from his dominions, under circumstances of great injustice and cruelty. In 1190 Philip accompanied Richard I. of England to the Holy Land, where they took Acre; but dissensions arising between the two monarchs, Philip returned to France. Though he had sworn on the Gospels not to undertake anything against the interest of Richard in his absence, he invaded Normandy, and took some places; but being repulsed at Rouen, made a truce for five years, and in the interval married Ingeburge, Princess of Denmark, whom he afterwards divorced, and espoused the daughter of the Duke of Meranie, for which he was excommunicated by the pope, and not absolved till he took back his former wife. Philip gave his assistance to Prince Arthur against his uncle John, king of England; but John having declared himself a vassal of the Holy See, the pope gave countenance to his acts. This giving offence to the English nobility, they made an offer of the throne to Philip, who declined it, but sent to England his son Louis, who was crowned at London in 1216. On the death of John, however, the English barons acknowledged his son, Henry III., and Louis returned to France. b. 1165; p. at Mantua, 1223.

PHILIP III. surnamed the Hardy, was proclaimed king of France in Africa, on the death of St. Louis, his father, in 1270. After concluding a peace with the king of Tunis, whose city the French were besieging, he returned to France, and was crowned at Rheims. Peter of Arago, having occasioned the horrible massacre of the French in Sicily, called the Sicilian Vespers, Philip marched against him in 1283, and took several towns, but died of a fever on his return, at Perpignan, in 1285. b. 1245.

PHILIP IV. called the Fair, succeeded his father, the preceding monarch, in 1285. He became king of Navarre, in consequence of his marriage with Joan, daughter and heiress of Henry I. In 1295, Philip engaged in a war against Edward I., king of England, who formed several powerful alliances with continental princes against the French monarch. In 1302, Philip, while attempting to suppress a revolt of the Flemings, lost the battle of Courtrai where perished the count of Artois, with 20,000 men. But, in 1304, he gained that of Mons-en-Puelle; in commemoration of which a fine equestrian statue of this monarch was set up in the church of Notre Dame, at Paris. This victory was followed by a peace; but Philip was shortly afterwards embroiled in a contest with Pope Boniface VIII., who pretended to the right of disposing of benefices, which was resisted by the king. On this the pope issued his bull of excommunication, which Philip caused to be burnt. The violent acts of Boniface were condemned by the Popes Benedict and Clement V., the latter of whom assisted Philip in persecuting and abolishing the order of Knights Templars in 1310. b. 1268; d. 1314.

PHILIP V., surnamed the Long, was the younger son of the preceding, and succeeded his brother Louis Hutin, by virtue of the salique law, which excluded females from the French throne, in 1316. He made war against Flanders, formed an alliance with Scotland, and expelled the Jews from his kingdom. The leprosy, a disease brought by the crusaders from Palestine, prevailed in a great degree in his reign. b. 1294; d. 1322.

PHILIP VI., or PHILIP OF VALOIS, the first king of France of the collateral branch of Valois, was the son of Charles, Count of Valois, brother of Philip the Fair. He ascended the throne in 1328, on the death of his cousin, Charles the Fair. In 1329, Edward III., king of England, did homage for the duchy of Guienne; but in 1337 he assumed the title of King of France, on the pretence of being a grandson of Philip the Fair by his mother. This produced a disastrous war, which lasted, with a few intervals, during many years. In 1346, Edward III. gained the battle of Cressy, in which the French lost near 80,000 men; among whom were John, king of Bohemia, and the flower of the nobility. This was followed by the loss of Calais and other important places in the following year. Edward sent a challenge to Philip to decide their pretensions by single combat, which the latter refused. The disasters of his reign were complete. In 1348, by the outbreak of a terrible pestilence, which carried off a third portion of his subjects. b. 1293; d. near Chartres, 1350.

PHILIP, physician to Alexander the Great, who cured his master of an attack of fever contracted while bathing in the river Cydnus. Parmentio wrote a letter to Alexander, informing him that his physician had been bribed by Darius to poison him; but the king of Macedonia, having confidence in his physician, took the draught which had been prescribed for him, at the same time handing to Philip the letter he had received. The speedy recovery of Alexander proved the fidelity of his physician. Flourished in the 4th century B.C.

PHILIP, a native of Phrygia, and governor of Jerusalem, where he greatly persecuted the Jews. Antiochus Epiphanes, who had appointed him to that post, left him regent of his kingdom during the minority of his son; but Philip was opposed by Lysias, and slain in battle.

PHILIP, duke of Suabia, son of Frederic Barbarossa, was elected emperor on the death of his brother, Henry VI., in 1197. But another party of the electors chose Otto, duke of Saxony, which occasioned a civil war. The pope excommunicated Philip, but afterwards absolved him, and endeavoured in vain to reconcile the contending princes. b. 1178; assassinated at Bamberg, 1208.

PHILIP, Marcus Julius, called the Arab, from being a native of Bostra, in Arabia, was born of an obscure family, and became a common soldier in the Roman army; but by his merit he rose to the command of the Imperial guard. In 244 he assassinated the emperor Gordianus the younger, and seized upon the throne. He gained great popularity at Rome by his generosity, and by making a canal for supplying the city with water. He celebrated the secular games with much pomp, and permitted great toleration to the Christians; indeed, by some writers, he is stated to have been himself a Christian. In 249 he was defeated by Decius, near Verona, and was assassinated by his soldiery immediately afterwards.

PHILIP OF DREUX, the son of Robert, Count de Dreux, embraced the ecclesiastical state, and became bishop of Beauvais; but the character of his mind more inclined him to warlike affairs than religious exercises. He joined the crusaders, and distinguished himself before Acre, in 1191. Philip II. having declared war against the English, the bishop took up arms in his favour; but was taken prisoner, and kept in close confinement. He made an appeal to the pope, who demanded him, as his son, from Richard I. That monarch, however, sent to the pope the bloody armour in which the bishop was taken, accompanied with these words, "See, holy father, if this be thy son's coat." The pope would not recognise the habiliments as canonical, and the bishop remained a prisoner till 1202. He afterwards fought against the Albigenes; and d. at Beauvais, 1217.

PHILIP THE GOOD, duke of Burgundy. Out of revenge for the death of his father, who was slain in 1419, he formed an alliance with Henry V. of England, against Charles II. of France and his successor. He defeated the dauphin at the battle of Mons, in 1421, about which time he made war, with success, against the Countess of Hainault, and compelled her to acknowledge him as her heir. It was during this war that Joan of Arc was captured and burnt. (See JOAN OF ARC.) In 1435 he was reconciled to Charles VII. The people of Dinan, in the province of Liège, having committed some outrages, Philip sent against them his son, the count of Charolais, who burnt the city to ashes, and put the inhabitants to the sword. This inhuman action being approved of by the father, proves that he had no right to be called the Good. b. 1396; d. 1467.

PHILIPPON, Philipp-on, Baron, a French lieutenant-general, distinguished for his defence of Badajoz, in 1811. He was taken prisoner, and in 1812 made his escape from Oswestry. b. 1769; d. 1836.

PHILIPS, John, fil-ips, a poet, educated at Winchester School, and Christchurch, Oxford; was the author of "The Splendid Shilling," "Blenheim," a poem in praise of Marlborough's victory; and one on "Cyder," formed on the Georgics of Virgil. b. 1676; d. 1708.

PHILIPS, Ambrose, an English dramatic writer and poet, was educated at St. John's College, Cambridge, where he wrote his Pastorals, which were greatly admired, and praised by some good writers. Pope, however, ridiculed them with great severity, at the same time that he exempted Philips's "Winter Piece" from his censure. He was also the author of a tragedy of merit, entitled the "Distressed Mother," and an abridged "Life of Archbishop Williams." b. about 1671; d. 1749.

PHILISTUS, fil-ist-us, a Greek writer, and the favourite of the tyrant Dionysius of Syracuse, who afterwards banished him. In his exile he wrote the History of Sicily, and that of Dionysius, which Cicero has commended. He was recalled by Dionysius the Younger, but was defeated by Dion in a naval engagement, and put to death, b. c. 356. Some extracts from his writings are included in the "Fragmenta" of Müller.

PHILIDOR, André, fil'-li-dor, a French musical composer, but better known as a distinguished chess player. At an early age he became a chorister in the chapel of Louis XV.; but after the changing of his voice he was left without employment. Being an adept at chess playing, he set out upon a tour through Holland, Germany, and England, and earned, by exhibiting his skill, the means of improving his knowledge of music. In 1753 he set to music Couperin's "Ode to Harmony," which obtained some success. While in London he also devoted much of his time to chess, and produced a work on that art. Retiring to Paris in 1754, he assisted in founding the Opéra Comique. He paid another visit to England in 1774, and there produced a musical work, but soon afterwards began to exhibit himself as a chess-player at Peto's Club, in St. James's Street, where, among other feats, he, blindfolded and simultaneously, played and won two games. b. at Dreux, 1726; d. in London, 1795.

PHILLIPS, Edward, fi'-lips, one of the nephews of Milton, was educated by his celebrated uncle. He was the author and compiler of several valuable works; but that by which he is best known is the "Theatrum Pœtarum, or a complete Collection of the Poets." p. 1680.

PHILLIPS, John, brother of Edward, was also educated under his uncle, whose political opinions he espoused and defended till the Restoration, when he became a writer on the side of royalty.

PHILLIPS, Samuel, a modern English littérateur, was the son of a tradesman in London, who brought him up for the stage. At the age of 14 he appeared at the Haymarket Theatre, in the character of Richard III.; but, at the instance of some friends, his father afterwards sent him to the University of Göttingen. He next proceeded to Cambridge; but the death of his father called him to London, in order to carry on the business for the benefit of his mother and family. In 1811 he adopted the profession of literature, and wrote "Caleb Stukely" for "Blackwood's Magazine." Subsequently engaged upon the staff of the Times newspaper, he contributed to that print many of the best reviews of books which have appeared in its columns. He was for a period "literary director" to the Crystal Palace Company; during which time he wrote the "Crystal Palace Portrait-Gallery" and the "Guide to the Palace and Park." Some of his criticisms upon books in the leading English journal were reprinted, with the title "Essays from the Times." Consumptive tendencies had for a long time exhibited themselves previous to his death, which was at length brought about by that malady. b. in London, 1815; p. 1854.

PHILLIPS, John, an eminent modern geologist, professor of geology at the University of Oxford, and assistant general secretary of the British Association for the Advancement of Science. He was an active worker in the paths of geological science for nearly half a century, and assisted in many great works connected with his favourite pursuit, from the date of the "Map of the Strata of England and Wales" to the great undertaking,—the "Geological Survey of the United Kingdom." He edited or arranged twenty-seven volumes of the Reports of the British Association; and in the "Bibliography of Geology" of Mr. Strickland and Sir W. Jardine, thirty-one treatises of his on geology of "Yorkshire," "Rivers, Mountains, and Seacoast of Yorkshire," and "Geological Map of the British Isles." To the "Encyclopædia Britannica," "Encyclopædia Metropolitana," "Penny Cyclopædia," &c., he contributed many valuable articles on branches of geological science. In 1858-59 he was president of the Geological Society. b. 1830.

PHILPOTS, the Rt. Rev. Henry, D.D., fil'-pots, for 39 years Bishop of Exeter, was educated at the cathedral school at Gloucester, and at Corpus Christi College, Oxford, where he took his B.A. degree in 1795. He became fellow of Magdalen College, but was not ordained until 1833. Three years after he became chaplain to the Bishop of Durham, and took an active part in the controversy against the Roman Catholic church which raged about that time. After obtaining no less than five livings and two prebendal stalls in little more than ten years, he received the rich living of Stanhope, in Durham, and in 1828 was made Dean of Chester by the Duke of Wellington, when he ceased to write as heretofore against the Roman Catholics. In 1830 he became bishop of Exeter. He was an able debater and an earnest churchman, ready at all times to do battle against error of any kind, but apt to carry out his intolerance of opposition to his views with a pertinacity that sown of persecution. He was equally opposed to Romanism and Calvinism. b. at Bridgewater, May 6, 1778; d. at Bishopstowe, near Torquay, Sept. 18, 1860.

PHILOMACHUS, fil'-o-p'-ma-n, general of the Achæans, who displayed great bravery in defending his native city against Cleomenes III., king of Sparta; and, in 294 b. c., defeated the Ætolians in a battle near the Lirisus. For this he was made captain-general; and shortly afterwards slain by the tyrant of Lacedæmon, near Mantinea, with his own hand. Nabis, the successor of Machinidas, defeated Philomachus at sea; but he recovered this loss on land, took Sparta, razed its walls, and abolished the laws of Lycurgus. The Mæseians having revolted, Philomachus marched against them, but was taken prisoner by falling from his horse. Demetrius, the Mæseian general, threw him into prison, and caused him to be poisoned, 182 b. c. b. in Arcadia, about 273 b. c.

PHILOSTRATUS, Flavius, fil'-o-strat'-us, a famous Greek sophist, who resided at Rome, where he was patronized by Julia, wife of Septimius Severus. He wrote the "Life of Apollonius of Tyana," a pretended philosopher. It is an extravagant romance, full of fables. He also wrote the "Lives of the Sophists," and a commentary upon the heroes of Homer. Flourished towards the close of the 2nd century.

PHILOXENUS, fil'-ak'-e-nus, a dithyrambic poet of Cythera, lived at the court of Dionysius of Syracuse, who banished him to the stone-quarries for censuring his verses. b. at Ephesus, about 380 b. c.

PHILOXON, fil'-gon, called Trallianus, from the place of his birth, a city of Lydia, was the freedman of Adrian, and wrote a "History of Marvellous Things;" also a "History of the Olympiads," part of which is extant. He is said to have mentioned the darkness at our Saviour's crucifixion. This passage caused a controversy between Whiston, Chapman, and others, in the 18th century. The best edition of his remains is that of Westermann, 1839. Flourished in the 2nd century.

PHOCAS, fo'-kas, emperor of the East, usurped the throne by murdering the emperor Maurice and his children, in 602. Khosru or Chosroes II., king of Persia, made war on him and took several of the Asiatic provinces of the Eastern empire. At last, roused by his cruelties, Heraclitus, governor of Africa, conspired against and slew Phocas, in 610.

PHOCION, fo'-shion, a celebrated Athenian general and statesman, who was the disciple of Plato and Xenocrates. He displayed great eloquence, and opposed Demosthenes when that great orator endeavoured to rouse the Athenians to declare war against Philip. Phocion saw in that measure the ruin of Athens; but, when the war commenced, he manifested the patriotism and talents of a brave general. Philip and Alexander made several attempts to corrupt him, but in vain. Phocion held the generalship at Athens forty-four times; but, notwithstanding his splendid virtues and abilities, he could not escape persecution. He was accused of treachery, and deposed, on which he fled; but was taken and poisoned, B.C. 317.—His son Phocus was a man of licentious character; but he avenged the fate of his father upon his accusers, and erected a statue to his memory.

PHOCYLIDES, fo-sil'-i-dees, a Greek poet and philosopher, was a native of Miletus. There is a poem extant, which is by some critics attributed to him. Flourished about 530 B.C.

PHOCION, fo'-shion, an Athenian general, who succeeded Callias, B.C. 432, and gave great proofs of his courage in the Peloponnesian war, and in defeating the fleets of the Lacedæmonians. He sold his estates to pay his army, and refused the rank of commander-in-chief.

PHOTIUS, fo'-shiu, patriarch of Constantinople, whose learning was great, and advanced him to several high offices in the state; after which he entered into orders; and, on the deposition of Ignatius, aspired to the patriarchate, which he obtained in an irregular manner in 853, but was nevertheless confirmed in the appointment in 858. This occasioned a schism, and Photius exercised great severities on those who adhered to Ignatius. He was deposed in the following year. Photius, however, contrived to gain the favour of the emperor Basil, who restored him to the patriarchal see upon the death of Ignatius, in 877. But, in 886, Leo caused him to be again deprived, and confined in a monastery, where he died. His works are, "Myriobiblion," a Commentary on several authors of antiquity; "Nomocanon," or a collection of the canons of the Church; and a collection of theological and controversial works. B. at Constantinople, early in the 9th century; D. in Armenia, about its close.

PHRYNICHUS, frin'-i-kus, a Greek writer, who composed a treatise on the Attic verbs and nouns, and "The Sophistical Apparatus," a collection of Greek phrases. Flourished about 175.—There were two others of this name, the one a tragic poet, and the other a general.

PIAZZI, Joseph, po-adj'-tee, an Italian astro-nomer, was born at Ponte, in the Vallée; entered into the order of the Theatines; and, after having been a professor at Genoa, Malta, Ravenna, and Palermo, was in 1787 made director of the observatory founded in the latter city. About this time he visited Paris and London, and entered into a correspondence with the most celebrated European astronomers. In 1801 he discovered a new planet, which he named Ceres Ferdinandea, and in 1805 he made a new catalogue of 7616 fixed stars. This distinguished astronomer produced various treatises and memoirs of great importance to the science, and was a member of many learned institutions. B. 1746; D. 1822.

PICARD, Jean, pik'-er, a French astronomer, who became a member of the Academy of Sciences in 1668, and five years afterwards was sent by the king to Uraniborg, which was built by Tycho Brahe to make celestial observations. Picard brought with him from Denmark many manuscripts of Tycho's. He was engaged in measuring a degree of the meridian, and in determining the meridian of Astronomical Observations made in Denmark." B. in France, 1620; D. 1682.

PICCINI, Nicholas, pe-chie'-ne, a celebrated Italian musical composer, whose first masters were Leo and Durante. From Italy he went to Paris in 1776, where the connexions were divided in opinion between him and Gluck. At the Revolution, Piccini returned to Naples, where he was proscribed as being a Jacobin; on which he went again to France, where he remained until his death. His principal operas are "La Ciccina," "Iphigenia in Tauris," and "Roland." B. at Bari, Naples, 1728; D. 1800.

PICCOLOMINI, James, pik'-ko-lo-me'-ne, a cardinal, whose real name was Ammannati, but which he changed out of respect to Pope Pius II., his patron, who was of the Piccolomini family. He became successively bishop of Massa and Frascati, and, in 1461, cardinal. Sixtus IV. seized his property after his death, and applied it to the building of an hospital. He wrote a "History of his Own Times," and Letters, which have been printed. B. at Lucca, 1422; D. 1479.

PICCOLOMINI, Alexander, held the offices of archbishop of Patras and coadjutor of Siena, where he wrote several dramatic pieces of reputation. His other works are, a treatise on the Sphere, "Theory of the Planets," "Moral Institutes," &c. He was the first who wrote on philosophical subjects in Italian, Latin having been theretofore used by the learned. B. at Siena, 1509; D. 1578.

PICCOLOMINI, Octavio, an Austrian general, who became famous during the Thirty Years' War, and was the favourite of Wallenstein, who confided to him his projects for turning his arms against the emperor. Piccolomini, however, betrayed the confidence, revealed the whole plot to the Imperial government, and was one of those commissioned to take Wallenstein, dead or alive. He became a prince of the empire, but disgraced his renown by great cruelty. He is a prominent character in Schiller's play of "Wallenstein." B. 1599; D. 1666.

at the military college of Brienne; after which he entered the army, and rose to be sergeant. The Revolution elevated him to the rank of general, and, in 1794, he succeeded General Hoche in the command of the army of the north. Shortly after, he relieved Landau, and compelled the English to evacuate the Netherlands. He next marched into Holland, of which he made a complete conquest. In 1797 he was elected a member of the legislative body; but his opposition to the Directory, and his speeches in favour of the royalist emigrants, occasioned an accusation against him as designing to restore royalty. He was ordered, without fail, to be transported to Cayenne, whence he escaped to England, where he remained till the spring of 1801, when he went to Paris, where he was apprehended and sent to the Temple. Three weeks afterwards he was found strangled in his bed, by means of a silk handkerchief twisted round his neck, and lightened with a short stick. The body was examined and exposed, and a labourer account published, to make it appear that he had laid violent hands on himself; but the circumstances warrant the opinion that he was assassinated. b. at Arbois, France, 1761; d. 1801.

PICHLER, Caroline, an eminent German novelist, who commenced a literary career at an early age, by contributing short poetical pieces to the almanacs. She subsequently produced a number of historical novels, some of which appeared before Sir Walter Scott commenced his career. The best of these novels were "Frederick the Fighter," "Henrietta of England," "The Siege of Vienna," and "The Swedes in Prague." As a dramatist she was less successful; but her "Pictures of the Times," and "Memorable Events of my Life," became highly popular in Germany. About a year after her death, a collected edition of her works was given to the world, and consisted of sixty volumes. As a novelist, she displayed considerable constructive skill, and often wrote with great pictorial effect; but her style was generally marred by too great diffuseness. b. at Vienna, 1769; d. 1813.

PICKEN, Alexander, pik'-en, a Scottish miscellaneous writer, who commenced his literary career by the publication of a volume of "Tales and Sketches of the West of Scotland," which was shortly followed by the "Sectarian" and the "Dominie's Legacy," and at a later period by "Traditionary Stories of Old Families," which was designed to embrace the legendary history of Great Britain and Ireland. A novel called "The Black Watch," founded on some early incidents in the history of the 42nd Highlanders, was published posthumously. b. at Paisley, 1788; d. 1833.

PICKERSGILL, Henry William, pik'-ers-gil, a modern English painter and Royal Academician, who, after completing his career as student, embraced the historical style of art. He subsequently devoted himself to portraits, and became one of the most fashionably patronized artists in that walk in England. Elected R.A. in 1825, he, ten years later, succeeded to the office of librarian to the Royal Academy. In the British collection at the South Kensington Museum, there is a portrait by him of Robert Vernon, the generous donor of the Vernon collection to the nation. There is also another work of his, entitled "A Syrian Maid," in the gallery. b. about 1782; d. 1868.

PICKERSGILL, Frederick Richard, a modern English painter, and relative of the preceding, was a student of the Royal Academy, and, in 1810, exhibited his first picture, "The Combat between Hercules and Achelous." In 1843 he gained one of the £100 prizes, for his cartoon entitled "The Death of King Lear," and, in 1847, won one of the first-class prizes of £500 for his oil-painting of "The Burial of Harold," for which he was afterwards paid an additional £500 on its purchase for the House of Lords. About the same time he became A.R.A., and, in 1857, R.A. One of his best pictures—"Florniel in the Cottage of the Witch"—is in the national collection at the South Kensington Museum. Among his most important works may be mentioned, "The Adoration of the Magi," "The Christian Church during the Persecution by the Pagan Emperors at Rome," "Samson Betrayed," and "Love's Labour Lost." b. in London, 1820.

PICOT, Sir Thomas, K.C.B., &c., pik'-ton, a gallant British officer, was descended from an ancient family of Pembrokeshire, and commenced his military career as an ensign in the 12th regiment of foot in 1771. He served on the Gibraltar station till 1778, after which he was promoted to a captaincy in the 75th. In 1791 he embarked for the West Indies; and, after the reduction of St. Lucia and Trinidad in 1797, rose to the rank of colonel, and was appointed governor of the latter island. Whilst holding that situation he was applied to by a Spanish magistrate to sign an order for inflicting the torture on a female slave, and, being told it was a customary practice, did so without inquiry. The girl, who was only fourteen years of age, was accordingly picketed, with a view to extort from her the discovery of a theft committed by her paramour. For this act of cruelty the governor was, in 1807, indicted, and found guilty by an English jury. As many exaggerated rumours had preceded the colonel to England, a new trial was granted, and though he was acquitted of moral guilt, the deed was one which threw a shade over his bright career. However, in 1808 he was again employed by his country. He was at the siege of Flushing, and on its capture was appointed governor. From Flushing he returned to England an invalid, but was soon again in the field. His courage and intrepidity shone on every occasion; ever foremost in the fight, he was a victorious leader at Badajoz, at Vittoria, at Ciudad Rodrigo, &c. At the battle of Waterloo, General Picton commanded the 5th division of the army, and fell in the moment of victory, having just repulsed one of the most fierce attacks made by the French. A monument to his memory was, by vote of Parliament, erected in St. Paul's cathedral. b. 1758; killed, 1815.

PICOTTE, Bernardin de St., pe'-air, an eminent French writer, who was educated for the profession of a civil engineer, and obtained employment under the French government. Quitting his native country, he went to Russia, where he was engaged to execute several important surveys; but having presented to Count Orloff a plan for establishing a colony of foreigners upon the eastern shores of the Caspian Sea, under republican government, he met with such a reception as decided him to leave that country. He repaired to Poland, with the intention of taking arms against Russia, but fell deeply in love at Warsaw, and forgot military glory in admiring the beauty of a Polish maiden. After spending some time in Germany, he returned to France, and soon afterwards joined an expedition, the ostensible object of which was to form a republican colony in the island of Madagascar; but discovering that his fellow-voyagers were in reality going thither to obtain a supply of slaves, he abandoned them, and landed in the Isle of France (Mauritius), where he voted himself to literature, and produced his beautiful little story of "Paul and Virginia," which has become a classic in every European language. His other works were, "Studies of Nature," "Harmonies of Nature," "The Indian Cottage," "Narrative of a Journey to Russia;" and several plays. When the Revolution burst forth, he was reduced to great distress, which was afterwards alleviated by the generous pa-which have been translated into almost as many languages as the Bible. These celebrated fables or tales are said to be drawn from an old Sanscrit work in five books, called the "Pancha Tantra." They have been translated into English by Sir William Jones.

PINCINCK, Thomas, pinch-bek, an English mechanician, who invented several machines, and first used an alloy of copper and zinc, which an imitation of gold, and was called after his name. b. in London, 1783.

PINDAR, pin-dar, the prince of lyric poets. In his youth he bore away the poetical prize from Mytis, but was less successful in his contest with Corinna, who defeated him five times. It is said, however, by some authors, that she owed her victory less to her poetry than to her charms. At the Olympic games, where women were excluded, Pindar conquered all his rivals,

A complete edition of his works, with his biography attached, was published at Paris in 1836. b. 1737; d. 1814.

PIGNOTTI, Lorenzo, peen-yot-te, an eminent Italian writer, who was a physician and professor of medicine at Florence and Pisa, counsellor of the latter university, and further distinguished himself as a naturalist, poet, historian, and antiquary. His poems form six volumes, and he also produced some highly popular fables. A "History of Tuscany" by him was a learned work, but was considered too liberal in its tendencies by the court of Rome, who condemned it to be burnt. b. in Tuscany, 1739; d. 1812.

PILES, Roger de, peel, a celebrated French painter and writer on painting, who, in 1682, became tutor to the son of the president Amelot, with whom he made a tour to Rome, where De Piles had ample opportunities for gratifying the taste which he possessed for the fine arts. The younger Amelot being appointed ambassador to Venice, De Piles accompanied him as secretary; and afterwards attended him in the same capacity to Lisbon and Switzerland. In 1692 he was sent by Louis XIV. to the Hague, ostensibly as a picture-dealer, but in fact to negotiate with those who were friends to France. The object of his mission being discovered, he was sent to prison, where he wrote his "Lives of the Painters." On his return to France he obtained a pension. He was a member of the Academy of Painting, and a great admirer of Rubens, whom he imitated with success. Besides the above work, he wrote a treatise on "Anatomy, adapted to Painting and Sculpture," and a "Course of Painting." b. at Clamecy, 1635; d. 1709.

PILKINGTON, Letitia, pilk-ing-ton, the daughter of Dr. Van Lewen, a physician of Dublin, became the wife of the Rev. Matthew Pilkington, from whom she was separated on account of the irregularity of her conduct. After this she settled in London, where she subsisted partly by writing, and partly by the bounty of her friends. She wrote "The Roman Father," a tragedy; and "The Turkish Count, or London Apprentice," a comedy; "Memoirs" of her life; and various poems, &c. b. 1712; d. 1770.

PITPA, or BIDPA, pit-pay, an Indian Brahmin and philosopher, who was, it is believed, a governor of part of Hindostan, and counsellor to an Indian king, whom he instructed by fables, given to honour at Thebes. When the Spartans took Thebes, they spared the house of Pindar, as did Alexander the Great. The best edition of his poet is that by Böckh, Leipzig, 1811. There is an English translation by Cary. Flourished in the 5th century B.C.

PINDAR, Peter. (See WOLCOT.)

PINELLI, John Vincent, pe-nail-le, a learned Italian, who fixed his residence at Padua, where he formed a magnificent library, stored with rare books and valuable manuscripts. The most learned men in Europe were among his correspondents, and his literary treasures were always open for their use. b. at Naples, about 1570; d. 1601.—A descendant of his, Mathias Pinelli, was a printer at Venice, where he formed a very valuable library, which was brought to London, and there sold by auction. d. at Venice, 1735.

PINZEL, Alexander Gui, pin'-grai, a clever French astronomer, who became librarian of St. Gervaise, at Paris. In 1700 he was sent to the South Sea, to observe the famous transit of Venus over the sun's disc. He was afterwards employed to prove the timepieces of Le Roy, and was admitted a member of the French Academy and of the Institute. His works are, "State of the Heavens from 1754 to 1787," "Memoirs of Discoveries made in the South Seas," "An Historical and Theoretical Treatise on Comets," "Translation of Maullius's Astronomics," and a portion of a projected "History of Astronomy in the 17th Century." b. at Paris, 1711; d. 1791.

PINKERTON, John, pin-ker-ton, a Scottish writer, who was bred to the bar, but devoted himself to literary pursuits. For half a century he continued to produce works in various departments of knowledge, many of which were of a valuable and important character. Among the rest, he gave to the world "A General Collection of Voyages and Travels," "The History of Scotland," "Portraits of Illustrious Persons of Scotland," several collections of ancient Scottish poems, and "Walpoliana." b. at Edinburgh, 1753; d. at Paris, 1826.

PINSON, Richard, pin'-son, a native of Normandy, who became servant to William Caxton, and afterwards printer to Henry VII. and Henry VIII. He printed Magna Charta, and several books, which are now scarce and valuable. d. about 1530.

PINTELLI, Baccio, pin-tail-le, a celebrated Italian architect, who designed the famous Sistine chapel at Rome. He also built the Ponte Sisto over the Tiber, several churches, and the old library of the Vatican. After the death of his patron, Sixtus IV., he was invited to Urbino by Frederick, the second duke, and designed for him the ducal palace and some churches. His designs were made upon such excellent principles that several of his buildings still remain in a state of perfect preservation; and his bridge over the Tiber, although nearly 400 years old, is yet as substantial as a new fabric. n. at Florence early in the 15th century; n. at Urbino about 1494.

Pinto, Ferdinand Mendez, pin-to, a Portuguese traveller, who was at first in the service of a Portuguese gentleman; but being of an adventurous turn of mind, he resolved to make a voyage to India, where he arrived in 1537. During the subsequent twenty-one years he led a life of constant vicissitude; at one time the owner of large treasures, at another pining in captivity. He travelled in the East Indies, China, Japan, and Siam; sometimes on land, sometimes in command of a vessel manned by daring adventurers. In 1558 he returned to Portugal, and composed a narrative of his voyages and adventures for the amusement of his children. This work is a curious one, but wholly unreliable, in consequence of a large admixture of fiction. n. near Coimbra, about 1510; n. 1543.

Pinturicchio, Bernardino, or BERNARDINO, Netti, pin-toor-ri-ke-o, a celebrated Italian painter, who belonged to the school of Perugino, and excelled in historical subjects and portraits. In the latter walk he was extensively employed; and had, among other high-born sitters, Cæsar Borgia, Queen Isabella of Spain, and Giulia Farnese. n. at Perugia, 1434; n. at Siena, 1512.

Piozzo, Sebastiano del, pe-om'-bo, a celebrated Italian painter, who was a disciple of Giorgione, and painted historical and portrait pieces. One of his finest works,—"The Raising of Lazarus," is in the National Gallery in London. Later in life, he quitted his profession to assume the functions of keeper of the signet to Pope Clement VII., whence rose his name Del Pionbo, "of the lead," in allusion to the lead of the seal. Many of the designs for his pictures were furnished by Michael Angelo; Sebastiano supplying the fine colouring which characterized his style. n. at Venice, 1485; n. 1517.

Piozzi, Mrs., pe-ol'-ee, an English authoress, and the friend of Dr. Johnson, was the daughter of John Salusbury, a gentleman of Curmionshire, and having appeared in the London world of fashion with much success, became the wife of Mr. Thrale, a rich brewer of Southwark. It was as Mrs. Thrale that she made the acquaintance of the great lexicographer; but after she became a widow in the 18th year of her marriage, she retired to Bath with her four daughters. At Bath, she met Gabriel Piozzi, an Italian music-master, whom she married in 1794. This union, which took place shortly before Dr. Johnson's death, led to the breaking up of their long friendship. After the Doctor's death, she produced her "Anecdotes of Dr. Samuel Johnson during the last twenty years of his life," which work Boswell declared to have been written in a spiteful and revengeful spirit. Peter Pindar (Dr. Wolcot) took the opposite view, and wrote his satirical poem called "Daddy and Piozzi" thereupon.

Pisistratus

Besides the work just named, Mrs. Piozzi wrote "The Three Warnings," a poem; "Observations and Reflections made in the course of a Journey through France, Italy, and Germany;" "British Synonymy;" &c. Her "Autobiography, Letters, and Literary Remains," which contain many interesting facts relative to Dr. Johnson, have been recently published. n. about 1739; n. at Clifton, near Bristol, 1821.

Piranesi, John Baptista, pe-ra-nai'-se, a celebrated Italian architectural engraver, who was remarkable for a bold and free style of drawing, which he generally executed upon the plate at once by etching with aquafortis. He kept an establishment at Rome for the production of architectural engravings, which became famous throughout Europe. His works, consisting of triumphal arches, bridges, buildings, and other remains of antiquity, occupy 29 folio volumes. n. at Venice, 1720; n. at Rome, 1778.

Piranesi, Francis, was son of the preceding, and, like him, a celebrated engraver and draughtsman. He took part in the revolution at Rome, and upon the arrival of the French in that city, repaired to Paris, where he produced a splendid collection of Roman antiquities. His works consist of 29 folio volumes. n. 1743; n. 1810.

Piron, Alexis, pe'-ran-p, a French dramatic poet, who was the son of an apothecary, and was educated for the law, but was prevented from establishing himself in practice in consequence of a reverse of fortune experienced by his parents. After living in obscurity till his 30th year, he repaired to Paris, where he became employed as a writer for the stage, producing, among other plays, the "Métromanie," one of the best French comedies in existence. He subsequently wrote satirical poems and epigrams, and sought to become a member of the Academy; but being unsuccessful, he retaliated by keenly satirizing the members of that body. Piron was a man of infinite wit and humour, but his works are too often defaced by licentiousness. He wrote his own epitaph, which was as follows:—

"Here lies Piron, who was nothing, not even an Academician."

His works were collected and published in 7 volumes, in 1776. n. at Dijon, 1684; n. 1778.

Pisistratus, pi-sis'-tra-tus, tyrant of Athens, was a descendant of Codrus and a relative of Solon, and distinguished himself early in life by his courage, particularly at the taking of Salamis; but after nobly serving his country, he endeavoured to enslave it. To effect his object he had recourse to an extraordinary device. Having inflicted several wounds on himself, he appeared before the people, and pretended that an attempt had been made to assassinate him. The Athenians believed the tale, and assigned him a guard, which he increased, and by that means made himself master of the citadel. The citizens out of fear acknowledged him their ruler; but Megacles and Lycurgus united their forces and expelled Pisistratus from Athens. Shortly after, Megacles offered to assist Pisistratus, on condition of his marrying his daughter; to which the tyrant consented, but afterwards used her so ill, that her father gathered a force and compelled him to quit the city. After an exile of thirteen years, he made himself master of Marathon, and having taken Athens by surprise, put to death all the friends of Megacles. He built an academy, which he furnished with a valuable library; made the first collection of the poems of Homer, and died in possession of the sovereign power, 527 B.C.

PISO, pi'so, an eminent Roman family, which produced some great men; as—PISO, Lucius Calpurnius, surnamed Frugi, on account of his frugality. He was consul 149 B.C., and terminated the war in Sicily. He composed annals and orations, which are lost.—PISO, Caius, consul 67 B.C., was the author of a law to restrain the factions which usually attended the election of the chief magistrates.—PISO, Cneius, was consul under Augustus, and governor of Syria under Tiberius, in which situation he behaved with great cruelty. He was charged with poisoning Germanicus, on which account he destroyed himself, A.D. 20.—PISO, Lucius, a senator, who attended the emperor Valerian into Persia in 253. On the death of that emperor he assumed the imperial title, but was defeated by Valens, and put to death in 261.

PITCAIRNE, Archibald, pi't-ka-ir-ni, an eminent Scotch physician, who studied divinity and afterwards law at the University of Edinburgh, but quitted both these professions for mathematics and medicine. After publishing a thesis, in which he endeavoured to prove that the doctrine of the circulation of the blood was known to Hippocrates, he, in 1692, accepted an invitation from the curators of the University of Leyden to assume the professorship of medicine, but returned to Edinburgh about a year afterwards. He published "Dissertationes Medice;" also wrote some Latin poems of the satirical kind, chiefly against the principal authors of the Revolution. The celebrated Boerhaave was one of his pupils at Leyden. B. at Edinburgh, 1652; D. 1713.

PITHOU, Pierre, pe'-loo, a learned French lawyer, who was educated at Angoulême, and narrowly escaped in the massacre of St. Bartholomew. Afterwards embracing the Roman Catholic faith, he became attorney-general in the chamber of justice of Guienne. He defended the rights of the kings and church of France against the court of Rome with great ability. His most important works are,—"Treatise on the Liberties of the Gallican Church," "Commentaries on the Customs of Troyes," "Notes on various Authors." To Pithou we are indebted for the first publication of Phœdrus, the "Novellæ" of Justinian, and other ancient remains. B. at Troyes, 1539; D. 1596.

PITHOU, François, brother of the preceding, became attorney-general in the chamber of justice established under Henry IV. He discovered the manuscript of the fables of Phœdrus, which he published in conjunction with his brother. His own works were, "Body of the Canon Law," and "The Laws of the Romans compared with those of Moses." B. 1544; D. 1621.

PITOT, Henry, pe'-to, an eminent French mathematician, who acquired the mathematics without a master, and in 1724 was admitted a member of the Academy of Sciences. His work on the theory of manœuvring ships was translated into English, for which he was elected a member of the Royal Society. He was appointed chief engineer of Languedoc and inspector-general of the canal. The city of Montpellier being in want of water, Pitot constructed an aqueduct, which supplied that place from a distance of three leagues. B. at Aramont, Languedoc, 1696; D. 1771.

Pitt

PITS, or PITSEUS, John, pi's, an English biographer, who was educated at Wykeham's School, near Winchester; after which he went to Rheims, where he taught rhetoric and Greek. The civil war breaking out in France, he retired to Lorraine, and obtained a canonry in the church of Verdun. The duchess of Cleves appointed him her confessor, and on her death he became dean of Liverdun. His work, "Lives of the Kings, Bishops, Apostolical Men, and Writers of England," is his principal production. B. in Hampshire, 1560; D. at Liverdun, 1616.

PITTS, Christopher, pi't, an English poet and divine, who is known by excellent translations of the "Æneid," Vida's "Art of Poetry," and some pleasing poems. B. 1639; D. 1718.

PITTS, Thomas, founder of the illustrious family of that name, towards the end of the 17th century went to the East Indies, as governor of Fort St. George, where he resided many years, and realized a large fortune; particularly by a diamond (called after him the Pitt diamond) which he purchased for £20,000, and sold to the king of France for somewhat more than five times that sum. A rumour having prevailed in England that the governor gained this jewel unfairly, and Pope having given the slander currency by a sort of poetical adoption of it in the following couplet—

"Asleep and naked as an Indian lay,

An honest factor stole a gem away,"

Pitt published a refutation of the calumny. In 1716, Mr. Pitt was made governor of Jamaica, but did not hold that situation above a year. He sat in four Parliaments for Old Sarum and Thirsk, and was buried in Blandford church, where a monument was erected to his memory. B. 1653; D. 1726.

PITTS, William, earl of Chatham, the celebrated English statesman, was the son of Robert Pitt, Esq., of Boconnoc, in Cornwall, and was educated at Eton, whence he removed to Trinity College, Oxford. He was for some time a cornet of dragoons; but, in 1735, quitted the army, on being chosen member of Parliament for the borough of Old Sarum. He exerted himself strenuously in opposition to the measures of Sir Robert Walpole, and produced such an effect, by his eloquence and power, in lowering the tone of that minister, that the duchess of Marlborough, who hated Walpole, bequeathed him a legacy of £10,000. On the change of administration in 1746, he became joint vice-treasurer of Ireland, and paymaster-general of the army, which places he held till 1755. The next year he was appointed secretary of state, but in a few months afterwards was again out of office. An efficient administration being desired in 1757, he again became secretary of state. The stupendous statesmanlike qualities of his mind now began to reveal themselves. He soon acquired an immense ascendancy over both the Parliament and the ministry, and the war in which the country was then engaged with France began to assume a new aspect. A fresh impetus was given to every department of the government, and the enemy was beaten both on land and at sea. In all directions the most brilliant actions were performed on the continent, whilst in other parts of the globe the flag of Great Britain was completely triumphant, several valuable places, both in America and the East Indies, being added to her possessions. Such was the state of affairs on the death of George II.; soon after which, a change taking place by the coming of Lord Bute into power, Mr. Pitt resigned. The peace of 1763 followed; but it was not popular, and, in 1766, a new administration was formed, in which Mr. Pitt had a share as lord privy seal; and at this time he was created Earl of Chatham. This ministry, however, being ill-arranged, was disand Pitt was appointed chancellor of the Exchequer, he being at the time in his 24th year. Peace with the Americans and with Spain and France was concluded by this administration, which soon gave way to what was called the Coalition ministry, formed by Lord North and Mr. Fox and their associates, &c.

those coercive measures which ultimately led to the war of Independence and the separation of the United States from the mother country. For some time previous, the popularity of Pitt had been on the wane, but it was now revived with all its former splendour. The end of his days, however, was at hand. As he was speaking with his accustomed energy on the subject of American independence, in the House of Lords, April 8, 1778, he was overpowered, and fell down in a fit of convulsions: from this he never sufficiently rallied to give hopes of a permanent recovery, but, on the 11th of the following month, breathed his last, and was solemnly interred in Westminster Abbey, where a monument was erected to his memory at the national expense. v. de Bocomoe, Cornwall, 1708; d. 1778. His lordship left a widow, who was created a baroness in her own right, with a pension of £3,000 a year. She died in 1803, at Burton Pynsent, in Somersetshire, an estate which had been left to Lord Chatham by Sir Thomas Pynsent, from admiration of his character.

PITT, William, an illustrious English statesman, was the second son of the great Earl of Chatham. His elementary education was received under the eye of his father at Burton Pynsent, in Somersetshire. His private tutor was the Rev. Dr. Wilson, afterwards canon of Windsor; but his education was principally conducted by the earl himself, whose favourite son he was, and who saw in him the seeds of that greatness which would confer additional glory on the name of Pitt. In 1773 he was sent to Pembroke Hall, Cambridge, where "although he was little more than 14 years of age," says one of his tutors, "and had laboured under the disadvantage of frequent ill-health, his proficiency in the learned languages was probably greater than ever was acquired by any other person in such early youth." At Cambridge he proceeded to the degree of M.A.; and on leaving the university was entered at Lincoln's Inn, and in three years was called to the bar. He went the western circuit once or twice, but never had much practice. In 1780 he stood for the University of Cambridge, but was unsuccessful. By means, however, of Sir James Lowther (afterwards earl of Lonsdale), he was returned to that Parliament for the borough of Appleby. As a senator he soon displayed his great oratorical talents in opposition to Lord North and the American war. His manner was thus described:—"His voice is rich and striking, full of melody and force; his manner easy and elegant; his language beautiful and luxuriant. He gave in this first essay a specimen of eloquence not unworthy the son of his immortal parent." In 1782 he brought forward a motion for an inquiry into the state of the representation in Parliament, which was rejected by a small majority. On the death of the marquis of Rockingham, Lord Shelburne obtained the office of first lord of the Treasury, 1783, the important offices of first lord of the Treasury and chancellor of the Exchequer were conferred on Mr. Pitt. In the following month he brought forward a new bill for the better government of India, which was rejected. On this the Parliament was dissolved, and the premier, who was returned for the University of Cambridge, again brought forward his bill for the regulation of India, and carried it triumphantly in both Houses.

A commercial treaty with France was entered into, the terms of which were highly advantageous to England. About this time also he adopted other beneficial measures relative to the finances, for extinguishing the national debt by a sinking fund; established a new constitution for the East-India Company, and passed acts for the relief of the Roman Catholics. It is impossible to embrace all the great points of his administration, combining, as it does, so much of the history of England and of the world. During the king's illness, Pitt gained popularity by taking constant and successful measures, in strenuously maintaining, against Fox, the right of Parliament, and not of the Prince of Wales, to settle the regency. The French Revolution, which shook the basis of political affairs throughout Europe, next burst forth. The execution of Louis XVI. occasioned the ministry to dismiss the French ambassador, and this was followed by a war, which lasted eight years. In 1800 Pitt effected the union of Ireland to Britain, and soon afterwards retired from office. The peace of Amiens, signed under the Addington administration, was of short duration, and a new war ensued. In 1804 Mr. Pitt returned to his former office, but he was surrounded with difficulties, many of his former friends had joined the opposition, and he might almost be said to have been left to wield the energies of the state alone. He effected another coalition with Russia and Austria against France, which failed. In the mean time, a gouty habit and unremitted mental exertions, together with a too free indulgence in wine, had completely undermined the constitution of this wonderful man, who succumbed to the vexation and pressure of troubles induced by the non-success of the European coalition against France, upon which he had set his heart. His character, if it lacked the fire and vigour of his father, was nevertheless noble and imposing. All that his greatest enemies, even in his own time, could pretend to charge him with, was ambition; while they were compelled to allow him the merit of vigorous application to business, uncommon eloquence, profound financial wisdom, and, above all, perfect disinterestedness. Though he had remained in power during so many years, he died in debt, which the Parliament resolved to discharge. His remains were also interred at the public expense, in the same vault with his father. Besides his official Pius II. (Æneas Sylvius Piccolomini) in 1431 became secretary to Cardinal Capranica, at the Council of Bâle, and acted in the same capacity to Cardinal Albergotti, who sent him to Scotland to negotiate a peace between England and that country. He afterwards displayed great talents in the disputes between Eugenius and the Council of Bâle, which he defended against the pope. The emperor Frederick III. made him imperial secretary, and employed him in several embassies. In 1456 he obtained a cardinalship, and two years later was elected pope. He began his pontificate by annulling all that he had maintained at the Council of Bâle, issuing a bull, in which he declared void all appeals from the papal decree to a general council. Pius was about to dispatch a fleet against the Turks when his death took place. His principal works are,—"Mémoir of the Council of Bâle;" "History of the Bohemians;" "On Cosmography;" "Treatise on Education;" "Poem on the Crucifixion;" "Letters;" a romance entitled "Euryalus and Lucrecia;" and a Memoir of his own life. n. at Corsignano, Siena, 1455; n. at Ancona 1504.

Pius III. (Francesco Piccolomini), nephew of the preceding, was elected pope in 1503, but died in less than a month afterwards.

Pius IV. (cardinal de' Medici), rose by merit to several high employments, in 1549 obtained a cardinalship, and, on the death of Paul IV., in 1559, was elected pope. He confirmed the decrees of the Council of Trent, after the closing of that assembly in 1564. In the following year a conspiracy was formed against his life by Bonediet Accolti and others, who were executed. This pope was not of the celebrated Medici family of Florence. n. at Milan, 1490; n. 1565.

Pius V. succeeded the preceding in 1566. He was a Dominican, and had been created by Paul IV. bishop of Sutri, and cardinal and inquisitor-general in the Milanese, where he displayed great bigotry and cruelty. After his election to the papal chair he issued a bull, in which the jurisdiction of the Roman church was sought to be carried to an extravagant pitch. Pius made war against the Turks, which produced the famous battle of Lepanto, wherein the latter were defeated. He was a cruel persecutor, and enforced the mandates of the Inquisition throughout Italy. n. in Piedmont, 1501; n. 1572.

Pius VI. (John Angelo Braschi). Benedict XIV. created him treasurer of the apostolic chamber, and Clement XIV. conferred upon him the cardinalship. He succeeded that pontiff in 1774. Shortly after his election he wrought some important reforms in the public treasury, and completed the magnificent museum in the Vatican, which he filled with monuments, vases, medals, and other ancient remains found in the Ecclesiastical States. But the greatest act of his pontificate was the draining of the Pontine Marshes, a project which had baffled several of the Roman emperors and many of the popes. These marshes occupied the whole of the valley extending from the Apennines to the sea, commencing at the port of Astura, covering the coast of Terracina, and reaching to the kingdom of Naples. This great tract contained nearly 200 square miles, and through the perseverance of Pius VI. a large proportion of it was rendered fit for cultivation. He also constructed on the side of the canals formed to carry off the water of the marshes, a beautiful road nearly 10 miles long, ornamented with rows of poplars. Besides this great enterprise, this pontiff built several handsome edifices at Rome, and founded some hospitals. The emperor Joseph II. having suppressed several monasteries, and decreed all the religious orders in his dominions free from papal jurisdiction, Pius, apprehensive of the consequences of this revolution to the Holy See, went in person to Vienna in 1782; but though he was honourably received, his efforts could not divert the emperor from his designs. On his return to Rome, the pope became embroiled with the courts of Naples, Modena, and Venice, chiefly with regard to the right of presenting to ecclesiastical benefices. The French revolution was, however, fraught with more serious consequence to the papal see. Upon a mere pretext, the French Convention ordered General Bonaparte to enter the Ecclesiastical territory, when, having taken several places, he compelled the pope to purchase a peace by a contribution of thirty millions of livres (£1,200,000), and the delivering up of the finest works of painting and sculpture. In 1797 a band of French revolutionists excited a tumult at Rome, and being driven to the house of the French Ambassador, were there headed by General Dupleix, who, together with several of the French, was slain. Upon this, General Berthier entered Italy, and made the pope prisoner in his capital, which was plundered. The venerable pontiff was carried away by the victors, and hurried over the Alps to Valence, where he died. His body was interred in a private manner; but in 1802 it was taken up and conveyed to Rome, where it was interred with great pomp. n. at Cesena, in the Papal States, 1717; n. 1799.

Pius VII. (Gregorio Barnaba Chiaramonti) was at first a Benedictine monk, but became, at the age of 40 years, bishop of Tivoli. In 1785 he was created a cardinal, and, after the death of Pius VI., was elected to the papal chair in 1800, by a conclave of thirty-five cardinals, after several months' deliberation at Venice. In the following year he entered Rome, which city was shortly afterwards evacuated by the French. The relations between Pius VII. and Bonaparte, then first consul, were at the outset of a sufficiently cordial nature. A concordat was signed between the republic and Rome, and in 1804 Pius repaired to Paris, where, in the cathedral of Notre Dame, he was present at the coronation of Napoleon as emperor. The misfortunes of the pope commenced in the following year. The emperor suddenly sent his troops to Ancona in 1805, and, shortly afterwards, Civita Vecchia was seized. Napoleon also wished Pius to annul the marriage between his brother Jerome and Miss Patterson, an American Protestant lady, which the pope refused to do. (See BONAPARTE, Jerome.) Other grounds of quarrel were found by the emperor, who wrote to the pope from Dresden, "that he must not take him for a Louis le Débonnaire; that his anathemas would never make his soldiers drop their muskets; that, if provoked too far, he (Napoleon) could separate the Romish church from the greater part of Europe, and establish a more rational form of worship than that of which the pope was the head, and that such a thing was easy to the pope of Rome. In the morning, just as the French took possession of Rome, and, shortly afterwards, the finest provinces of the papal territory were united to the kingdom of Italy. It was in vain that Pius remonstrated: Napoleon declared that, unless he forthwith entered into an offensive and defensive alliance with the kingdom of Naples and Italy, "he would lose his temporal sovereignty, and remain bishop of Rome, as his predecessors were during the first eight centuries, and under the reign of Charlemagne." After remaining some time as a prisoner in his palace on the Quirinal, Pius was suddenly taken off, under French escort, to Grenoble, whence he was conveyed to Saron, in the Riviera of Genoa. In 1812 he was taken to Fontainebleau, but still remained obdurate, and refused to sanction Napoleon's separation from Josephine. The defeat of the French in Germany, as well as the previous disaster in Russia, caused Napoleon to give way before his passive but indelible opponent. In 1814 he sent him back to Italy; but Pius, instead of proceeding to Rome, stopped at Cesena, his native town. Upon the abdication of Napoleon, Pius proceeded to Rome, where he spent the remainder of his life, engaged in reforming the civil institutions of his dominions. He created a new police, abolished torture and the punishment of death for offences against religion, extirpated the banditti of the Campagna, and put an end to several vexatious feudal imposts. b. 1712; d. at Rome, 1823.

Pius VIII. (Cardinal Castiglione) became pope in succession to Leo XII., in 1829. After a short pontificate of one year, he died, 1830.

Pius IX. (Giovanni Maria Mastai Ferretti) became pope in succession to Gregory XVI. in 1846. Born of a noble Italian family, his youth was characterized by mildness and a charitable disposition. In his 18th year he went to Rome, with the intention of entering the body-guard of the pope; but having been seized by an epileptic attack, he, upon recovering, resolved to devote himself to the service of the Church. After completing his studies at the college of Viterbo, he was ordained a priest, and dispatched upon a mission to Chili, in 1823. Upon his return, two years later, he became president of the hospital of St. Michael. In 1826 his zeal was rewarded by an appointment to the archbishopric of Spoleto, from which he was, in 1832, translated to Imola; and became cardinal under Gregory XVI. in 1840. Upon the death of Gregory, in 1846, the conciliatory and liberal character of Cardinal Ferretti gained him the tiara. The first measures of the new pontiff were of a popular and liberal character: he disbanded his Swiss guard; granted to political offenders, amounting to 2000, a general and unconditional amnesty; reformed civil abuses, and lightened the burthens of his people to a very considerable extent. But the spirit of republicanism, which awoke at Paris in 1848, spread throughout Europe; and at Rome, as elsewhere, the people rose against their ruler. A republic was proclaimed; and Pius IX., after remaining some time a prisoner in his palace, fled in disguise to Gaeta. These events produced a complete reaction in the weak and vacillating mind of the pontiff. All the liberal tendencies of his policy disappeared under the influence of his minister, Cardinal Antonelli, and under his fear of republican institutions. He called upon the great Catholic powers of France, Austria, Spain to divide among them. After wringing all he could from the unfortunate Atahualpa, Pizarro inhumanly put him to death in 1533, and then proceeded to capture the city of Cuzco, where great treasure was taken. In 1534, Ferdinand, one of Pizarro's brothers, laid the royal share at the feet of Charles V., whereupon the Spanish leader was confirmed in his power, while to Almagro, his rival, was granted all the country that might be conquered southward of Pizarro's vice-royalty. Whilst Pizarro was engaged in settling the government of Peru, Almagro proceeded to conquer Chili. In 1536, the Peruvians having risen against the Spaniards, Almagro marched to their relief; but after defeating the insurgent natives, he took prisoners Pizarro's brothers. Almagro himself subsequently fell into the hands of his more enterprising rival, by whom he was brought to trial and executed, in 1538. Thus left alone in power, Pizarro began to rule in a despotic and partial manner, whereat many of the Spanish adventurers became alienated and attached themselves to Almagro's son. In 1541 a conspiracy was formed against Pizarro; he was surprised at midday, set upon, and after a most determined resistance, himself and a few devoted followers were slain. B. at Truxillo, 1480.—Gonsalvo, one of his brothers, was acting as governor of Quito at the date of Pizarro's murder, and subsequently succeeded in gaining supreme power throughout Peru. After retaining this position during three years, he was, in 1543, defeated and taken prisoner by Guascar, whom Charles V. had created viceroy. He was brought to trial, condemned as a rebel, and executed almost immediately afterwards.

PLANCKE', James Robinson, plai'-shai, a modern English writer and dramatist, who was descended from a French family which came to England on the revocation of the Edict of Nantes in 1685. Early in life he wrote a burlesque, entitled, "Amoroso, King of Little Britain," for a private performance, which was afterwards accepted by the committee of management of Drury Lane Theatre, where it was produced with complete success in 1813. This unexpected piece of good fortune determined the young author to apply himself to dramatic writing; and, during the subsequent forty years, he wrote about two hundred plays, some of the most successful of which were the charming extravaganzas produced under the management of Madame Vestris. He also adapted several of the plays of the old dramatists, and was at one period engaged to design the costumes for the Shakspearean dramas placed upon the stage of Covent Garden Theatre. For the series called the "Library of Entertaining Knowledge," he wrote a "History of British Costume;" the articles on costume in Knight's "Pictorial Shakspeare," as well as the articles "Costume and Furniture" in the "Manners and Customs," chapters in the "Pictorial History of England" were also from his pen. He became a member of the Society of Antiquaries in 1830, but retired from it in 1852. A course of travel in the north of Europe led to his producing "Lays and Legends of the Rhine," and "Descent of the Danube." Not the least valuable of his many excellent efforts was his translation of the Fairy Tales of the Countess d'Aulnoy, Perrault, and others. In 1854 he received the appointment of Rouge Croix Pursuivant of Arms, and was made Somerset Herald in 1856. Among his works on heraldic subjects may be named "Regal Records," and "The Pursuivant of Arms, or Heraldry founded upon Truth." B. in London, 1796.

PLANTAGENET, plan-taj'-e-net, the surname of a line of English kings, who were of French origin on the paternal side, Henry II. of England, the first of the line, having been the son of Geoffrey V., duke of Anjou, and of Matilda, daughter of Henry I. The Duke of Anjou was named Plantagenet because he usually wore a sprig of broom—in Latin, planta genista, in French plante genêt—in his cap. Henry II. ascended the English throne in 1154, and his descendants reigned during 331 years, the last monarch of the line being Richard III., who fell at the battle of Bosworth, in 1485. In the 14th century the line became divided into two great rival factions, that of York and of Lancaster, or the parties of the Red and White Roses. (See HENRY II., III., IV., V., and VI.; Richard I., II., and III.; Edward I., II., III., IV., and V.; and JOHN.)

PLANTIN, Christopher, plan-tin, a celebrated French printer, who settled at Antwerp in 1553, and became distinguished for the beauty and correctness of his productions. His editions are extremely valuable. His chief work was a polyglot Bible, executed by order of Philip II. of Spain. B. in Touraine, 1514; D. 1589.

PLATINA, plai-te'-nu (Bartholomew Sacchi), a learned Italian historian, who, on going to Rome, was patronized by Cardinal Bessarion, by whose means he was appointed apostolical abbreviator; of which post he was deprived by Paul II. Platina wrote a letter to that pontiff, who sent him to prison and caused him to be tortured. Subsequently, Sixtus IV. made him librarian of the Vatican. He was the author of a "History of the Popes;" a "History of Mantua;" the "Life of Nerio Capponi," and other works. B. near Mantua, 1421; D. 1481.

PLATO, plai'-to, an illustrious Greek philosopher. His father was Ariston, the son of Aristocles; on his mother's side he was descended from Solon. His first master was Dionysius the grammarian; and afterwards he received instructions in gymnastic exercises from Ariston, an Argive wrestler, who, according to some accounts, gave him the name of Plato, because of the broadness of his shoulders and the robustness of his person. His former name was Aristocles, which was that of his grandfather. He next applied to the study of music and poetry, and composed some pieces intended for Olympic exercises; but on hearing Socrates deliver a long discourse, he burnt them, and became his disciple; some of his epigrams, however, are still preserved. He was a disciple of Socrates for about ten years; and upon his death, in 399 B.C., Plato left Athens, and travelled into different countries in search of knowledge. At Cyrene he studied geometry and other branches of mathematics; thence he went into Egypt, where, during thirteen years, he sought to learn all that the priests could teach him. He next visited Italy, and settled at Tarentum, where he formed an intimacy with Eurytus and Archytas. He afterwards made a voyage to Sicily, to observe the wonders of that island, particularly Mount Etna. In Sicily he became acquainted with Dionysius, tyrant of Syracuse, whom he was unfortunate enough to offend, and who induced the Spartan ambassador, in whose vessel Plato was returning home, to sell him for a slave at Ægina; but his purchaser having given him his freedom, he repaired to Athens, where he commenced teaching in the garden of the Academy whence his philosophy was called the Academic. At the request of Dion, the uncle of Dionysius the Younger, he made a second voyage to Sicily, where he was received with great honour; but finding that his advice was not heeded by the youthful tyrant, who chose rather to imitate his father, he returned to Athens, where he gained a number of followers. After making a third journey to Syracuse, he settled in his native city, and there spent the remaining years of his life in literary and philosophical pursuits. The philosophy of Plato is so sublime, his morality so pure, and ... views of the Divine Being and a future state so clear, that he has been thought to have had a knowledge of the Mosiac writings; a supposition which, considering his long residence in Egypt, is not improbable. The best editions of Plato are,—the Greek text, edited by Bekker, and published at Berlin, 1823; a complete French translation, by Victor Cousin; a partial translation into German, by Schleiermacher; and an English version by Taylor. Some of his principal writings have been translated and published in Bohn's Classical Library. n. at Athens, b.c. 429; d. 347 b.c.

PLATOFF, Count, plaf'-tor, hetman of the Cossacks, served in the campaign of 1816-7 against the French, and subsequently defeated the Turks in several engagements in Moldavia. He was opposed to Napoleon during the advance of the grand army into Russia, in 1812. He experienced several defeats, particularly at Trodno; but in the subsequent retreat of the French, his Cossacks proved as destructive as a plague to the fugitives. In the campaigns of 1811-15 he signalized himself chiefly by allowing his Cossacks to plunder without restraint. n. about 1765; d. 1818.

PLAUTUS, Marcus Accius, plav'-tus, a Latin comic dramatist, was a man of humble birth, and settled at Rome, where his plays were performed with great applause. There is more intrigue and plot in his pieces than in those of Terence; the humour, also, is extremely natural and entertaining. Only twenty are extant. A good English translation is that entitled "Domestical Comedies of Plautus, translated into Familiar Blank Verse." n. at Sarsina, in Umbria, about 227 b.c.; d. 184 b.c.

PLAYFAIR, John, plai'-fair, an eminent Scotch mathematician, who, in his 18th year, became a candidate for the professorship of mathematics at the Marischal College, Aberdeen, and was only excelled by two older men. In 1785 he was appointed joint professor of mathematics in the University of Edinburgh, and, in 1805, succeeded to the chair of natural philosophy at the same seat of learning. He was a supporter of Dr. Hutton's geological theories, and, in 1802, published "Illustrations of the Huttonian Theory of the Earth," an improved edition of which he contemplated, and, with that view, made a geological tour in Italy, France, and Switzerland. He published "Outlines of Natural Philosophy" and "Elements of Geometry." To the "Edinburgh Review" he contributed many articles on astronomical and mathematical subjects, as well as several to the "Encyclopædia Britannica." n. at Bervie, near Dundee, 1718; d. at Edinburgh, 1819.

PLAYFAIR, William, brother of the preceding, was an ingenious projector and author. After serving an apprenticeship to a millwright, he was engaged as a draughtsman at Boulton and Watt's establishment, Soho, Birmingham. On going to London, he obtained patents for various inventions, and engaged in many speculations, and became a fertile writer on politics and other subjects. His most important publications are, "A Commercial and Political Atlas," "An Inquiry into the Decline and Fall of Nations," "France as it is," "History of Jacobinism," and "British Family Antiquity." n. 1759; d. 1823.

PLAYFAIR, Lyon, an eminent modern chemist, who was sent from Bengal, in the East Indies, to receive his education at the University of St. Andrews, and having shown a taste for chemical science, was, in 1831, placed under Professor Graham at Glasgow. In the following year he went to India, but shortly afterwards returned to Europe, and having resumed his chemical studies under his former teacher, at University College, London, passed to the celebrated laboratory at Giessen, in 1838. Under Liebig he made great progress in organic chemistry; and after taking the degree of doctor of philosophy at the University of Giessen, returned to London, where he produced some translations of the great German chemist's "Reports on the Progress of Organic Chemistry." In 1843 he became professor of chemistry in the Royal Institution of Manchester, and in that position became very popular. Nominated a member of the Health of Towns Commission, he drew up several of the reports of that body. His next appointment was as chemist to the Museum of Economic Geology, then in Parliament Street; but when the new building in Jermyn Street was commenced, the arrangements of the laboratory were placed under his charge. He was one of the most active commissioners of the Great Exhibition in 1851, for services was created a Companion of the Bath, and was further rewarded by Prince Albert with the appointment of gentleman usher in his household. He subsequently became joint-secretary, and, at a later period, sole secretary of the department of science and art. Dr. Playfair published some valuable anal. of coal-gas in the "Memoirs" of the Museum of Economic Geology, and several lectures upon the products exhibited in the Crystal Palace of 1851. Throughout his career he displayed great scientific knowledge, was the discoverer of some new chemical compounds, and was one of the best chemical analysts of his time. n. in Bengal, East India, 1798.

PLAYF, Ignace, plif'-el, a German musical composer, who studied his art under Vanhall and Haydn, and during a long tour in Italy. In 1783 he received the appointment of chapel-master at Strasburg cathedral, and while holding that office composed a number of masses and other pieces of sacred music, which were consumed by a great fire which occurred in the city. Become famous for his compositions, he was, in 1791, invited to London, where he was so liberally rewarded for his efforts that he was enabled to purchase an estate near Strasburg. During the French revolution he narrowly escaped the guillotine. About that period he also began to lose his hold upon the popular musical taste, a change which induced him to abandon the science of music for the trade of music-publisher and pianoforte-manufacturer; and after acquiring a fortune, retired to an estate

PLINY, Caius Plinius Secundus, plin'-e, plin'-e-us, called the Elder, was of an illustrious family, and in his youth bore arms with reputation; after which he was admitted to the college of augurs. Vespasian appointed him procurator of Spain, in which office he conducted himself with strict integrity, devoting the day to public affairs and the night to study. His mind was stored with various knowledge, and he was an indefatigable observer of the works of nature. To this spirit of observation he sacrificed his life; for, lying at Misenum, in the Gulf of Naples, with a fleet which he commanded, he was surprised at an extraordinary cloud issuing from Vesuvius. He immediately moved his vessel so as to be enabled to land at the foot of the mountain to ascertain the cause of the phenomenon: but the sulphureous exhalations from the burning lava overcame him, and he was suffocated. Of all the works of Pliny none remain but his "Natural History," which, says Cuvier, "is one of the most precious monuments left us by antiquity." It is a perfect encyclopædia of ancient science, and is divided into 37 books, treating of astronomy, meteorology, the theory of the earth, geography, botany, zoology, agriculture, medicine, mineralogy, sculpture, painting, &c. b. it is supposed, 23 A.D.; d. 79.

PLINY THE YOUNGER, Caius Plinius Cæcilius Secundus, was the nephew of the preceding, who adopted him as his son and heir. He had Quintilian for his master, and advanced so rapidly, that at the age of 19 he pleaded in the forum with an eloquence equal to that of the greatest orators of his time. When Trajan was elevated to the throne, he conferred the consular dignity on Pliny, who, at the desire of the senate, pronounced that fine oration which is extant, entitled the "Panegyric on Trajan." He was some time after appointed governor of Pontus and Bithynia, where he abolished the arbitrary imposts and stopped the persecution of the Christians, of whom he gave a liberal account to the emperor. After his return to Rome, he settled at Comum, his native place, where he established an academy and library for young men who had not the means of education. Pliny was a liberal patron of men of virtue and learning. For Quintilian he always retained the greatest regard, and gave his daughter a handsome dowry on her marriage. Of the many works of this writer, only his "Epistles" and "Panegyric on Trajan" remain. He also wrote the "History of his own Times," of which Tacitus speaks in high terms. The best edition is that of Amsterdam, 1734. Hearne, Lord Orrery, and Masson, have furnished English translations of them. b. about 63; d. about 116.

PLIN, Robert, plot, a learned English antiquary and naturalist, who became secretary to the Royal Society in 1682, and published their "Transactions" from No. 143 to 166. He was appointed first keeper of the Ashmolean Museum, and professor of chemistry at Oxford. He was also nominated historiographer to the king, and Mowbray herald extraordinary. His works are, the "Natural Histories of Oxfordshire and Staffordshire," papers in the "Philosophical Transactions," and an essay on the "Origin of Springs," in Latin. b. in Kent, 1641; d. 1696.

Plunket

PLUTINUS, ploti'-nus, the most celebrated of the neo-Platonic philosophers. After studying for eleven years under Ammonius, he travelled into Persia and India, where he acquired a great store of knowledge. He served in the army under Gordian; but, when that emperor was slain, Plotinus effected his escape, and went to Rome, where he opened a school of philosophy, and had many disciples. His works were printed at the Oxford University press, in 3 volumes, 1835. b. at Lycopolis, Egypt, 204; d. in Campania, 274.

PLOWDEN, Edmund, plou'-den, an eminent English lawyer, who was educated at Cambridge; whence he removed to Oxford, where he took his degrees in physic, which profession he quitted for the law. His "Commentaries and Reports" are greatly esteemed. They consist of a collection of cases from Edward VI. to the middle of the reign of Elizabeth. b. in Shropshire, about 1517; d. 1585.

PLUCHE, Noel Antoine, plooch, a French writer, who became professor of rhetoric in the college of Rheims, entered into orders, and subsequently went to Paris, where he taught geography and history. His principal works are, "Spectacle de la Nature," of which there are several English translations; "The History of the Heavens," an inquiry into the origin of mythology and idolatry (this has also been translated into English); and "On the Mechanism of Languages." b. 1638; d. 1761.

PLUNKET, Leonard, pluke'-net, an eminent English botanist, who was doctor of physic; but, notwithstanding his great merit, was neglected till the close of life, when he was appointed superintendent of the garden at Hampton Court, and royal professor of botany. He published several "Collections of Botany," and his Herbal, containing 8000 plants, is in the British Museum. b. 1612; d. 1706.

PLUNKET, Charles, ploo'-mei, an eminent French botanist, who at first studied mathematics, but afterwards applied himself to natural history. Louis XIV. sent him to America, to collect plants useful in medicine, and he made three voyages for that purpose. The king rewarded him with a pension, and appointed him royal botanist. He was on the eve of undertaking a fourth voyage, but died as he was about to embark. His works are, "Description of the Plants of America," "Treatise on American Ferns," "The Art of Turning," two dissertations on Cochineal, in the "Journal des Savans," &c. b. 1646; d. near Cadix, 1706.

PLUNKET, Oliver, plun'-kef, archbishop of Armagh and Roman Catholic primate of Ireland, who was accused of having attempted to excite an insurrection of the Roman Catholics of Ireland against Charles II. On that charge he was condemned to death, and after execution his body was quartered, in 1631. b. 1616.

PLUNKET, William Conyngham, first Lord, an Irish lawyer and statesman, who, having distinguished himself by his oratorical talents while a student at Trinity College, Dublin, was returned to the Irish Parliament through the influence of the earl of Charlemont. In 1787 he was called to the bar, and obtained such a large practice that, by the year 1807, he had acquired a fortune. In the same year he was returned to the British House of Commons, when he attached himself to the Whigs, and became a powerful orator of that party. In 1827 he was created lord chief justice of the Common Pleas in Ireland, and a peer of the United Kingdom. During the passage of the Roman Catholic Emancipation Bill he was the constant adviser of the duke of Wellington in the English House of Lords. In 1830 he became lord chancellor of Ireland, which post he retained until the year 1841. Lord Plunket's later years were spent apart from political life, in retirement at his estate in Ireland. He was a great and impassioned orator; but though he has been compared to Pitt and Burke, he was too deficient in the profounder principles of legislation to have been equal to those statesmen. As a lawyer, he was more brilliant than sound, more dexterous than learned. n. at Newton, Cork, 1764; d. near Bray, Ireland, 1854.

PLUQUET, François André Adrien, plou'-kai, an eminent French writer, who entered into orders and obtained a canonry, which he quitted to assume the professorship of history at the College of France, in 1776. He belonged to the party of Fontenelle, Montesquieu, and Helvétius; and, among other important works, wrote "An Examination of Fatalism," "Dictionary of Hieresie," "On Sociability" (in this work he combated the opinion of Hobbes, and proved that man is beneficent and religious); "The Classical Books of the Empire of China," and "On Luxury." n. at Bayeux, 1716; d. 1790.

PLUTARCH, plou'-tark, a celebrated Greek biographer and moralist, who studied philosophy in the school of Ammonius, at Delphi; and so greatly was he esteemed by his countrymen, that, when but a young man, he was associated in a deputation to the proconsul of the province, on an important mission, which he discharged with honour. He is stated to have afterwards travelled through Greece and into Egypt, and his observations in the latter country are believed to have led to his producing a treatise on Isis and Osiris. (One account, but not a perfectly reliable one, declares that, when he visited Rome, he was received with flattering marks of distinction by Trajan, who raised him to the consular dignity, and appointed him governor of Illyria. It is certainly ascertained that he resided at Rome, where he delivered lectures in Greek upon philosophy, and enjoyed the friendship of Lucan, the younger Pliny, Martial, and others. At an advanced age he retired to his native town. He left two sons, Plutarch and Lamprias. The last wrote a list of his father's works, which were numerous. The most celebrated of his works are his "Lives of Illustrious Men," in delineating which he has shown great impartiality, an abhorrence of tyranny and vice, and an accurate acquaintance with the human mind. His "Morals" also contain many valuable observations and curious narratives. The best edition of his works is that of Henry Stephens, Greek and Latin, 1672. His "Lives" have been translated into English by Dryden, by Langhorne, and by Professor Lowe. His "Morals" have also been translated into English. n. at Charonea, Boeotia, about 43; d. at the same place, at a very advanced age.

Pocock, Edward, pu'-kok, a learned English divine and orientalist, who, at the age of 14, was entered of Magdalen Hall, Oxford; whence he removed to Corpus Christi College, where he obtained a fellowship. In 1629 he entered into orders, and was appointed chaplain to the English factory at Aleppo. While there, he improved himself in the Hebrew, Syriac, Arabic, and Ethiopic languages, which he had before studied at the university. He was also employed by Archbishop Laud in purchasing ancient manuscripts and coins; and that prelate having founded an Arabic lecture at Oxford, appointed Mr. Pocock the first professor. He returned home in 1636; but afterwards made another voyage to the East, and remained there four years. On his arrival in England, he found his patron in the Tower and the kingdom in commotion. In 1648 he was nominated to the Hebrew professorship, with the prebend of Christchurch annexed; he published in the same year his "Specimen Historie Arabum." In 1652 he was one of those concerned in preparing the intended edition of the Polyglot Bible. His principal works were—"Patria Mosi; or, The Six Preliminary Discourses of Moses Maimonides;" "The Annals of Bactria;" "Abu-l-farajii Historia Dynastarum;" "Commentaries on Micah, Malachi, Hosea, and Joel;" a Syriac version of the second epistle of St. Peter, the second and third of John, and that of Jude. n. at Oxford, 1604; d. 1681.

Pocock, Isaac, an artist and dramatist, whose father distinguished himself as a marine painter; and Isaac appearing to have a genius for the same art, was placed first with Romney, and afterwards studied under Sir William Beechey. He gained the first prize given by the British Institution, by the production of his historical picture of the murder of Thomas à Becket. He afterwards painted other pictures, but becoming independent, he retired to Maltonhead, where he occasionally used both his pencil and pen, and produced many dramatic pieces, the greater part of which were successful. He was the author of about 40 melodramas, farces, and operatic pieces; among which were, "The Miller and his Men," "Hill or Miss," "John of Paris," "Robinson Crusoe," "Montrose," &c. n. 1782; d. 1835.

Poe, Edgar Allan, po, an eminent American writer, who was the son of a strutting player, and was in childhood left an orphan, but was adopted by Mr. Allan, a wealthy merchant. He accompanied that gentleman to England in 1816, and was placed at a school at Stoke Newington. Returning to his native country in 1822, he was sent to an academy at Richmond, and at a later period to Charlottesville University, Virginia. His career at school and college was brilliant, so far as the acquirement of learning was concerned, but was marked by so much extravagance and irregularity, that it terminated in his expulsion from the last-named establishment. He soon afterwards quarrelled with his generous protector, in consequence of the latter's refusal to pay some of his gambling debts. Intending to proceed to Greece, at that period struggling to throw off the tyranny of the Turks, he went to Europe, but, although he never reached his destination, he wandered about the continent until he was seized by the police of St. Petersburg, for being engaged in a drunken riot. The American ambassador procured his release, and sent him home, where he was kindly received by Mr. Allan. In a short time, however, he had a serious quarrel with Mr. Allan, who declared he would never see or assist him again. A small volume of poems which he had published, had been so successful as to lead Poe to believe that he might rely upon literature as a means of subsistence; but deeming himself slighted, he soon afterwards enlisted as a private soldier. Some military friends rescued him from this position; upon which he again adopted a literary career. He readily obtained employment upon the magazines and periodicals; but his unfortunate predilection for strong drinks always lost him what his great talent had secured. Towards the close of 1843, he joined a temperance society, but unhappily was weak enough to accept the invitation of some friends to drink, while staying at Baltimore, and became so utterly inebriated that he fell down in the streets. On being picked up, he was conveyed to an hospital, where he expired on the following day. His works consist of "Eureka, a Prose Poem," one volume of poetry, and two of tales. b. at Baltimore, United States, 1811; d. in the same city, 1849.

POELENBERG, Cornelius. (See POELENBERG.)

POERIO, Carlo, po-er'-e-o, a modern Neapolitan statesman, who was the son of Baron Joseph Poerio, counsellor of state and attorney-general of the high court of justice at Naples. Carlo was educated at Florence under the most able professors, but returned to Naples in 1828, where he commenced practice as an advocate, and distinguished himself by eloquently defending the principles of representative government, for which he was three times prosecuted by the ruling powers. When a constitutional government was proclaimed at Naples, in 1848, Poerio was appointed under-secretary for home affairs, and afterwards became minister of public instruction. When Bomba suddenly and infamously destroyed the constitution, Poerio was, with other enlightened members of the state, imprisoned. During ten years he suffered all the horrors of a Neapolitan dungeon, but obtained his release from the late king of Naples in 1859. With Settembrini and many other patriots, he was placed on board a ship, which was ordered to proceed to the United States. But the patriots, who greatly outnumbered the crew of the vessel, sent a deputation to the captain, informing him that, without wishing to employ force, they had resolved to steer the ship into the nearest British port. The exiles were in consequence landed at Cork, and soon afterwards Poerio and his companions proceeded to London. He subsequently returned to his country, and was elected a member of the Italian Parliament in 1860. b. 1803; d. 1867.

POGGENDORFF, John Christian, pog-gen-dorff, an eminent German physician, who in 1834 was appointed professor of physics at the university of Berlin, and in 1838 became member of the Academy of Sciences. In his work entitled "The Magnetism of the Voltaic Pile," he was the first to demonstrate and apply the principles of the multiplier. In 1824 he assumed the direction of the "Annals of Physics and Chemistry," which, under his editorship, became one of the first of the scientific journals of Germany. With Liebig and Wöhler, he afterwards undertook a "Dictionary of Chemistry," and subsequently produced a "Biographical Dictionary of Mathematicians and Naturalists," and "Studies for a History of the Exact Sciences." His scientific researches have been principally directed towards electricity and magnetism. He invented a galvanometer, another instrument for producing a constant current of electricity, and made some important discoveries relative to galvanic polarization, &c. b. at Hamburg, 1796.

POGGIO BRACCIOLINI, John Francis, pod'-jo bratek'-che-o-le'-ne, a learned Italian historian, whose merit procured him the office of secretary to Pope Boniface IX. and several of his successors. While he was at the council of Constance, he was employed in searching for ancient manuscripts in that city, of which he discovered several. From Constance he went to England, where he continued for some time, and then returned to Rome; but, in 1435, settled at Florence, married, and became secretary to that republic. His principal works are—"Funeral Orations," "History of Florence," "De Varietate Fortunæ," "Epistles," a collection of witticisms, a Latin translation of Diodorus Siculus, and editions of several ancient writers discovered by him, particularly Quintilian and Ammianus Marcellinus. b. at Terranova, Florence, 1380; d. at Florence, 1459.—His son James translated his father's "History of Florence" from the Latin into Italian; also the "Life of Cyrus" from the Greek, and other works. He was put to death for being concerned in the conspiracy of the Pazzi in 1478.

POIRIER, Germain, poi-ri-ay, an eminent French chronologist and antiquary, was of the order of Benedictines of St. Maur, which he quitted in 1769. He was one of the writers of "The Art of Verifying Dates," and undertook, in conjunction with Previeux, the 18th volume of the "Collection of the Histories of Gaul and France," begun by Bouquet. b. 1724; d. 1803.

POISSON, John B., poi-s'-son, an eminent French geographer, who produced a "Physical and Political Atlas of the whole World," the atlas for the "Universal Geography" of Malte-Brun, and several of the maps accompanying the works of Humboldt. He also constructed several fine globes, one of which is preserved in the Louvre museum. b. 1761; d. at Valence, 1831.

POISSON, Raymond, poi-s'-son, a celebrated French actor and dramatic writer, who was gentleman of the chamber to the Due de Crequi, but quitted that service for the stage. His pieces are, "The Baron de la Crasse," "The Good Soldier," "The Fool of Quality," and some others. b. about 1620; d. 1690.

POISSON, Simeon Denis, an eminent French mathematician, who, in 1811, was appointed professor of mechanics in the Normal School at Paris, and subsequently became examiner of the Polytechnic School, member of the Academy of Sciences and of the Council of Public Instruction, and baron and officer of the Legion of Honour. He was one of the most profound mathematicians of his time, and largely contributed to the scientific journals. His dissertations chiefly relate to the mathematics of magnetism, heat, the gases, capillary attraction, gravitation, &c. He excelled in applying the methods of mathematical analysis to questions of physics. A monument to his memory was erected in his native town. b. at Pithiviers, 1781; d. at Paris, 1842.

POIVRE, Peter, poi-vr, an eminent French naturalist and traveller, who entered the Congregation of Missionaries and was sent to China, where he was imprisoned during two years. In his passage to Europe the vessel was attacked by the English, and Poivre had his arm carried off. He subsequently quitted the ecclesiastical state, and was sent by the French India Company, in 1740, to open a commercial establishment in Cochin-China, and was also appointed intendant of the isles of France and Bourbon, where he introduced the bread-fruit tree and other valuable plants. He wrote "The Voyage of a Philosopher," a treatise on the "Dyeing of Silks," and "The History and Manners of China," &c. B. at Lyons, 1719; D. at the same city, 1786.

POLE, Reginald, pole, cardinal and archbishop of Canterbury, was the son of Richard Pole, Lord Montague, and of Margaret, daughter of George, duke of Clarence, younger brother of Edward IV., and cousin-german to the mother of Henry VIII. At the age of 12 he was entered at Magdalen College, Oxford, where he made considerable progress in learning. In 1517 he obtained a prebend in the cathedral of Salisbury, and two years after, the deaneries of Exeter and Wimborne. About this time he went to Italy for improvement, upon a liberal establishment from his relation Henry VIII. He returned to England in 1523, and was held in great favour by the king, on account of his engaging manners and accomplishments; but, when that monarch avowed his design of divorcing his queen, Pole opposed it, and went to Italy. Henry having assumed the supremacy over the Church, and caused Dr. Sampson to write a defence of that title, sent the book to Pole, who returned an answer to it under the title "Pro Unitate Ecclesiasticæ." This gave such offence that his preferments and pensions were taken from him; but he was abundantly compensated by the pope and emperor. The former made him cardinal in 1536, and appointed him nuncio to France and Flanders. At home, however, he was declared a traitor, and a price was set upon his head. He was one of the legates at the Council of Trent, where he attended as long as his health permitted. On the death of Paul III. he narrowly missed election to the papedom. Queen Mary was no sooner settled on the English throne, than Pole was appointed legate to reduce England to submission to the papal see; but, before he set out, the act of attainder which had been passed against him was repealed. He arrived in 1554, and was magnificently received and lodged in the palace at Lambeth. Shortly after he met the Parliament, and pronounced the papal absolution of the kingdom. The day after the death of Cranmer, he took upon himself the title of archbishop of Canterbury, having been promoted to that dignity some time before. He was also elected chancellor of both universities, which he visited by commission. He behaved with moderation to the Protestants, and was displeased with the conduct of Gardiner and the other persecuting prelates. He survived Queen Mary only sixteen hours. Besides his book against Henry VIII. and his defence of it, he wrote several pieces in favour of the papal authority and the doctrines of the Church of Rome. It is difficult to absolve Cardinal Pole from all acquiescence in the dreadful persecutions which took place in Queen Mary's reign; but his mild and honourable disposition seems totally at variance with the fearful acts which disgraced that period. B. at Staunton, Staffordshire, 1509; D. at Lambeth, 1558.

POLEMBERG, Cornelius, po-len-bairg, an eminent Dutch painter, who, at the invitation of Charles I., visited England, where he painted cabinet pictures of great beauty. His hand copies are particularly fine. On the disturbances breaking out between the King and Parliament, he returned to his native country.

POLEMON, pol-e-mon, a Greek philosopher, who in his youth led a dissolute life; but, passing the school of Xenocrates one day, inflamed with wine, he entered in order to ridicule the philosopher. The discourse of Xenocrates on the misery of intemperance had such an effect that Polemon became his disciple and successor. After this change he drank nothing but water during the rest of his life. B. at Athens, about 310 B.C.; D. 270 B.C.

POLEYOV, Nicolas Alexievitch, pol'-e-roi, an eminent Russian writer, who was the son of a merchant settled in Siberia. He never went to school, but was taught reading in his sixth year by his sister. He was a prodigious reader, and, while still a mere child, wrote a drama, a manuscript newspaper, and a "History of Peter the Great." "At last," he says, in his Autobiography, "I became my father's walking dictionary in geography and history, for my memory at that time was such as I have never met with in anybody else. To learn by heart a whole tragedy cost me nothing. In a word, if I must describe my mental progress up to the year 1811, it was this,—I had read about a thousand volumes, of all kinds and sorts, and remembered all that I read." In 1812 his father had settled at Moscow, when the city was destroyed by fire on the advance of Napoleon I.; after which event he returned to Irkutsk, where young Polevoy spent several years as clerk to his father, who wished him to become a man of business, while the inclinations of the son were wholly towards literature. In secret he learnt the French and German languages, and in 1817 sent an account of the emperor Alexander's visit to Kursk to the "Russian Courier," which was his first essay in print. He continued his contributions, and repaired to St. Petersburg, where he made the acquaintance of the most distinguished literary men; and proceeding to Moscow, established there the "Moscow Telegraph," in 1825. The succeeding twenty-one years were occupied in incessant literary labour. He was a journalist, an historian, a romance-writer; he produced essays, tales, translations of Shakspeare, and a multitude of dramas, tragedies, and comedies, at a rate faster than criticism could follow. His most important works are, a "History of the Russian Nation," which was left incomplete at his death; "Sketches of Russian Literature;" Dramatic Works and Translations; and Lives of Napoleon, Peter the Great, and Suwarrow. His translation of "Hamlet" was played with great success at Irkutsk in 1837. B. at Irkutsk, 1796; D. 1840.

POLIGNAC, Melchior de, pol'-len-yak, a celebrated French cardinal, who was descended from one of the oldest families in France, and received his education at Paris, where he, at the same time, defended the philosophy of Aristotle and that of Descartes with great ingenuity. In the disputes between the pope and the court of France, Polignac rendered great service by bringing about a reconciliation. Louis XIV. sent him as ambassador to Poland to procure the election of the prince of Conti, after the death of John Sobieski. In this he failed, and on his return to France was for some time in disgrace. He afterwards recovered the royal favour, and in 1712 assisted in negotiating the treaty of Utrecht. In the next year he received from Pope Clement XI. the dignity of cardinal. After the death of Louis XIV. he was exiled to his abbey of Anehin, and was not recalled till 1721. In 1726 he was made archbishop of Auch, and in 1732 commander of the order of the Holy Ghost. Cardinal Polignac wrote an excellent Latin poem, entitled "Anti-Lucretius." B. at Puy, Langue-doc, 1661; D. at Paris, 1741.

POLIGNAC, Prince Jules de, minister and favourite of Charles X., was the son of the duc de Polignac and his duchess, the favourite and confidante of Marie Antoinette. At an early age he joined the count of Artois, then in exile, and was appointed his aide-de-camp. In 1804 he returned to France, where he and his elder brother engaged in a plot against the first consul; on the discovery of which he was condemned to an imprisonment of two years. Even after the expiration of this term he was detained in custody, but contrived to effect his escape in 1813. After fulfilling various missions in the interests of the Bourbons, he was, upon their restoration to the throne of France, sent as ambassador to the court of England. From that post he was recalled in 1820 by Charles X., who appointed him minister of foreign affairs and president of the council. But his acts excited general dissatisfaction, and his reactionary policy led to the fall of Charles X. and the expulsion of the elder branch of the Bourbons from the French throne. During the revolution of 1830 he obstinately refused all compromise, and, after the triumph of the people, attempted to escape under a disguise; but was taken at Granville, conducted to Paris, and brought to trial before the Court of Peers, which condemned him to imprisonment for life, with the loss of all his titles and orders. After being detained for several years in the fortress of Ham, he was pardoned in 1836; upon which he repaired to England; but subsequently returned to France, where he spent the remainder of his days in strict privacy. This blundering statesman was, apart from politics, an honourable and worthy man; but his public acts may be assumed to have sprung from the prejudices of his birth and education, and his blind faith in the principles of the old régime. B. at Paris, 1783; D. 1847.

POLIZIANO, or POLITIANUS, Angelo, po-liz-i-ai-nus, a learned Italian writer, whose poetical talents recommended him to the patronage of Lorenzo and Julian de' Medici, the former of whom made him tutor to his children. He discharged this trust so well as to be appointed professor of Greek and Latin at Florence. His principal works were, "History of the Confederacy of Puzzi," a Latin translation of Herodian, "Greek Epigrams," "Latin Epistles," "Bucolic Poems," a "Treatise on Anger," and "On Leo," the earliest form of the libretto of an opera extant. B. in Tuscany, 1454; D. 1494.

POLLOX, Robert, pol'-lok, a Scotch poet, who was educated for the church, but produced, before he had attained his 26th year, a very remarkable poem, entitled "The Course of Time." Upon the recommendation of Professor Wilson, Messrs. Blackwood, of Edinburgh, published the work, which attracted the most unqualified admiration in the religious world. It speedily ran through several editions; having in the year 1887 attained its twenty-first. The young poet's constitution was frail, and was undermined by his intense application. He was preparing to start for Italy, but D. at Southampton, 1827; B. in Renfrewshire, 1799.

POLO, Marco, pol'-lo, a celebrated old Venetian traveller, whose father and uncle left Venice in 1250 for Constantinople, travelled up the Euxine, and afterwards proceeded to Bokhara, where they acquired the Menzolian language; they next joined the suite of the Persian ambassador, with which the brothers proceeded to the court of Kubla Khan, in Chinese Tartary. The Venetians were well received by Kubla, who commissioned them to carry a letter to the pope, in which he asked that a hundred kamica men might be sent into his dominions. They arrived safely at Venice in 1269, after an absence of nineteen years. In 1272, the two brothers, and Marco Polo, the son of Nicolo, together with two Dominican friars, again set forth into the interior, from the coast of Syria; but the friars, becoming too frightened to proceed, left the three Venetians to prosecute by themselves their journey into central Asia. In 1275 they arrived at the camp of Kubla Khan, who soon afterwards dispatched Marco Polo on several missions to China and India; and Marco was thus the first European who visited China. In 1291 the three Venetians were permitted to accompany an embassy to Persia, and, after travelling through China, they embarked at Fo-Kien, and sailed thence for Persia. From Persia they set sail for Venice, which they reached in 1295. Venice was at that period at war with Genoa, and Marco Polo was placed in command of one of the war-galleys of the state; but, being taken prisoner, was conveyed to Genoa. While in captivity he dictated to a fellow-prisoner the narrative of his adventures. This MS. he afterwards corrected on regaining his liberty, and caused a French translation to be made of it. The work was published at Venice in 1550. It is one of the most interesting and valuable of the ancient works on geography. Marco Polo was B. about 1250; D. about 1323.

POLYÆNUS, pol'-i-æ-nus, a Macedonian, who wrote a work entitled "The Stratagems of War," dedicated to the emperors Antoninus and Verus. There are several editions of this book in Greek and Latin. It was translated into English by R. Sheppard, 1793. Flourished about the middle of the 2nd century A.D.

POLYBIUS, po-lib'-i-us, a Greek historian, whose father, Lycortas, was a distinguished Grecian general, and taught his son the principles of philosophy and policy. Philopomen was his instructor in the art of war. Polybius displayed great skill and courage in several expeditions during the war between the Romans and Perseus, king of Macedon. When that monarch was defeated, Polybius was taken prisoner and sent to Rome, where he gained the friendship of Scipio, whom he accompanied to the siege of Carthage, and to that of Numantium. Polybius, on the death of Scipio, was greatly afflicted, and retired into private life. Part only of his "Universal History" of his own time, in Greek, remains, which was translated into English by Sir Henry Spenser, in 1698. B. at Megalopolis in Arcadia, about 204 B.C.; D. about 122 B.C.

POLYCARP, pol'-i-karp, bishop of Smyrna, and a martyr of the Christian church, was the disciple of St. John the Evangelist. He made a journey to Rome in 160, to settle the controversy respecting the proper time for the celebration of Easter. On his return to Smyrna, in 160, he was condemned to the flames by the proconsul. His martyrdom is affectingly related in a letter from the church of Smyrna to the churches of Pontus; and there is also extant an epistle of his to the Philippians, published by Usher, with those of Ignatius, in 1617. p. 71.

POLYEETUS, pol-i-kle-tus, a sculptor of Sicily, in the Peloponnesus, who was the rival of Phidias. It is reported that Polyeetus, by way of convicting the critics, exhibited a statue for public animadversion, offering to correct the faults that should be noticed. On producing it a second time, amended exactly according to the errors which had been pointed out, he placed by it another, formed according to his own judgment. The observers unanimously approved this last, and censured the former; on which Polyeetus said, "That which you condemn, is your own work; that which you admire, is mine." Flourished about 410 B.C.

POLYDORUS VERGIL. (See VERGIL.)

POMBAU, Don Sebastian Joseph Carvalho, Marquis de, font-bai, a Portuguese statesman, who served during some time in the army; but abandoning a military life, retired to his estate until 1730. In 1745 he was sent ambassador to Vienna, where he married the Countess Daun, a relation of the famous marshal of that name. In 1750 he was appointed secretary for foreign affairs, and had the principal share in the administration. He displayed great talent, encouraged agriculture and commerce, placed the marine on a respectable footing, and instituted several excellent regulations; but he disgraced his public life by his avarice. He, however, distinguished himself by his honourable conduct after the earthquake which destroyed Lisbon in 1755. By his means the city was speedily restored, and the public calamity relieved. But his influence at court created him many enemies; and at length a conspiracy was formed against him and the king, which was discovered, and the authors and agents severely punished. Being suspicious that the Jesuits were concerned in this plot, he caused them to be expelled from the kingdom. On the death of Joseph II., in 1777, the power of Pombal was destroyed, and he was exiled from court. p. at Souza, Coimbra, 1689; p. at Pombal, 1782.

POMPEY, Francois, font-pei, a French writer, who published, among other learned works, "Treatise on the Funerals of the Ancients," "Pantheon Mysticum," and "An Account of the Heathen Mythology," of which the latter work gave an English translation without acknowledgment. p. 1618; p. 1634.

POMPEY, John, font-pei, an English and divine, who entered into orders, and obtained the living of Malton, in Bedfordshire. On account of a passage in his poem entitled "The Choice," Bishop Compton was for some time very much prejudiced against him. His poems possess little merit, but were once very popular. p. at Luton, 1667; p. 1703.

POMPEYNE, Jeanne Antoinette Polson, Marchioness, font-pei-ne, mistress of Louis XV., was the daughter of a butcher, and at an early age married M. D'Etholes, the nephew of the former general Normandy Townshend. While hunting in the forest of St. Germain, on the borders of which Townshend had held an estate, the king had an opportunity purposely afforded him of seeing Madame Pompadour, with whose charms he was immediately enamoured. She was created marchioness of Pompadour in 1745, and retained a complete ascendancy over the heart of Louis till her death. The marchioness is stated in her "Memoirs" to have taken a considerable share in the political affairs of her time, particularly the war of 1756. p. 1721; p. at Versailles, 1764.

POMPEIUS, CÆIUS, font-pei-yus, commonly called Pompey the Great, was the son of Pompey, an able general, under whom he studied the art of war, and with such success, that at the age of twenty-three he was fitted to command three legions, which he raised at his own expense, and with which he joined Sylla. Three years afterwards he recovered Sicily and Africa, and became so great a favourite with the army that Sylla recalled him. He obeyed the mandate, though his soldiers wished him to resist the orders of the dictator. Sylla received him with expressions of friendship, and saluted him with the appellation of Imperator; he also obtained the honours of a triumph. After the death of Sylla, Pompey compelled Lepidus to quit Rome; and brought the war against Sertorius in Spain to a victorious conclusion, for which he obtained a second triumph, p. 73, and, at the same time, was elected consul. In his consulate he restored the tribunes, exterminated the pirates, gained great advantages over Tigranes and Mithridates, and made numerous conquests in the East. After these exploits he entered Rome, and was honoured with a third triumph. But his glory and vain character procured him many enemies; to counteract whom he joined with Cæsar and Crassus in forming the first triumvirate, p. 69. To strengthen this alliance, he married Julia, daughter of Cæsar; but the two great men became rivals. The consequence of Pompey's being

On the death of Julia, he married Cornelia, daughter of Metellus Scipio, whom he associated with himself in the consulate. Cæsar held the government of Gaul, when the senate, at the solicitation of Pompey, passed a decree commanding him to quit the army, on pain of being declared an enemy to his country. War now broke out between the two generals, who encountered each other on the plains of Pharsalia, where Pompey was defeated, and fled, but was afterwards overtaken and killed. p. 101 B.C.; killed 48.

POMPIGNAN, Jean Jacques de France, Marquis of, font-pei-gnan, a French writer, who was admitted a member of the Academy in 1769; on which occasion he had the honour to deliver an inaugural discourse in defence of Christianity, which drew upon him a number of satires and lampoons from Voltaire and the other members of that society. His works consist of dramatic pieces, sacred odes, and discourses, a translation of Virgil's "Georgics," &c. p. at Montauban, 1769; p. 1784.

POMPIGNAN, Jean George de France de, brother of the preceding, was a prelate of the French church. He wrote—"Critical Essay on the Present State of the Republic of Letters;" on the Secular Authority in matters of Religion; "Scepticism convicted by the Prophecies:" "Religion avenged on Incredulity by Incredulity itself." B. at Montauban, 1716; D. 1790.

POMPONATIUS, Peter, pom'-po-nat'-shi-us, a learned Italian, who taught philosophy at Padua and other cities in Italy, with extraordinary reputation. In his book "De Immortalitate Animæ," printed at Bologna, in 1516, he maintained that a future state was no part of the Aristotelian philosophy, but a matter of religious faith. This position occasioned a violent controversy, and Pomponatius, though supported by Cardinal Bembo, was regarded as an atheist. B. at Mantua, 1482; N. 1535.

POMPONIUS LÆTUS, Julius, pom'-po'-ni-us, a name given to Peter of Calabria, who went to Rome, where he was distinguished for his talents, till he was falsely accused of conspiring against Pope Paul II. He then retired to Venice; but, after the death of Paul, returned to Rome, where he became suspected of atheism, on account of his enthusiasm for the ancient philosophy. His principal works are, "The Lives of the Cæsars," editions of Sallust, Pliny the Younger, and some of the works of Cicero; Commentaries on Quintilian, Columella, Virgil, &c. N. in Calabria, 1435; D. 1498.

POŃIATOWSKI, Stanislaus, Count, pom'-e-a-tow'-ske, a Polish nobleman, who distinguished himself as general of the Swedish army of Charles XII. It was through his bravery that Charles was enabled to effect his escape after the battle of Pultowa, and he afterwards succeeded in winning over the Porte to support the unfortunate monarch against the Russians. He subsequently returned to his native country, where King Augustus appointed him general of the royal guard and treasurer of Lithuania. He also enjoyed the favour of the elector of Saxony, who had succeeded to the kingdom of Poland. By that monarch he was appointed castellan of Cracow, one of the highest posts in the country. One of his sons became king of Poland, under the name of Stanislaus Augustus. B. 1678; D. 1762.

POŃIATOWSKI, Joseph, Prince, a distinguished Polish general, who at first served in the Austrian army, and when his countrymen rose against Russia, fought under Kosciuszko; but, upon the defeat of that general, Poniatowski sought a refuge at Vienna. When the French entered Warsaw, in 1806, he was appointed to the command of the Polish army which was to co-operate with the French against Russia. In 1812 Napoleon gave him the command of the 5th corps of the "grand army," which was composed of Poles. In the subsequent battles he distinguished himself by his skill and bravery, and covered himself with glory in the retreat from Moscow. Shortly before the battle of Leipzig he was created a marshal of France. N. at Warsaw, 1763; drowned in the Elster, 1813.

POSSONNET, Sir Frederick Cavendish, K.C.B., pou'-son-net, a distinguished cavalry officer and major-general in the British army, the second son of the Earl of Bessborough, was appointed to a cornetcy in the 10th dragoons in 1810, and after passing through the intermediate grades of rank, obtained a majority in the 23rd light dragoons in 1807. During the Peninsular war he had frequent opportunities of distinguishing himself, and was regarded as the beau idéal of a cavalry officer. At Talavera, Barossa, Vittoria, Salamanca, and Vittoria, he performed some most brilliant exploits, and during the whole of the retrograde movement of the army from the Douro, a day seldom passed without his being more or less engaged with the enemy's advance. He closed his career on the field of Waterloo, where, in the absence of his commanding officer, General Vandeleur, who had a few minutes before led forward the 16th light dragoons, he observed a French column rapidly advancing into the small valley which lay between the two armies. There was not a moment to lose; Colonel Ponsonby, calculating the column at about 100, exclaimed, "They must not be allowed to come farther," and with his well-known cry, "Come on, 12th!" dashed against the enemy, followed by his men. At the very moment when they had driven their opponents back into the enemy's lines, the colonel received a cut on his right arm, which caused his sword to drop, and immediately afterwards received another on his left, which he raised to protect his head. By the latter he lost the command of his horse, which galloped forward, and Colonel Ponsonby, unable to defend himself, received a blow from a sword on his head, which brought him senseless to the ground. There he lay, exposed on the field, during the whole of the ensuing night. After being pierced through the back by a lance, plundered by a French tirailleur, rode over by two squadrons of Prussian cavalry, and encumbered for some hours by a dying soldier lying across his legs, he was at length rescued by an English soldier, whom he persuaded to stay by him until morning, when a cart conveyed him to the village of Waterloo. He had received seven wounds, but ultimately recovered. He became a major-general in the army, K.C.B., and colonel of the royal dragoons, besides enjoying the honour of four foreign orders of knighthood. B. 1753; D. 1837.

POSTOPIDAN, Eric, pout-op'-pi-dan, an eminent Danish divine, who was professor of theology in the university of Copenhagen, and, in 1747, became bishop of Bergen. He wrote extensively upon the history and antiquities of his country. The most important of his works were,—"A History of the Reformation in Denmark," and another upon the History, Antiquities, and Migrations of the old Danish races. B. in Jutland, 1693; D. at Bergen, 1764.

POPE, Sir Thomas, pope, a patron of learning, received his education at Eton school, and afterwards studied the law. At the age of 28 he became treasurer of the Court of Augmentations, and was shortly afterwards appointed visitor of religious houses, in which situation he conducted himself with moderation. In 1540 he was knighted and made master of the jewel-house in the Tower. He was the intimate friend of Sir Thomas More, to whom, by order of the king, he communicated the sad tidings of his intended execution. In 1551 he founded Trinity College, Oxford. N. at Deddington, Oxfordshire, 1508; D. in London 1553.

a play, which was performed by the upper boys, the master's gardener representing Ajax. At the age of twelve, Pope retired with his parents to Binfield, in Windsor Forest, where his father had purchased an estate. Here he formed his intention of becoming a poet, and wrote his "Ode on Solitude," which appears as the first-fruits of his poetic genius. It was here also that he first met with the works of Waller, Spenser, and Dryden; but, on perusing Dryden, he abandoned the rest, and studied him as a model. In his sixteenth year he wrote his "Pastorals;" the "Essay on Criticism," "Rape of the Lock," and "Windsor Forest," quickly following. The "Essay on Criticism," notwithstanding the youth of the author, is one of the finest poems in the language, and contains the soundest rules; but his genius shone to greater advantage in his "Rape of the Lock," founded on the circumstance of Lord Petre's cutting off a lock of Mrs. Fermor's hair. About 1713, the poet being then in his twenty-fifth year, he published proposals for a translation of the "Iliad," in which he met with such great encouragement, that he was enabled to purchase a house at Twickenham, whither he removed with his parents in 1715. After completing the "Iliad," he undertook the "Odyssey," for which also he obtained a liberal subscription. He was,

SH-CESS AS WELL AS THE MERE OF HIS OWN, procured him numerous enemies among the inferior classes of writers, from whom he experienced frequent spleenetic attacks. His temper was too irritable and too little under control to permit his taking no notice of them; and in 1725 he vented his resentment in a mock heroic, entitled "The Iliad," in which he took more than warrantable revenge, and, what was worse, exposed to ridicule many worthy and gifted individuals who had given him no offence. In 1731, by the advice of Lord Bolingbroke, he employed his pen upon a moral and philosophical subject, the result of which was his "Essay on Man," an ethical poem addressed to that statesman. Of this work it is needless to speak; for, whatever may be thought of its leading principle, it possesses refined thoughts and substantial beauties. He next wrote satires, in which he attacked several persons of rank. Pope was engaged in preparing a complete edition of his works when he was carried off by asthma. In person Pope was small and crooked; yet there was much animation and elegance in his countenance, except when he was labouring under his hereditary complaint, the headache. His friendships appear to have been capricious, and he had no small portion of vanity in his disposition; to which, and self-interest, almost all considerations were readily sacrificed. The best editions of Pope are Warburton's, in 9 volumes, and those of Bowles and Roscoe. The latest and best memoir of the poet was recently brought out under the auspices of J. W. Croker and Mr. Peter Cunningham. n. in London, 1688; p. 1711.

POPPEA SABINA, pop-pe'a sa-bi'na. The most celebrated of this name was a Roman matron, who married a knight, by whom she had a son. Her personal charms captivated Octo, who was then one of Nero's favourites. He carried her away, and married her; but Nero, who had seen her accomplishments, soon deprived him of her, and sent him out of Italy. After he had taken this step, Nero repudiated his wife Octavia, and married Poppœa. The cruelty of the emperor did not, however, long permit her to share the imperial dignity. She died of a kick which she received from him when advanced in pregnancy, about 65 A.D.

POPEXONA, John Anthony Licinio Regillo, por-dai-no'-nai, an eminent Italian painter, so called from the place of his birth, was the disciple of Giorgione, and the rival of Titian. The emperor Charles V. conferred on him the honour of knighthood. n. 1583; p. 1539.

PORPHYRY, por-fi'-re, (PORPHYRUS, por-fi'-i-us), a platonic philosopher, who studied eloquence at Athens, under Longinus; and philosophy at Rome, under Plotinus, whose life he wrote. His learning was great, and he composed many works, one of which, against the Scriptures, was burnt by order of Theodosius the Great. n. at Tyre, 233; p. at Rome, 304.

PORPHYROGENITUS, por-fi-ro'-jen-i-tus (See CONSTANTINE VI.)

PORESENNA, or PORSENNA, por-sen'-na, or por'-se-na, ruler of Clusium, a city of Etruria, who declared war against the Romans because they refused to restore Tarquin to his throne. At first successful, he would have entered the gates of Rome, had not Horatius Coehus stood at the head of a bridge, and resisted the fury of the whole Etrurian army, while his companions behind were cutting off the communication with the opposite shore. (See COEHUS, Horatius.) This act of bravery astonished Porsenna; but when he had seen Mutius Scaevola, who had entered his camp with the intention of murdering him, burn his hand without emotion, to convince him of his fortitude, he no longer dared to make head against so brave a people. He made a peace with the Romans, and never after supported the claims of Tarquin. The story of Porsenna's attack upon Rome forms the subject of one of Lord Macaulay's "Lays of Ancient Rome."

PORSON, Richard, por'-son, a celebrated Greek scholar, who was the son of a parish clerk in Norfolk. Through the liberality of Mr. Norris, a gentleman of that county, he was enabled to pursue his studies at Eton. A similar act of liberality on the part of Sir George Baker was the means of his proceeding to Cambridge, where he continued his studies in a most distinguished manner till, in 1790, he was unanimously elected regius professor of Greek. Until the establishment of the London Institution, Porson struggled with poverty, having only the £10 a year afforded by his professorship to subsist upon; but on being appointed chief librarian to the last-named institution, with a salary of £200 per annum, his circumstances became comparatively easy. Although one of the greatest scholars England has produced, Porson published very little, his "Tracts and Miscellaneous Criticisms upon the Greek Writers," and his edition of the "Lexicon of Photius," being his most important efforts. n. at East Roston, Norfolk, 1730; p. 1804.

PORTA, James della, por'-ta, a celebrated Italian architect, who built the Gregorian chapel, several fine churches, and other structures, and finished the cupola of St. Peter's at Rome, in 1560. The Villa Aldobrandini, now called Belvedere, is one of his best works. n. at Milan, about 1530; p. at Rome about 1595.—His nephew, William della Porta, was an eminent sculptor, and restored the legs of the Farnese Hercules.

PORTA, John Baptist, a learned Neapolitan writer, who invented the camera obscura, and acquired a great reputation by his works on science, particularly mathematics, medicine, and natural history. He held assemblies of learned men in his house, which were condemned by the court of Rome, on the absurd charge that the object of their meetings was the discussion of magic. Some writers have claimed for Porta the discovery of the telescope; but the most competent critics admit that Galileo is the only person to whom that honour is due. His principal works are, "Treatise on Natural Magic," in Latin; another on Physiognomy, mixed with Astrology, and other delusions of his age. n. about 1550; p. 1615.

PORTAL, Antony, por'-tal, an eminent Italian physician, who went to reside at Paris, and there became the friend of Buffon, a member of the Academy of Sciences, professor at the College of France, and president of the Academy of Medicine. At the restoration he was appointed consulting physician to the king. He was an industrious writer, his most important publication being a "History of Anatomy and Surgery," first produced in 1773. n. 1742; p. 1832.

PORTER, Anna Maria, por'-ter, an English novelist, who, while a child, residing with her mother at Edinburgh, made the acquaintance of Sir Walter Scott, then in his youth. Her first attempts in fiction are said to have sprung from the suggestions of the future novelist, who used to relate stories to her. Her chief works are, "The Hungarian Brothers," "The Recluse of Norway," "The Village of Mariendorp," and "The Knight of St. John." She was also the authoress of a collection of ballad-romances, and other poems. n. at Durham, about 1781; p. near Bristol, 1832.

PORTER, Jane, an English novelist, was the sister of the preceding, and the authoress of "The Scottish Chiefs," "Thaddeus of Warsaw," "The Pastor's Fireside," "The Field of Forty Footsteps," &c. These novels display certain powers of description and skill in construction; but enjoy, at the present time, but little of the great popularity they once had. n. 1776; p. 1850.

PORTER, Sir Robert Ker, an English painter, and the brother of the two preceding novelists, produced some battle-pieces of an extraordinary size. His "Storming of Seringapatam," exhibited in the Strand in 1800, was 120 feet in length; "The Siege of Acre" and "The Battle of Agincourt" (hung in the Guildhall), were also of large dimensions. In 1804 he was appointed historical painter to the emperor of Russia, and painted the emperor of the Admiralty, the Great Admiral, at St. Petersburg. He went to Spain in 1808, and accompanied the army of Sir John Moore until the battle of Corunna: he was also a spectator of the great Russian campaign of Napoleon while in Russia, an account of which he published on his return to England. In 1813 he was created a knight by the Prince-regent. During the interval 1817-20 he travelled with his wife, the Princess Mary de Sherbatoff, in Georgia, Persia, and Armenia, and published a work on that tour in 1822. Several years later he obtained the appointment of British consul at Venezuela, which post he filled until the year 1841. During the concluding years of his life he painted few pictures, and those chiefly upon sacred subjects. n. at Durham, about 1778; p. at St. Petersburg, 1842.

PORTER, George Richardson, an eminent statistical writer, was educated for a commercial career; but meeting with ill-success in trade, he resolved to devote himself to statistical literature. In 1832 he received an appointment at the Board of Trade, and, in his various employments therein, displayed so much energy and intelligence, that he rose to a secretaryship of the board, at a salary of £1500 per annum, in 1841. He was one of the founders of the Statistical Society, and a constant contributor to its Journal. To the same body he was also elected treasurer, upon the retirement of Mr. Hallan in 1841. His most important work, entitled "The Progress of the Nation," was commenced in 1836, and completed about 1840; but several new and enlarged editions were subsequently put forth. His other works were a translation of Bastiat's "Popular Fallacies regarding General Interests," a section of "The Admiralty Manual of Scientific Engineering," edited by Sir J. F. Herschel, and a portion of the "Geography of Great Britain," published by the Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge; and the "Tropical Agriculturist." n. in London, 1792; p. at Tonbridge Wells, 1855.

PORRUS, Francis, por'-lus, an eminent Greek professor, who filled the chair of classical literature at Padua, Modena, and Ferrara. Having embraced the reformed faith, he quitted Italy and went to Geneva, where he obtained a professorship in 1562. His works are, additions to the Greek Dictionary of Constantine; commentaries upon Pindar, Thucydides, Longinus, Xenophon, and other ancient authors. n. in the island of Crete, 1511; p. at Geneva, 1581.

PORUS, por'-us, king of part of India, near the river Hydaspes, on the banks of which he was defeated by Alexander, who, asking him how he would be treated,— "As a king," said Porus. This answer so pleased the victor, that he not only restored to him his dominions, but added thereto several provinces. He was treacherously put to death by Eudamus, B.C. 317.

POSIDONIUS, pos-i-do'-ni-us, an astronomer of Alexandria, who flourished before Ptolemy, and undertook to ascertain the circumference of the earth, which he made to be 30,000 furlongs.—There was a Stoic philosopher of the same name, who was a native of Apamea, in Syria, and taught with reputation at Rhodes. Josephus charges him with having invented the calumny against the Jews, that they worshipped the head of an ass. Cicero makes several allusions to his writings. Flourished about 100 B.C.

POSTEL, Guillaume, pos'-tel, a French mystic, was sent by Francis I. into the East, to collect manuscripts, and on his return was appointed royal professor of mathematics and languages. He lost this post, however, in consequence of his extraordinary opinions, and went to Rome, where he turned Jesuit; but was expelled from the order and imprisoned, for maintaining that the authority of councils was superior to that of popes. On gaining his liberty he went to Venice, and formed an intimacy with an old woman who had given herself up to mystic reveries. Postel started the strange notion that women had been left without redemption, which was now accomplished by Mother Joan, the name of this visionary. For his wild fancies he was again imprisoned; but recovered his liberty, and returned to Paris. He afterwards wrote a retraction, and was restored to his professorship; but again relapsed, and was confined in a monastery. He wrote a great number of works on theology and the oriental languages. n. in Normandy, 1510; p. 1581.

POSTUMUS, Marcus Crassus Latianus, post-thu-mus, a Roman general, who was elected emperor in Gaul on the death of Valerian, in 231. He defeated the Germans in several actions, and displayed talents and virtues worthy of his dignity; but having refused to allow his soldiers to plunder Mayence, they rose against and slew him and his son, in 207.

POSTYKIN, Gregory Alexandrovitch, po-tyu'-kin, a Russian general favoured by Catharine II. He entered the cavalry of the Russian guard at an early age, and, having attracted the notice of Catharine, by his tall and handsome person, she made him minister of war; in which capacity he suggested the idea of taking the Crimea from the Turks. In 1787 he renewed the war against Turkey, and put himself at the head of the army. The year following he took Otshakof, and put its inhabitants to the sword. He acquired prodigious riches, was appointed field-marshal of Russia, grand hetman of the Cossacks, and possessed almost uncontrolled power. He was a man of debauched principles, and an inordinate egotism, which produced a disorder that carried him off. His remains were interred under a magnificent mausoleum at Cherson. He is said to have aspired to the duchy of Courland and to the kingdom of Poland. n. near Ask, about 1710;

POTR, pot, a name of St. Bartholomew's Hospital, and, in 1764, became fellow of the Royal Society. He invented some surgical instruments, and wrote a treatise on "Hernia," another on "Wounds of the Head," and "Observations on the Fistula Lachrymalis." n. in London, 1713; p. 1788.

POTTER, Paul, pot'-ter, an eminent Dutch painter, excelled in painting landscapes with cattle, and in representing the effect of the meridian sun upon objects. His "bull" is universally admired as an extraordinary piece of animal-painting; it is in the museum at the Hague. n. at Breuckelen, 1625; p. 1651.

POTTER, John, a learned English prelate who was educated at the University of Oxford pointed chaplain to Archbishop Tenison, he removed to Lambeth, and, in 1708, became regius professor of divinity. In 1715 he was preferred to the see of Oxford, whence, in 1737, he was translated to Canterbury. He wrote "Antiquities of Greece," "Discourse on Church Government," an edition of Clements Alexandrinus, and some theological works. n. in York-shire, 1674; p. 1747.

POTTER, Robert, a learned English divine, who made several excellent translations of classical authors, the most important of which were his Sophocles, Euripides, and Aeschylus. He was also the author of a vindication of Gray, the poet, against Dr. Johnson. n. 1729; p. 1804.

In 1839 he was further honoured by being created a baronet; and, upon the outbreak of war between England and China, was sent to the latter country as ambassador extraordinary. After acting with much decision in concert with Admiral Sir William Parker, he succeeded in obtaining from the Chinese authorities a treaty of commerce. At the conclusion of the war, he was nominated governor and commander-in-chief of Hong Kong, and knight grand-croix of the Bath. Upon his return to England, in 1844, the House of Commons voted him a pension of £1500 per annum. In 1846 he was appointed governor of the Cape of Good Hope, a post he vacated to assume the governorship and command-in-chief of the presidency of Madras, which he held till 1854. In all these employments he exhibited the best qualities of a public administrator. n. 1789; p. at Malta 18.

POUSSIN, Nicholas, poos'-sin, an eminent French painter, who studied in Italy, where he applied himself principally to landscape. On his return to France, in 1633, he was named first painter to Louis XIII., and provided with apartments in the Tuilleries. He was also appointed to ornament the gallery of the Louvre; but being thwarted in his plans while executing that great work, he went to Rome, and continued to reside there until his death. Eight fine pictures by him are in the National Gallery. A set of his pictures, entitled the "Seven Sacraments of the Church of Rome," are included in the collection of the earl of Ellesmere. n. at Amely, 1594; p. at French extraction, and whose real name was Bugnet; but he took that of Poussin, his sister having married Nicholas Poussin. His landscapes, particularly those which represent land-storms, are very fine. Six of his paintings are contained in the National Gallery. n. at Rome, 1603; p. at the same city 1675.

POWELL, Sir John, bart., an eminent and honest lawyer, was born of a very ancient and wealthy family at Penryn-y-naw, in the parish of Llanwrda, Carmarthenshire. He was a judge in the Court of King's Bench, in 1688, and distinguished himself so much by his integrity and alacry on the trial of the seven bishops, that James II. deprived him of his office, but he was restored to it at the Revolution, and sat there until his death, in 1696. In Hume's "Life of Jeremy Taylor" it is stated that he was a pious and distinguished man, and was offered the great seal of England if he would have decided against the bishops. When every effort to influence him against the bishops had failed, the court, it is said, made the same attempt upon his eldest son Thomas, who for many years represented the county of Carmarthen in Parliament, which reaching the judge's ears, he sent for him, and told him that if he accepted of any place, or the promise of any place under royal appointment, he should consider it as intended to bias his judgment, and would disinherit him; and, as to himself, he would rather live upon his cockle-bank at Langharne, than do anything so repugnant to his conscience.

POWELL, Rev. Baden, an eminent English mathematical professor, who received his education at Oriel College, Oxford, and, in 1827, became Savilian professor of geometry in the same university. During his long connexion with Oxford, he was one of the most energetic supporters of reform, and a constant advocate for the introduction of a more extensive system of teaching with respect to the natural sciences than was there pursued. The nature of his researches will be seen by an enumeration of his principal works or contributions to scientific journals. These are—"Elementary Treatise on Experimental and Mathematical Optics;" "Revelation and Science;" "The Connexion of Natural and Divine Truth; or, the Study of the Inductive Philosophy considered as subservient to Theology;" "Tradition Unveiled;" Essays on the Spirit of the Inductive Philosophy, the Unity of Worlds, the Philosophy of Creation, the Plurality of Worlds; a revised edition of Dr. Pereira's work upon "Light;" an "Historical View of the Mathematical Sciences," contributed to Dr. Lardner's "Cabinet Cyclopædia;" and a large number of papers on Natural Philosophy and Mathematics, furnished to the "Philosophical Transactions," the "Annals of Philosophy," the "Reports of the British Association," and "Taylor's Scientific Memoirs." He was the author of one of the "Essays and Reviews," a work which deeply agitated the religious world. b. in London 1796; d. 1850.

POWERS, Hiram, pot-ers, an eminent modern American sculptor, was the son of a small farmer in Windsor county, Vermont, U.S. On the death of his father, being left in poor circumstances, he was compelled to maintain himself by his own exertions. After finding employment in an hotel, a provision-store, and a clock-maker's shop, he made the acquaintance of a foreign artist, and, having from his youth been an adept at drawing, quickly learnt the art of modelling in plaster from his tutor. He then obtained employment in the Cincinnati Museum as a modeller in wax. Whilst thus engaged, he assiduously cultivated his artistic powers, and with so much success, that, in 1835, he was enabled to set himself up at Washington as a modeller of busts. Two years later he proceeded to Italy, which for a long period had been a cherished idea. In that land of art his progress was very rapid. The first work by which he acquired fame as a sculptor was an "Eve," in marble. In 1851, his "Greek Slave" was placed in the Great Exhibition of London, where it became an object of popularity to a most remarkable degree. From that period his fame became European, and he was everywhere admitted to be a highly-gifted representative of American art. His other works were, a "Fisherman," "La Penserosa," and a number of portrait busts of the most distinguished statesmen and public men of his native country. b. at Woodstock, in Vermont, U.S., 1805.

POWELL, Thomas, pow-nal, an English writer and politician, who, in 1753, went to America, and was appointed governor of New Jersey and afterwards of South Carolina. He returned to England in 1761, and, several years later, entered the House of Commons, where he opposed the war with America. He wrote a treatise on the "Antiquities of Roman Gaul," "Intellectual Physics," an essay on the "Nature of Being," a treatise on "Old Age," "Memorial to the Sovereigns of Europe," and other works. b. at Lincoln, 1722; d. at Bath, 1805.

POZZO DI BORGIO, Charles André, Comte, pot-ro de bor-go, a Corsican nobleman, who was sent, in 1793, as deputy to the National Assembly, to thank that body for having annexed Corsica to France; but afterwards returned to his native island, and struggled, in concert with General Paoli, for the establishment of a free government, under English protection. In 1797, the English having abandoned Corsica, he repaired to London, where he became the leader of the French refugees. In 1803 he went to Russia, and entered the diplomatic service of that country. The emperor Alexander appointed him his ambassador to Louis XVIII. in 1814, and, as the envoy of Russia, he took part in all the acts of the Holy Alliance. He was present, as Russian commissioner, at the battle of Waterloo, where he received a wound; and afterwards was one of those who suggested that Napoleon should be exiled from Europe. He represented the emperors Alexander and Nicholas at the court of France until the year 1834, when he returned to St. Petersburg. Shortly afterwards he resumed his former post at Paris, and in 1835 repaired to London as ambassador extraordinary of the czar. In 1839 he retired from public affairs, and took up his residence at Paris. b. at Ajaccio, Corsica, 1761; d. at Paris, 1842.

PRATT, Winthrop Mackworth, praid, an English poet and prose writer of celebrity, who commenced his literary career by contributing to the "Edinburgh," and "Knights' Quarterly Magazine." He was called to the bar in 1820, and in the following year entered parliament, where he offered a resolute opposition to the Reform Bill. A complete edition of his works appeared in 1861. b. 1802; d. 1830.

PRATT, Samuel Jackson, prut, a novelist, poet, and miscellaneous writer, in early life went on the stage, but relinquished that pursuit, and subsequently became an itinerant lecturer, a bookseller, and, lastly, an author by profession. He settled at Bath, where, under the fictitious appellation of Courtney Melmoth, he published several novels and poems. The principal of his poems were, "The Tears of Genius, on the Death of Goldsmith," "Sympathy," and "Landscapes in Verse." His best novels were, "Liberal Opinions," "Emma Corbett," "The Pupils of Pleasure," and "Family Secrets." Besides these works, he published "Gleanings through Wales, Holland, and Westphalia," "Gleanings in England," "Harvest Home," "The Fair Circassian," a tragedy; and some others. b. 1799; d. 1814.

PRATT, Charles. (See CAMDEN, Earl of.)

PRAXAGORAS, prax-ag-o-ras, a Greek historian, who was a native of Athens, and wrote a history of the sovereigns of that country, and another of Constantine; also one of Alexander the Great. Flourished about 315.

PRAXITELES, prax-il-e-les, a celebrated Grecian sculptor, who executed several fine statues, in bronze and marble, of Bacchus, a satyr, Venus, and Apollo. An ancient copy of one of his works, the "Apollo Sauroctonus," is the only example of his genius extant. He excelled in the grace, tenderness, and finish of his works, and was esteemed as second to Phidias only. Phryne, a celebrated Thespian courtesan, was his mistress, and served as the model for his statues of Venus. He also executed a series called "The Labours of Hercules," for the temple erected to that hero at Thebes. Two of his sons acquired fame as sculptors. Praxiteles is supposed to have been b. about 360 B.C.; p. about 280 B.C.

PRESOTT, William Hickling, pres'-tot, a celebrated American historian, who came of a New England family of high honour. His grandfather, Colonel William Prescott, commanded the American forces at Bunker's Hill; his father was an eminent judge at Boston. In 1811 he was sent to Harvard University, where he graduated in 1814. While at college, he was deprived by an accident of the use of one eye; and the sight of the other became so impaired as to compel him to abstain from any lengthened course of study. Happily, his father's circumstances were such as to preclude the necessity of his toiling for bread. He early determined to devote himself to a life of literature. Soon after quitting college, being advised to travel, he went to Europe, and spent two years in an extended journey through England, France, and Italy. At the end of that time he returned to his native country with restored health, but with no great improvement in the state of his eyes. His marriage took place soon after, and from this period his days flowed on in diligent and uneventful devotion to literary pursuits. But he laboured at his task under circumstances which would have crushed many men. "While at the university," he says, "I received an injury in one of my eyes which deprived me of the sight of it. The other, soon after, was attacked by inflammation so severely that for some time I lost the sight of that also; and though it was subsequently restored, the organ was so much disordered as to remain permanently debilitated; while twice in my life since I have been deprived of the use of it for all purposes of reading or writing for several years together. It was during one of these periods that I received from Madrid the materials for my History of Ferdinand and Isabella; and in my disabled condition, with my transatlantic treasures lying around me, I was like one pining from hunger in the midst of abundance. In this state I resolved to make the ear, if possible, do the work of the eye. I procured the services of a secretary, who read to me the various authorities; and, in time, I became so far familiar with the sounds of the different foreign languages (to some of which, indeed, I had been previously accustomed by a residence abroad) that I could comprehend his reading without much difficulty. As the reader proceeded, I dictated copious notes; and when these had swelled to a considerable amount, they were read to me repeatedly, till I had mastered their contents sufficiently for the purpose of composition." But the difficulties of composition had yet to be overcome. Dictation was at first tried; but finding that he could not attain the force and freedom he required, he was compelled to relinquish that mode. A writing-case for the blind was obtained from London, and "with this instrument," continues Prescott, "I have written every word of my historicals. This modus exposes me to some embarrassment, for as one cannot see what he is doing on the other side of the paper, any more than a performer on the treadmill sees what he is grinding on the other side of the mill, it becomes very difficult to make corrections. This requires the subject to be pretty thoroughly canvassed in the mind, and all blots and erasures to be made then, before taking up the stylus. This compels me to go over my composition to the extent of a whole chapter, however long it may be, several times in my mind before sitting down to my desk. When there, the work becomes one of memory rather than of creation, and the writing is apt to run off glibly enough." In 1834 the first of the historical works composed under so many difficulties was produced, under the title of "The History of Ferdinand and Isabella the Catholic of Spain." The work became universally successful, and was translated into French, Spanish, and German. Its author was immediately elected a member of the Royal Academy of Madrid. Prescott's literary industry was not checked by the success of his first work. He immediately devoted himself to the delineation of another brilliant period in the history of Spain, the fruits of which appeared in 1843, in a work in three volumes, called "The History of the Conquest of Mexico," which was received with even greater favour than that which had greeted the "History of Ferdinand and Isabella." The literary world recognised in it the same careful research, the same accuracy of statement, the same persuasive sweetness and beauty of style. In 1847 he published the "History of the Conquest of Peru," a work of kindred and commensurate excellence to that of the "History of the Conquest of Mexico." The historian next devoted himself with unabated ardour to the preparation of a work of wider range and broader scope,—the "History of the Reign of Philip II." He had become one of the great literary names of the age, and everywhere both public and private collections were thrown open to him. It was while preparing himself for the composition of the last-mentioned work that he paid a brief visit to England, where he was cordially received by individuals of the highest literary and social distinction, and where the favourable impression created by his works was confirmed by his prepossessing manners and appearance. He took ample time for the task which he destined to be the great performance of his life. The first two volumes of the work appeared in 1855; and the highest expectations formed by the public were justified. In the following year he produced an edition of Robertson's "Charles V.," to which notes and a supplement, containing an account of the emperor's life after his abdication, were added. In the last year of his life he published the third volume of his "History of Philip," which, unfortunately, did not complete the work. His other works consist of essays upon Italian, Spanish, English, and American literature, and a memoir of Brockden Brown, the American novelist. He obtained the highest acknowledgments of literary distinction. The University of Oxford, in 1850, conferred upon him the degree of doctor of laws. In 1845 he received the highest of all distinctions of its kind, in being elected a corresponding member of the class of moral and political philosophy in the French Institute, succeeding Navarette, the Spanish historian. Of most of the learned societies of Europe he was a member. b. at Salem, Massachusetts, 1796; d. 1859.

OF BIOGRAPHY.

Price

PRICE, Richard, price, an English dissenting minister and political writer, who, at the commencement of the American war, distinguished himself by his zeal on behalf of republicanism, and published pamphlets on "Civil Liberty" and "Civil Government," for which he received the thanks of the city of London. He also wrote "Observations on the National Debt," in which he endeavoured to prove that the kingdom was on the eve of bankruptcy. Soon after the breaking out of the French revolution, he preached a discourse at the Old Jewry, in which he exulted over the misfortunes of the royal family of France, in such a manner as to call forth the keen animadversions of Burke. His principal works were, "On the Importance of Christianity," "A Review of the Principal Questions and Difficulties in Morals," "Discussion of the Doctrines of Materialism and Necessity, in a Correspondence with Dr. Priestley." b. at Tynton, Glamorganshire, 1723; d. 1791.

PRICE, Rev. Thomas, a distinguished Welsh scholar, whose life was passed as pastor to different congregations of his countrymen. The object of his life was to rescue Welsh literature from the neglect into which it had fallen. In 1829 he made a tour in Brittany, and published an interesting account of that country. His principal works are,—“An Essay on the Influence which the Welsh Traditions have had on the Literature of Europe,” a “Critical Essay on the Language and Literature of Wales,” “History of Wales and the Welsh Nation, from the early ages to the death of Llewelyn ap Gruffyd,” and an Essay upon the “Comparative Merits of the Remains of Ancient Literature in the Welsh, Irish, and Gaelic Languages.” b. in Brecknockshire, 1757; d. 1818.

PRICHARD, Rees, pritch-ard, a Welsh divine and poet, who was educated at the University of Oxford, and spent his life as a rural pastor in his native country. His poems in Welsh, on religious subjects, have been often printed, and are very popular in Wales. b. about 1574; d. 1644.

PRICHARD, James Cowles, an eminent English physician and ethnologist, who received his education for the medical profession at Edinburgh, and to that subject his attention continued to be devoted till, in 1813, his “Physical History of Mankind” was produced. In that work, not only anatomy and physiology, but also philology, was introduced, to form a systematic history of the races of mankind. This work has been several times reprinted, has been translated into French and German, and is generally admitted to be one of the best works of its class. Dr. Prichard also devoted much attention to the study of nervous and mental diseases, and was appointed visiting physician to the Gloucestershire Lunatic Asylum, and in 1845 became one of the commissioners of lunacy. He was fellow of the Royal, and president of the Ethnological Society, and, upon the installation of the late duke of Wellington as chancellor of the University of Oxford, Dr. Prichard was nominated M.D. of that seat of learning. His principal works were, “On the Crania of the Laplanders and Finlanders,” “On the Eastern Origin of the Celtic Language,” “An Analysis of Egyptian Mythology,” “On the Different Forms of Insanity in relation to Jurisprudence,” and a “Review of the Doctrines of the Vital Principle.” b. at Ross, Herefordshire, 1785; d. in London, 1818.

PRIDEAUX, John, pre-do, a learned English prelate, who was admitted to Exeter College, Oxford, of which he became fellow, and, on the death of Dr. Holland, was chosen rector. He was afterwards appointed regius professor of divinity, in which he displayed considerable talents. He also served the office of vice-chancellor, and in 1611 was advanced to the bishopric of Worcester; but was deprived of the revenues in the civil war. He wrote extensively upon grammar, logic, and theology, and was described as “a plentiful fountain of all sort of learning.” b. in Devonshire, 1578; d. 1651.

PRIDEAUX, Humphrey, a learned English divine, who, in 1676, published, under the title of “Marmora Oxoniensia,” an account of the Arundel marbles, with a comment on them, which gained him great reputation; it also procured him the patronage of chancellor Finch, who gave him a living at Oxford. In 1681 he was promoted to a prebend of Norwich, of which cathedral he became dean in 1702. Being disabled from public duty, through an ill-performed surgical operation, he devoted himself to composition, and produced his “Conjunction of the Old and New Testament,” an admirable work, which was translated into several languages, and passed through numerous editions. Besides the above works, he was the author of “Directions to Churchwardens,” “The Life of Mahomet,” “The Original Right of Tithes.” b. in Cornwall, 1648; d. 1724.

PRIDEMAN, Vincent, preed-man, the founder of the hydropathic system, or system of curing diseases by water, was the son of a farmer in Austrian Silesia, and, after receiving some education in the town school, was put to the work of the farm. After remaining at this employment for several years, his mind was turned to the subject of the “water-cure” by a singular accident. One day, while taking a cart loaded with barley to the fields, the horse became restive, bit him with his teeth, and, throwing him down, dragged the cart over his body. Two of his ribs were broken, and a medical man declared that, even if he recovered, he would remain a cripple for life. The future water-doctor, however, contrived, by placing himself in a certain position, so to expand his lungs, that his ribs were replaced; while, with a copious use of cold water, he kept down the inflammatory symptoms. In a short time he was quite recovered, and then commenced applying, in other cases, the treatment which he had proved so beneficial in his own. He studied medicine, and, in time, formed an establishment at Gräfenberg, which was soon resorted to from all parts of Germany. Between the years 1829 and 1843 he had treated 1050 patients successfully, using neither medicine, bleeding, nor blistering. Water, open air, exercise, plain diet, and cheerful society, were his only remedies. b. 1799; d. 1851.

PRIESTLEY, Joseph, preed-lee, an English natural philosopher and theologian, who, at the age of 22, became assistant minister to an Independent congregation at Needham Market, in Suffolk; after which he was chosen pastor of a congregation at Nantwich, in Cheshire, where he also kept a school. In 1761 he removed to Warrington, as tutor in the belles-lettres in the academy there. His connexion with that institution ended in 1767, when he accepted an invitation from the dissenters at Leeds, where he published several theological works, which attracted considerable notice and led to a sharp controversy. In 1773 he went to reside with the earl of Shelburne as librarian and companion. Several years afterwards he appeared as a champion of the doctrine of philosophical necessity, in which he had his friend Dr. Price for an opponent. While thus engaged in metaphysical and theological disputations, he pursued his philosophical inquiries with ardour; the result of which appeared in the "Philosophical Transactions," and in separate publications, particularly his "Experiments and Observations on Different Kinds of Air." His engagements with Lord Shelburne having been brought to an end, Dr. Priestley, with a pension of £150 a year, retired to Birmingham, where he became pastor of a congregation of Unitarian dissenters in 1780. He there published several of his works; as, "Letters to Bishop Newcome on the Duration of Christ's Ministry," and the "History of the Corruptions of Christianity." This last brought him into a controversy with Dr. Horsley. Dr. Priestley, however, still persevered, and published his "History of Early Opinions concerning the Person of Christ." In 1791 a riot happened at Birmingham, owing to an imprudent meeting of some of his friends to celebrate the destruction of the Bastille. Several houses were pulled down and burnt, and Dr. Priestley's among the rest; by which he lost his library, manuscripts, and philosophical apparatus. In consequence of this disgraceful transaction, he retired to London, and for some time officiated as pastor to the Unitarian congregation at Hackney, of which Dr. Price had been minister. But his mind being greatly depressed by late events, he went to America in 1794, and settled at Northumberland, in the state of Pennsylvania. He was a fellow of the Royal Society, and of other learned bodies in different parts of the world. He lived to see his phlogistic system of chemistry universally exploded; yet he persisted in defending it to the last. He was also equally tenacious of his Socinianism. His writings are too various to be enumerated. The principal and best are his "Charts of History and Biography," his "History of Electricity," the "History and Present State of Discoveries relating to Vision, Light, and Colours," lectures on the "Theory and History of Language," and on the "Principles of Oratory and Criticism." n. near Leeds, 1773; n. in America, 1804.

PRIOR, Don Juan, Marquis de los Castillejos, prior, a Spanish general and statesman, who took an active part on the side of Isabella II. in the civil war that followed her accession. Like most of the Spanish statesmen of his time, he was sometimes in favour and sometimes in disgrace, until his trial and imprisonment for alleged high treason compelled him to retire awhile from public life. In 1833-54 he fought on the side of Turkey in the Russian war, and in 1859-60, greatly distinguished himself in the war between Spain and Morocco, for which he was made a marquis and grandee of Spain, in 1861. In 1866 and 1867, he headed two movements against the government of Isabella II., but was compelled through their utter failure to leave Spain. He was not, however, destined to be long an exile, for in 1868 the troops and navy declared against the queen, who retired to France. Prior then became minister for war in the provisional government, and held the same post, with that of prime minister, during the regency of Serrano. n. 1814.

PRINGLE, Thomas, a Scotch poet and writer of works of travel, was the son of a farmer, and was educated at the grammar-school of Kelso and the university of Edinburgh. After publishing several minor effusions, he started the "Edinburgh Monthly Magazine," having among his coadjutors Lockhart, Dr. Brewster, Hogg, and Wilson. In the first number appeared an article on the "Gipsies," gratuitously supplied by Scott. This magazine afterwards became the property of the Messrs. Blackwood, and in time its title was changed to that of "Blackwood's Magazine." Pringle had, however, separated from the periodical, and after experiencing some pecuniary embarrassments, he, in 1820, went out with his brothers, who were farmers, to the Cape of Good Hope. The family of the Pringles had accompanied them, and soon a tolerably prosperous community was formed. Through the influence of Scott and others, he subsequently obtained the post of librarian to the government at Cape Town. He also set up an academy, and started a newspaper, and was apparently on the high road to fortune, when his print, "The South-African Journal," having been declared by the governor to contain a libel upon him, Pringle fell under the ban of the government authorities, and in time became ruined in his prospects. In 1826 he repaired to London, and sought to obtain the sum of £1000 as compensation for his losses, but without success. The remaining years of his life were spent as a working literary man. His chief works were, "A Narrative of a Residence in South Africa," "An Account of English Settlers in Albany, South Africa," and several small collections of poems. His two works on Africa are exceedingly interesting, and give a picturesque, but at the same time truthful narrative, of what the author had seen. His poetry is fluent and pleasing. n. at Blacklaw, Teviotdale, 1789; n. 1831.

PRIESTER, James, print-sep, an eminent Oriental scholar, who went out to India at an early age as a subordinate in the Mint department at Benares. In that city he collected a valuable mass of observations, which he published in an important work, entitled "Sketches of Benares." In 1832 he was appointed editor of the "Journal of the Asiatic Society," which was produced at Calcutta, to which place he had some time previously removed. In 1832 he succeeded Wilson as secretary of the Asiatic Society. One of the most important of his later researches was the deciphering of some inscriptions which had baffled all previous Oriental scholars. He likewise devoted himself to a profound study of Bactrian coins, and by his enlightened and indefatigable efforts succeeded in obtaining an almost unbroken series, from the days of the successors of Alexander the Great to modern times. He likewise furnished articles on chemistry, Indian antiquities, and numismatics to the journal of which he was the editor. n. 1800; n. 1840.

Cross, who sent him to Westminster school, but afterwards took him home with the intention of bringing him up to his own business. Prior, nevertheless, still pursued his classical studies as occasion permitted, which proved the means of his advancement; for happening to explain a disputed passage in Horace, to some company at his uncle's house, the earl of Dorset, one of the party, became his patron, and sent him to St. John's College, Cambridge, of which he was chosen fellow. In 1697 he wrote, in conjunction with the Hon. Charles Montague, afterwards earl of Halifax, a burlesque upon Dryden's "Hind and Panther," in a poem entitled the "Story of the Country Mouse and City Mouse." The earl of Dorset introduced him to court after he left the university; and in 1699 he was appointed English secretary to the congress at the Hague, and gave so much satisfaction that King William made him gentleman of his bed-chamber. In 1697 he was secretary at the treaty of Ryswick; in 1700 he was for a short time secretary of state. In 1713 he was appointed secretary to the embassy in France; and had not been long there, when, going to see the curiosities at Versailles, the officer in attendance showed him the fine paintings by Le Brun of the victories of Louis XIV., asking at the same time whether King William's actions were also to be seen in his palace: "No sir," answered Prior, "the monuments of my master's actions are to be seen everywhere but in his own house." In 1715 he was arrested by order of the House of Commons, and committed to prison. He was even excepted from the act of grace; but, in 1717, he recovered his liberty without being brought to trial. Besides his poems, which are easy, lively, and elegant, he wrote the "History of his Own Times," n. either in Dorsetshire or London, 1684; n. at Wimpole, Cambridge-hire, 1721.

PRISCIANUS, pris'-i-an-us, an eminent Roman grammarian, whose work, "De Arte Grammatica," is the most complete ancient treatise on the subject extant. His works were printed by Aldus Manutius, at Venice, in 1476. From several expressions in his works, he is believed to have been a Christian. He was so exact in his judgment and criticism, that to "break Priscian's head" became a proverb for false grammar. Flourished in the 6th century.

PROBUS, pro'-bus, a Roman emperor, who, from being a common soldier, rose to the highest military rank. After the death of the emperor Tacitus in 276, the Eastern army proclaimed Probus, as the reward of his valour and integrity. He was also acknowledged by the senate; after which, he turned his arms against the Gauls and Goths, whom he completely subdued. He next defeated the Samaritans, and made an advantageous peace with Persia. The interval of peace he employed in rebuilding cities and occupying his soldiers in useful works. The Persians again taking up arms, Probus prepared to attack them, but was murdered by his troops at Sirmium, in 282. n. 232.

PROCIDA, Giovanni di, pro-che'-da, an Italian gentleman, lord of the island of Procida, who distinguished himself as physician to the emperors Frederic II. and Conrad IV., both of whom loaded him with honours and possessions. Having been despoiled of a great portion of his wealth by Charles of Anjou, he formed the resolution of depriving him of his crown, and placing it upon the head of Peter III., king of Arragon. With infinite subtlety, he organized a conspiracy against Charles in 1232, and was one of the prime movers of the great massacre of all the French in Sicily, known in history under the name of the "Sicilian Vespers." He became, at a subsequent period, the confidential adviser of the Arragonese princes of Sicily. n. about 1225; n. about 1293.

PROCLUS of CONSTANTINOPLE, pro'-klus, a Platonic philosopher, who wrote against the Christian religion, and in one of his works sought to prove that the world is eternal. He also composed Commentaries upon Plato, and other works. n. at Athens, 455.

PROCORIUS, pro'-ko'-pi-us, a Greek historian, whom Justin I. took into his confidence, honoured him with the title of Illustrious, and appointed him secretary to Belisarius. He wrote a "History of the Wars of the Persians, the Gauls, and the Goths," also a "Secret History." The best edition of his works is that of Lonn (in the series of Byzantine Historians) 1835. Flourished about the 6th century.

PROCORIUS of GAZA, a Greek rhetorician and theologian, who wrote commentaries on the books of the Kings and Chronicles, and on Isaiah, printed in Greek and Latin. Flourished about 520.

PROCTER, Bryan Waller, prok'-ter, a modern English poet, generally known under the pseudonym of Larry Cornwall. He was educated for the legal profession, and, during many years, held an important appointment as one of the commissioners of lunacy. His first volume of poems was produced in 1819, under the title of "Dramatic Scenes, and other Poems." His "English Songs," Memoir and Essay prefixed to an edition of Shakespeare, "Marston Colonna," and others, evinced, in their author, the posses-which was produced at Covent-garden Theatre, was highly successful. A collection of some charming essays and tales in prose by him was published in America. n. about 1790.

PROTICUS, prod'-i-k-us, a sophist and rhetorician, who taught at Athens, and had for disciples Euripides, Socrates, Isocrates, and Xenophon. The Athenians put him to death, on pretence that he corrupted the morals of their youth. Flourished 435 b.c.

PROPERTIUS, Sextus Aurelius, pro-per'-sh-i-us, an eminent Latin poet, who was the esteemed friend of Mæcenas, Ovid, and Tibullus. His elegies are usually printed with those of Catullus. A translation of them by "Oxford Hands" appeared in 1835. n. about 50 b.c.; n. 16 b.c.

PROTAGORAS, pro-tay'-o-ras, a Greek philosopher of Abdera, who was at first a porter. He became the disciple of Democritus, to whose system he added remarks, doubting whether the gods existed or not, for which his books were burnt at Athens, and the author banished. Flourished in the 5th century b.c.

PROTOGENES, pro-tay'-e-nees, a celebrated Greek painter, who was the rival of Apelles, but there existed a close friendship between them. Flourished about 332 b.c.

PROUDHON, Pierre Joseph, prood'-awn, a modern French writer on political economy, who acquired considerable notoriety in 840 by publishing a work entitled "What is Property?" a question which he himself answered in the first line of his work as follows: "All Property is Robbery." His other works, which are principally remarkable for their Utopian and impracticable character, are, "The Solution of the Social Problem," and a "System of Contradictions in Political Economy." In 1849 he attempted to form a "People's Bank" at Paris; but the scheme was broken up by the condemnation of M. Proudhon to three years' imprisonment, for alleged libel; upon which he took to flight but returned soon after and submitted to his sentence, and regained his liberty in 1852. For a pamphlet directed against the government of Napoleon III. and the Romish church, in 1853, he was again sentenced to a fine and imprisonment, on which he retired to Brussels, where he remained till his death in 1865. n. 1849.

PROUT, Samuel, an eminent English water-colour painter, who was the companion of Haydon in their student days; but, unlike that ambitious artist, Prout drew from nature "the ivy-mantled bridges, mossy water-mills, and rock-built cottages which characterize the valley scenery of Devon." He was fortunate enough to attract the notice of John Britton the antiquary, and accompanied him as draughtsman in a tour through Cornwall. In 1805 he went to London, where he maintained himself by executing drawings for the print-sellers of the metropolis, and by teaching. In time he won a high position, and began to produce his remarkable lithographic facsimiles of drawings made upon the continent of Europe. The most important of these were "Sketches made in Flanders, Germany, France, Switzerland, Italy, &c." He also wrote "Hints on Light and Shade, Composition, &c." n. at Plymouth, 1783; p. 1832.

PRUDENTIUS, Clemens Aurelius, syn-ten-ah-ius, a Latin poet, who was successively an advocate, a magistrate, and a soldier, and distinguished himself in all these professions. His Latin poems were printed by Elzevir in 1667, with the notes of Heinsius. Flourished in the 4th century.

PRYNNER, William, prin, an eminent English lawyer, who, in 1632, was tried in the Star Chamber for writing a libel against the queen, under the title of "Histriomastix; or, a Discourse on Stage Plays." For this he was sentenced to stand in the pillory, to lose both his ears, and to pay a fine of £3000. In another pamphlet he attacked Laud and the bishops, for which he was condemned to lose the remainder of his ears, to pay a fine of £5000, to be branded on both cheeks, and to be imprisoned for life. These atrocious sentences were rigidly carried into effect. The House of Commons released him in 1641. He sat in the Long Parliament; but, though he had been active in promoting the rebellion, he was an enemy to Cromwell, who caused him to be imprisoned. At the Restoration he was made keeper of the records in the Tower. He wrote a very large number of books, chiefly on politics and religion; also the "History of Archbishop Laud," and the "Lives of Kings John, Henry III., and Edward I." n. at Swainswick near Bath, 1600; p. 1631.

PSALMANAZAR, George, sal-man-az-ar, a notorious impostor, who is supposed to have been a native of France. After obtaining a good education in a monastery, he went to Germany, where he pretended to be a Japanese converted to Christianity. Being reduced to distress, he entered a Scotch regiment in Flanders, the chaplain of which brought him to England, where he passed for a native of Formosa, and, to support the character, lived upon raw flesh. He wrote a pretended Formosan grammar, and a history of that island, which imposed upon many learned persons. At length the deceit was discovered, and Psalmanazar was abandoned by his patrons. He next engaged with the booksellers in compiling the "Ancient Universal History," his share of which shows considerable erudition. His latter years made ample amends for his former irregularities. n. about 1679; p. in London, 1753.

PTOLEMY LAGUS, or SOTER, fol'-e-me, first Greek king of Egypt, was the natural son of Philip of Macedon. He was the favourite and one of the best generals of Alexander the Great, on whose death he obtained Egypt, Libya, and part of Arabia, to which, on the death of Perdiccas, he added Cæle-Syria, Phœnicia, Judæa, and the Isle of Cyprus. He made Alexandria his capital, where he built a lighthouse called the Pharos, as a guide to pilots for that harbour. He encouraged literature and formed an academy, with a museum, at Alexandria. Ptolemy is said to have written the "Life of Alexander the Great," and other works, which are lost. p. 283 B.C.

c PHILADELPHUS, son and successor of the above, obtained his surname (which signifies brother-loving) in ridicule, for having put to death his two brothers. Ptolemy formed an alliance with the Romans. He was a great encourager of commerce, for which purpose he built a city on the Red Sea. He also constructed considerable fleets, both there and in the Mediterranean. He was a liberal patron of learned men, and caused the Scriptures to be rendered into Greek, in that version called the Septuagint. p. 247 B.C.

PTOLEMY EUGENETES, the son and successor of the preceding, declared war against Sel Callinicus, to avenge the death of his sister Berenice. Ptolemy made himself master of Syria and Cilicia, and was extending his conquests when the news of a revolt called him to Egypt. He soon quelled the insurgents, and by the prudence of his reign acquired the name of "Euergetes," or benefactor. He was poisoned by his own son, 222 B.C.

PTOLEMY PHILOPATOR ("father-loving"), ironically so called, from his crafty in poisoning his father. He also put to death his mother, brother, uncle, and sister, and is said to have exposed a number of Jews, on a plain, to the fury of his elephants; but those animals, instead of destroying the intended victims, fell upon the Egyptians; on which the tyrant, out of fear, conferred great favours on the Jewish nation. p. 205 B.C.

PTOLEMY EPIPHANES, or "Illustrious," succeeded his father Philopator, and, at the age of 11, assumed the reins of government. During his minority, Antiochus the Great conquered large portions of his kingdom; but afterwards restored them to Ptolemy, when he gave him his daughter in marriage. Ptolemy was poisoned B.C. 181.

PTOLEMY PHILOMETOR, son and successor of the preceding, having declared war against Antiochus Epiphanes, was taken prisoner by him. The Egyptians then placed Physcon, his brother, on the throne, whom Antiochus deposed, and restored Philometor, who died of a wound received in battle against Alexander Balas, king of Syria, B.C. 146.

PTOLEMY PHRYGON, so called from the prominence of his belly, succeeded his brother Philometor, and was a cruel and sensual tyrant. On account of the persecutions which they endured, the people of Alexandria emigrated into Asia; and his subjects having revolted against him, he murdered his son Memphitis from suspicion. D. 117 B.C.

PTOLEMY LATHYRUS ("gray pea"), so called from an excrescence on his nose resembling a pea, succeeded his father Physcon; but was soon after driven to Cyprus by his mother Cleopatra, who gave the crown to her son, Ptolemy Alexander. Lathyrus having mustered an army, invaded Judæa, and committed great cruelties on the Jews; after which he marched to Egypt, but was unsuccessful. On the death of Alexander he ascended the throne. D. 81 B.C.

PTOLEMY AULETES, whose surname he obtained from his skill in playing on the flute, was the illegitimate son of the preceding, and ascended the throne after the death of his father. He ceded Cyprus to the Romans, with a large tribute, which so displeased his subjects, that they revolted, and placed his daughter Berenice on the throne. By the help of his allies, he recovered his dominions, and put his daughter to death. D. 51 B.C.

PTOLEMY DIONYSIUS, or BACCHUS, king of Egypt, the son of the preceding, ascended the throne with his sister Cleopatra, whom he married, according to the will of his father. Pompey the Great, who had been his guardian, fled into Egypt after his defeat at Pharsalia, and was murdered by him. Ptolemy, who was no more faithful to Cæsar than he had been to his rival, was drowned in the Nile, after being defeated by the Romans, B.C. 48.

PTOLEMY, Claudius, an eminent Egyptian geographer and mathematician, is celebrated for his "System of the World," in which he placed the earth as the centre of the system, round which sun, planets, and stars revolved. His "Geography" describes the whole world as it was known in his day, and was the great textbook of the science of which it treats until the 15th century, when the discoveries of the Venetians and Portuguese demonstrated its errors. A small but correct edition of this curious work was published in the "Tauchnitz Classics," in 1843. A very curious map, giving a view of Ptolemy's known world, was furnished by Goselin, in his "Researches upon the Geography of the Ancients," published at Paris 1813. Flourished at Alexandria early in the 2nd century.

PUBLICOLA. (See VALERIUS, Publius.)

PUBLIUS SYRUS, pub'-li-us, a comic poet of Syria, who was at first slave to a patrician named Domitius, who gave him his liberty. His works are lost, but some quotations from them are preserved in the writings of ancient authors. Flourished at Rome, about 40 B.C.

PUFFENDORF, Samuel de, poof'-fen-dorf, an eminent writer on universal jurisprudence, studied at Leipsic, where he applied himself to philosophy, law, and the mathematics. In 1658 he was appointed tutor to the son of Coyer, ambassador of the king of Sweden to the court of Denmark; but war breaking out between the two countries, the family of the ambassador was thrown into prison, and Puffendorf with the rest. There he composed his treatise on "Universal Jurisprudence," which was printed at the Hague in 1660. This work obtained for him the professorship of the law of nature and nations at Heidelberg; whence, in 1670, he removed, by the invitation of the king of Sweden, to Lund, and was appointed professor in the university of that city. He was afterwards created a baron, and historiographer, by the Swedish monarch. In 1683 he went to Berlin, where he became counsellor of state. His other works are, "History of Sweden from 1628 to 1654;" "History of Charles Gustavus;" "History of Frederic William the Great, elector of Brandenburg;" and treatise on "The Law of Nature and Nations." B. at Chemnitz, Saxony, 1632; D. at Berlin, 1694.

PUGN, Augustus, pu'-gin, an eminent French architectural draughtsman, who settled in London, and became an assistant to the architect Nash. He also published a number of works on architecture, the most important of which were,—"Specimens of Gothic Architecture from various Edifices in England;" "Specimens of the Architectural Antiquities of Normandy;" and "Gothic ornaments." B. 1732; D. 1832.

PUGN, Augustin Welby Northmore, an eminent English architect, and the son of the preceding, under whom he acquired the elementary principles of his art. He was next engaged as the designer of furniture for the apartments at Windsor Castle, and subsequently devoted himself to the production of Gothic designs for furniture, gold and silver smith's work, &c. About 1841 he embraced the doctrines of the Roman Catholic faith, and soon afterwards became extensively employed in designing ecclesiastical structures for the service of that church. From his plans, churches, chapels, convents, and schools were erected throughout Great Britain. His best works are, the cathedral church of St. Marie, at Derby; the cathedral of St. George, Southwark, London; and the Roman Catholic churches at Liverpool, Manchester, Oxford, Cambridge, and Newcastle-upon-Tyne. For the earl of Shrewsbury, who was his constant patron, he built a monastery and church at Alton Towers; he also designed the gateway to Magdalen College, Oxford. His latest employment was the designing and superintendence of the interior of the new palace at Westminster. His chief literary works were,—"Glossary of Ecclesiastical Ornaments;" "True Principles of Pointed, or Christian Architecture;" and "An Apology for the Revival of Christian Architecture." He unfortunately outlived his mental powers. B. 1810; D. 1852.

PUGOT, Alfé de, po'-zho', one of the most able French painters of the 19th century, was born at Valenciennes, the native town of Watteau, and at a very early age became a pupil of David, whose peculiar manner—that of a school now nearly extinct—he inherited. In 1810, his picture of "Jacob blessing Joseph's Children" attracted the attention of connoisseurs, and in the following year "Lycurgus presenting the Heir to the Throne" obtained the grand prize, and laid the foundation of the painter's reputation. Few artists were more industrious than M. de Pujol. Besides his many oil paintings—among which the most famous is "St. Stephen preaching the Gospel," in the Valenciennes museum—he was the author of several frescoes in the churches of St. Sulpice and St. Roch, and in the Paris Bourse; and took part in the decorations of the Library of the Louvre, and the Diana Gallery at Fontainebleau. He became a QUARLES, Francis, quarles, an English poet, who received the appointment of cupbearer to Elizabeth, daughter of James I., and queen of Bohemia, after which he became secretary to Archbishop Usher, and chronologer to the city of London. He was a zealous royalist, for which his estates were sequestered and his goods plundered. The loss of his manuscripts is said to have preyed so much upon his spirits as to occasion his death. He wrote several works, the best known of which is his "Emblems, Meditations, and Hieroglyphics." Pope is supposed to have been considerably indebted to his works. n. near Roumford, Essex, 1702; n. 1614.

QUATREMERRE DE QUINCY, Antoine Chrysostom, kat'-re-mair, an eminent French archaeologist, who became a member of the Legislative Assembly in 1790; but having declared himself in favour of a constitutional monarchy, was thrown into prison during the Reign of Terror, and remained there thirteen months. His royalist principles subsequently led to his being condemned to death by the Directory; but he contrived to effect his escape. Under the empire he was allowed to return to his native country, where he led a retired and studious life. At the restoration of the Bourbons he received the appointments of royal censor, intendant-general of the public arts and monuments, and member of the Council of Instruction. He subsequently became member of the French Institute, perpetual secretary of the Academy of Fine Arts, and deputy for the department of the Seine. His principal works were, "Dictionary of Architecture," "The Arts of Design in France," and lives of Raffaele, Canova, and Michael Angelo. n. at Paris, 1755; n. 1849.

QUATTROMONTI, Sertorio, quat'-tro-ma'-ne, a learned Italian writer, who, through the influence of Paul Manutius, was admitted into the library of the Vatican, where he studied the Greek writers with great avidity. He was afterwards taken into the service of the duke of Noceira, who held him in great esteem. After the death of his patron, he accepted an invitation from the Prince de Stigliano, but did not long remain in his service. He translated the "Æneid" into Italian verse; and his works were printed together at Naples in 1711. n. at Cosenza, Naples, about 1511; n. about 1606.

QUERINI, Angelo Maria, quat'-re'-ur, a celebrated Italian cardinal, who at the age of 17 entered the order of Benedictines. In 1710 he travelled in Germany, whence he passed to Holland, England, and France, in which countries he contracted an intimacy with the most learned men of the age, particularly Newton, Bentley, Fénelon, and Montaucon. Benedict XIII. made him archbishop and cardinal, which dignities he filled with great reputation. Cardinal Querini formed a magnificent library, which he gave to the Vatican. His most important works were a Latin treatise upon the Antiquities and History of Corsica; a "Library History," of Brescia; Lives of Popes Paul I., II., and III.; and an edition of the Letters of Cardinal Polo. n. at Venice, 1680; n. at Rome, 1755.

letters of nobility on curing the dauphin of the small-pox. He was also member of the Academy of Sciences at Paris, and of the Royal Society of London. He gave much attention to agricultural and economic science, the study of which latter he may be said to have introduced into France, and upon which he wrote several treatises. He was the principal of the Society called Economists. His chief works are, "On the Effects of Bleeding;" "Physical Essay on the Animal Economy;" and "Treatise on Fevers." n. 1694; n. 1771.

QUESNEL, Pasquier, kes'-nel, a celebrated French controversialist, who studied theology, after which he became distinguished by his learning and piety; but being a zealous Jansenist, was obliged to retire to Brussels, where he published his "Reflections on the New Testament," which work was attacked by the Jesuits, and occasioned so much controversy, that Pope Clement XI. issued his famous bull, called "Unigenitus," against Quesnel's book. Through the intrigues of the Jesuits he was thrown into prison, and put in irons; but he effected his escape, with the assistance of a Spanish gentleman. He wrote a number of pieces of practical and controversial divinity. n. at Paris, 1681; n. at Amsterdam, 1719.

QUEVEDO Y VILLEGAS, Francis, kat'-sef'-do, an eminent Spanish author, who cultivated both poetry and prose, and his works were much esteemed; but some of them gave such offence that the author was thrown into prison, where he remained. The best edition of his works was published at Madrid in 1794, by Sanchez, in 11 vols. 8vo. His "Visions of Hell" have been translated into English. n. 1580; n. 1645.

QUILLER, Claude, keel'-lui, a French physician and Latin poet, who, to avoid the resentment of Cardinal Richelieu, retired to Rome, where he wrote his "Callipædia," a Latin poem, on the art of having beautiful children. In this piece he satirized Cardinal Mazarin, who, instead of punishing him, gave him an abbey. In 1650, Joubert published a new edition of his poem, dedicated to the cardinal, substituting aneology instead of satire. He also wrote a Latin poem called "The Hourial." His "Callipædia" has been translated into English by Rowe. n. 1692; n. 1661.

QUINCEY, qviz, an eminent English actor, who attended for the law; but, having a strong inclination for the stage, joined a company of players, and, after performing at Dublin and other places with applause, was engaged at Covent Garden, where he played 'astaff' with the greatest success. He became the first actor of his time till Garrick appeared. In 1716 the rival actors performed together in the "Fair Penitent," and exhibited an astonishing display of powers. Quin was employed by Frederick, Prince of Wales, to instruct the royal children in elocution; and when was informed of the graceful manner in which George III. delivered his first speech from the throne, he emphatically said, "Ay, it was I who taught the boy to speak." About this time he received a pension, having retired from the stage 14 years before. n. in London, 1693; n. at Bath, 1766.

QUINCEY, Philip, ke'-notte, a French dramatic poet, who is considered the first author of French operas. He also produced several tragedies and comedies of considerable merit. He was a member of the French Academy, and obtained a pension from Louis XIV. The works of Quinault were printed at Paris, with his Life, in 1715. b. at Paris, 1635; d. 1683.

QUINCEY, Thomas de. (See DE QUINCEY, Thomas.)

QUINET, Edgar, ke'-nai, a modern French author and statesman, who, after pursuing his educational career in his native country with some distinction, repaired to the university of Heidelberg, where he completed his education in the most brilliant manner. In 1828 he was appointed a member of the scientific commission dispatched to the Morea, and in 1839 became professor of foreign literature to the Faculty of Letters at Lyons. An eloquent and ardent advocate of republicanism, the principles of which he defended both in his writings and in the councils of the nation, he was, after the coup d'état, expelled from France. He took up his residence at Brussels, and devoted himself entirely to literature. As an author he was very prolific and diverse. His most important works were, "Modern Greece," "Art in Germany," "Liberty of Discussion in Religious Matters," "The Austrian, French, Spanish, and Neapolitan Crusade against Rome," which was an energetic protest against the attacks made upon the republic of Rome in 1848; "The Philosophy of the History of France," and a dramatic poem. He also contributed many interesting and valuable articles to the "Revue des Deux Mondes." In 1852 he married, at Brussels, the daughter of the Moldavian poet Assaki. b. at Bourg, Ain, 1803.

QUINTANA, Manuel José, keen-ta'-na, a celebrated Spanish poet, who pursued the profession of advocate until the French invasion of Spain (1808), when he resolved to devote his pen to the denunciation of the foreign intruders. He drew up the manifestoes of the insurrectionary juntas, established a weekly periodical, wherein he persistently attacked the French, and, indeed, in many forms, proved himself the most eloquent and energetic literary antagonist with whom they had to contend. But, at the same time, he was an advocate for free government, and his opinions found no favour with Ferdinand VII. Upon his return to Spain, Quintana was seized, and imprisoned during six years, and was subsequently banished to an obscure town in Estremadura. In 1828 he was permitted to return to Madrid, in consequence of his complying with King Ferdinand's request that he should write an ode upon the occasion of his third marriage. Honours and fortune followed: he was appointed director-general of studies and of public instruction; became a senator and a peer, and received in public a crown of laurel from the queen of Spain. His odes written in favour of liberty are regarded as among the finest specimens of Spanish poetry. Mr. Prescott translated several of his prose biographies. b. at Madrid, 1773; d. at the same city, 1857.

QUINTILIAN, or QUINTILLIANUS, Marcus Fabius, quin-til-i-an, quin-til-i-as'-mus, a celebrated orator and critic. At the commencement of the reign of Galba, he opened a school of rhetoric at Rome, where he taught with great reputation, and was liberally rewarded by the government. He also pleaded in the forum, and was intrusted by Domitian with the education of his nephews. His "De Institutione Oratoria" may be justly pronounced the finest system of rhetoric ever written. This invaluable work was discovered by Poggio Bracciolini in 1417, in the abbey of St. Gall. The best edition is that of Burmann, 1720, Leyden. b. either in Spain or at Rome, about 42; d. about 117.

Rabelais

QUINTUS CALABER, or QUINTUS SMYRNEUS, quin'-tus, a Greek poet, who wrote, in imitation of the style of Homer, a continuation of the "Iliad." The work was discovered by Cardinal Bessarion in Calabria, in the 15th century. Select translations from it appeared at Oxford in 1821. Lived in the 5th century.

QUINTUS CURTIUS RUPEUS, a Roman historian, of whose life nothing is known, but who is supposed to have been the writer spoken of by Suetonius. He wrote the "Acts of Alexander the Great, King of the Macedonians," in ten books, two of which are lost. The clear style of the work has caused it to become a classic, although it is more a romance than a history, and is full of errors in geography and chronology. There are many editions of it, and an English translation was made by Digby in 1726. Supposed to have flourished at the beginning of the 1st century.

QUIROS, Fernandes de, ke'-roes, a Spanish navigator, who was employed by Philip III. in making discoveries in the Pacific Ocean. In 1605 he discovered the Society Isles and other places. d. at Panama, 1614.

RABAUD DE ST. ETIENNE, Jean Paul, ra'-bo, a French Protestant minister, who became a member of the National Convention of France. He was proscribed, with other members of the Girondist party, and fled; but was taken and sent to Paris, where he was guillotined. He wrote, "A Letter on the Life and Writings of Count de Ghibelin;" "Letters on the Primitive History of Greece;" "Considerations on the Interests of the Third Estate." b. at Nîmes, 1741; guillotined, 1793.

RABELAIS, François, ra'-be-lais, a celebrated French writer, was the son of an apothecary, and became a monk of the order of St. Francis. He afterwards entered a convent of Benedictines, but finding that a monastic life was distasteful to him, he determined to abandon the monastic life. He then studied medicine at Montpellier, where he took his doctor's degree, and became professor in 1531. The chancellor Duprat having abolished the privileges of that university, Rabelais was deputed to wait on him, and succeeded in obtaining a reversal of that decree. The cardinal du Bellay, ambassador to Rome, appointed him his physician, and took him in his suite. On his return to France he was rewarded with a prebend in an abbey, and the benefice of Mondon, which offices he filled until his death. His principal work is the famous satirical romance entitled the "History of Gargantua and Pantagruel." In this work, wherein acuteness, wit, and humour overflow, even to riotousness, Rabelais, under the guise of allegory, ridiculed all the great personages of his country. The monks, especially, were lashed in the severest manner. The work consisted of five parts, which appeared separately between 1533 and 1564. Urquhart's English translation of this romance is very fine and spirited. Besides the above piece, he wrote some medical works and numerous letters. n. at Chinon, Touraine, 1483; d. at Paris, 1553.

RACHIN, Eliza Rachel Felix, usually called, ra-shel, a celebrated French actress, who was the daughter of a Jew pedlar. The family gained a livelihood by periodically visiting various towns in Germany and Switzerland, at length settled for a time at Lyons, and in 1830 went to reside at Paris. Sarah, her elder sister, used to sing at the various cafés, to the accompaniment of an old guitar, while Rachel went from table to table to collect the offerings of the spectators. On one of these occasions the young minstrels attracted the notice of M. Choron, the founder of the Institution for the Study of Sacred Music, and he, more particularly noticing Rachel, took both sisters under his charge. After a short time, however, he found that the sonorous organ of the young Jewess was better suited for declamatory expression than for music, and he transferred her, as a pupil, to a dramatic instructor. Under this tutor she laboured unweariedly during four years, until she obtained a true conception of the highest classical characters, although she had a secret longing for the lighter creations of Molière. She next became a student at the Conservatoire, and, in 1837, made her début at the Gymnase, but with little success. In the following year, however, she took the Parisian public by surprise, and excited the greatest enthusiasm by her performance of Camille, in "Les Horaces," at the Théâtre Français. The Parisian critics were startled by her powerful acting, by the originality of her conceptions, and, above all, by a certain concentrated power of expression which thrilled to the soul of the hearer. In the same year she performed other classical parts, such as Emile, in "Cinna," Mounie, in "Mithridate," and the chief character in "Phédre." Her popularity reached the highest point at once, and her salary, which was 4000 francs in the first year, became 20,000 in the second. In after-years her income varied from 300,000 to 400,000 francs. In course of time she extended her repertoire by the representation of parts in modern works, and attracted crowded audiences by her performance in Adrienne Lecouvreur, Lady Tartuffe, and Louise de Lignerolles. Up to her very last season she continued to study regularly, and a strong proof of her progress was to be found in the successive changes and very decided improvements which took place in her enactment of the part of Phédre, always a fine performance, but in later years a truly grand one. In London she was always welcomed at her periodical visits to the St. James's Theatre; but, although great things had been expected from a trip across the Atlantic, her efforts at New York were far from being a real success. Never of a robust constitution, the arduous labours of her profession at length led to an illness which cut her off prematurely. n. at Mont, Switzerland, 1820; d. at Cannes, 1858. —Her four sisters, and brother Raphael Felix, were also more or less distinguished as performers upon the French stage.

RACINE, John, ra'-seen, a celebrated French poet, who was educated in the society of Port Royal, where he gave his principal attention to the Greek tragic poets. His first publication was an ode on the marriage of Louis XIV. in 1660, which procured him a present of 100

siastical habit, which he now renounced. Nicole, in a letter written against Descartes, having charged the dramatic poets as poisoners of the soul, Racine replied in a severe manner. In 1667 appeared his "Andromache," which was attacked by several critics, particularly St. Evremond. His next piece was the tragedy of "Britannicus," which far surpassed his former productions. In 1677 appeared his best tragedy, that entitled "Phédre," which was opposed by one on the same subject written by Pradon, and occasioned violent controversies between the partisans of the respective poets. The intrigues of his rivals so irritated Racine, that he resolved to abandon the drama. Through the influence of Madame de Maintenon, Racine was associated with Boileau in writing the "History of Louis XIV.," a work which was never published. About this time he consented to write his sacred drama of "Esther," at the desire of Madame de Maintenon, and it was acted by the young ladies of her educational establishment of St. Cyr, in 1680. His best piece of this kind was his "Athalie." At the instance of his patroness, Madame de Maintenon, Racine drew up a memorial upon the best mode of alleviating the miseries of the people, which, falling under the king's eye, he was so displeased as to banish the poet from court. His health had for a long time been in a frail condition, and the loss of the court favour so greatly increased his sufferings, that, after lying ill for two years, he died. Besides his dramatic works, he wrote canticles or hymns for the use of St. Cyr; the "History of Port Royal;" "Letters and Epigrams," &c. Racine was not equal to Corneille in vigour and genius, but he surpassed him in variety, tenderness, and elegance. His style is perfect. n. at Ferté-Milon, Aisne, France, 1639; d. 1699.

RACINE, Louis, a French poet, son of the preceding, embraced the ecclesiastical state, but Cardinal Fleury gave him a civil appointment. He wrote several good poems; "Reflections on Poetry;" a prose translation of Milton's "Paradise Lost;" Life of his father; and other works. n. at Paris, 1682; d. 1763.

RACLE, Leonard, ra-kl, an eminent French architect, who, in 1786, obtained a prize from the academy of Toulouse, for a memoir on the construction of an iron bridge of a single arch of 100 feet span. He also wrote others on the ics of the evoked, and on regulating the course of the Rhine. He was the intimate friend of Voltaire, so house at Ferney built. n. at Bâle, ; d. 1792.

RADCLIFFE, Alice, rad-klif, an English poet, who wrote a poem on Ovid's Epistles, poem called "News from Hell," and other works of a like nature. d. about 1700.

RADCLIFFE, John, an eminent English physician, took up his bachelor's degree in physics at Lincoln College, Oxford, and afterwards commenced practice, and obtained a considerable reputation. In 1642 he took his doctor's degree, and not long after removed to London, where he rose to the top of his profession. Astonishing things are related of his skill and ready wit. He attended King William III., who having shown him his swollen ankles, and asked what he thought of them, "Why, truly," said Radcliffe, "I would not have your majesty's two legs for your three kingdoms," which uncourly answer gave great offence. In 1713 he was chosen member of Parliament for Buckingham. To the University of Oxford he was a munificent benefactor, particularly by founding the famous library which is called by his name. b. at Wakefield, Yorkshire, 1650; d. 1714.

RADCLIFFE, Mrs. Anne, an eminent English romance-writer, whose works abounded in incidents of the terrible, the mysterious, and the wildly imaginative type. Her talent was undoubted, and her success great, which induced a crowd of inferior imitators to attempt the same order of composition. In 1789 she produced the "Castles of Athlin and Dumbayne," and, in subsequent years, published the "Mysteries of Udolpho;" "The Forest; or, the Abbey of Saint Clair;" and other romances. She was also the author of "A Tour in Holland." All her works were translated into French, and were very popular on the continent, as well as in England. b. in London, 1784; d. 1823.

RADETZKY DE RADETZ, Field-marshal Count Joseph, ra-det'-ke, a celebrated Austrian general, commenced his military career as cadet in a cavalry regiment in 1784. Called to participate in the long struggle against Napoleon, and having won his way to the rank of major-general, having fought at Agram and Erlingen,—in the battles of 1813, '14, and '15, he gained honourable laurels, inasmuch as he defended the independence of his country; and at Kulm, Leipsic, and Brienne, exhibited great skill and bravery; but afterwards he became nothing else than the able executioner of the decrees of a despotic government. Having been successively governor of Ofen in Hungary, and Lemberg in Poland, he was, in 1823, appointed commander-general of the Lombardo-Venetian kingdom. In 1848 the people of Milan rose against their Austrian oppressors, and after a gallant struggle drove them out of the city. Radetzky retreated upon Verona, to await the arrival of reinforcements. Shortly afterwards, Charles Albert, king of Sardinia, joined the popular cause, and crossing the Adige, placed his army between the Austrian commander and the troops which were marching to his aid. In the end, however, the old marshal proved too skilful a strategist for the Piedmontese king, and after many severely contested battles, Charles Albert was signally defeated at Novara. This battle decided the fate of the Italian cause, and Austrian tyranny was again triumphant in Lombardo-Venetia. After 73 years of service in the Austrian armies, he was permitted to resign at the commencement of the year 1857. b. in Bohemia, 1766; d. 1857.

RADZIWIL, rad'-zi-wil, the house of, an ancient Polish family of Lithuania, which commenced to figure in history in the 14th century. Nicholas Radziwil, the first of the name, was created by Jagellon, grand-duke of Lithuania, palatine of Wilna. The most celebrated of his descendants were—Nicholas, palatine of Wilna and governor of Livonia, under Sigismund Augustus, king of Poland. He signalized himself by his valour against the Teutonic knights in 1557, and against the Russians, whom, in 1565, he completely defeated. He abjured the Catholic for the Protestant religion, which he propagated zealously, and at his own expense produced a Polish translation of the Bible, which was condemned at Rome. b. about 1500; d. 1567. His descendants reverted to the Roman Catholic faith. —Charles Radziwil, palatine of Wilna, distinguished himself by his opposition to the Russians, and was the great rival of the powerful Czartoryski family. Nominated, in 1762, governor of Lithuania, by Augustus II., king of Poland, he energetically combated Russian influence; but, not succeeding in preventing the dismemberment of his native country, went into exile, but returned to Poland shortly before his death, which took place in 1790.—A lady of this house secretly married Sigismund, king of Poland, in 1548.

RÆBURN, Sir Henry, rai'-bern, an eminent Scotch artist, who was brought up to his father's trade, which was that of a goldsmith; but, having shown great taste and skill in miniature-painting, he was sent to London and afterwards to Italy, for the purpose of improving himself as an artist. In 1787 he returned to Edinburgh, where he became a popular portrait-painter, and continued to reside there until his death. He received many marks of honour both at home and abroad; was elected member of the academies of Florence and of New York, and became an R.A. in 1815. His best portraits were those of Sir Walter Scott, Francis Jeffrey, Sir Francis Chantrey, Lord Eldon, and Professor Playfair. When George IV. visited Edinburgh in 1823, he created Ræburn a knight. As a draughtsman he was correct and vigorous, and his colouring was rich and harmonious. b. near Edinburgh, 1756; d. 1823.

RAFFAELLE, or RAPHAEL, Sanzio, ra'-fa-ail'-lai, ra'-fa-el, a celebrated Italian painter, whose father, an artist of some eminence, after teaching him the rudiments of the art, placed him under Perugino. At Florence he studied the famous cartoons of Da Vinci and Michael Angelo; after which he went to Rome, where he was employed by Pope Julius II. in the embellishment of the Vatican. He also painted several fine pieces for Francis I. of France, who liberally rewarded him. Leo X. employed him in designing the cartoons for the tapestry to be hung in the Sistine chapel. These drawings were sent to Flanders to be copied; and, after remaining there a century, seven were bought by Charles I. They are now at the South Kensington Museum. The works of this eminent painter of modern times are numerous, but are chiefly to be found at Rome. In the National Gallery there are a St. Catherine, portrait of Julius II., a portion of a cartoon, and the "Vision of a Knight," with the original pen-and-ink drawing. The university of Oxford possesses a fine collection of his drawings. b. at Urbino, 1493; d. at Rome, 1520.

RAFFLES, Sir Thomas Stamford, raf'-fels, an eminent English statesman, and naturalist, who became a clerk in the India House at an early age, and in that capacity displayed so much zeal and talent as to be chosen, in 1805, to fill the post of under-secretary to the government of Pulo-Penang, or Prince of Wales Island. His ability was so great, that in a short time he rose to the secretaryship, but was compelled to vacate that office in 1809, in consequence of ill-health. He went to Malacca, where he devoted himself to the study of the Malay language, and in 1809 published an essay thereon. In 1811 he was appointed lieutenant-governor of Java, which had been taken from the Dutch. During the five years that he held this post, he made extensive reforms in the government and abolished slavery. At the same time he collected a vast and valuable body of information relative to the geology, geography, and natural products of the island. These materials he subsequently classified and published, after his return to England, in a work entitled "The History of Java." In 1818 he received the honour of knighthood, and was appointed lieutenant-governor of Fort Marlborough, in the island of Sumatra, where, as formerly, he was distinguished by his enlightened measures as an administrator, and emancipated the slaves. At Singapore he founded a commercial station, and a college for the study of Anglo-Chinese and Malay literature. He returned to England in 1824; but, unfortunately, the ship in which he had first embarked took fire, and almost the whole of the valuable collection of animals, plants, manuscripts, and drawings which he had formed, was totally destroyed. He was the founder and first president of the Zoological Society, and presented the museum of that body with a fine collection of preserved animals. n. at sea, off Jamaica, 1781; p. 1826.

RAGLAN, James Henry Fitzroy Somerset, Lord, räg'-lan, a modern English general, who left the Westminster school in his 16th year to enter the British army as cornet in the 4th Light Dragoons. After accompanying the British ambassador to Constantinople in 1807, he was placed upon the staff of the Duke of Wellington, and subsequently became his aide-de-camp. He served throughout the Peninsular campaign, which was marked by the victories of Rolica, Talavera, Vimiera, and Busaco. In the retreat to the lines of Torres Vedras, and in the subsequent operations, he evinced distinguished merit. At Waterloo he lost his right arm, and was subsequently created K.C.B. and a colonel. After the conclusion of the war he fulfilled the diplomatic duties of secretary and minister in the embassy at Paris. In 1819 he became military secretary to the duke of Wellington, both in the Ordnance and at a later period at the Horse Guards. Upon the death of the Duke of Wellington, Lord Raglan was called to still higher military duties. He was appointed master-general of the Ordnance, and, at the outbreak of the war between England and Russia, was selected to take the command of the British army destined to defend the Turkish empire. Under his directions, and in conjunction with the French troops led by Marshal St. Arnaud, the British army signally defeated the Russians, and in two hours carried the intrenched and fortified position on the heights of Alma. It has been ascertained that he was for carrying Sebastopol by a coup-de-main, but gave way to the wishes of the French commander, who desired to take the fortress by investment. The repulse and defeat of the enemy at Balaklava, and the daring intrepidity of the army at Inkermann, took place under his command; but he succumbed to disease before the final success of the operations which he himself had inaugurated. His remains were conveyed to England; a pension of £1000 per annum was settled upon his widow, and one of £2000 upon his son. n. 1783; p. before Sebastopol, 1855. (See Kinglake's "Invasion of the Crimea.")

RAGOTZKY, Sigismund, ra-gotz'-ke, an Hungarian magnate, who was elected prince of Transylvania upon the death of Stephen Batay in 1607. n. about 1610.

RAGOTZKY, George, prince of Transylvania, entered into an alliance with the Swedes, against Poland, in 1659. He was slain in action with the Turks, 1661.

RAGOTZKY, Francis Leopold, prince of Transylvania, an Hungarian patriot, who was, in 1701, appointed chief by the revolted Hungarians, and displayed in that capacity signal bravery and address. After holding Hungary separate from Austria during ten years, he, upon the proclamation of peace between the inhabitants of that country and the emperor, went to France, and thence to Constantinople, where he was held in great esteem. n. 1676; p. in Turkey, 1735.

RAGUENET, Francis, rag'-nai, a French historian, who obtained a prize from the Academy in 1689, for a discourse on the "Merit of Martyrdom." In 1704 he published a "Comparison between the Italians and the French, with regard to Music and the Opera," in which he maintained the superiority of the former. This work occasioned a literary warfare. His other works are, "The Monuments of Rome; or, a Description of the Works of Art, &c., in that City;" the "History of Oliver Cromwell;" "History of the Old Testament." n. at Rouen, 1660; p. 1720.

RAGUSA, Augustus Frederick de Marmont, Duke of, ra-goo'-sa, a celebrated general and marshal of France, received a complete and regular military education at the college-school of Châlons, and, after entering the army, attracted at Toulon the favorable notice of Bonaparte, who made him his aide-de-camp. He accompanied that general to Italy in 1796, and fought in almost every subsequent engagement, winning high honour for his great skill, bravery, and readiness of resource, till at length he was selected by Bonaparte to carry to Paris the twenty-two colours captured from the enemy. In the Egyptian campaign he was a general of brigade, and, in 1799, was one of the officers who accompanied Bonaparte in his perilous flight from Egypt. Between the years 1805 and 1814 he was one of the most conspicuously skilful and courageous of all Napoleon's subordinates. At Ulm, during the conquest of the province of Styria; at Wagram; as the successor to Massena in Portugal; and at Bautzen, Dresden, and Leipzig, he bore a distinguished part. Against an allied force of Austrians, Russians, and Prussians, numerically four times greater than his own, he obstinately defended Paris, in 1814. But when the enemy's artillery began to sweep the city from the heights of Montmartre, he received instructions from Joseph Bonaparte which permitted him to evacuate the French capital. He then went over to the allies with his entire force, thus deserting the cause of the emperor for ever. He was subsequently employed by Louis XVIII. and Charles X., the latter of whom commanded him to repress the revolt of 1830; he was, however, defeated by the people, and became an object of odium with his countrymen. His name was struck off the rolls of the French army, and he was banished from his native country. He spent the remainder of his life away from France, and devoted his leisure to the composition of some excellent treatises upon military science. His "Memoirs" appeared at Paris in 1856. n. at Châtillon-sur-Seine, 1774; p. at Venice, 1862.

RAIKES, Robert, raiks, an English philanthropist, who was the son of a printer of Gloucester, and was himself bred to the same trade.

OF BIOGRAPHY.

Raimbach

Having acquired a fortune in trade, he employed it in acts of charity, and in providing instruction to the inmates of the county bridewell and to the children and workmen employed in the factories. He established a number of Sunday schools, requiring only "clean hands, clean faces, and combed hair" in their attendants. In all his noble efforts he was very successful. b. at Gloucester, 1735; d. 1811.

RAIMBACH, Abraham, rain-jak, an eminent English engraver, was of Swiss descent on his father's side, and was, at an early age, placed as an apprentice to an engraver. His first work was the key to Copley's "Death of Chatham." An assiduous student of his art, he went on increasing in skill, till, in the year 1812, he became engraver for Sir David Wilkie. During the remainder of his life he was employed by that artist to reproduce his works, the excellence and popularity of which enabled him to acquire large sums by their sale. His best prints after Wilkie were the "Rent Day," "The Village Politicians," "The Cut Finger," "The Parish Beadle," "Blind-Man's-Buff," and "Dis-training for Rent." After his death, his autobiography was published by his son; it was entitled "Memoirs and Recollections of the late Abraham Raimbach, including a Memoir of Sir David Wilkie." The work is full of interest, and contains a pleasing account of the engraver's visit to the museum of the Louvre at Paris, during the short interval of peace in 1803. b. in London, 1776; d. 1843.

RAIMONDI, Marc Antonio, rai-mon'-de, a celebrated Italian engraver, who was employed by Raffaele to engrave his drawings. Clement VII. ordered him to be imprisoned for having engraved a series of obscene designs after Julio Romano, illustrating the sonnets of Aretino; but the pope having been shown his superb engraving of the "Martyrdom of St. Lawrence," pardoned him, and became his patron. When Rome was taken by the Spaniards, in 1527, Raimondi lost everything he possessed, and fled to Bologna, where he continued to work until his death. The British Museum possesses a fine collection of his engravings, some of which are valued at £80 per impression. b. at Bologna, about 1488; d. about 1546.

RAIMOLDS, John, rai'-nolds, a learned divine, and president of Corpus Christi College, Oxford, was considered the leader of the Puritan party, and distinguished himself greatly at the Hampton Court conference, in 1603, where he suggested the necessity of the authorized translation of the Bible, in which work he was afterwards engaged. b. 1549; d. 1607.

RAILTON, Sir Walter, rail'-e, a celebrated English navigator, author, and courtier, who, receiving the rudiments of his education home, was, about 1598, sent to Oriel College, Oxford, where "he was worthily esteemed a proficient in oratory and philosophy;" but did not long remain there; for, having an enterprising spirit, he entered into the troop of gentlemen volunteers who went to the assistance of the Protestants of France, where he continued about five or six years. He subsequently joined the expedition of General Norris in the Netherlands, in aid of the cause of the Prince of Orange. Soon after his return he engaged with his brother-in-law, Sir Humphry Gilbert, in a voyage to America, whence they returned in 1579. The next year he was in Ireland, where he distinguished himself against the rebels of Munster. On his return to England he introduced himself to the notice of Queen Elizabeth by a romantic piece of gallantry. Her majesty, while taking a walk, stopped at a muddy place, hesitating whether to proceed or not; on which Raleigh took off his new plush cloak, and spread it on the ground. The queen trod gently over the foot-cloth, and soon rewarded the sacrifice of a cloak with a handsome suit to the owner. Being still intent upon making discoveries, he, in 1584, fitted out a squadron, which endeavoured to establish the colony called, in honour of Elizabeth, Virginia; but almost the only fruits of the expedition were the bringing of the tobacco-plant and the potato to England. After spending £40,000 in an unsuccessful attempt to found a colony, he abandoned the scheme to a mercantile corporation. Meanwhile he had been made a knight, captain of the queen's guard, a lord warden of the Stannaries, and lieutenant-general of Cornwall. In the defeat of the Spanish armada, in 1588, Sir Walter bore a glorious part, for which he received distinguishing marks of favour from the queen. In 1591 he sailed on an expedition against the Spanish fleet, but without success. About the same time he incurred the queen's displeasure by an intrigue with one of her maids of honour, whom he afterwards married. In 1595 he sailed to Guiana, and destroyed the capital of Trinidad. The year following he took a distinguished part in the capture of Cadiz. Honours were lavished in abundance upon him, and he obtained the lordship of St. Germaine, in Cornwall. Sir Walter was one of those who brought about the fall of Essex, and remained in the favour of the queen till her death; but, in the succeeding reign, his fortunes changed. He was stripped of his preferments, tried, and condemned for high treason, on a charge the most frivolous, and without the least evidence. He remained in the Tower thirteen years, during which he wrote several works on various subjects of great importance, the best of which was the "History of the World," which was published in 1614. The year following he was released, in consequence of the flattering account which he had given of some rich mines in Guiana. On gaining his liberty, he sailed to that country, in search of those pretended mines, instead of discovering which, he burnt the Spanish town of St. Thomas, and returned to England, where, on the complaint of Gondomar, the Spanish ambassador, he was apprehended, and, in a most unprecedented manner, beheaded on his former sentence. His works are historical, philosophical, poetical, and political. As an author, Hume declares him to be the "best model of our ancient style;" and Hallam speaks of him as "less pedantic than most of his contemporaries, seldom low, and never affected." The appearance and character of this poet, courtier, navigator, statesman, and military and naval commander, are thus sketched by Aubrey:—"He was a tall, handsome, and bold man; but his nose was that he was damnable proud. He had a most remarkable aspect, an exceeding high forehead, and long-faced." Altogether, he was one of the most remarkable men of a remarkable age. b. at Hayes, Devonshire, 1552; beheaded at Westminster, 1618.

RAVEN, James, ralf, an American writer, was originally a schoolmaster at Philadelphia, and went thence, in 1725, to London, where he published a poem entitled "Night." He also wrote a "History of England," and several political pamphlets. Pope has given him a place in his "Dunciad," where he exclaims,— "Silence, ye wolves, while Ralph to Cynthia howls, And makes night hideous; answer him, ye owls."

b. about 1700; d. at Chiswick, 1782.

RAMLER, Charles William, ram'-ler, a German poet and miscellaneous writer, became teacher of the belles lettres at Berlin; where his "Lyrical Anthology" procured him the name of the German Horace. He also composed oratorios, and translated some works into his native language. b. 1725; d. 1798.

RAMBAUT, Jean Philippe, ra'-mo, a celebrated French musician, who, after practising as organist at his native place, discharged the same office in the cathedral of Clermont. In 1733 he produced his opera of "Hippolytus," which was followed by several others, and greatly admired. But it was as a theorist in music that Rameau excelled; and on account of his two works, the "Demonstration of the Principles of Harmony" and the "Code of Music," he was called the Newton of that science. Louis XV., to whom he was composer, conferred on him the title of nobility and the order of St. Michael. b. at Dijon, 1683; d. 1764.

RAMMOHUN ROY, ram'-mo'-hoon, a distinguished Orientalist, who came of a high order of the Brahminical caste. While still a youth, he evinced heretical tendencies; and he states, "when about the age of sixteen, I wrote a manuscript, calling in question the validity of the idolatrous system of the Hindoos. This, together with my known sentiments on that subject, having produced a coolness between me and my immediate kindred, I proceeded on my travels, and passed through different countries, chiefly within, but some beyond, the bounds of Hindostan. When I had reached the age of twenty, my father recalled me, and restored me to his favour; but my continued controversies with the Brahmins on the subjects of their idolatry and superstition, and my interference with their custom of burning widows and other pernicious practices, revived and increased their animosity towards me; and, through their influence with my family, my father was again obliged to withdraw his countenance, though his limited pecuniary support was still continued to me." After the death of his father, in 1803, he openly broke with the Brahmins, and wrote several works exposing their errors. He published an English translation of portions of the

"S" in 1817, and subsequently became part proprietor of an English newspaper called the "Bengal Herald." A series of selections from the New Testament, entitled, "The Precepts of Jesus the Guide to Peace and Happiness," translated into Sanskrit and Bengalee, was his next publication. In 1830 he was sent to England as ambassador from the king of Delhi, who at the same time conferred upon him the title of rajah. He was on the eve of returning to his own country when he was seized with illness, which terminated in his death. He was a frequent attendant in the Unitarian chapels in England, and held that a belief in the divine mission of Christ was perfectly consistent with the doctrines laid down by the Sanskrit writers on the Brahminical faith. He wrote and spoke English, Bengalee, Persian, Hindostanee, and was further acquainted with French, Hebrew, Latin, Greek, and Arabic. He was as acute as a diplomatist, as he was enlightened and cultivated as a man. His representations to the British court led to the king of Delhi's receiving an addition to his income of £30,000, b. in Bengal, 1774; d. near Bristol, 1833.

he became tutor to a nobleman's son at the university of St. Andrew's. In 1710 he was at Cambray, where he was converted to the Roman Catholic religion by the celebrated Fénelon, whose life he wrote. He was afterwards employed as tutor to the duke de Château-Thierry, and made knight of the order of St. Lazarus. He was also engaged by the son of James II., called the Pretender, in instructing his children. His works are, "Discourse upon Epic Poetry," "Essay upon Civil Government," "Remarks on Shaftesbury's Characteristics," "History of M. de Turenne," "Philosophical Principles of Natural and Revealed Religion." b. at Ayr, Scotland, 1686; d. in France, 1743.

R S A X, Allan, a Scotch poet, who, at an early age, went to Edinburgh, where he became apprentice to a barber, but subsequently distinguished himself by several ingenious poems and songs in the Scotch dialect. His principal performance is a pastoral, entitled "The Gentle Shepherd." b. in Scotland, 1683; d. 1758.

RAMSAY, Allan, a Scotch portrait painter, and son of the preceding, whose early studies in drawing were made without the aid of any tutor; but he afterwards improved his skill by a visit to Italy. Lord Bute became his patron; and, through his means, he was introduced to George III., whose principal painter he became in 1767. The English school of portrait-painting was in a very crude condition at that period; but Ramsay was perhaps superior to most of the predecessors of Sir Joshua Reynolds. Two of his portraits of George III., when Prince of Wales, were engraved. He was an accomplished man beyond the immediate range of his profession, and was acquainted with the Greek, Latin, Italian, and French languages. b. at Edinburgh, 1713; d. at Dover, 1784.

RAMSAY, David, an American physician and historian, studied medicine in Philadelphia, and South Carolina. From 1776 to 1785 he distinguished himself first as a member of the legislature of South Carolina, and afterwards as a member of Congress. He laboured zealously with his pen to promote the independence of his country; and among his publications are, "The History of the American revolution," "The Life of Washington," and "The History of South Carolina." But his most elaborate work, consisting of a series of historical volumes, entitled "Universal History meridianised, or an Historical View of the World, from the earliest Records to the Nineteenth Century," &c., was published after his death. b. 1749; shot by a mine, 1815.

RAMSDEN, Jesse, rams'-den, an excellent English mechanic, who was at first a cloth-worker, but in his 23rd year apprenticed himself to a mathematical instrument maker in London. He pursued his new employment with so much success that he was engaged by the best mathematical instrument makers in the metropolis, and was enabled in 1768 to open a shop in the Haymarket; but in 1776 he removed to Piccadilly, where he carried on business till his death.

BIOGRAPHY.

Ramus

He greatly improved Hadley's quadrant or sextant; and invented a machine for dividing mathematical instruments, for which he received a premium from the Board of Longitude. Mr. Ramsden also improved the construction of the theodolite, and the barometer for measuring the heights of mountains. The pyrometer, for denoting the expansion of bodies by heat, also employed his talents; and he made many important discoveries and improvements in optics. He improved the refracting micrometer, the transit-instrument and quadrant, and procured a patent for an improved equatorial. His mural quadrants were admirable, and much sought after. Mr. Ramsden was chosen a fellow of the Royal Society in 1756. b. in Yorkshire, 1735; d. 1800.

RAMUS, Pierre, ra'-moos, a French philosopher and mathematician. His birth was mean, and he received his education in the college of Navarre, where he was a servant. He studied with such ardour as to be admitted to the degree of master of arts; his thesis on which occasion was an attack upon the doctrine of Aristotle, which occasioned a violent controversy, and Ramus was prohibited from teaching. But, in 1551, he was nominated to the professorship of philosophy and eloquence in the College of France. He was also obnoxious to the Sorbonne from being a Protestant; and in the massacre of St. Bartholomew, this learned and worthy man fell a victim. His principal works are, treatises on Arithmetic and Geometry; Greek, Latin, and French Grammars; a "Life of Cicero," with remarks on the Latin language; "Animadversions upon Aristotle;" "Commentaries upon Quintilian," &c. b. at Cuth, Picardy, about 1515; killed at Paris, 1572.

RAMUSIO, Giovanni Battista, rai'-moose'-o, was Secretary of the Council of Ten at Venice, and ambassador from that republic to France, Switzerland, and Rome. He made the first collection of voyages and travels that is known; the first volume of which appeared at Venice, 1550. b. at Treviso, Venetia, 1485; d. at Padua, 1557.

RANDOLPH, Sir Thomas, ran'-dolf, an English statesman, who was banished to France in the reign of Mary, on account of his religion. Queen Elizabeth employed him in several embassies, and rewarded him with knighthood, the offices of chamberlain of the exchequer and mastership of the posts. His letters are in different collections, and his account of Russia is contained in Hakluyt's "Voyages." b. in Kent, 1523; d. 1590.

RANDOLPH, Thomas, an English poet, who was a fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge, and the intimate friend of Ben Jonson, who used to call him his son. His poems abound with wit and humour. He was the author of several dramatic pieces. b. at Badby, Northamptonshire, 1605; d. 1635.

RANDOLPH, Thomas, a learned English divine, who became fellow, and afterwards president, of Corpus Christi College, Oxford. He wrote an answer to the "Essay on Spirit," a valuable discourse on Jephthah's vow, and several sermons. b. about 1710; d. 1783.

RANDOLPH, John, a learned prelate, son of the preceding, studied at Christchurch, Oxford, where he graduated, and in 1785 was elected to the regius professorship of divinity. He became, successively, bishop of Oxford, Bangor, and London. He was the author of "Prælectio de Linguae Græcæ Studio," &c., "Sullogæ Con-cessionum," "Concio ad Clerum," &c. b. 1749; d. 1813.

RANDON, Jacques Louis, Count, ran'-dawng, a distinguished French general and marshal was an illustration of the famous saying of the time of the empire, that every French soldier carried the baton of a marshal of France in his sapsack. He was but a sergeant in 1812, and gained the epaulette of a sub-lieutenant by gallant conduct at the battle of Moskowa. His bravery and skill as an officer, during the various campaigns in Africa, between 1833 and 1843, led to his rapid advancement. He was minister of war under the Republic, and under the second Empire he became governor-general of Algeria. In 1856 he was created marshal of France, and, soon afterwards, minister of war. b. at Grenoble, 1795.

RANKE, Leopold, rank, an eminent modern German historian, who at the outset of his career was engaged as teacher in the gymnasium of Frankfort-on-the-Oder; but having had from his earliest years a strong predilection for historical studies, he devoted all his leisure to the composition of a "History of the Roman and German People from 1494 to 1535;" on the publication of which, in 1824, it was found to be so full of accurate and discriminating knowledge, that its author received the appointment of professor of history in the University of Berlin. The government of Prussia next granted him the means of prosecuting his researches among the archives of Vienna, Rome, and Venice. The historian was thus enabled to produce his "Princes and Nations of South Europe in the 16th and 17th Centuries," and "The Conspiracy against Venice in 1689." In 1836 his reputation was established on the most substantial basis by his great work entitled "The Popes of Rome: their Church and State," of which an excellent translation was made by Mrs. Austin, and which likewise formed the foundation of one of Lord Macaulay's best essays. For about four years he edited the "Historical and Political Gazette," a print which, being deemed too liberal in its views, was suppressed in 1838. In 1841 he became historiographer of Prussia. The most important of his subsequent works were, "History of Germany during the Reformation," translated into English by Mrs. Austin; "Memoirs of the House of Brandenburg," and "History of Prussia during the 17th and 18th Centuries," and a "History of Servia and the Servian Revolution." b. near Naumberg, Prussian Saxony, 1795.

RANTZAU, Josias, Count de, ran'-so, a French marshal in the 17th century, was descended from an illustrious family in Holstein, and entered when young into the Swedish army. In 1635 he went to France with the chancellor Oxenstierna; and Louis XIII. being pleased with his agreeable manners, made him a major-general, and gave him the command of two regiments. He served under the duke of Orleans and the great Condé, with high reputation, rose to the rank of marshal, completed the conquest of Flanders, and was made governor of Dunkirk in 1646; but becoming an object of suspicion to Cardinal Mazarin, was confined 11 months in the Bastille, and died soon after his liberation, in 1650. During his different campaigns he was so often severely wounded, that at last he had but one eye, one ear, one arm, and one leg.

RAPHELENGIUS, François, ra-fel-lain'-je-oos, a distinguished French critic, who studied the learned languages at Paris, after which he went to England, and taught Greek at Cambridge. On his return, he published learned editions of several ancient writers, with notes, and was employed on the Polyglot Bible of Antwerp, printed in 1571. He was appointed professor of Hebrew and Arabic at Leyden. His other works are—a Hebrew Grammar, an Arabic Lexicon, and a Chaldaic Dictionary. B. near Lisle, 1639; D. at Leyden, 1597.

RAPIN DE THOYRAS, Paul de, rap'-ä, a French advocate, who afterwards became a historian. Obligated to leave France on the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, he visited England and Holland; and in 1698 accompanied William of Orange to England, and obtained a military command in Ireland; but, being wounded at the siege of Limerick, he disposed of his commission. He afterwards became tutor to the son of the earl of Portland, whom he accompanied on his travels. His "History of England," which is very excellent, was printed at the Hague in 1724, and was afterwards translated into English by Nicholas Tindal. B. at Caestre, 1661; D. at Wesel, 1725.

RAPP, Jean, Count de, rap, a French general, attracted notice by his skill and bravery in the early progress of the revolutionary wars; was aide-de-camp to General Desaix during his campaigns in Germany and Egypt, and filled the same situation under Bonaparte when first consul. In 1803 he was employed in the subjugation of Switzerland, defeated the Russian Imperial guard, and took Prince Repnin prisoner at the battle of Austerlitz. He was appointed governor of Dantzic in 1807, and after the retreat of the French army, defended the city with consummate ability and valour, till he was compelled by famine to capitulate. Returning to France in 1814 he was received with distinction by Louis XVIII., but joined Napoleon on his return from Elba. He was, however, again taken into favour by the king, and died lieutenant-general of the cavalry in 1821. B. 1772.

RASK, Erasmus Christian, rask, an eminent Danish philologist, who displayed an extraordinary aptitude for the acquisition of languages from his earliest years. He was the son of parents in the humblest circumstances; but his talents procured him patrons, who furnished him with the means of prosecuting his studies, first at the university of Copenhagen, and subsequently in Russia, Sweden, and Finland. In 1808 he was employed in a subordinate capacity at the University Library at Copenhagen, but was subsequently sent, at the cost of the Danish government, to Persia and India, whence he brought home a most valuable collection, consisting of upwards of a hundred old and rare oriental manuscripts. His later years were passed in the uninterrupted prosecution of his philological labours, and in the fulfilment of his duties as historical professor in the university of Copenhagen. His most important works were—an Armenian Dictionary; Anglo-Saxon Grammar; Investigations concerning the Northern or Icelandic Language; Spanish and Frisian Grammars; and a treatise on "The Age and Authenticity of the Zendavesta." B. in the island of Funen, 1787; D.

RASPAIL, François Vincent, ras'-pail, a modern French chemist and writer on scientific subjects, who, in 1825, was appointed editor of the natural history section of the "Bulletin des Sciences." Before that period he had been a successful writer upon scientific questions for various French journals. Two of his works were as remarkable for their originality as for their general excellence. These were, the "Natural History of Health" and the "Médecine of Pharmacie Domestique," the last of which was most efficiently reproduced in an English form by Dr. G. L. Strauss, in a work entitled "Domestic Medicine; or, Plain Instructions in the Art of Preserving and Restoring Health." M. Raspail was a man of strong political feelings, and, both with sword and pen, fought for the cause of republicanism. Under Louis Philippe he was twice imprisoned for his opposition to the government, and also from 1849 to 1854. On his release he retired to Belgium, but subsequently returned to France. B. at Carpentras, 1794.

RASTALL, or RASTELL, John, ras'-tel, an old English printer, who pursued his calling in London. His wife was the sister of Sir Thomas More, whose "Dialogues on the Worship of Images and Relics" he printed. He was himself an author, translator, and compiler, and is said to have written the "Anglorum Regum Chronicon, or Pastyme of People," which was included in the "Collections of English Chronicles" published in 1811. D. in London, 1596.

RATTAZZI, Urbano, ra-tad'-see, an Italian statesman, was a native of Alessandria, and at the age of twenty-one took his doctor's degree. He first practised at the bar of Turin, but was induced to remove to Casale in 1834, and in less than a year from that date had established a reputation as one of the most judicious and able lawyers in Italy. In the struggles of 1848, Signor Rattazzi acquired so much renown by his high attainments and liberal opinions that the electors of Alessandria returned him as their representative in the Assembly of Turin. He had scarcely arrived to take his seat there before he was intrusted by M. Casati with the ministry of public instruction. The latter minister, however, lived but a short time after this appointment, and Rattazzi occupied a distinguished place among the Opposition party. In 1849 the Abbe Giolberti, who was charged with the formation of a new cabinet, conferred on him the office of keeper of the seal, which he shortly afterwards exchanged for that of minister of the interior. On the fall of Giolberti from power, Rattazzi succeeded him as president of the council, where he used his influence to advance the impatient policy of Charles Albert, and, in the disastrous defeat which resulted from the measures adopted, remained firmly attached to his party. In 1853, Rattazzi was again appointed minister of the interior, and held that office till 1859, when, after the treaty of Villafranca, he superseded Count Cavour in the presidency, but was shortly afterwards compelled to relinquish the direction of affairs to the firmer hand of Cavour. In 1861, after acting for some time as president of the Chamber, Rattazzi once more became prime minister, having ousted Baron Ricasoli from power; but was himself forced to resign in the following year. He held office once more as premier of the kingdom of Italy for a few months in 1867. B. 1808.

and Thorwaldsen. He was extensively employed by the various governments of Germany, and produced a large number of works, some of them of great excellence. The statues of Göthe, Schiller, and the monument to Frederick the Great of Prussia, were his best productions. A reduced model of the last work is contained in the Crystal Palace at Sydenham. B. in the principality of Waldeck, 1777; D. 1857.

RAVAILLAC, François, ra-vai-yak, a French regicide, who at first assumed the religious habit of the Feuillans, but was expelled on account of his fanatical views. He afterwards became deranged in intellect by the discourses of the leaguers, and, conceiving that Henry IV. of France was not a true Catholic, he assassinated him in 1610. He was torn to pieces by wild horses. B. at Angoulême, about 1579.

RAVENSCROFT, Thomas, rai'-vans-kraft, an eminent English musical composer, who was educated in St. Paul's choir, and in his 15th year became bachelor of music of the University of Cambridge. His fine collection of part-songs, including the famous "Canst thou love and lie alone?" was first published in 1611. In 1621 he produced "The whole Book of Psalms, &c., composed into Four Parts by sundry Authors," which included contributions from the father of John Milton, Tallis, and Morley. Ravenscroft himself produced the justly-admired Bangor, St. David's, and Canterbury tunes. He is also supposed to have edited the famous collections of melodies known as the "Pamelia" and "Deuteromelia," a selection from which was printed by the Roxburgh Club in 1822. B. 1592; D. about 1640.

RAWLINSON, Richard, rau'-lin-son, a learned English antiquary, who collected materials for a continuation of Wood's "Athenæ Oxonienses" and "History of Oxford," which, with an account of his travels, he bequeathed to the University of Oxford, as well as a collection of medals and books. He also founded an Anglo-Saxon professorship in the same university; and his heart, agreeably to his own desire, was put in a marble urn and placed in St. John's College chapel. He published a translation of Fresnoy's "Method of Studying History," and other works. B. about 1700; D. 1755.

RAWLINSON, Sir Henry Creswicke, an eminent decipherer of the cuneiform inscriptions. In his 16th year he entered the military service of the East India Company, from which he retired in 1836, having won his way to the rank of lieutenant-colonel. He was also created a K.C.B., and appointed a director of the East India Company. His first efforts in the department of knowledge for which he became famous were in 1833, when he copied and read the Behistun inscriptions, in Kurdistan. While political resident at Bagdad, in 1843, he studied the inscriptions of Nineveh. He contributed many papers to the journals of the Asiatic and Geographical Societies; and in 1852 published "Outline of the History of Assyria, as collected from the Inscriptions discovered by A. H. Layard in the Ruins of Nineveh." He also put forth a "Memorandum on the Publication of the Cuneiform Inscriptions," and was employed to furnish copies of the Inscriptions discovered at Nineveh and Babylonia. B. at Chadlington, Oxfordshire, 1810.

but gave his son a good education at Braintree, whence he removed to Trinity College, Cambridge, where he became fellow and Greek and mathematical lecturer. While at the university, he cultivated the study of botany, which was then in a very neglected state; but, by his example and exertions, it became a favourite pursuit. In 1660 he published, in Latin, his "Catalogue of Plants Growing in the Neighbourhood of Cambridge," which laid the foundation of his "Synopsis Methodica Stirpium Britannicarum." The same year he was ordained by Bishop Sanderson; but in 1662 quitted his fellowship. After this he made numerous journeys over the kingdom with his friend Mr. Willughby and others, in search of botanical and zoological facts. He also accompanied the same gentlemen on an extensive tour over the continent of Europe, of which he published an account in 1673. He was chosen a fellow of the Royal Society in 1667, and contributed numerous papers to the "Transactions" of that learned body on subjects of natural history. In 1679 he fixed his residence near Black-Notley, Essex, where he continued perfecting his collections and works till his death. His botanical and zoological writings laid the foundations of the classification of the vegetable and animal kingdoms. His other works were, "Three Discourses on the Primitive Chaos, the Creation, Deluge, and Conflagration of the World;" several volumes attempting a classification of the whole animal kingdom; a translation of Rauwolf's "Travels in the East." After his death were published his "History of Insects," and a collection of "Philosophical Letters" between himself and several of his correspondents. Cuvier says that his labours "may be considered as the foundation of modern zoology; for naturalists are obliged to consult them every instant, for the purpose of clearing up the difficulties which they meet with in the works of Linnæus and his imitators." B. at Black-Notley, near Braintree, Essex, 1627; D. 1705.

RAYNAL, Guillaume Thomas François, rai'-nal, a French historian, who entered early into the society of Jesuits, and on taking priest's orders became a celebrated preacher, but quitted his order in 1748; on which he fixed his residence at Paris, where he had recourse to literature as a means of support. In 1770 he published his celebrated work, the "Philosophical and Political History of the European Commerce in both Indies," which obtained him a great reputation. In 1781 he published, at Geneva, a new edition of his history, greatly improved and enlarged. In 1791 he addressed a letter to the National Assembly, in which he exposed the dangerous course in which they were engaged, and predicted the evils which would result from revolution. His other works are, "History of the Stadtholdership;" "History of the Parliament of England;" "History of the Divorce of Henry VIII. of England;" "On the Revolution of the English Colonies in North America." B. at St. Geniez, 1713; D. 1796.

READE, Charles, D.C.L., reed, a modern English novelist of great power and originality, who was called to the bar in 1843, after a successful career at Oxford, which culminated in his being made fellow of Magdalen College. His best work, perhaps, is "Never too late to Mend," while his latest, bear-

REAUMUR, René Antoine Ferchault, Sieur de, rei-aw'-mur, an eminent French philosopher, who was educated for the legal profession, but abandoned it for the study of mathematics, philosophy, and natural history. In 1703 he was admitted a member of the Academy of Sciences. His principal works are, "A History of Insects;" "A History of the Rivers of France;" and numerous papers in the Memoirs of the Academy of Sciences. He was the inventor of the valuable instrument known as Réaumur's thermometer. Of his work on insects, Cuvier declares "that he unceasingly excites our curiosity by new and singular details. His style is diffuse but clear, and the facts which he relates may always be depended upon." B. at Rochelle, 1683; D. 1757.

REBOULT, Jean, reb'-ool, a modern French poet, was the son of a locksmith, and himself followed the calling of a baker until the year 1830, when he repaired to Paris, where a brilliant reception awaited him, in consequence of the great popularity his poems had attained in the capital. The merit of bringing him before the public was due to M. de Lamartine, who addressed to the baker-poet one of his harmonies, entitled "Genius in Obscurity." He published several collections of poems, some of which ran through as many as six editions. His songs are frequently of the Annæreontic order. One of his tragedies was produced upon the French stage in 1850, and obtained a great and deserved success. In 1848 he was sent to the Constituent Assembly as the representative of his native department. B. at Nîmes, Gard, 1798; D. 1864.

RECORDS, Robert, rek'-ord, an English physician and mathematician, was the first who wrote on algebra in the English language. B. about 1500; D. in London, 1568.

REDDING, Cyrus, red'-ding, an English literateur, who, after editing the "Plymouth Chronicle" and other prints, went to Paris to undertake the literary direction of "Galignani's," an English journal founded in the French capital after the second return of the Bourbons. He subsequently became sub-editor of the "New Monthly Magazine," while under the editorship of Thomas Campbell, and after discontinuing his connexion with that periodical, became editor of several provincial newspapers. He published, among other works, a "Naval Gazetteer," "Every Man his own Butler," and a "History and Modern Wines." B. in Cornwall, 1755.

REEDS-DALE, John Freeman Mitford, Baron reeds'-dale, an eminent English lawyer and statesman, was educated at New College, Oxford, and having studied at Lincoln's Inn, was called to the bar. Devoting himself to chambers practice, he soon obtained a high reputation; and, in 1782, published "A Treatise on Pleadings in Suits in the Court of Chancery." He was afterwards made a Welsh judge. In 1780 he was chosen M.P. for Brecknock; in 1793 he was appointed solicitor-general, and in that capacity assisted in conducting the state trials of Hardy, Horne Tooke, and Thelwall. He succeeded Sir John Scott (Lord Eldon) as attorney-general in 1799; and in 1801 was elected speaker of the House of Commons, on the resignation of Mr. Addington. He was raised to the peerage in 1802, and made lord chancellor, and a member of the privy council in Ireland; but resigned the seals in March, 1806, in consequence of the death of Pitt. B. 1748; D. 1830.

REED, Isaac, reed, a critic and miscellaneous writer, was bred to the profession of a conveyancer, which he relinquished for literary pursuits. He published the poems of Lady Mary Wortley Montagu, edited the Seatonian prize poems, and revised and enlarged Dodsley's "Old Plays." He afterwards published the "Biographia Dramatica," and four volumes of humorous pieces, under the title of the "Repository;" but his most important work is an edition of Shakspeare, in 10 volumes, which he extended afterwards to 21 volumes, embodying in its pages all the most valuable notes and elucidations of former commentators, with much original information. He was also a great book collector, and after his death his library was sold by auction, the sale lasting 39 days. B. 1742; D. 1807.

REDGRAVE, Richard, red'-grair, a modern English painter, whose early youth was spent in his father's office, where he was employed in making designs and working drawings. In 1826 he became a student of the Royal Academy; eleven years later he obtained his "first success" as an artist, on exhibiting his picture of "Gulliver on the Farmer's Table," at the British Institution. From that period he gradually rose to a foremost position in his profession. In 1840 he became associate, and in 1857 an academician. His best paintings are—"The Sempstress," an illustration of Thomas Hood's "Song of the Shirt;" "A Poet's Study;" "Solitary Pool;" "Little Red Riding-hood;" "The Midwood Shade." His work entitled "The Country Cousins" is an excellent one, and was painted for Mr. Vernon. It now belongs to the nation, and may be seen in the British collection at the South Kensington Museum. He was appointed head master of the government school of design, and published an "Elementary Manual of Colour." B. in London, 1801.

RIET, Francis, ret'-id, an Italian naturalist, who became professor of philosophy at Pisa, and physician to the grand-duke Ferdinand II. of Tuscany. He assisted in compiling the Dictionary of the Academy della Crusca, and wrote some poems; but is chiefly known by his works on natural history, which are—"Experiments on the Generation of Animals," "Observations on Vipers," "Experiments on Natural History," &c. &c. brought from India. B. at Ai

REEKS, Abraham, rees, a laborious compiler, came of a family of dissenting clergymen. He was, during 20 years, professor of mathematics in the 1 College at Hoxton, and afterwards came professor of theology college HACKNEY. He first published an enlarged edition of the Encyclopedia of Chambers, and subsequently produced a work of the same kind himself, under the title of the "New Encyclopedia," in which work he was assisted by several talented men. B. in Wales, 1743; D. in London, 1825.

REEVE, Clara, rees, a novelist, was the daughter of a clergyman, and possessed great learning, which she displayed in her first literary essay, a translation of Barclay's "Argenis." Her productions are, "The REGIOMONTANUS, re-gi-o-mont'-nus, a German astronomer, whose real name was Müller, studied at Vienna under Purbach, whom he succeeded in the chair of astronomy, 1461. He was taught the Greek language by Theodore Gaza, and was thus enabled to read Ptolemy and other mathematicians of antiquity. He visited several countries, and received marks of distinction from sovereign princes, particularly Sixtus IV., who made him archbishop of Ratisbon, and employed him in reforming the calendar. He wrote extensively upon astronomy. s. in Germany, 1436; d. at Rome, 1476.

REGNARD, Jean François, rain'-yar, a French comic writer, who was fond of travelling, and in a voyage from Genoa to Marseilles was taken by an Algerine pirate, and carried to Algiers, where by his skill in cookery he obtained the favour of his master; but being detected in an intrigue, was condemned to suffer death or turn Mohammedan. The French consul being made acquainted with the affair, ransomed him and sent him to France, after which he travelled through Flanders, Holland, Denmark, Sweden, and Poland. His dramatic works, which rank next to Molière's, were published in 1823. s. 1650; d. 1709.

REGNIER, Mathurin, rain'-yai, a French satirical poet, who secured the patronage of Cardinal Joyeuse, and obtained a pension and a canonry. The best edition of his poems is that of Paris, 1822. s. 1573; d. 1613.

REGNIER, François-Seraphin, a learned French author, whose talents recommended him to the patronage of the duke de Crequi, whom he accompanied to Rome in 1662. While there, he wrote Italian sonnets in so good a style as to be admitted a member of the Academy della Crusca. In 1684 he succeeded Mezeray as secretary of the French Academy. His most important works were a French grammar; an Italian translation of Anacreon; French, Latin, Spanish, and Italian poems; and a history of the disputes of France with the court of Rome. s. at Paris, 1632; d. 1713.

REGNIER, Claude Antoine, duke of Massa, minister of justice under the government of Napoleon, practised as an advocate at Nancy, was a member of the Constituent Assembly, retired from public affairs during the Reign of Terror; but after the fall of Robespierre became a member of the Council of Ancients, and took an active part in the senate. He assisted in the elevation of Bonaparte as first consul; in 1802, was appointed grand judge, minister of justice, &c.; and in 1813 became president of the legislative body. s. 1736; d. 1814.

REGULUS, Marcus Atilius, reg'-u-lus, a Roman consul, who, in his second consulate, defeated Amilcar and Hannu in a naval engagement off the coast of Sicily. This victory was followed by another on land, and the reduction of several places. The Carthaginians sued for peace, which was refused. Xanthippus, a Spartan commander, coming with reinforcements to the Carthaginians, defeated Regulus, who was taken prisoner. The Carthaginians subsequently sent him as envoy to Rome to propose terms of peace, but on the condition of his return. Regulus advised the senate not to comply with the terms, for which the Carthaginians put him to a cruel leath, 251 B.C. The senate gave his widow leave to avenge her husband's death on some illustrious Carthaginians, which she did with such barbarity as obliged them to stop her progress.

REICHARDT, John Frederic, ri'-shard, a musical composer and author, studied under Kant, was director of the Italian Opera at Berlin, and subsequently had the direction of the French and German theatres at Cassel. Among his compositions, which are very numerous, are he "Tamerlane" of Morel, and the "Panthea" of Berquin. His literary productions are, "Familiar Letters written during a Journey in France in 1792, and again in 1803 and 1804," "Familiar Letters on Vienna," &c.; and "Napoleon Bonaparte and the French People under his Consulate," &c. s. 1751; d. 1814.

REID, Thomas, reed, a learned Scotch divine, who was educated at the parish school of Kincardine and at Marischal College, Aberdeen, where, in 1752, he became professor of philosophy. In 1764 he succeeded Dr. Adam Smith in the chair of moral philosophy in the university of Glasgow. His chief works are "An Inquiry into the Human Mind," and "Essays on the Intellectual and Active Powers of Man." s. in Kincardineshire, 1709; d. 1796.

REID, Major-General Sir William, a distinguished English general of engineers, who received his education at the Royal Military Academy at Woolwich, and began his career as lieutenant of the Royal Engineers in 1809. He became captain in 1814, brevet lieutenant-colonel in 1837, brevet-colonel in 1851, and major-general in 1856. Within a year of receiving his first commission he was sent to the Peninsula, and served to the end of the war. He was at the three sieges of Badajoz, the siege of Ciudad Rodrigo, the siege of the forts and the battle of Salamanca, the sieges of Burgos and San Sebastian, and the battles of Vittoria, Nivelle, Nive, and Toulouse; and was wounded at Badajoz, Ciudad Rodrigo, and San Sebastian. He was present at the attack on Algiers under Lord Exmouth in 1816. In 1832 he was employed at Barbadoes in rebuilding the government offices which had been destroyed by a hurricane in the preceding year; and then he first conceived the idea of endeavouring to trace the laws which govern the movements of these agents. Subsequently, as governor of Bermuda, Barbadoes, and Malta, as chairman of the executive committee of the Great Exhibition of 1851, and as the author of the "Law of Storms," he rendered signal services to his country. At the close of the Exhibition he was made a K.C.B., and the government of Malta was conferred upon him, which he administered during the Crimean war. His well-known work on the "Law of Storms"—that is, on the laws of motion of the tropical whirlwinds—was founded in a great measure on his own experience in the West Indies, where he had been on military duty before his government of Bermuda. This work is not merely a theoretical investigation, but of eminently practical value to all who have to navigate in the seas, both of the East and West Indies. s. at Kinglassie, Fifeshire, 1791; d. 1858.

REID, Captain Mayne, a modern novelist, who was the son of a minister of the Irish Presbyterian church, and was designed for the ecclesiastical profession; but being possessed with an ardent desire to see the world, he abandoned his theological studies, and, before he had attained his twentieth year, set out for America. He resided for some time upon the banks of the Red River, hunting and trading with the Indians. In 1840 he was at New Orleans, where he joined a body of volunteers, who were about to proceed against the Mexican armed bands which had invaded Texas. After five years of a wandering life upon the prairies of Missouri, he repaired to Philadelphia, and having spent a few months as a writer for the journals, joined the American army with the rank of captain. In the war against Mexico, he signalized himself by his bravery on several occasions. In 1849 he intended to take service under the popular banner of the Hungarians; but the unexpected capitulation of Gorze having put an end to the struggle, his hopes of military employment in the cause of liberty were frustrated. He next entered upon a literary career, and produced a series of novels, which met with a very successful reception. The best-known were "The Rifle Rangers," "The Scalp-Hunters," "The White Chief," and "Oceola," which latter first appeared in the pages of "Chambers's Journal." At a later period he employed himself in producing works for juvenile perusal; and here again he became a favourite with a large number of readers. His success may be attributed to the fact that he wrote in a vigorous and graphic style, and describes incidents and scenery which have ever been attractive to youthful minds—viz., such as are to be found in the Far West, and among the wandering Indian tribes. B. in Ireland, 1818.

REINHOLD, Erasmus, riné-holte, an eminent German astronomer and mathematician, who was professor at the university of Wittenberg, and wrote some mathematical and astronomical works of a most important and valuable nature. B. at Saalfeld, 1511; D. 1553.

REINHOLD, Charles Leonard, a German metaphysician, who received his education among the Jesuits, but quitted them to pursue the study of philosophy. He afterwards repaired to Weimar, where he married the daughter of Wieland. In 1786 he published "Letters upon the Philosophy of Kant," and in the following year was appointed professor of philosophy at Jena, where his lectures were very numerous; attended. In 1794 he went to Kiel, where he held the professorship of philosophy until his death. Reinhold was among the first to appreciate and propagate the theories of Kant; but he subsequently bent towards the ideas of Fichte. He conceived that a great deal of the misconception of the views of these philosophers arose from the obscurity of their language; and consequently undertook to compose a work the object of which was to reform the phraseology adopted in metaphysical works. He was a most prolific writer. He also produced a "Letter to Lavater and Fichte, respecting the Belief in God." B. at Vienna, 1758; D. at Kiel, 1823.

REISK, John, risek, a learned German writer, who published a treatise "On the Sibyls and other Oracles," "On Ahasuerus and Esther," "On the Malady of Job," "On the Images of Jesus Christ," and other works of erudition. B. 1641; D. 1701.

REISKE, John James, a learned German critic and physician, who became rector of the college of St. Nicholas, at Leipsic, and published, among many other learned works,

Renan

"Oratores Græci," an edition of Dionysius Harcarnassensis, the works of Plutarch, and a Latin translation of Abulfeda's "History of the Arabs." B. in Saxony, 1716; D. 1774.

RELAND, Adrian, rué-lund, a learned Dutch writer, who, at the age of 21, was chosen professor of philosophy at Harderwyk; whence he removed to Utrecht, on being appointed professor of oriental languages and ecclesiastical antiquities. His principal works are "Dissertations on the Medals of the Ancient Hebrews," "Introduction to Hebrew Grammar," an edition of Epictetus, and a magnificent work upon the Antiquities of Palestine. B. at Alkmaar, in Holland, 1676; D. at Utrecht, 1718.

REMBRANDT VAN RYN, Paul, rem-brant, an eminent Dutch painter and etcher, acquired his art under several of the best painters of Amsterdam, and early in life grew famous. He had many pupils, whom he employed in making copies of his works, which he retouched and sold for large sums. His love of money was intense, and at his death he left a large fortune. In painting historical subjects he was less successful than in portrait, where he displayed a brilliancy of colouring and a power of light and shade that was truly astonishing. His best etchings realize from 30 to 100 guineas. Several fine paintings of his are in the National Gallery. B. near Leyden, 1606; D. at Amsterdam, 1669.

REMI, St., rem-r, archbishop of Rheims, converted Clovis to Christianity, and baptized that monarch. D. 533.

REMY, Joseph Honoré, advocate in the Parliament of Paris, who wrote a burlesque called "Days," in opposition to Young's "Night Thoughts;" but his principal work is an eulogy on Chancelleur de l'Hôpital, which was crowned by the French Academy in 1777, and censured by the Sorbonne. He also wrote the eulogies of Molière, Colbert, and Fénelon. B. 1738; D. at Paris, 1782.

RENESSAT, Jean Pierre Abel, re-moo-sé, an eminent French orientalist, and professor of the Chinese and Tartar languages at the College of France. He acquired, without the assistance of a tutor, the Chinese, Tibetan, and Manchou languages. He was one of the founders of the Asiatic Society at Paris, and became conservator of the oriental manuscripts in the Bibliothèque Royale. His attainments as a Chinese scholar were very high, and he produced a number of works on the most difficult languages in the world, of a most excellent character. His principal productions were—"Elements of the Chinese Grammar;" "Researches upon the Tartarian Languages;" a "History of Buddhism;" an edition of a Chinese novel, entitled "The Two Cousins;" and a volume of Chinese tales. He also contributed several valuable articles to the "Biographie Universelle," and to the "Journal des Savans." B. at Paris, 1788; D. 1832.

RENAN, Joseph Ernest, rai-nan, a French philologist, who has acquired celebrity for his "Life of Jesus," published in 1863, and, in a lesser degree, for his knowledge of Hebrew, Arabic, Syriac, and other Eastern languages. In 1840 he was sent on a mission to Syria, and there visited many of the localities mentioned in the New Testament in connection with Our Saviour, whom Renan seeks to divest of his divine attributes. B. at Tréguier, Cot. du Nord, 1823.

Renaudot

RENAUDOT, Theophrastus, ren'-o-do, a French physician, was the first who published, in France, a gazette, so called, as is supposed, from the Venetian coin una gazetta, for which such papers were originally sold at Venice. Renaudot obtained the privilege of publishing the "Gazette of France" for himself and family. His other works are, "An Abridgment of the Life of the Prince de Condé," and the "Life of Cardinal Mazarin." b. at Loudun, 1683; n. 1653.

RENAUDOT, Eusebius, a learned French writer, and grandson of the preceding, entered into orders, and distinguished himself by his knowledge of the Arabic, Syriac, and Coptic languages. The Cardinal de Noailles took him to Rome, where Clement XI. gave him the priory of Fossey, in Brittany. On visiting Florence, the grand-duke gave him apartments in his palace, and the Academy of that city chose him a member. He was also a member of the French Academy and of other learned societies. His most important works are, a continuation of Nicole's book on the "Perpetuity of Faith," "History of the Jacobite Patriarchs of Alexandria," in Latin; "A Collection of the Ancient Oriental Liturgies," "Account of India and China," translated from the Arabic; and a translation of the "Life of Athanasius" from the Arabic. b. at Paris, 1646; p. 1720.

RENNELL, Major James, ren'-nel, an eminent English geographer, who, early in life, entered the navy, and served under Admiral Parker at the taking of Pondicherry. At the age of 20 he abandoned the naval for the military service, having entered the engineers of the East India Company. Under Lord Clive he served with considerable distinction, was wounded, and gained the rank of major. In 1732 he returned to England, and henceforth pursued his investigations in geography, history, and topography. He produced—"Map and Memoir of Hindostan;" "Marches of the British Army in the Peninsula of India during the Campaign of 1791;" "Observations on the Topography of the Plain of Troy;" "Treatise on the Comparative Geography of Western Asia," with a very valuable atlas; an "Investigation of the Currents of the Atlantic Ocean," a work which Lieutenant Maury, of the United States navy, afterwards extended and improved. Major Rennell also published, "Geographical System of Herodotus explained and examined," and a learned commentary upon the "Retreat of the Ten Thousand Greeks." Mungo Park was much indebted to his patient research and great acquirements in the production of his work on his African travels. He was a member of the Royal Society, and a frequent contributor to its "Transactions," as well as to those of the Antiquarian Society. A most interesting paper, read to the latter body, was his disquisition on the landing-place of Julius Cæsar in Britain. After his death, his remains were honoured with a place in Westminster Abbey. Though unacquainted with the Greek language, and knowing Herodotus only through a most inefficient translation, he, by virtue of his unrivalled sagacity, produced a work illustrative of "the father of history" which entitles him to the highest reputation as a geographer. b. near Chudleigh, Devonshire, 1742; d. 1830.

RENNIE, John, ren'-ne, a Scotch mechanician, and civil engineer, was the son of a farmer, and from his earliest youth had a great inclination for the study of what is termed "mechanical drawing." He also studied chemistry and mechanics under Drs. Black and Robison at Edinburgh, and, after working during some time as an operative mechanist, repaired to London about 1780. He was at first employed in the metropolis to superintend the construction of steam-engines and machinery; but, at a later period, became engaged in designing and erecting public works. He built a bridge over the Thames, and the Southwark iron Bridge over the same river. The Grand Western Canal, from the mouth of the Exe to Taunton; the Aberdeen Canal, and the Kennet and Avon Canal, were his best works in inland navigation. He was no less distinguished as a designer of docks; London Docks, the East and West India Docks, and those of Greenock, Leith, and Liverpool, attesting to his great acquirements as a civil engineer. The designs for London Bridge were made by him, but were carried to completion by his son, Sir John Rennie, after his death. He likewise furnished plans for the improvement of the dockyards at Portsmouth, Plymouth, Chatham, and Pembroke; erected the pier at Holyhead, and designed the enlargements of the harbours of Berwick, Newhaven, &c. His remains were interred in St. Paul's Cathedral. b. at Phantassie, Haddingtonshire, Scotland, 1761; d. in London, 1821.—His sons, George and John (the latter of whom was knighted on the completion of London Bridge), were also distinguished civil and practical engineers, and executed many important works, both in Great Britain and on the continent.

REPP, Thorleif Gudmunsson, rep, an eminent modern Icelandic writer, who for a short time held the post of under-librarian to the Advocates' Library at Edinburgh. He contributed articles to the "Penny Cyclopædia," "Encyclopædia Britannica," and "Blackwood's Magazine;" and, among other important works, co-edited, with Ferrall, a Danish and English Dictionary, and an edition of the "Sagas" in Icelandic. b. 1794.

REPTON, Humphrey, rep'-ton, an eminent English "landscape gardener," who, between the years 1785 and 1811, was engaged in improving the gardens of the English nobility and gentry throughout the kingdom. He published several works upon his profession, which were afterwards re-edited and improved by Mr. London. b. at Bury St. Edmunds, 1752; d. 1818.

RETHEL, Alfred, rait'-el, a celebrated German painter, whose genius for art was evinced at an early age; as, in his 15th year, he produced a series of crayon drawings, the composition, truthfulness of outline, and correct expression of which were very remarkable. His first large subject in oil was entitled "The Establishment of Christianity in Gaul," in which was displayed rare originality of treatment. Among his later pictures was one of which a strange story is told; it was called "Nemesis Pursuing a Murderer," and was of such a forcible and harrowing character as to cause its owner, a certain personage of high rank, who had been guilty of some undiscovered crime, and who had won the painting in a lottery at Frankfort, to become a lunatic. Rethel subsequently produced a series of frescoes, which are admitted to rank among the chef-d'œuvre of German art. At a later period he took up his residence at Rome, where he devoted himself to the composition of a series of paintings illustrative of the campaigns of Hannibal. Not less remarkable for vigour of imagination and power of design, were his book illustrations; among which may be cited, "Death, the Consoler and the Avenger," and his drawings made for "Beeton's Illuminated Family Bible." B. 1816.

RETZ, Jean François Paul de Gondi, Cardinal de, raitz, was descended from a powerful and wealthy family, and was educated for the church, a profession little suited to his unscrupulous and debauched disposition. In 1643 he was dignified. In the civil wars of the Fronde he raised a regiment, to which he gave the name of Corinth, because he was titular archbishop of that place. At length he made peace with the court, on condition of his being created a cardinal; but he still continued to cabal against the government, for which he was imprisoned at Vincennes and Nantes. He made his escape from the latter place, and travelled in several countries. In 1661 he returned to France, and obtained his pardon and the abbey of St. Denis. This turbulent prelate wrote "Memoirs" of his own life, and the "History of the Conspiracy of Count Fiesco." B. at Montmirail, 1614; D. at Paris, 1679.

RETZSCH, Moritz, raitsh, an eminent German designer, who, after studying at the Dresden Academy, became, in 1824, professor of painting in the same institution. It was not as a painter, however, but as a designer, that he became famous. His etchings in outline, illustrative of Göthe and Shakspeare, are works of great beauty and power, and became as popular in England as in the native country of the artist. He also produced a set of illustrations to Bürger's "Lenore," and to several poems of Schiller. B. at Dresden, 1779; D. 1857.

REUTER, Julius, roil-ter, a clever German, who, in 1849, first conceived the idea of setting up a great central office in connection with all parts of the world for the transmission of commercial and political intelligence, which he carried out in London from 1851 to 1869, when he sold his business to the British Government, who were then buying up the rights of all the British telegraph companies. B. about 1815.

REYNIER, Jean Louis, rai-ne-at, a Swiss, who entered the corps of engineers of the French army, and rose by his skill and valour to the grade of adjutant-general in 1794, and to that of general of brigade in the following year. He served under Moreau in the army of the Rhine in 1796, accompanied Bonaparte to Egypt in 1798, and signalized himself by his bravery at the battle of the Pyramids. He defeated 20,000 Turks before El-Arish. After the murder of General Kleber he became involved in a dispute with his successor, quitted Egypt in 1801, and was, upon his return to France, disgraced and exiled. Recalled in 1805, he was given a command, and took part in the conquest of Naples and Calabria. He was subsequently minister of war at Naples, and fought at Wagram, in Spain, and in Russia, but was taken prisoner at Leipzig in 1813. Recovering his liberty, he repaired to Paris, where he resided until his death. He left some works upon Egyptian antiquities, &c. B. 1771;

REYNIER, Jean Louis Antoine, was brother of the preceding, and became a government official under Murat at Naples. He wrote, among other works, "Public and Rural Economy of the Ancient Peoples," and "Egypt under the Romans." D. about 1820.

RIBAS, Sir Joshua, rei-bas, a celebrated English painter, was the son of a clergyman, and was intended for the profession of medicine; but having a great taste for drawing, he resolved to make painting his profession, and accordingly was placed, in his 15th year, under Hudson, the portrait painter. In 1749 he went to Italy, on board the vessel of the Honourable Mr. Keppel, his early friend and patron. After studying the works of the most illustrious masters at Rome during two years, he returned to London, where he found no encouragement given to any other branch of the art than portrait painting. He was thus under the necessity of complying with the prevailing taste, and in that walk soon became unrivalled. The first picture by which he distinguished himself, after his return, was the portrait of Commodore Keppel. He did not, however, confine himself to portraits, but painted several historical pictures of high and acknowledged merit. When the Royal Academy was founded, in 1768, he was appointed president, which station he held, with honour to himself and advantage to the arts, till 1791, when he resigned it. He was also appointed principal painter to the king, and knighted. His literary merits, and other accomplishments, procured him the friendship of the most distinguished men of his time, particularly Johnson, Barrow, Goldsmith, and Garrick; and Sir Joshua had the honour of instituting the celebrated literary club of which they were members. He was likewise a member of the Royal and Antiquarian Societies; and was created doctor of laws by the universities of Oxford and Dublin. Sir Joshua's academical judgment, the most refined taste, a perfect acquaintance with the works of the greatest masters, and are written in a clear and elegant style. B. at Plympton, Devonshire, 1723; D. 1792, and was buried in St. Paul's Cathedral.

RHAM, Rev. William Lewis, raa, a modern writer upon scientific agriculture, was of Dutch parentage, but brought to England at an early age. After completing his education at the university of Cambridge, he entered upon holy orders, and was appointed to a living in Norfolk. He wrote the agricultural articles for the "Penny Cyclopaedia," the greatest portion of which was subsequently reproduced in a work entitled "The Dictionary of the Farm;" an "Essay on the Analysis of Soils," and "Flemish Husbandry," for the "Library of Useful Knowledge." He was likewise a contributor of articles upon agriculture and rural matters to the "Gardener's Chronicle." B. at Utrecht, 1774; D. at Winkfield, Berkshire, 1844.

RHAZES, rai-raz, a famous Arabian physician of great learning, who wrote a great number of works upon medicine. His treatise upon small-pox and measles is the most ancient account of these disorders extant. D. at Bagdad about 932.

RIBAS, Joseph de, rei-bas, a general in the Russian army, was a native of Naples, and being at Leghorn at the time Alexis Orloff arrived there with his fleet for the purpose of carrying off the natural daughter of the empress Elizabeth, whom Prince Radziwil had taken to Rome and then abandoned, he assisted in this undertaking, and then went to Russia to obtain from Catharine II. the reward of his services. After attending on the son of the empress by Gregory Orloff, in his travels, he obtained a regiment of carabineers; and in 1790 commanded, with the rank of admiral, the fleet destined for the attack of Kilia and Ismail, to the success of which he greatly contributed. Having again signalized himself in her service, both as an officer and a diplomatist, the empress in 1792 made him a rear-admiral, and gave him a pension of 20,000 roubles.

RIBERA, Anastasius Pantaleon de, re'-bai-ra, a Spanish poet, called the Scarron of Spain. On account of his wit he was entertained at the court of Philip IV. His poems, printed at Saragossa in 1640, are of the burlesque kind. B. at Madrid, 1686; d. 1660.

RIBERA, José. (See SPAGNOLETTA.)

RICARDO, David, re-kar'-do, an English writer upon political economy, who was educated for a commercial career by his father, a member of the London Stock Exchange. Having acquired a large fortune in the same pursuit, he in 1819 entered the House of Commons, where he distinguished himself in the debates upon subjects of finance. As a writer, his fame mainly depends upon his work entitled "The Principles of Political Economy and Taxation;" but he likewise made several important contributions to political science in his essay on the "Influence of a Low Price of Corn on the Profits of Stock," "Proposals for an Economical and Secure Currency," "Protection to Agriculture," &c. In financial questions he took a foremost part, both in the parliamentary debates, and as the author of "The High Price of Bullion a Proof of the Depreciation of Bank Notes," and "Reply to Mr. Bosanquet's Practical Observations on the Report of the Bullion Committee." He remained in Parliament until his death. B. in London, 1772; d. 1823.

RICASOLI, Bettino, Baron, re-cas'-o-le, an Italian statesman, a native of Tuscany, was educated at Florence, and for many years tacitly acquiesced in the system of government pursued by the grand-duke. After 1848, however, he endeavoured to induce the Tuscan ruler to grant fair and moderate concessions to his people; but failing in his efforts, retired from the arena of politics for a time, protesting, however, against the intrusion of the Austrians. After the battle of Novara and the return of the grand-duke, he took no further part in public affairs till 1850; and on the Austrians being compelled to withdraw, and the abdication of the grand-duke in 1859, he actively exerted himself in promoting the incorporation of Tuscany with the Italian kingdom. In 1860 an unsuccessful attempt was made upon his life, and in the March of that year he undertook the chief post in the government of Tuscany. When Count Cavour died in 1861, Baron Ricasoli's high character and reputation for capacity and patriotism pointed him out as the proper successor of Italy's great statesman, and he accordingly became premier, in which position he endeavoured to carry out the policy of Cavour. His somewhat stern and cold manners, however, made him distasteful to the king, and in 1862, a court intrigue induced him to resign, when he was succeeded by M. Rattazzi, and retired into private life, until 1866, when he again became premier, resigning once more in 1867. He has always enjoyed the respect of all parties in the country. B. 1809.

RICAUD, or RYCAUD, Sir Paul, re'-ko, an English writer and diplomatist, who in 1861 became secretary to the earl of Winchelsea, ambassador to Constantinople, and while there wrote "The Present State of the Ottoman Empire," published in London, 1870. He was subsequently consul at Smyrna during eleven years; and in 1835 became secretary for the provinces of Leinster and Connaught, in Ireland. King William appointed him his resident for the Hanse Towns, where he remained ten years. His other works were, "A Continuation of Knolles's History of the Turks;" "A Continuation of Platina's Lives of the Popes;" "A Translation of Vega's Royal Commentaries of Peru." B. about 1625; d. 1700.

RICCI, or RIZZI, Sebastian, rié'-che, an eminent Italian painter, who visited and worked in Vienna, Paris, and London, at all which places he acquired considerable distinction. He decorated the ceilings and staircases of several mansions of the English nobility, and painted a picture of the Ascension in the cupola of Chelsea Hospital. The staircase of Montagu House, afterwards the British Museum, was also painted by him. After residing in London during ten years, he quitted it when Sir James Thornhill was appointed to paint the dome of St. Paul's Cathedral, a task which he deemed himself better qualified to perform. B. 1659; d. 1734.

RICCI, Laurence, an Italian Jesuit, and the last general of the order, to which office he was elected in 1753; but when the society was suppressed in 1773, Ricci and some of his fraternity were confined in the castle of St. Angelo at Rome, where he died in 1775. B. 1703.

RICCIONE, Luigi, rié'-ko-bo'-ne, an Italian actor and dramatic writer, who performed at the Italian Theatre in Paris during some years; but in 1729 renounced the stage from religious scruples. He wrote several comedies, and a "Discourse of the Reformation of the Theatre;" observations on "Comedy" and on the "Genius of Molière;" "Historical Reflections on the Theatres of Europe," and a "History of the Italian Theatre." B. at Modena, about 1674; d. 1753.

RICH, James Claudius, rié', an eminent Oriental scholar, who was born in France, but was brought to England while an infant. By the time he had attained his fifteenth year, his remarkable talents for the acquisition of the Oriental languages enabled him to become versed in Arabic, Hebrew, Persian, Syriac, and Turkish. These acquirements gained for him, in 1803, the appointment of writer in the service of the East India Company. He afterwards became secretary to the consul-general in Egypt; but that functionary having died before Mr. Rich had entered upon his duties, he was permitted to travel through Egypt and Turkey, for the purpose of acquiring the Turkish and Arabic languages and dialects. Disguised as a Mameluke, he travelled in Syria and Palestine, and, trusting to his knowledge of the manners of the country, entered the grand mosque at Damascus, with the pilgrims who were proceeding to Mecca. In 1807 he returned to Bombay, where he took up his residence at the house of Sir James Mackintosh, whose daughter he married. In 1808 he proceeded to Bagdad, as resident of the East India Company. While holding that post, he made a valuable collection of manuscripts, gems, and coins found at Nineveh, Bagdad, and Babylon; and also amassed the materials for his "Memoir on the Ruins of Babylon," which was published first at Vienna, and subsequently in England. In 1813 he was compelled by the state of his health to leave Bagdad; and he proceeded to Paris, stopping at Constantinople on his way; but returned to his duties in 1815. He was awaiting instructions at Shiraz from Bombay, when his death took place. His most RICHARD I., Richard, duke of Normandy, was the son and successor of William, surnamed "Longsword." He took part in the elevation of Hugh Capet to the French throne. D. 996.

RICHARD II. was son and successor of the preceding, and formed an alliance with Robert II., king of France. His dominions were troubled by several internal dissensions, which he succeeded in quelling. He was succeeded by his eldest son Richard. D. 1027.

RICHARD I., king of England, surnamed Cœur de Lion, ascended the throne on the death of his father, Henry II., in 1189. His reign commenced with a fearful riot, and massacre of the Jews. In 1190, Richard joined the crusade with Philip Augustus of France; but dissensions taking place between the two kings, the latter departed from Palestine. Richard remained in the East, where he displayed the most impetuous valour against Saladin, whom he defeated near Casarea; and having made a truce, embarked in a vessel which was shipwrecked on the coast of Italy. He then travelled in disguise through part of Germany; but being discovered by his enemy, Leopold duke of Austria, he was made prisoner, and sent to the emperor Henry VI., who kept him confined in a castle in the Tyrol, bound with chains. At length he was ransomed by his subjects for 100,000 marks, and landed at Sandwich in 1194, after which he was crowned a second time. Philip Augustus having, contrary to treaty, seized on part of Normandy, Richard invaded France with a large army; but a peace was concluded in 1196. The war was renewed in 1199, and Richard, in besieging the castle of Chalus, in Aquitaine, received a wound from an arrow, of which he died. B. at Oxford, 1157; D. 1199.

RICHARD II. was the second son of Edward, Prince of Wales, commonly called the Black Prince, and succeeded Edward III., his grandfather, in 1377. In his minority he displayed remarkable promptitude in quelling the dangerous insurrection headed by Wat the Tyler, in Smithfield. When that insurgent was slain by Watworth, lord mayor of London, the young king, then about fifteen years of age, rode up to the irritated populace, and said, "Follow your king; I will be your leader, and redress your grievances." The people, struck with astonishment, obeyed the call, and dispersed quietly to their own homes. When the government had quelled the revolt, no grievances were redressed, but, instead, more than 1500 were executed on the scaffold. The remainder of Richard's reign was unfortunate. Dissensions prevailed among the nobility, of which Henry duke of Lancaster, availed himself, and assumed the title of king. (See HENRY IV.) Richard was betrayed into his hands by the earl of Northumberland in 1399, taken to London, and confined in the Tower, where he abdicated the throne before the assembled magnates of the kingdom. B. at Bordeaux, 1366; supposed to have been assassinated at Pontefract Castle, 1400.

RICHARD III. was the brother of Edward IV., and created duke of Gloucester. He caused his nephews, Edward V. and Richard duke of York, to be secretly murdered in the Tower; after which he was himself proclaimed king in 1483. The duke of Buckingham, who had assisted him in his usurpation, subsequently conspired against him, but was taken prisoner and beheaded. Henry earl of Richmond, afterwards

Henry VII., of the house of Lancaster, was called, but returned privately and landed at Milford, in Wales, where he was joined by a few followers, who soon increased. He then marched against Richard III., whom he encountered at Bosworth Field, where, after performing prodigies of valour, the king was slain, and his body placed on the head of the Henry. The character of Richard III. has been most variously represented by different historians: Walpole declared that all the crimes attributed to him were mere fabrications. It is, however, certain that he was a most unscrupulous as he was talented, energetic, and determined. B. at Fotheringhay Castle, Northamptonshire, 1452; killed, 1485.

RICHARD PLANTAGENET, earl of Cornwall, titular king of the Romans and emperor of Germany, was the son of John, king of England, and was elected to his German titles in 1250, but resided only a short time in the country. At the battle of Lewes, in 1264, he was taken captive by De Montfort, and was imprisoned in Kenilworth Castle. From his natural daughter Isabel, who became the wife of Maurice de Berkeley, the earls of Berkeley claim to be descended. B. at Berkhampstead, 1272.

RICHARD OF CREXWISTLE, an old English historian, who was a monk of the Benedictine monastery of St. Peter, Westminster, wrote upon Saxon and British history, and a "Description of Britain" in Latin, the manuscript of which was discovered at Copenhagen in 1747. The historian Gibbon declares that the author "shows a genuine knowledge of antiquity very extraordinary for a monk of the 14th century." By some critics the genuineness of the work has been doubted, but it is included in a volume of Bohn's "Antiquarian Library." His "Historia ab Henrico" commences with the arrival of the Saxons in Britain. D. about 1402.

RICHARD, Louis, an eminent French botanist, was dispatched by Louis XVI. to Guinea and Martinique, where he made a rich and vast collection of plants. During the Revolution he remained in obscurity, but subsequently became professor of botany and a member of the French Institute. He produced an excellent edition of Balliard's "Elementary Dictionary of Botany," and was also the author of a "Manual of Botany," which is a classical work in France. He likewise wrote articles on botany for various French scientific journals. B. at Versailles, 1754; D. 1821.

OF BIOGRAPHY.

Richardson

RICHARDSON, Jonathan, rich-ard-son, an English portrait painter, who was one of the best English artists before Reynolds. He also wrote the "Theory of Painting," and an essay upon the art of criticism as it relates to painting. b. about 1665; d. in London, 1745.

RICHARDSON, Samuel, an eminent English novelist, was the son of a joiner, whose circumstances did not permit him to give the future author more than a very ordinary education; after which he was bound apprentice to Mr. Wilde, a printer in London. At the expiration of his time, he became foreman and corrector of the press in his master's establishment. At length he set up in business for himself, first in a court in Fleet Street and afterwards in Salisbury Square. He became one of the foremost printers in London; and, by the interest of Mr. Onslow, speaker of the House of Commons, obtained the printing of the journals of that House. In 1754 he was chosen master of the Stationers' Company, and in 1760 purchased a moiety of the patent of law-printer to the king. In 1740 he made his first appearance as author, by publishing "Pamela," the outline of the plot of which he had heard some years before; and, says he, "I thought, if written in an easy and natural manner, suitable to the simplicity of it, it might possibly turn young people into a course of reading different from the pomp and parade of romance-writing, and, dismissing the improbable and marvellous, with which novels generally abound, might tend to promote the cause of religion and virtue." This work, which may be considered as the precursor of the regular English novel, at once became highly successful, and encouraged the author to proceed in the same career. His next performance was "Clarissa Harlowe," which is esteemed his masterpiece, though his novel of "Sir Charles Grandison" possesses great beauties. Besides these works, he published a volume of "Familiar Letters" for the use of young people; an edition of Æsop's Fables, with reflections; and a paper in the "Rambler." His correspondence with persons of eminence was published in 1804, with his life, by Mrs. Barbauld. Richardson possessed an amiable and friendly disposition, and had a strong sense of religion. b. in Derbyshire, 1689; d. 1761.

RICHARDSON, Joseph, a lawyer and poet, was entered at St. John's College, Cambridge, in 1774; became a student of the Middle Temple in 1779, and was called to the bar in 1784. He wrote "Criticisms on the Rolliad" and "Probationary Odes for the Laureateship," two satirical works on public characters, which were very popular at the time; and "The Fugitive," a successful comedy. b. in Northumberland; d. 1803.

RICHARDSON, William, a poet and miscellaneous writer, was a son of the minister of Aberfoyle, and was educated at the University of Glasgow. He accompanied Lord Cathcart, who had been his pupil, to Russia; and was for more than 40 years professor of humanity at Glasgow. Among his works are, "Anecdotes of the Russian Empire," "Essays on Shakspeare's Dramatic Characters," "Observations on the Study of Shakspeare," poems, and tales. d. 1814.

RICHARDSON, Dr. Charles, a modern English philologist, who was educated for the profession of the law, but quitted it for philology. In 1805 he produced his "Illustrations of English Philology," and subsequently undertook the lexicographical portion of the "Encyclopædia

Richelieu

Britannica." His greatest work was completed in 1837, under the title of "Richardson's Dictionary of the English Language," which is, in many respects, superior to that of Dr. Johnson. His subsequent works were on the study of languages, some remarks upon certain doubtful passages in the writings of Shakspeare, and a number of valuable articles upon philology, inserted in the "Gentleman's Magazine." d. 1775; d. 1865.

RICHARDSON, Sir John, an eminent Arctic traveller, who was in 1801 sent to the University of Edinburgh, and afterwards entered the royal navy as assistant-surgeon. In 1819 he was attached to the Arctic expedition under Captain (Sir John) Franklin, as surgeon and naturalist, and again in 1825. After nearly two years of arduous service, he returned in 1827, and published an account of his services, in a narrative which was attached to the great work produced by Captain Franklin. After distinguishing himself by his works on the zoology of the northern parts of British America, he became, in 1838, physician to the fleet, in 1840 inspector of hospitals, and in 1846 was created a knight. In 1847, no tidings having been obtained of the vessels which had been dispatched to the Arctic regions under Sir John Franklin, three expeditions were sent out by the British government, the command of one of which was intrusted to Sir John Richardson. He started from Montreal, in Canada, in April, 1848, and returned to the same place at the close of the following year. He published a narrative of his journey, in a work entitled "The Arctic Searching Expedition: a Journal of a Boat-voyage through Rupert's Land and the Arctic Sea, in Search of the Discovery-ships under Sir John Franklin." This work contained a large amount of valuable information relative to the geology, natural history, and the mode of life of the Indians and Esquimaux inhabiting the country through which the expedition passed. As a naturalist he produced some important works, the chief of which were, "The Zoology of the Voyage of H.M.S. Erebus and Terror, under the command of Sir James Ross, during the years 1839-43," the "Fossil Mammals" to the "Zoology of Captain Kellett's Expedition in 1845-61," and "Notes on the Natural History of Captain Sir Edward Belcher's Expedition, during the years 1852-54." d. at Dumfries, 1737; d. 1865.

RICHELIEU, Armand du Plessis de, reeshl-yu(r), a celebrated French cardinal and statesman, who, after completing his studies in divinity, repaired to Rome, in order to obtain the bishopric of Luçon from the pope. On his return to France, he advanced himself into favour by an insinuating address, and for his eloquence was appointed almoner to Mary de Medici, through whom he obtained, in 1616, the appointment of secretary of state; but the death of his friend the Marshal d'Ancre occasioned his temporary disgrace, on which he retired to Avignon. Louis XIII., however, recalled him to the ministry, and he soon took the lead in the management of public affairs. Having a great hatred towards the Calvinists, he pressed the siege of Rochelle in person, and, by his vigorous efforts, compelled it to surrender in 1628. He next devoted himself to the humbling of the house of Austria, at that period the greatest power in Europe. Gregory XV. made him a cardinal, and he was also created a duke and peer of France. Notwithstanding his ambition and cruelty, he had great qualities. He founded the French Academy, established the royal botanical garden, and was a liberal patron of men of letters. He wrote his own "Memoirs," which were published at Paris in 1823. n. at Paris, 1585; n. 1642.

RICHHELIEU, Louis François Armand du Plessis, duke of, a French marshal, was a scion of the same family as the cardinal. After the death of Louis XIV. he was admitted into the court of the regent, duke of Orleans, and largely participated in its profligacy. He was sent to the Bastille in 1716 for fighting a duel with the Count de Gacé, and again in 1719, as an accomplice with the Spanish ambassador in a conspiracy against the regent. He subsequently joined the army, and distinguished himself under Villars, and afterwards at Kehl, Philippsburgh, Dettingen, and Fontenoy; conquered Minorca, forced the duke of Cumberland to submit to the capitulation of Closterseven, and devastated the electorate of Hanover. In 1781 he obtained the rank of dean of the French marshals; and concluded his long career in 1788. n. 1696.

RICHHELIEU, Armand Emanuel du Plessis, duke of, grandson of the preceding, emigrated at the commencement of the revolution, entered the Russian service, and distinguished himself at the siege of Ismail, for which he was rewarded with the rank of major-general. In 1801 he revisited France, when Bonaparte endeavoured to attach him to his service; but he returned to Russia, and in 1803 was appointed governor of Odessa, which city, by his prudent measures, he raised from insignificance to a high pitch of prosperity. On the restoration of the Bourbons, he took his seat in the Chamber of Peers, accompanied Louis XVIII. to Ghent, and, returning with him to Paris after the battle of Waterloo, was appointed president of the council of ministers, and placed at the head of the foreign department. He soon resigned this post, but again held the office of prime minister in 1820. n. 1776; n. 1822.

RICHMOND, Legh, rick'-mond, a clergyman of the established church, became chaplain to the Lock Hospital, Loudon, and afterwards rector of Turvey, in Bedfordshire. He is principally known as the author of "Annals of the Poor," containing the "Dairyman's Daughter," and other devotional tales. He also wrote a work entitled "The Fathers of the English Church," &c. n. at Liverpool, 1772; n. 1827.

RICHTER, Jean Paul Frederic, reezh'-ter, a distinguished German author, was the son of a village pastor, under whom he received his earliest education, but was afterwards sent to school, and finally, in 1780, to the university of Leipsic, where, although he suffered extreme want, he pursued a brilliant career. Having no other means of support, he determined to apply himself to literature, and produced two or three works, but obtained little success in his new employment. In 1785 he returned to the cottage of his mother, then a widow. He next found employment as tutor in a family, and continued to be thus engaged till his pub-

1807, he received an annual pension of 1000 florins. Henceforth his life flowed on in the uneventful pursuit of literature. As a writer he is distinguished by his originality, profound learning, and, indeed, obscurity; for even among his countrymen a key to his works has been found necessary. An excellent translation of a fine work by him, entitled "Flower, Fruit, and Thorn Pieces," has been published. In "Carlyle's Miscellanies," some interesting essays on Richter's works are to be met with. Carlyle has likewise translated some specimens of the great German author in his "German Romance." n. near Haireuth, 1763; n. 1825. —The name of Richter has been borne by several learned German writers; one of whom, Charles Frederic Richter, wrote some esteemed works upon Biblical antiquities. n. 1812.

RICORD, Philip, rik'-o, an eminent modern French physician, who went to Paris in 1820 to study his profession under Dupuytren, Lisfranc, and other celebrated men. He subsequently became the most extensively employed physician of the French capital, and although he specially studied and illustrated by his writings some particular forms of disease, he displayed, both in his works and in his writings, a profound acquaintance with all the ills that afflict humanity. So clear and elegant is the style in which his works are written, that his compatriots surnamed him the "Marivaux of Medicine." Among his more important works were a collection of observations and researches communicated to the "Memoirs" of the Academy of Medicine. n. at Baltimore, U.S., 1800.

RIDLEY, Nicholas, rid'-le, a learned English bishop and martyr, who received his education at Pembroke College, Cambridge, where he was elected fellow in 1524. His great abilities and piety recommended him to the notice of Archbishop Cranmer, through whom he was made chaplain to the king. In the reign of Edward VI. he was nominated to the see of Rochester, and had a principal share in framing the Liturgy, Articles, and Homilies. In 1550 he was translated to the bishopric of London, and by his interest with the young king he obtained the foundation of the noble charities of Christ's Hospital, St. Bartholomew's, and St. Thomas's in Southwark. On the decease of Edward, he unfortunately joined the friends of Lady Jane Grey, for which, and his zeal in the Reformation, he was by Queen Mary sent to Oxford, to dispute with some of the popish bishops, and on his refusing to recant, was burnt there opposite Balliol College, in company with Bishop Latimer, in 1555. He wrote against transubstantiation, and his sermons and letters were printed after his death. n. in Northumberland, about 1540.

RIEGO, Raphael del Riego y Nunez, re-ai'-go, a Spanish patriot, who fought against the French in 1808, and was made prisoner; and, upon recovering his liberty, in 1814, became lieutenant-colonel of the regiment of Asturias. He shared in the conspiracy of 1819, and when Quirós and others were arrested, raised the RIENZI, Cola, or Nicola Gabrino di, re-ain'-dse, an obscure Roman, who had received an excellent education, which was improved by a strong will and vigorous understanding. He was sent by his fellow-citizens to Clement VI., at Avignon, in order to prevail upon that pontiff to return to Rome. His cloquence pleased the pope, though it did not persuade him. Rienzi, on his return, formed the design of making himself master of Rome, with the title of tribune. Having gained a considerable number of partisans, he entered the Capitol, harangued the people, and elevated the standard of liberty. He designed to unite the whole of Italy into one great republic, with Rome for its capital. For some time he was successful, his government was popular, and even Petrarch wrote in his favour, comparing him to Brutus. At length a conspiracy was formed against him, and, having lost the popular favour by his arrogance and tyranny, he was compelled to seek safety in flight, but was taken and put to death. The incidents of his life form the basis of one of the finest of Bulwer's novels, that called after the Roman tribune's name. B. about 1310; slain in a revolt, 1352.

RIGAUD, or RIGAUT, Nicholas, re'-golte, a learned French philologist, was educated among the Jesuits, who endeavoured to prevail upon him to enter their order, which he refused, and embraced the profession of an advocate. On Casaubon's going to England, Rigault succeeded him as librarian to the king, who appointed him procureur-general of the supreme court of Nancy. He was afterwards intendant of the province of Toul. His works are—excellent editions of Martial, Juvenal, Tertullian, and Minutius Felix, with observations and notes upon other classics. B. 1577; p. 1654.

RIGAUD, Hyacinthe, re'-go, an eminent French portrait painter, who became director of the Academy of Painting, and was granted letters of nobility, and the order of St. Michael, by Louis XV. He has been called the Vandyck of France. B. at Perpignan, 1659; p. 1743.

RILEY, John, ri'-le, an English artist, who, after the death of Sir Peter Lely, gained considerable reputation and employment as a portrait painter. B. in London, 1643; p. 1691.

RINUCCINI, Octavius, re'-noo-che'-ne, Italian poet, who accompanied Mary de' Medici to France, and became gentleman of the chamber under Henry IV. The operas of Rinuccini are greatly admired, and his poetry is elegant. B. at Florence, about 1560; p. 1621.

RIPON, Frederick John Robinson, Earl of, rip'-on, an English statesman, and popularly known as "Prosperity Robinson," from the glowing colours in which he was in the habit of depicting the commercial condition of the country, was the younger son of Thomas, second Lord Grantham, and received the rudiments of his education at Sunbury, but was afterwards placed at Harrow, where he was the schoolfellow of Sir Robert Peel, Lord Aberdeen, and Lord Palmerston, and also of Lord Byron. From Harrow he proceeded to St. John's College, Cambridge, where he obtained Sir William Browne's medal for the best Latin ode in 1801, and graduated M.A. in the following year. In 1804 he was appointed private secretary to Lord Hardwicke, then lord-lieutenant of Ireland. In 1807 he was returned for Ripon, which he continued to represent for twenty years. After filling various subordinate offices, he was appointed President of the Board of Trade in 1818, Chancellor of the Exchequer in 1834, created Viscount Goderich, and made secretary for the Colonies in 1827, and on the death of Mr. Canning in the autumn of that year became prime minister, which position, however, he held only for a few months. On the formation of Lord Grey's ministry in 1830, he resumed the seals of the Colonial office, which post he held till 1833, when he was appointed lord privy seal, and was created earl of Ripon. In 1834 he retired from the Grey ministry; and in 1841 accepted the office of President of the Board of Trade under Sir Robert Peel. He subsequently presided over the Board of Control, and finally retired from official life on the breaking up of Sir Robert Peel's administration in 1846. B. 1782; p. 1859.

RIPPEDA, John William, Baron de, rip'-pai'-da, a Dutch adventurer, who was descended from an ancient Spanish house, served some time as colonel of infantry in the Dutch service during the war of the Spanish Succession, and in 1715 was nominated ambassador to the court of Spain, where he gained the favour of Philip V., who made him a grandee of the kingdom and minister of war and finances; but afterwards he fell into disgrace, and was imprisoned at Segovia. He escaped thence, and, going through Portugal, reached England; whence he went to Holland. Lastly, he made a voyage to Morocco, where he turned Mohammedan, but endeavoured to introduce a new religion, compounded of Christianity, Judaism, and Mohammedanism, B. at Groningen, about 1630; p. at Tetuan, 1737.

RISTORI, Adelaide, ris'-to-re, an eminent Italian actress, was the daughter of a strolling player, and played, herself, children's parts at the age of four years. At 15 she attracted the notice of the famous tragic actress Charlotte Marchionni, who gave her some invaluable counsel. Upon her marriage with the young Marquis del Grillo, she retired from the stage; but was induced to return to it by the triumphs she obtained when playing, for a single occasion, at the benefit of one of her old friends. She was playing at Rome in 1849, and divided her time between the theatre and her duties as an attendant upon the wounded in hospital. In 1855 she appeared at Paris, where she excited the utmost enthusiasm. On repairing to London, shortly afterwards, an equally brilliant reception greeted her; which she also experienced in Germany and Russia. The talents of Madame Ristori were rich and varied: tragedy, comedy, and even broader dramatic works, were all within the compass of her genius. B. at Cividade, 1821.

RITSON, Joseph, rit'-son, an English lawyer and eminent antiquary. He became a conveyancer in Gray's Inn; but having purchased, in 1785, the office of high bailiff of the liberties of the Savoy, he devoted the remainder of his life to literature. His principal works are "Observations on Johnson and Steevens' Edition of Shakspeare," "Cursory Criticisms on Malone's Edition of Shakspeare," "Observations on War-ton's History of English Poetry," "Collections of English and Scotch Songs," "English Anthology," "Metrical Romances," "Bibliographia Poetica." B. at Stockton, Durham, 1752; p. 1803.

gent American astronomer, who served his apprenticeship to a clockmaker, and was afterwards a farmer; but pursued his mathematical and astronomical studies with such success, that, in 1769, the American Philosophical Society requested him to make observations on the transit of Venus over the sun's disc, which he performed with great accuracy. He succeeded Franklin as president of the above-named society. Several of his papers are in the American "Transactions." n. at Philadelphia, 1732; n. 1796.

RITTER, Karl, rit'-ter, a modern German geographer, who, upon the completion of his studies at the university of Halle, became tutor in a nobleman's family, and made a tour with his pupils in Italy, France, and Switzerland. In 1820 he was appointed professor extraordinary of geography in the university of Berlin, after which time he devoted himself to his favourite science. His most important works were, "Portico of a History of the European Peoples before Herodotus," "Geography in Relation to the Character and History of Mankind," "An Introduction to Universal Comparative Geography," "A Glance at the Sources of the Nile," and "A Glance at Palestine and its Christian Population." He was a member of the Academy of Berlin, and a foreign member of the Royal Society of London. n. at Quedlinberg, 1779; n. 1860.

RIVAROL, Anthony de, re'-va-rol, a French writer, who translated Dante's "Inferno," and published a "Discourse on the Universality of the French Language," crowned by the Academy of Berlin in 1784; "Letters on Religion and Morality;" "A Little Almanack of Great Men," a satire; "Letters to the French Nobility;" "The Political Life of La Fayette;" and "Prospectus of a new Dictionary of the French Language." n. at Bagnols, 1757; n. at Berlin, 1801.

RIVIERE, Mercier de la, rev'-e-air, a celebrated French political economist, who obtained the post of counsellor of the Parliament of Paris in 1747; was afterwards made intendant of Martinique; and, on his return, published his noted work, entitled "L'Ordre naturel et essentiel des Sociétés Politiques." n. 1791.

RIZZIO, or RICCIO, David, rit'-so, an Italian musician, who played and sung with equal excellence, and, accompanying the ambassador of the duke of Savoy to the court of Mary, queen of Scotland, became the favourite of that princess, who made him her secretary for foreign languages. This gave such offence to Henry Darnley, her husband, that he and his associates assassinated Rizzio in her presence, in 1566. (See MARY STUART.)

ROBERT I., king of France, rob'-ert, was the second son of Robert the Strong, and younger brother of Rudes, who also became king of France. He was chosen king at Soissons, in 922, to the prejudice of Charles the Simple. He was, however, killed at the battle of Soissons in the following year. Hugh the Abbot was his son, and Hugh Capet the Great his grandson.

ROBERT II., king of France, called the Saxe and Devout, was crowned in 986, on the death of Hugh Capet, his father. He married his cousin Bertha, but Pope Gregory V. declared the marriage void, and excommunicated the king, who took for his second wife the daughter of the Count of Arles and Provence. n. about 970; n. 1031. He was an accomplished prince.

ROBERT I., duke of Normandy, surnamed the Magnificent and the Devil, succeeded his father, Richard III., having, it is said, poisoned his elder brother Richard. He repressed several revolts in his dominions, attacked Baldwin III., Count of Flanders, and attempted to defend Alfred and Edward, the sons of Edmund, who had been exiled from the English throne by Canute. To expiate the errors of his youth, he made a pilgrimage to the Holy Land, but died upon his return, it is said of poison. He left only one son, the celebrated William the Conqueror. n. at Nicea, 1035.

ROBERT II., duke of Normandy, was the eldest son of William the Conqueror. He had recourse to arms against his father, who was compelled to cede the duchy of Normandy to him. He sold nearly a third of his territories to his younger brother Henry, afterwards Henry I. of England, for the sum of £3000. The latter invaded Normandy in 1105, and, after a sanguinary battle beneath the walls of Tenchebrai Castle, Robert, with 400 of his knights, was taken prisoner. He was afterwards confined for the remainder of his life in Cardiff Castle. Some historians assert that his sight was taken away by his merciless brother Henry, but William of Malmesbury declares that his only punishment was that of solitary imprisonment during twenty-eight years. n. 1057; n. 1133.

ROBERT I., king of Scotland. (See DAVID, Robert.)

ROBERT II., king of Scotland, was the son of Walter, the High Steward of Scotland, who had married a daughter of Robert Bruce, and was the founder of the house of Stuart, the name of the office held in the royal household by their ancestors being adopted as a surname by the family when they came to the crown. During the infancy and exile of David II., the successor of Bruce, the Steward held the reins of government in conjunction with the earl of Moray. The portrait of this gallant founder of a line of Scottish and English kings was thus given by Fordun: "He was a comely youth, tall and robust, liberal, gay, and courteous; and for the innate sweetness of his disposition, generally beloved by true-hearted Scotchmen." When David II. was taken prisoner by the English at Neville's Cross in 1316, the Steward was for the third time appointed regent, and, during the subsequent 11 years, administered the affairs of the kingdom with remarkable sagacity. In 1339, two years after the release of the king, the Steward was created earl of Strathearn, and, upon the death of David, in 1371, was declared king by the title of Robert II. After the demise of Edward III. of England, hostilities were renewed between the two countries, and, while the English laid waste the north in one direction, the Scotch advanced into England, and appeared before Calisle. After a short truce, the battle of Otterburne, or Chevy Chase, was fought, between the English, under Earl Percy, and the Scotch, under Earl Douglas. The Scotch were victorious, but at the cost of their leader's life. King Robert had now grown old and infirm, and the nobles of the kingdom began to regard Robert, his son, as their leader. In 1390 he retired to his estate in Ayrshire, and remained in seclusion until his death. n. 1316; n. 1390.

ROBERT III., king of Scotland, was the son and successor of the preceding. During the first nine years of his reign he ruled in peace; but, in 1399, Henry IV. of England marched, at the head of a large army, into Scotland as far as Edinburgh, which city was successfully defended by the duke of Rothesay, the king's eldest son. In 1401 Hotspur (Henry Percy) advanced to Preston, in East Lothian, and the king's troubles were augmented by the death, at the age of 24, of his eldest son, the duke of Rothesay, who had been seized, imprisoned, and, it is supposed, murdered, by his uncle, the duke of Albany. Shortly afterwards, his army was twice defeated by the English, and the king, suspicious of the ambitious designs of his brother, the duke of Albany, sent his only surviving son, James, earl of Carrick, to France; but the prince was captured on his voyage by an English vessel. (See JAMES I. of Scotland.) This last misfortune broke the heart of the Scottish king. b. about 1340; d. 1406.

ROBERT, Hubert, an eminent French architectural painter, who made drawings of nearly all the great monuments and buildings of Rome. His most celebrated pictures are,—“The Catacombs of Rome;” “The Burning of the Hôtel-Dieu at Paris;” “The Tomb of Marius;” and “The Musée Napoléon.” b. 1733; d. 1808.

ROBERT, Leopold, an eminent French painter, who studied under Gerard and David, and perfected his talents in Italy, where he executed many of his finest pictures. His greatest works are, the “Neapolitan Improvisatore,” “The Reapers,” and “Venetian Fishermen.” b. 1794; committed suicide at Venice, 1835.

ROBERT, Nicholas, an eminent French miniature-painter, who also excelled in depicting flowers, plants, and insects. For Gaston, duke of Orleans, he painted a magnificent collection of miniatures of all those objects. It is preserved in the Cabinet du Roi at Paris. b. at Langres, about 1710; d. 1784.

ROBERT OF GENÈVA was elected pope by fifteen cardinals, in 1378, and took the name of Clement VII. He was recognised as head of the Church in Spain, France, Scotland, and Sicily, whilst the rest of the Christian world acknowledged Urban VI. as the true pontiff. This double election caused a long schism, which continued till some time after his death. d. at Avignon, 1394.

ROBERT OF GLOUCESTER, an old English historian, whose Chronicle of English affairs was written in verse, and ends shortly before the commencement of the reign of Edward I. He is supposed to have been a monk in the abbey of Gloucester, but nothing is known as to his personal history. There are several copies of his work, which was edited by Hearn, and published in 1721. Lived in the 13th century.

ROBERT OF LINCOLN, surnamed Grosseteste or Greathead, an English prelate, who, in 1235, succeeded to the diocese of Lincoln. He was a learned divine, and a firm supporter of the rights of the English church against the pope, the king, and several of the most powerful persons. He made a number of translations from the Greek, some of which have been printed. b. about 1175; d. 1253.

ROBERTS, David, an eminent Scotch painter, who was intended for the trade of a house-painter, but who, about 1831, went to London, where, during several years, he worked as a scene-painter, in conjunction with his friend Stanfield. By degrees he abandoned scene for architectural painting, and having obtained some success in the latter walk, he visited Spain in 1832, and upon his return, published a collection of drawings, entitled “Spanish Sketches,” which fixed his reputation. From that period his rise was rapid; he became A.R.A. in 1839, and two years afterwards a full academicien. To enumerate a few of the best subjects of this confessedly the finest architectural painter of his time, will serve to show the bent of his genius. Perhaps the greatest work of the kind which has ever been given to the world is his “Holy Land, Syria, Arabia, Egypt, and Nubia,” a collection of lithographs which were admirably reproduced upon stone by Mr. Louis Haghe. His best Eastern pictures were,—“The Outer Court of the Temple at Edfou,” “Jerusalem from the Mount of Olives,” and the “Statue of the Vocal Memnon on the plain of Thebes.” His “Chancel of the Collegiate Church of St. Paul at Antwerp” is a magnificent effort of pictorial art, and is contained in the national collection at the South Kensington Museum. “Rome,” “Christmas-day in St. Peter’s at Rome,” “Approach to the Grand Canal,” are among his best Italian subjects. b. at Stockbridge, Edinburgh, 1796; d. 1864.

ROBERTSON, William, rob-ert-son, an historian and divine of the church of Scotland, was educated at the university of Edinburgh, where he took the degree of doctor in divinity; and, having entered into orders, became one of his majesty’s chaplains in ordinary for Scotland, and was offered considerable preferment in the church of England, which he declined. His first work was the “History of Charles V.,” in which are displayed superior powers of discrimination, together with an elegant and very luminous style. For this he was appointed royal historiographer for Scotland. He was also elected principal of the university of Edinburgh. His other works were, “The History of Scotland,” not altogether void of partiality; the “History of America,” and an “Historical Disquisition concerning India.” He was a man of amiable manners and brilliant accomplishments. b. at Edinburgh, 1721; d. 1783.

ROBERTSON, Thomas William, one of the most talented and original dramatic authors of the nineteenth century, and a contributor to “Caste,” “Home,” and “School.” His novels, “David Garrick,” founded on his comedy of that name, and “Stephen Caldricke,” appeared originally in “The Young Englishwoman,” one of Beeton’s popular magazines. b. January 9, 1820.

ROBESPIERRE, François Maximilien Joseph Isidore, rob-es-pe-air, the famous French revolutionist, was the son of a provincial advocate, and was educated at the expense of the Bishop of Arras. After completing his studies at Paris, he entered upon the profession of the law, but with no great success. Upon the outbreak of the Revolution he became a member of the National Assembly, and in a short time rose to be the chief of the Jacobins. He declared that “France must be revolutionized,” and was soon named public accuser. Having risen to power, he, to maintain it, had recourse to the most cruel expedients. The prisons were crowded with unfortunate victims of all ages and of both sexes. Numbers were daily put to death, and the streets were deluged with blood,

Robins

At length a conspiracy was formed against him: he was accused of seeking his own aggrandizement by getting rid of his old colleagues, and was condemned to death. He was taken, and was contrived to effect his escape, and marched against the Convention; yet he had not sufficient personal courage to turn the tide once more in his own favour, and was again taken prisoner. He attempted to destroy himself by a pistol-shot, but only succeeded in breaking his jaw, and in that condition was, with twenty-two of his associates, dragged to the scaffold. His character has been severely decied, but deservedly so. He was cowardly and cruel, but eloquent and unmercenary. His partisans surnamed him the "Incorruptible," and at his death he was worth but 50 francs. n. at Aris, 1759; guillotined, 1794.

ROBINS, Benjamin, rob'-in, an eminent English mathematician and artilleryist. His parents were Quakers; but he abandoned that form of faith soon after he had settled in London as teacher of mathematics. He distinguished himself by confuting a memoir by Bernouilli on the "Force of Bodies in Motion," and by a demonstration of the last proposition of Newton's "Treatise on Quadratures." In 1742 he published his "Principles of Gunnery," the result of his own experiments,—an admirable work, which is without a superior in its particular walk, even at the present day. He also contributed to the improvements in the royal observatory at Greenwich, and in 1749 was appointed engineer in general to the East India Company. n. at Bath, 1707; d. at Madras, 1751.

ROBINSON, Rev. Edward, rob'-in-son, a learned American divine, who, upon the completion of his educational career, repaired to Paris, and afterwards to Halle, in Prussia, in order to study the Oriental languages and literature. After spending some time in the Holy Land, he in 1811 produced his "Biblical Researches in Palestine, Mount Sinai, and Arabia Petraea," a very learned and valuable work. After his return to his native country, he became professor of Biblical literature in the Theological Seminary at New York. He also translated the Greek Lexicon of Buttmann and the Hebrew Lexicon of Gesenius; and wrote a "Commentary on the Apocalypse," "Dictionary of the Bible," and "Harmony of the Four Gospels," in English. n. in Connecticut, U.S., 1791; d. 1863.

ROBINSON, John, rob'-in-son, a Scotch mathematician, who became professor of natural philosophy at Glasgow. In 1770 he accompanied Admiral Sir Charles Knowles to Russia, and was made director of the marine cadet academy at Cronstadt. On his return to his native country, he was appointed professor of natural philosophy at Edinburgh. He was the author of the "Elements of Mechanical Philosophy," some of the articles in the "Encyclopædia Britannica," and a curious work entitled a "History of the German Illuminati." n. at Boghall, Stirling, 1739; d. at Edinburgh, 1805.

ROBINSON, George, robb'-son, a distinguished painter of landscapes in water-colours, and also eminent as a draughtsman, whose first publication was a view of the city of Durham, with the profits of which he made a tour in the Scottish Highlands, the result of which was a work entitled "Outlines of the Grampian Mountains." This brought him fame and emolument; and he continued to produce many excellent works, the most prominent of which are a "View of London Bridge before Sunrise," and "Picturesque Views of English Cities." n. at Durham, 1788; d. 1833.

ROB ROX, rob' roi', "Robert the Red," a famous Highland freebooter, whose real name was Robert Macgregor, but who took that of Campbell in consequence of the clan Macgregor being outlawed. Previously to the rebellion of 1715, in which he joined the standard of the Pretender, he had been a trader in cattle; but the duke of Montrose having deprived him of his lands, he made reprisals upon the property of the latter. During some time he continued to levy "black mail" upon his enemies, notwithstanding every effort made to capture him. This bold, active, and courageous outlaw is the hero of one of Sir Walter Scott's novels, n. about 1680; d. subsequently to 1743.

ROBUSTI, Jacopo. (See TINTORIETTO.)

ROCHAMBEAU, Jean Baptiste Donatien de Vimeur, ro'-kam-be, Comte de, marshal of France, entered the army at the age of 16; in 1746 became aide-de-camp to Louis Philippe, duke of Orleans; and afterwards obtaining the command of the regiment of La Marche, distinguished himself at the battle of Lafeldt, where he was wounded. He won fresh laurels at Croveidt, Minden, Corbach, and Clostercamp; and, having been made Lieutenant-general, was, in 1780, sent with an army of 6000 men to the assistance of the United States of America. Having landed in Rhode Island, he acted in concert with Washington, first against Clinton, in New York, and then against Cornwallis. Rochambeau was raised to the rank of marshal by Louis XVI, and, after the revolution, was appointed to the command of the army of the north; but he was superseded by more active officers, and after satisfactorily vindicating his conduct, which had been impugned by the journals, retired to his estate near Vendôme, with a determination to interfere no more with public affairs. He was subsequently arrested, and narrowly escaped suffering death during the domination of Robespierre. In 1803 Bonaparte granted him a pension, and the cross of grand officer of the Legion of Honour. His "Mémoires" were published in 1809. n. 1725; d. 1807.

ROCHER, Rejina Maria, rosh', a novelist, among whose productions, which were very popular in their day, were "The Children of the Abbey," "The Naturalist's Visit," "The Monastery of St. Columba," &c. n. 1765; d. 1815.

ROCHERFORT, William de, rosh'-for, a French writer, who was a member of the Academy of Inscriptions and Belles-Lettres, and published a faithful and elegant translation of Sophocles. He also wrote a "Refutation of Mirabaud's System of Nature," and other works. n. at Lyons, 1731; d. 1788.

He displayed unusual powers of wit and a fertility of imagination; but he disgraced his fine qualities by the most dissolute principles and licentious conduct. His days were shortened by intemperance, but he died sincerely penitent. His satirical poems are keen, but defaced by obscenity and impety. It must be mentioned to his credit, that before his death he ordered all his licentious writings to be destroyed. On one occasion his bold wit found expression in a mock epitaph written upon the door of Charles II.'s bedroom:—

ROCHON, Alexis Marie, rosk-awny, a French astronomer and navigator, who became in 1784 curator of the cabinet of physics and optics to the king. In 1790 he was despatched to London on a mission relative to the reform of the weights and measures, and was subsequently appointed member of the commission for regulating the French coinage, and of the French Institute. In 1790 he constructed a lighthouse at the entrance to the harbour of Brest. He wrote extensively upon scientific subjects, his most important works being, "Memoirs upon Mechanics and Natural Philosophy;" and "Essay on Ancient and Modern Money." He also wrote, "Voyages in the East Indies and in Africa," and a "New Voyage to the South Sea." b. at Brest, 1741; d. 1811.

ROCKINGHAM, Charles Watson Wentworth, Marquis of, rok-ing-ham, an English statesman, who was the son of the first marquis of Rockingham. In 1750 he entered the House of Lords, and immediately afterwards took a foremost part in the debates of that assembly. Horace Walpole, however, in his "Memoirs of the Last Ten Years of the Reign of George II.," makes several uncomplimentary references to the future prime-minister. In 1753 he says of him, "The young marquis of Rockingham entered into a debate so much above his force, and partly applied the trite old apologue of Menenius Agrippa, and the sillier old story of the fellow of college, who asked why we should do anything for posterity, who had never done anything for us!" His consistent and honourable character, and his steady adherence to the principles of Whiggism, nevertheless enabled the young statesman to rise gradually but certainly. He became a knight of the Garter in 1760, and five years later was appointed first lord of the Treasury, and prime-minister, holding office during a year. Upon the retirement of Lord North from the head of affairs in 1782, the marquis of Rockingham again succeeded to power, and held place until his death, which took place a few months afterwards. b. 1730; d. 1782.

RODERICK, rod'-e-rik, the last of the Visigothic kings of Spain, was the son of Theodoric, duke of Cordova, who had been deprived of his sight by King Witiza; but Roderick revolted against, and, after defeating, deprived him of his crown. The sons of Witiza sought the aid of the Moors, who prepared to invade Spain; and in 710 landed, under the command of Tarif, at Tartessus, now Tarifa. In the following year the Moors again landed in greater force, at the foot of the rock of Calpe. The expedition was under the command of Tarik, and the place of landing was termed Gebel Tarik, which became corrupted into Gibraltar. The Arabs advanced into the interior, and were met at Medina Sidonia by Roderick, with a large but badly-disciplined army. A series of desperate engagements, occupying nine days, ensued, and resulted in the defeat of the Goths, the flower of whose chivalry, together with Roderick himself, were slain. Scott, Southey, and Irving have chosen the conquest of Spain by the Moors for the subject of some of their most admirable works. d. 711.

RODGER, Alexander, rod'-jer, a modern Scottish poet, was the son of a farmer in Midlothian, who, having emigrated to Hamburg, Alexander joined his mother's relatives in Glasgow, and there became a weaver; and while engaged in this way, added to his income by giving lessons in music, for which he had considerable talent. He became connected, in 1819, with a political journal intended to advocate reforms in the representation of the people in Parliament and otherwise, and in consequence was prosecuted and committed to prison for what were then called "revolutionary practices." On his release, he became inspector of cloths at Barrowfield printworks, Glasgow, and ultimately became connected with various newspapers published in the western Scottish metropolis, in which occupation he continued till his death. Rodger published two volumes of "Poems and Songs," which became extremely popular in the west of Scotland. His writings are pervaded by a fine vein of humour; and his political productions show considerable satiric power.

In his songs, which are the most valuable of his works, he is more the poet of the home affections than of external nature. Personally he was exceedingly popular with his compatriots, was fond of society, and from his kindly and genial humour, was always a welcome guest wherever he appeared. A monument to his memory has been erected in the necropolis of Glasgow. b. 1784; d. 1848.

RODNEY, George Brydges, Lord, rod'-ne, a gallant English admiral, who entered the navy in his twelfth year, and distinguished himself in several actions. In 1759 he became rear-admiral, and was employed to bombard Havre-de-Grace. In 1761 he was sent against Martinique, which island, together with Santa Lucia and Grenada, he captured, and for his services was created a baronet. Owing to an electioneering contest for Northampton and other causes, he was reduced to such a state of pecuniary embarrassment as to be obliged to reside on the continent, where, during the American war, he was tempted by the Count de Sartines, by brilliant offers, to enter into the French service. These overtures he refused; of which De Sartines liberally informed the British government, by whom Sir George was recalled home, and obtained a command. In 1780 he defeated the Spanish fleet and took several ships. This was soon after followed by a more splendid victory and the capture of the Spanish admiral, Don Juan de Langara. But the most important exploit of this brave admiral was the defeat of the French fleet under Count de Grasse in the West Indies, in 1782, when the French admiral and a number of his ships were taken. For this he was created a peer and obtained a pension. b. at Walton-upon-Thames, Surrey, 1718; d. 1792.

RODOLPH OF HAMBURG. (See RODOLPH.)

RODRIGUEZ, Ventura, rod'-dro-gais, a Spanish architect, who in 1733 assisted in making the designs for the new palace at Madrid. In 1752 he became professor of architecture in the Academy of St. Fernando at Madrid. He designed a very large number of the cathedrals, colleges, and churches throughout Spain, and was justly styled by his countrymen the restorer of architecture in his native country. b. 1717; d. 1785.

THE DICTIONARY

Roe

ROE, Sir Thomas, ro, an English statesman, who in 1614 was sent ambassador to the Great assy he published a very account. He subsequently acted in the same capacity at Constantinople. During his residence in the East he made a large collection of valuable manuscripts in the Greek and Oriental languages, which, in 1628, he presented to the Bodleian library. He also brought over the famous Alexandrian MS. of the New Testament, sent from Cyril, patriarch of Constantinople, to Charles I. In 1629 he was sent to negotiate a peace between the kings of Poland and Sweden, in which he succeeded. In 1611 he went as ambassador to the diet of Ratisbon, and on his return was made a privy councillor and chancellor of the Garter. n. in Essex, about 1580; d. 1614.

ROXBURGH, John, ro-buck, a physician and natural philosopher, was educated at Edinburgh and Leyden, and engaged in practice at Birmingham. He attracted his attention particularly to chemical experiments; and, in conjunction with Mr. Garbett, established a sulphuric acid manufactory at Preston Pans, in Scotland, which proved very successful; and in 1759 also founded the celebrated Carron ironworks. An attempt to work mines of coal and salt, on the estate of the duke of Hamilton, however, caused his ruin. n. at Sheffield, 1718; d. 1794.

ROXBURGH, John Arthur, a modern English politician, who went at an early age to Canada, but returned to England in his twenty-third year to study for the English bar, to which he was called in 1831, and in the following year was returned as member of Parliament for Bath. This seat he lost in 1837, but was re-elected in 1841. He again lost this seat in 1847, but was returned, unopposed, for Sheffield in 1849. As an "extreme liberal," he sided with no great party in the house, but chose rather the part of an independent critic of the measures which were proposed in the national council-chamber. His powers as an orator were considerable, though strongly tinged with asperity, a quality which often brought him into collision with the Whigs. He became queen's counsel in 1843, and was also chairman of several companies. As an author he produced a "History of the Whig Party," "The Colonies of England," and like contributions to the "Westminster Review." In 1865 he moved for an inquiry into the condition of the army before Sebastopol, which being carried against the Aberdeen ministry, they resigned. As chairman of that committee, he acted in such a manner as to earn from the nation the gratitude due to the efforts of an honest and independent politician. n. at Manchester, 1801.

ROELAS, Juan de las, ro-ai-las, a celebrated Spanish painter, who is supposed to have studied under Titian, at Venice. "No one," says Ford, n. his "Handbook of Spain," "ever painted the black grimalkin Jesuit like Roelas." His best works are,—"The St. Inigo," in the cathedral of Seville; a "Holy Family with Jesuits," and a "Nativity." n. about 1560; d. 1625.

ROEMER, Olaus, ro(r)-mer, a Danish astronomer, who was educated at Copenhagen, and, on visiting Paris in 1671, became mathematical tutor to the dauphin. He also received a pension from Louis XIV., assisted Cassini and learned in making the survey of France, and, during his ten years' stay in the kingdom, made many important discoveries in astronomy, as well as inventing some new and excellent forms of astronomical apparatus. In 1682 he was recalled to his native country, and received from the king of Denmark the appointment of professor of astronomy at Copenhagen. His celestial observations, under the title of "Basis Astronomiæ," were printed by his pupils in 1735. n. in Jutland, 1611; d. 1710.

ROGERS OF HOVEDEN. (See HOVEDEN.)

ROGERS, John, roj-ers, an eminent divine, who became chaplain to the king at Antwerp, where he assisted Tindal and Coverdale in translating the Bible into English. In the reign of Edward VI. he returned to England, and obtained a prebend in St. Paul's cathedral, where he was a frequent and zealous preacher. He was the first person executed in the succeeding reign, being burnt at the stake in 1555.

ROGERS, JOHN, a learned English divine, who became fellow of Corpus Christi College, Oxford. He wrote an able treatise on the invisibility of the Church, against Hoadly, and Sermons. n. in Oxfordshire, 1679; d. 1720.

ROGERS, Woods, an English navigator, who belonged to the royal navy in 1708, when he was invited by the merchants of Bristol to take the command of an expedition to the South Sea. He set sail with two vessels, taking out James as a pilot. Passing to the south of Tierra del Fuego, in January, 1709, they entered the Pacific Ocean, and in February arrived at the isle of Juan Fernandez, where they found Alexander Selkirk; they then visited the coast of California, crossed the Pacific, and returned to England in October, 1711. Captain Rogers was afterwards employed to exterminate the pirates who infested the West Indies. n. 1732.

ROGERS, Samuel, an eminent English poet, was the son of a London banker, in whose house of business he was placed, after having received an efficient private education. From his earliest years he had a predilection for poetry, and, at the age of twenty-three, produced his first volume of verses, under the title of "An Ode to Superstition, and other Poems." Between the appearance of his first publication and that of his second, "The Pleasures of Memory," which was given to the world in 1792, he travelled upon the continent and in Scotland. Six years later he brought out another volume, after which he remained silent during fourteen years; for he devoted morning to his poetical works until the year 1812, when he published a fragment entitled "Columbus." During this interval, however, he had retired from a five participation in the affairs of the bank, and had given himself to the cultivation of the friendship of the celebrities of his time. "The house of Rogers, in St. James's Place, became a little paradise of the beautiful, where, amid pictures and other objects of art, collected with care and arranged with skill, the happy owner nestled in fastidious ease, and kept up among his contemporaries a character in which something of the Horace was blended with something of the Mæcenas." "Jacqueline" was put forth in 1814; "Human Nature" in 1819; and in 1822, the poet, then sixty years of age, produced the first part of his "Italy." The complete edition of this latter poem was not published until 1830, when it appeared in a magnificent form, having been illustrated, under his own direction, by Stothard, Turner, and Prout, at a cost of £10,000. OF BIOGRAPHY.

Rogers

his ninety-first year he wrote an occasional piece, composed, like all his works, with laborious slowness, and polished line by line into elegance. That Rogers was a shrewd observer and brilliant talker, besides a poet, is evinced by the publication of his "Table Talk," which appeared after his death. "We have in his works a classic and graceful beauty," says an eminent critic; "no slovenly or obscure lines; fine cabinet pictures of soft and mellow lustre, and, occasionally, trains of thought and association that awaken or recall tender heroic feelings." He had been in the habit of taking constant exercise till within a short time before his death, and was at last only prevented from appearing in public by an accident with which he met in the streets. b. at Newington Green, near London, 1762; d. 1855.

ROGERS, Henry, a modern English essayist, who received his education at Highbury College, and, for some time, officiated as an Independent preacher. Relinquishing this employment in consequence of ill-health, he became professor of the English language and literature in University College, London, which post he subsequently vacated to assume the chair of philosophy at Spring Hill Independent College, Birmingham. He contributed extensively to the pages of the "Edinburgh Review," and selecting subjects similar with those which had been formerly chosen by Lord Macaulay, he won a high position by his able and elegant treatment of them. A collection of his essays, critical, historical, biographical, and speculative, was published in 1850, and again, in an enlarged form, in 1856. As a writer upon the religious opinions of the present time he was very successful, and produced, among other popular works upon that subject, "The Eclipse of Faith," and a "Defence" of that book, in reply to Mr. Francis Newman. He also wrote "The Life and Character of John Howe, M.A.," with an analysis of his writings; and "General Introduction to a Course of Lectures on English Grammar and Composition." b. at St. Albans, Herts, 1808.

ROGER, Peter Mark, ro'-zhet, a modern physician and physiologist, who studied his profession at Edinburgh, and afterwards settled in practice at Manchester, where he became physician to the lunatic asylum and fever hospital. He repaired to the metropolis at a later period, and was elected fellow and secretary of the Royal Society, and lecturer on physiology at the Royal Institution of Great Britain. His works were both numerous and important, the chief of them being one of the Bridgewater treatises; treatise on "Physiology and Phrenology;" articles for the "Encyclopædia Britannica" and the "Cyclopædia of Practical Medicine;" and papers published in the "Transactions" of various learned and scientific societies. He was a fellow of the Royal College of Physicians, and of the Astronomical, Zoological, Geographical, and Entomological Societies. Apart from the scientific researches which engaged his pen, he produced an excellent work, entitled "A Thesaurus of English Words and Phrases, arranged and classified so as to facilitate the Expression of Ideas, and assist in Literary Composition." b. in London, 1779.

ROHAN, Henry, Duke of, ro'-an, Prince of Leon, distinguished himself by his bravery at the siege of Amiens, and thereby obtained the friendship of Henry IV., after whose death he became the chief of the Huguenots in the reign of Louis XIII.; but upon the taking of Rochelle and the establishment of peace in 1629, he retired to Venice, where he was chosen generalissimo of the armies of the republic against the imperialists. He was subsequently recalled by the king, who employed him in the Grisons against the Germans and Spaniards. But the duke in 1637 gave up his command, and entered the service of the duke of Saxe-Weimar, by whose side he received a mortal wound at the battle of Rheinfelden. He wrote the "Interests of Princes;" "The Perfect Captain;" or, an Abridgment of Cæsar's Commentaries;" "On the Government of the Thirteen Cantons;" and Memoirs. b. in Brittany, 1579; d. 1638.

ROHAN, Louis, Prince of, generally called the Chevalier de Rohan, who became colonel of the guard under Louis XIV., was a brave but unprincipled man, and engaged in a plot to deliver Quillebeuf to the Dutch, which being discovered, he was sentenced to death. b. about 1635; executed, 1674.

ROHAN, Cardinal de, a French prelate, who became the dupe of the Countess de Lamotte and others, by whom he was induced to purchase for Queen Marie Antoinette a magnificent collar of diamonds, in the hope of obtaining her favours. On the discovery of the affair, he was, in 1785, brought to trial before the Parliament and acquitted, but was exiled from the French court. b. 1734; d. 1803.

ROHAULT, Jacques, ro'-hôte, a French philosopher, who became a zealous defender of the Cartesian system, of which he published a popular view. Of this work Dr. Samuel Clarke gave an edition, with notes, adapting it to the Newtonian system. He was also the author of "Elements of Mathematics," and a treatise on Mechanics. b. at Amiens, 1620; d. 1675.

ROLAND, ro'-land, a celebrated hero of chivalric romance, was one of the paladins of Charlemagne, whose nephew he is by some stated to have been. His character was that of a brave warrior,—devoted and loyal. He was appointed commandant of the Marches of Brittany by Charlemagne, whom he afterwards accompanied to the conquest of Spain. Returning from that expedition, he fell into an ambuscade at Roncesvalles, where, together with the flower of the French chivalry, he perished in 778. His adventures are celebrated in the famous continental romance entitled the "Chanson of Roland." He is also the hero of the "Roland Amoureux" of Boiardo, and of the "Orlando Furioso" of Ariosto. The town of Rocamadour, in France, pretends to be in possession of the "Durandal," or the celebrated sword of Roland.

ROLAND DE LA PLATIERE, Jean Marie, a French statesman, who was designed for the church; but, relinquishing his studies, became engaged in commercial pursuits. In time, his commercial abilities being very great, he became inspector-general of the manufactures of Picardy, and afterwards of those of Lyons, of which city he was subsequently nominated deputy to the Constituent Assembly. In 1792 he became minister of the interior, but did not long retain the office. When the party of Girondists, to which he belonged, was proscribed, he fled from Paris, leaving his wife, who refused to accompany him, behind. He retired to Rouen, where, on hearing of the execution of his wife, he ran himself through the body, in 1793. He wrote some works on the cotton and linen manufactures, "Letters from Switzerland, Italy, Sicily, and Malta," and a "Dictionary of Manufactures and Arts." n. 1793.

ROLAND, Marie Jeanne Philipon, the wife of the preceding. Her father was an engraver named Philipon, who was eminent in his profession, and gave her an excellent education. At the age of twenty-five she married M. Roland, though there was a great disparity in their ages. She rendered important services to him in his capacity of minister of the interior; and most of the official writings which he published were the production of her masculine mind. On his flight, she was sent to the prison of the Abbaye, and, after an imprisonment of some weeks, was released; but she had scarcely reached her own house before she was Anecdotes, and Memoirs of herself. At length she was dragged before the revolutionary tribunal, and sentenced to the guillotine, which she endured with great fortitude, saying, as she looked on the statue of Liberty, "O Liberty, what crimes are committed in thy name!" n. at Paris, 1794; guillotined, 1793.

ROLLIN, Charles, rol'-ld, a celebrated French writer, who, after studying in the college of Plessis and at the Sorbonne, became successively professor of languages, rhetoric, and eloquence. In 1694 he was appointed rector of the university of Paris, where he revived the study of Greek, and introduced many important regulations in the academical exercises. His principal works were, an edition of Quintilian; treatise on "Studying and Teaching the Belles Lettres;" "Ancient History of the Egyptians, Carthaginians, and Babylonians;" "History of Rome from the Foundation of that City to the Battle of Actium;" and "Miscellaneous Pieces." n. at Paris, 1661; d. 1741.

ROLLO, rol'-lo, a chieftain of Norway, who, being driven from that country by the king of Denmark, landed in Normandy, which was ceded to him by Charles the Simple in 911. Rollo embraced the Christian religion in the following year, and was baptized by the name of Robert. He assumed the title of duke of Normandy, married Giselle, the daughter of the French king, and was the ancestor of William the Conqueror. n. either in 920 or 927.

ROMAGNOLI, Gian Domenico, ro-man-yo-er, a distinguished Italian jurist, who became doctor of law of the university of Parma in 1786. He commenced practice as an advocate, and soon became celebrated. He also published several legal works, which were well received in Germany, as well as in his native country. In 1800 he was invited by Napoleon I. to Milan, to assist in the compilation of a criminal code. In the following year he became professor of civil law in the university of Pavia. On the downfall of Napoleon in 1814, he lost all his public appointments, and henceforth devoted himself to private teaching and to the composition of works on jurisprudence. His legal treatises, which are regarded as among the soundest in the whole range of Italian legal literature, were very numerous. The best known are, "Code of Criminal Procedure for the Kingdom of Italy;" "Fundamental Principles of Administration;" "Introduction to the Study of Universal Public Law;" and several treatises supplied to the "Statistical Annals of Milan." A monument to his memory was raised at Milan. n. near Piacenza, 1761; d. at Milan, 1835.

ROMANUS, William, ro'-main, an English divine and theological writer, who, upon entering into orders, became a frequent preacher before the university of Oxford, till his strongly Calvinistic sentiments caused him to lose his appointments at that seat of learning. He then removed to London, where he continued to preach in various churches, to large congregations, almost till his death. He was the editor of Calaneo's "Concordance to the Hebrew Bible," in which he made some unwarrantable alterations to serve the Hutchinsonian doctrine. n. at Hartlepool, 1714; d. in London, 1795.

ROMANA, Don Peter Caro y Sureda, Marquis de la, ro-ma'-na, a Spanish general, distinguished himself in the campaigns against the French on the Pyrenean frontier, from 1793 to 1795; and commanded the auxiliary Spanish corps of 14,000 men which was sent to the north of Germany by Napoleon; but when Spain rose against the domination of France, La Romana, aided by an English squadron, succeeded in embarking his troops from the island of Fuenc, and conducting them home in safety. During 1809 and 1810 he displayed great talents both as a general and a statesman. n. 1761; d. 1811.

ROMANO, Giulio, ro-ma'-no, a celebrated Italian painter and architect, whose family name was Lippi, was the disciple of Raffaele, who made him his heir. His greatest pictures are, "The Fall of the Giants," and "The Battles of Constantine." He built some fine structures at Mantua, where he was patronized by the duke. n. at Rome, 1472; d. 1546.

ROMOFF, Michael, ro-mo'-nov, czar or emperor of Russia, was elected by a council of the states at Moscow in 1613; but had to combat the rival pretensions of Sweden and Poland. After a short war, he concluded a peace with Sweden in 1617, by which he ceded to Gustavus a large portion of territory. In the following year he signed a treaty with Ladislaus IV., king of Poland, who had advanced to the walls of Moscow. Directed by the sage counsels of his father, Michael would have advanced the civilization of his country, had not his death prematurely taken place in 1645. He left his throne to his son Alexis. The dynasty of Romanoff reigned in from the year 1613 until 1762, when it was extinct in the person of the empress Elizabeth, who died without issue. It was succeeded by the dynasty of Holstein-Gottorp, with which it was connected by ties of marriage, Charles Peter Ulric, who signed after Elizabeth, under the name of Peter III., being the son of her sister Anna Petrovna, duchess of Holstein-Gottorp, and daughter of Peter the Great.

ROMANUS I., ro-ma'-nus, emperor of the East, was an Armenian, and became a soldier in the army of the emperor Basil, whose life he saved in a battle against the Saracens, which proved the foundation of his fortune. Constantine VI., whose daughter he espoused, associated him in the empire in the year 919. He displayed great military talents, and to his other eminent qualities added the virtues of piety and piety. d. 948.

II., called the Younger, was the fine Porphyrogenitus, whom he poisoned and succeeded in 959. He died of intemperance or of poison in 963.

ROMANUS III. obtained the Imperial throne by his marriage with Zoe, daughter of Constantine the Younger, in 1028. He was a weak prince, and was murdered by his wife, 1034.

ROMANUS IV., surnamed Diogenes, succeeded, in 1067, Constantine Duca, whose widow Eudocia he married. He defeated the Mohammedans, who had ravaged the empire, but, in 1071, was taken prisoner by the sultan Alp Arslan, who, however, set him at liberty on paying a heavy ransom. He was subsequently dethroned by Michael, the son of Constantine Duca, who deprived him of his eyes. b. 1071.

ROMANZOFF, Peter Alexandrovitch, Marshal, ro-man-zov, a celebrated Russian general, who, in the reign of Catharine II., distinguished himself by his victories over the Turks at Bender, Ismail, and other places. In 1771 he was taken prisoner by the sultan Alp Arslan, who, however, set him at liberty on paying a heavy ransom. He was subsequently dethroned by Michael, the son of Constantine Duca, who deprived him of his eyes. b. 1071.

ROMANZOFF, Nicholas, Count, an eminent Russian statesman, son of the preceding, who, after holding various minor offices, became minister for foreign affairs in 1807. He was present at the interview between Napoleon I. and Alexander at Erfurt in the following year; signed the treaty of peace with Sweden in 1809; the treaty of alliance with Spain in 1812; and, in 1814, retired from public life, in order to devote himself to the cultivation of letters and the arts. At his expense were produced the "Diplomatic Code of Russia," "History of the Byzantine writer, Leo Diaconus," a Russian translation of the "History of the Mongols and Tartars by Abdul-Ghazi." In 1814 he dispatched a Russian expedition under Captain Kotzebue, upon a scientific voyage round the world, entirely at his own cost. He likewise invited Mr. Heard, an Englishman, to superintend the formation of Lancasterian and Industrial schools upon his estate of Homel, in the government of Mohilev. b. 1763; d. 1826.

ROMBOURS, Theodore, rom'-boots, a Dutch painter, who was the disciple of Abraham Janssens, and excelled in painting historical subjects and conversational pieces, and attempted to rival Rubens, but without success. b. at Antwerp, 1597; d. 1637 or 1640.

ROMILLY, Sir Samuel, rom'-il-le, an eminent English lawyer, whose father, a jeweller, was the son of a French Protestant, who had taken refuge in England after the revocation of the Edict of Nantes. Samuel was designed for the trade of his parent, and, being of a serious and retiring disposition, employed his leisure in remedying the defects of the very limited education he had received. The pecuniary means of his father having become considerably increased, he was articled at his own desire to a clerk in chancery; but at the expiration of his term in 1778, instead of resting satisfied with his clerkship in chancery, he resolved to qualify himself for the profession of a barrister. In 1783 he was called to the bar. After remaining for several years with but little employment, he attracted the favourable notice of Lord Lansdowne, who conceived a high opinion of his abilities, in consequence of the perusal of a small effusion by him, entitled "On the Constitutional Power and Duties of Juries,"

Ronge

His rise was henceforth certain and rapid. After attaining to a large practice as a chancery lawyer, he, in 1800, became king's counsel; in 1806 he was knighted, appointed solicitor-general, and elected a member of Parliament. In the House of Commons he distinguished himself by his impressive eloquence on the Whig benches. He advocated the reform of Parliament, the abolition of the slave-trade, the mitigation of the severity of the criminal code, and the emancipation of the Roman Catholics. He published one of his speeches, in a pamphlet entitled "Observations on the Criminal Law, as it relates to capital punishment, and on the mode in which it is administered." Throughout the remaining years of his life he nobly persevered in his efforts to effect an amelioration of the terribly severe laws relative to the execution of criminal justice; there being, at that period, almost 300 crimes punishable by death. After the dissolution of Parliament in 1818, he was elected for Westminster; but having about that time lost his wife, his mind was affected to such a degree that, in a fit of dejection, he put an end to his life. b. 1757.

ROMBER, George, rum'-ne, an excellent English painter, who was apprenticed to an itinerant artist, whom he soon surpassed. In 1762 he went to London, where he became a favourite portrait painter. As soon as he had realized a sufficiency to enable him to visit Italy, he crossed the Alps, and, after studying there with avidity, returned to London, where he rapidly acquired fame and fortune. b. at Dalton, Lancashire, 1734; d. at Kendal, 1803.

ROMULUS, rom'-u-lus, the founder of Rome, and brother of Remus, was the son of Rhea Sylvia, daughter of Numitor, king of Alba. She was placed among the vestals, but being delivered of these two children at a birth, declared that the god Mars was their father. Amulius, who had usurped the throne of Numitor, his brother, caused the children to be thrown into the Tiber, where they were found by Faustulus. On coming of age, they discovered their origin, put Amulius to death, and reinstated Numitor. A difference, however, arose between the two brothers, and Romulus put Remus to death. He afterwards founded the city of Rome, by collecting a number of strangers, and died b.c. 716.—Such is the story given by Plutarch, but modern writers, following the researches of Niebuhr, declare that for the most part it is little more than a poetical legend.

RONGE, Johannes, ronj, a modern German religious reformer, who was the son of a small farmer, and was educated for the Roman Catholic priesthood. In 1842 he was, however, deprived of his charge for publishing a letter to the Bishop of Breslau, in which he denounced the "Holy Coat," then being exhibited at Trèves, as an imposture. The religious movement inaugurated by that epistle led to the foundation of a German Catholic church independently of the papacy. Ronge was regarded as the apostle of the new church, and travelled over his native country making converts. He was called a "second Luther," and in a few years assisted in instituting upwards of 200 societies; but, subsequently to the revolution of 1848, the German governments determined to suppress these new congregations. Ronge became an exile in England, where he devoted himself to preaching to his fellow-countrymen in London, and to the propagation of Froebel's system of lucation; upon which subject he published, entitled "A Practical Guide to the Kinder-Garten (Children's Garden), Exposition of Froebel's System of Instruction." n. at Bischofswalde, Silesia.

RONSARD, Pierre de, ron'-sar, a French poet, who was page to the duke of Orleans, and afterwards served James V., king of Scotland; in which country he remained two years, and then returned to France, where he was employed in several negotiations of importance. He subsequently retired from court, and, on taking orders, obtained some ecclesiastical benefices. His poems were in his age so much esteemed as to procure him the title of the "Poet of France." n. in the Vendômois, 1524; n. near Tours, 1555.

ROOKER, Laurence, rook, an English astronomer, who, in 1652, was chosen (freshman) professor of astronomy at the University of Oxford, which chair he afterwards exchanged for that of geometry. He was one of the first members of the Royal Society, and wrote "Observations on Comets;" "Directions to Seamen;" "Method of Observing the Eclipses of the Moon;" and "Observations on the Eclipses of the Satellites of Jupiter." n. in Kent, 1623; n. 1662.

ROOKS, Sir George, a gallant English admiral, who entered the navy at an early age, and rose by his merit to the first honours of his profession. He gave evident proofs of his skill and courage in many expeditions, particularly in burning thirteen of the French ships at La Hogue, and in the glorious action off Vigo. In 1704 he took Gibraltar by bombardment, after which he obtained a decisive victory over the French fleet off Malaga, in which desperate fight the English lost 2000 and the French 3000 men. Notwithstanding these eminent services, he was, by the influence of the Whig party, obliged to resign the command; whereupon he retired to his estate. n. in Kent, 1650; n. 1769.

ROOME, Edward, room, an English lawyer, who became solicitor to the Treasury. He wrote some satirical papers called "Pasquin," against Pope, who gave him a place in his "Dunciad." He was also the author of a dramatic piece called "The Jovial Crew." n. 1720.

ROSA, SILVATOR, sal-va'-tor ro'-sa, an eminent Italian painter, who excelled in painting combats, sea-pieces, and landscapes of romantic scenery, with banditti. He painted with the greatest rapidity, and was also a musician, poet, architect, and an excellent comic actor and improvisatore. His satirical poems so deeply irritated his enemies, that he was compelled to seek an asylum under the Medici at Florence. There is a landscape by him in the National Gallery. n. near Naples, 1615; n. at Rome, 1673.

ROSA, Francisco Martinez de la, ro'-sa, a distinguished Spanish patriot, statesman, and author, who, when not yet out of his teens, was appointed professor of moral philosophy in the university of Granada; and as just about this time the national enthusiasm against Bonaparte was at its height, he is said to have turned his professorial chair into a "patriotic tribune." Not being of the age fixed by law for members of the Cortes, he was unable to enter political life at this time, and in 1810 paid a visit to Spain and "La villa de Madrid" (a tragedy)—both of which tended powerfully to inflame the ardour of the besieged. After the triumph of Spanish liberty, and the vote in favour of the constitution of 1812 (which was mainly due to his efforts), he was named member of the Cortes for Granada. But he had made himself particularly obnoxious to Ferdinand VII., and in 1814 was sent to a subterranean dungeon, where he remained for six months, standing on the inviolability of his person as a deputy, and flatly refusing all overtures of submission. He was therefore banished to Africa among thieves and cut-throats. When the revolution of Riego occurred, Martinez was recalled, and nominated deputy in the Cortes in 1820; and for many years afterwards was mixed up in the turbulent arena of Spanish politics and revolutions, being sometimes in power, sometimes in opposition, and not unfrequently in exile. His political views appear to have undergone considerable modification, for while chief of the cabinet from March, 1834, to June, 1835, he promoted the famous royal decree which abrogated the constitution of 1812, principally his own work, but granted guarantees, and confirmed the existence of the two Chambers. In 1839-40 he was in a kind of voluntary banishment in Paris, and Regent Espartero made him ambassador of Spain in that city. In 1842-3 he was ambassador of Spain in Rome. After the restoration of Christina, he entered Narvaez's cabinet, and again went as ambassador to Paris in 1847, and held the office till 1851, when he was elected president of the First Chamber. In 1857 he was appointed secretary of state in Armero Mon's cabinet, and under O'Donnell became president of the council of state. He is described by one of his biographers as "an eloquent orator, a courageous citizen, and a universally-esteemed politician." Senor Martinez de la Rosa will, however, probably owe his reputation with posterity to his literary productions. He published five volumes of his works in 1827 ("Obras Literarias"), in which are his three dramas, "Edipo," "Morayna," and "La Conjuracion de Venecia." A very successful comedy of his may be named also, "La Hija en casa y la Madre en la Mascara" ("The Daughter at Home and the Mother at the Ball"). Some of his other works were, "El Arte Poetica" ("Lyric Works"), two novels, "Herman Perez del Pulgar" and "La bella de Solis," a History of the French Revolution, and six volumes of various works published in the "Spanish Library." He was perpetual secretary of the Academy, and president of the University Council. n. 1789; n. 1862.

ROSEMOND CHURTON, ros'-a-mond, usually called Fair Rosamond, was the daughter of Walter de Clifford, baron of Hereford. She was the favourite mistress of Henry II., who is reported to have secreted her in a labyrinth at his palace of Woodstock, where, according to some writers, she was discovered and poisoned by Eleanor, queen of that monarch. But it seems more certain that she died in the nursery of descended of an old Spanish family, and having displayed bravery and capacity in some minor appointments, was, in 1831, nominated captain-general or governor of Buenos Ayres. In 1835 he became president of the Argentine Confederation; but by seeking to obtain for the province of Buenos Ayres a preponderating influence and advancement, he became embroiled with Brazil, and afterwards with France and England, in consequence of an attack made upon Monte Video. Defeated in 1845, he nevertheless offered an obstinate resistance until 1850, when the states under his rule revolted against his tyrannical measures. Urquiza was nominated president, and in 1851 totally defeated Rosas, who was compelled to make his escape from the country, and to take refuge in England. b. at Buenos Ayres, 1793.

ROSCIUS, Quintus, ros'h-i-us, an illustrious Roman actor, who became the most famous performer of his age, and is said to have received about a thousand denarii per day (upwards of £34) for his acting. Cicero, who speaks in the highest terms of his talents, undertook his defence against Pannius. The Roman state assigned him a considerable pension, which he appears to have deserved as much by his virtues as his abilities. d. about 61 b.c.

ROSCOE, William, ros'-ko, an eminent English writer, who was the son of a market-gardener near Liverpool, and having been placed for a short period in a bookseller's shop, was afterwards articled to an attorney. In 1774 his term expired, and he became an attorney; but in the meanwhile he had studied the Greek and Latin, and mastered the French and Italian languages. He also wrote some verses, one of which, upon the art of engraving, led to his introduction to Sir Joshua Reynolds. At the outburst of the French Revolution he defended its principles against the strictures of Burke. In 1796 appeared his fine "Life of Lorenzo de' Medici," a work which soon acquired for him a high reputation, and was translated into French, German, and Italian. His "Illustrations, Historical and Critical, of the Life of Lorenzo de' Medici" followed; and in this work he defended himself against a considerable amount of adverse criticism to which he had been subjected. The "Life and Pontificate of Leo X." was his next production, and formed a sort of continuation of the former work; and both illustrating, as they did, a brilliant period of modern Italian history, were hailed as splendid contributions to literature. He subsequently became member of Parliament and partner in a banking-house. In the House of Commons he voted with the Whigs, and advocated the abolition of the slave trade. b. near Liverpool, 1753; d. 1831.

ROSCOE, Henry, youngest son of the preceding, was bred to the bar, to which he was called in 1800, and like his father visited America many "Diges." He was the author of "Lives of Eminent British Lawyers," in Lardner's Cyclopædia; a "Life" of his father; and edited "North's Lives." b. 1800; d. 1836.

ROSCOMMON, Wentworth Dillon, Earl of, an English writer, who received his first education at the seat of the earl of Strafford, his uncle, in Yorkshire. At the fall of Strafford he was sent to Caen, in Normandy, where he had for his tutor the eminent scholar Bochart. At the Restoration he was made captain of the band of pensioners, which post he afterwards resigned, and went to Ireland, where he was appointed captain of the guards; but, dissipating his fortune by gaming, he returned to court, and was made master of the horse to the duchess of York. He now altered his course of life, married a daughter of the earl of Burlington, and applied himself to poetry. He wrote "Essay on Translated Verse," "Horace's Art of Poetry translated into English blank verse;" and a collection of prologues and epilogues to plays. His poetry is neat and elegant, but of no extraordinary excellence. His remains were interred in Westminster Abbey. b. about 1633; d. 1684.

ROSS, Alexander, ross, a Scottish poet, was educated at Marischal College, Aberdeen, and was through life schoolmaster at Lochie, in Angus-shire. He did not publish anything till nearly 70 years of age, when he gave to the world a poem called "Helenore; or, the Fortunate Shepherdess," which was popular in the north of Scotland. He also wrote a number of songs, many of which became favourites with his countrymen. b. 1699; d. 1784.

ROSS, Sir John, an English admiral and Arctic navigator, commenced his career as a volunteer on board the Pearl frigate in 1786. During the subsequent five years he served on board various ships of the royal navy, but then joined the mercantile marine, returning, however, to the royal service in 1799, as midshipman of the Weasel sloop of war. He became a lieutenant in 1805, and was severely wounded in the following year in a desperate cutting-out expedition under the batteries of Bilbao, a feat which was rewarded by a pension of £98 a year. He continued to serve with distinction until the end of the war in 1815, by which time he had attained the rank of commander, and was, in 1818, appointed to the command of the Isabella discovery-vessel, and was sent out, in company with the Alexander, under Lieutenant Parry, to ascertain the existence or non-existence of a north-west passage. The vessels penetrated some distance up Lancaster Sound, when the Isabella, which was far ahead of the Alexander, suddenly altered her course, Ross having imagined that he perceived land round the bottom of the bay, forming a chain of mountains connected with those which extended along the north and south sides. Parry, in the Alexander, was also ordered to turn eastward, although the latter declared that the supposed "Croker Mountains" did not in reality exist. (See PARRY, Sir William Edward.) The vessels thereupon returned to England, and Ross was promoted to post-rank. In 1819 he produced a narrative of his voyage, and in 1827 attempted to reach the north pole, after which he again went upon a voyage of discovery to the Arctic Seas, in a vessel equipped at the expense of Sir Felix Booth, sheriff of London. His nephew, Commander James Clark Ross, accompanied him, and the ship left the Thames in 1829. They reached Felix Harbour, in the Gulf of Boothia, where, after being several times frozen up, Captain Ross was compelled to abandon his ship, in 1832. They struggled on in boats and sledges, gaining the entrance of Lancaster Sound in August, 1833. There they met with the old vessel of Ross, the Isabella, which was at the time upon a whaling voyage. He inquired the name of the ship, and was informed that it was the Isabella, once commanded by Captain Ross. "On which," says he, "I stated that I was the identical man in question, and my people were the crew of the Victory." He reached England in September, 1833, and was knighted and created a companion of the Bath. The narrative of his second voyage was published in 1835; in 1839 he was appointed consul at Stockholm; in 1850 he was dispatched in search of Sir John Franklin, and, having deemed himself neglected by the government, produced a "Narrative of the Circumstances and Causes which led to the failure of the Searching Expeditions sent by Government and others for the Rescue of Sir John Franklin." He reached the grade of rear-admiral in 1851. In addition to the works already quoted, he produced a "Treatise on Navigation by Steam," "Memoirs and Correspondence of Admiral Lord de Saumarez," and "Letters to Sea Officers." n. in Wigtownshire, Scotland, 1777; n. in London, 1856.

Ross, Sir James Clark, captain in the royal navy, and nephew of the preceding, under whom he served as midshipman at the commencement of his career. Between the years 1819 and 1827 he served under Sir William Edward Parry, in four expeditions to the Arctic Seas. In the latter year he was promoted to the rank of commander, and after his return from the second voyage of his uncle, he was, in 1834, made post-captain, in reward of his discovery of the northern magnetic pole. He was next engaged in performing a magnetic survey of Great Britain. In 1839 he was placed in command of an expedition to the Antarctic Seas, the object of which was magnetic investigation. After an absence of four years, during which a vast and valuable body of information relative to magnetism, meteorology, geography, zoology, and botany, was collected, he returned to England. He had discovered a large continent in the Antarctic regions, to which he gave the name of Victoria Land, and an active volcano, 12,000 feet high, which he named Mount Erebus. In 1848 he went out in search of Sir John Franklin, but, like the other explorers, unhappily met with no success. He was one of the most skilful and scientific officers in the royal navy, was accorded the degree of D.C.L. by the university of Oxford, and was fellow of the Royal, Geographical, Astronomical, and other Societies. In 1844 he was created a knight. He produced a "Voyage of Discovery and Research in the Southern and Antarctic of patrons, and from that time painted the chief beauties and highest dignitaries of the British aristocracy and the various members of the royal families of England and Belgium. In 1837 he was appointed miniature painter to the queen, and in 1838 was elected associate of the Royal Academy, in 1842 academician, and in the same year was knighted. The desire for historical composition adhered so strongly to him, that so late as 1843, a cartoon by him, "The Angel Raphael discoursing with Adam," was exhibited at Westminster Hall, and obtained one of the premiums of £100. n. in London, 1794; n. 1860.

Rosses, William Parsons, Earl of, ross, a modern astronomer and constructor of the magnificent instrument called the "Monster Telescope," received his education at Mardalen College, Oxford, and succeeded to the earldom on the death of his father, in 1881. His best claim to distinction was the magnificent telescope erected under his personal superintendence at Birr Castle, near Painsmstown. It is the largest ever constructed; its speculum is almost six feet in diameter, its tube fifty-six feet in length; and to complete it cost, its designer years of anxious labour and experiment, and a great expenditure of money. By its means a more extended knowledge of the surface of the moon, and of the nebulae has been gained. In 1855 he was created a knight of the Legion of Honour, having previously acted as president of the Royal Society; he was likewise a member of most of the learned and scientific bodies in Europe. He wrote an account of the monster telescope, the manufacture of its specula, and full descriptions of the machinery; "Letters on the State of Ireland;" and "Memorandum presented to the Council of the Royal Society for rendering the Council of the Society more efficient." n. 1860; n. 1867.

Rossi, Pellegrino, Count, an Italian statesman, who, though of humble origin, received a liberal education, studied law at Pisa, and commenced practising at the bar of Bologna in 1809. In 1814, imbued with a desire to give freedom to Italy, he renounced his profession for that of arms, and, on the overthrow of Murat, fled into Switzerland, where he sought consolation for political disappointments in the pursuits of science. He fixed his residence at Geneva, where, in 1819, he was appointed professor of law. In 1820 he was elected a member of the council of Geneva, and soon afterwards was sent as deputy to the Diet, when he drew up a report on the revision of the Swiss federal constitution. The moderation of his political views, so closely resembling those of the French Doctrinaires, had brought him into communication with Guizot and De Broglie; and at their instance he quitted Geneva for Paris in 1832, with a view to employment in the service of the French government. On his arrival at Paris he was appointed professor of political economy, was soon afterwards chosen a member of the Institute, was created a peer in 1839; and in 1845, being now a naturalized Frenchman, was appointed ambassador to Rome. Through his influence Pius IX. ascended the pontifical throne in 1846; and at his instigation entered upon the liberal career, from which so much was expected, but which was afterwards completely abandoned. In 1848, when the cry of national independence was raised in Piedmont, Rossi set out for Carrara, where he was wel-

English miniature-painter, whose parents were both devoted to the arts; his father as a miniature painter and drawing-master. By the time he was nine years of age, the proficiency in drawing of "little Ross" was almost unprecedented. In the year 1808, at the age of thirteen, he was admitted a student of the Royal Academy, where his assiduous study attracted the notice of many. The first ambition of the young aspirant was to excel in historical art, and from Benjamin West, the president of the time, he received much kind advice. At fifteen he obtained prizes for large chalk drawings, which were remarkable for correctness and beauty of finish. When he was about twenty, however, he altered his course, and adopted that branch of art in which he became unrivalled. He soon attracted the notice of the higher class came with enthusiasm; which still further increased when he sent his son to join the army of Charles Albert. But the victories of Radetzky checked his ardour, and for a time consigned him to privacy and neglect, from which he emerged in September, 1843, to take office as prime minister of the pope, in which position he laboured for two months to secure freedom for the Roman people and peace for Italy; but his career was cut short by an assassin, Nov. 14, 1848, and immediately afterwards the revolution broke out which compelled Pius IX. to take refuge at Gaeta. Count Rossi did not produce any literary work commensurate with his reputation; but his "Traité du Droit Pénal" and his "Cours d'Economie Politique" may be consulted with profit. b. at Carrara, 1787.

ROSSINI, Gioacchino, ros-se'-ne, an illustrious Italian composer, was the son of a strolling musician, by whom he was taught the rudiments of his art; but, having a fine voice, he was placed under a skilful tutor in order to acquire the art of vocalization. At twelve years of age he sang in the churches of Bologna; and when, at fifteen, his voice broke, he was entered of the Lyceum of Bologna, in order to acquire a more abstruse knowledge of the musical art. Young Rossini, however, regarded the study of double counterpoint as drudgery, and happening to hear his master, Padre Mattei, observe one day that single counterpoint was sufficient knowledge for a composer who only aspired to write the lighter kinds of music,—“Do you mean to say, Padre,” he exclaimed, “that with what I have learned already I could write operas?” “Why, yes,” answered the Padre. “Then,” replied Rossini, “I mean to write operas; and I don’t want any more lessons.” But although he took no more lessons from Mattei, he laboured assiduously at the task of self-instruction. In 1813 he produced his opera of “Tancredi,” which at once made its composer famous throughout Europe. Encouraged by this success, he produced a number of other works in quick succession, all of which, however, were inferior to the work which brought him into popularity. In 1816 he produced his world-famous “Barber of Seville,” at Rome. Those of his later works which still keep the stage, are “La Cenerentola,” “La Gazza Ladra,” “La Donna del Lago,” and “Guglielmo Tell.” This last was written at the age of thirty-seven, and with it closed the career of Rossini as a composer. “An additional success would add nothing to my fame,” he said; “a failure would injure it.” After holding the post of manager of the Italian Opera at Paris during some time, he, in 1836, returned to his native country, where he continued to reside till 1856, when he repaired to Paris once more. b. at Pesaro, near Bologna, 1793; d. 1868.

ROSSLYN, Alexander Wedderburne, Earl of, ross'-lin, an eminent lawyer, who received his education at the university of Edinburgh, and, in 1752, was admitted an advocate at the Scotch bar. In the following year he entered himself of the Inner Temple, and was called to the English bar in 1757. He was indefatigable in his profession, and in 1763 obtained a silk gown as king’s counsel. Not long afterwards, he was returned to Parliament for Richmond. He joined Mr. George Grenville in opposition, and distinguished himself by his eloquence on several occasions. On the death of his friend, Mr. Wedderburne accepted the office of solicitor-general, and zealously supported government in the endeavour to subjugate America. In 1778 he was made attorney-general, and in 1780 was appointed chief justice of the Common Pleas, being at the same time created Baron Loughborough. On the formation of the coalition ministry of Lord North and Fox, Lord Loughborough gave his aid to that administration, and afterwards voted with them in opposition; but in 1793 he was made lord chancellor, and supported government with energy during the war with France. In 1801 he was created earl of Rosslyn, and resigned the seals the same year. His remains were interred in St. Paul’s Cathedral. His lordship wrote a pamphlet entitled, “Observations on the State of the English Prisons, and the means of improving them.” b. in Scotland, 1733; d. 1805.

ROSTOPCHIN, or RASTOPCHIN, Count Feodor Vasilievitch, ros-top'-chin, a Russian general, who held the chief command at Moscow when that city was burned at the approach of Napoleon I., in 1812. He was descended from an old Russian family, which could trace its descent in a direct line from a son of Genghis Khan. After concluding his education, and making the tour of Europe, he became an officer of the Guards, and the favourite of the grand-duke Paul, who created him a count. He subsequently fell into disgrace, but was again preferred to high appointments under the emperor Alexander, who also gave him the command at Moscow. Napoleon proclaimed that the great conflagration which proved so destructive to his army, was kindled at the orders of Rostopchin. In 1823, however, the Russian count, who was then a resident at Paris, produced his small work, called “The Truth as to the Conflagration of Moscow.” In that pamphlet he commenced: “Ten years have elapsed since the conflagration of Moscow, and I am still pointed out to history and posterity as the author of an event which, according to the received opinion, was the principal cause of the destruction of Napoleon’s army, of his subsequent fall, the preservation of Russia, and the deliverance of Europe. Certainly there is something to be proud of in such splendid claims as these; but having never usurped anybody’s rights, and being tired of hearing the same fable constantly repeated, I am going to make known the truth, which alone ought to dictate history.” He went on to declare that the fire was not the result of a preconcerted plan, but that it originated in many of the shopkeepers and others having voluntarily applied the flame to their own dwellings. The French, nevertheless, adhere to the opinion that Rostopchin was the author of the conflagration. He returned to Russia in 1825. He was a spirited and witty writer, and produced several works, and also wrote a singular piece of biography, entitled “My Memoirs, written in ten minutes.” b. 1705; d. at Moscow, 1826.

ROTHSCHILD, Meyer Anselm, rots'-child, the founder of the celebrated commercial family which bears his name, was designed for the Jewish priesthood; but becoming an orphan in his eleventh year, was placed in a banking-house at Hanover. After acquiring some little capital, he returned to Frankfort, where he began business upon a modest scale as banker or exchange-broker. His skill and reputation for probity gained for him general confidence, and in 1801 he became banker to the landgrave of Hesse, whose private fortune was preserved through the tact of Rothschild during the troubled period when Napoleon I. held undisputed sway over Germany. The house subsequently attained unexampled prosperity, and upon the death of Meyer Anselm, his sons were left a legacy of enormous wealth and boundless credit. He had ten children, five of whom were sons. The eldest, Anselm, was the chief of the Frankfort house, Solomon of that of Vicuna; Nathan settled at Manchester in 1800, and afterwards in London. He was regarded as the ablest of the family, and to his sagacity is principally due the great prosperity of the house. He advanced money to the English government during the last years of the continental war, and was the first to introduce foreign loans into England. Charles was established at Naples, and James at Paris. Although widely separated from each other, the five brothers were in reality but the heads of departments of one great firm. Meyer Anselm Rothschild was born at Frankfort-on-the-Maine about 1750; d. 1812.

ROTHECK, Charles Von, rot'-tek, an eminent German historian and statesman, who was appointed professor of history at the university of Baden in 1798. He travelled through Europe to increase his knowledge of constitutional law, and, after his return, published several works remarkable for their liberal tendency. In 1806 he was appointed councillor to the grand-duke of Baden, and afterwards professor of law and political economy at Friburg. He subsequently became vice-president of the Chamber of Baden, wherein he zealously defended public liberty, and especially the liberty of the press. He edited a political dictionary, and was the author of several valuable historical works. b. in Baden, 1775; d. 1840.

ROUBILLAC, Louis Francis, rou-bill'-i-ak, an eminent sculptor, who was a native of France but who settled at an early age in England where he became the most popular sculptor of his time. His best works are,—the statue of George II. in Golden Square, London, and Shakspeare in the British Museum. b. at Lyons, about 1695; d. in London, 1762.

ROTHER, Eugene, rou'-ai, a French statesman and barrister, who was minister of justice, with the exception of a short interval, from 1849 to 1852, when he became vice-president of the council of state. He was afterwards minister of agriculture, &c., and was nominated to the Senate in 1856. He negotiated the French treaty of commerce with Mr. Cobden in 1860. He was minister of state from 1863 to 1869, and a zealous supporter of Napoleon III. b. 1811.

ROUSSEAU, Jean Baptiste, a French poet, who was the son of a shoemaker. He, however, received a liberal education, and wrote some poetical pieces in his youth, which brought him into so much notice, that Marshal Tallard took him to England as his secretary. Several virulent satires having been circulated against persons of eminence, to whom Rousseau was known to have an aversion, the general voice attributed them to him; when, so great was the odium he incurred, that he was banished from the kingdom. He then went to Switzerland, and being introduced to Prince Eugene, accompanied him to Vienna. He afterwards lost the favour of the prince, on which he went to Brussels, where he contracted an intimacy with Voltaire, which ended in a quarrel, and the two poets lampooned each other without mercy. Besides his epigrams, sonnets, and other poems, he wrote some comedies and letters. b. at Paris, 1670; d. at Brussels, 1741.

ROUSSEAU, Jean Jacques, a celebrated French author, was the son of a watchmaker. His mother died while he was a child, which, he says, was the first of his misfortunes. Among the earliest books which fell in his way were Plutarch and Tacitus. His education, however, was very confined, and he was put apprentice to an engraver; but, according to his own account, he learned nothing but lying and pilfering. He ran away from his master, and in a destitute condition was taken under the protection of a lady named Madame de Warens, who had quitted the Protestant religion for the Catholic. This lady appears to have had somewhat of the zeal of proselytism in her charity, for she sent the young fugitive to a Roman Catholic seminary at Turin. He did not long remain there, but hired himself as footman to a lady, who died shortly after. Having some talents for music, he set up as a teacher of that art at Chambéry, whence, in 1710, he went to Lyons, and afterwards to Venice as private secretary to the French envoy. In 1745 he repaired to Paris, where he lived in great poverty during some time, till Dupin, the farmer-general, gave him a place in his department. In 1750 he obtained a prize from the academy of Dijon for the best essay in answer to the question "Whether the re-establishment of the arts and sciences has conduced to the purity of morals?" This success prompted to produce a discourse upon "The Origin of Inequality among mankind." In 1758 he published a letter to D'Alembert upon the project of establishing a theatre at Geneva. In this letter, which was well written, he declared himself adverse to theatrical exhibitions, though he had before published a comedy, and also a pastoral, both adapted for the stage. He next published his "Dictionary of Music." He had previously produced a dissertation on French literature, or rather a censure of it. In 1760 appeared his romance of the "New Heloisa." It is in the form of letters, exhibiting a strange mixture of beauties and deformities, but it was read with avidity. This work was eclipsed by his "Emile," a moral romance, in which he condemns every other mode of education but that of following nature. Rousseau, in this work, attacks the prophecies and of the Christian religion, while he praises the gospel. He draws a beautiful picture of its Divine Author. The Parliament of Paris condemned the book, and prosecuted the writer, who fled to Switzerland, where he received so many inults on account of his principles, that he returned to Paris, and on the invitation of Mr. Hume went to London in 1766, where he found a quiet asylum during a short period; but, having quarrelled with his friend, he went back to France, and sometimes appeared in the Armenian dress. He was of a restless, proud, and tactful disposition, imagining that there was a conspiracy of men of letters against him, and that all mankind were his enemies. His works have been published in twenty-two volumes by Levré. b. at Geneva, 1712; d. near Chamilly, 1778.

Middle Temple, where he was called to the bar, but never distinguished himself in that profession. At the age of 25 he produced his "Ambitious Step-mother," a tragedy, which was so well received as to encourage him to pursue the dramatic career, which he did with increasing reputation. He was appointed under-secretary of state, and, upon the accession of George I., was made poet-laureate, and surveyor of the customs in the port of London. Besides his tragedies, he wrote some poems, and translated Lucan's "Pharsalia" and Quillett's "Callipædia" in verse. His remains were interred in Westminster Abbey. b. at Little Beckford, Bedfordshire, 1673; d. 1718.

ROWLEY, ro'-le, a monk of Bristol. (See CHATTEBTON.)

ROWLEY, William, an English dramatic writer, and comic actor of some reputation in the reign of James I., who was assisted in one of his plays by Deeker, Ford, and others; and in another by, it is supposed, Shakespeare.

ROXANA, ro'-a-na, the wife of Alexander the Great, was the daughter of a Bactrian prince, and celebrated for her beauty. At the death of Alexander she was pregnant of a son, who was named Alexander the Younger. Cassander put to death both the mother and son, 312 B.C.

ROXBURGH, William, ro'-burg, an eminent Scotch botanist, was a physician in the service of the East India Company, and while employed at Samulcottah, introduced pepper, coffee, cinnamon, the bread-fruit tree, &c., into the plantations of the district. In 1783 he became superintendent of the botanic garden at Calcutta. He caused two thousand drawings of the plants he had discovered to be made, and sent them to the Court of Directors. His researches led to the publication of the celebrated "Flora Indica" and "Coromandel Plants," which latter was produced subsequently to his death. p. 1816.

ROY, Julien le, roi, a celebrated French clock and watch maker, who, from his earliest years, evinced a great aptitude for mechanical pursuits, and in 1713 was admitted into the Company of Clockmakers at Paris, where he acquired a high reputation. b. 1686; d. 1759.

ROY, Peter le, son of the preceding, became watchmaker to the king, and published "Mémoires pour les Horlogers de Paris," and "Treatise on the Labours of Harrison and Le Roy for the Discovery of the Longitude at Sea." p. 1785.

ROY, Major-General William, an eminent British geodesist, who conducted the first trigonometrical survey of the United Kingdom, which was commenced in 1787. At the same time the national observatories of Paris and Greenwich were connected by means of a series of triangles. An able account of the instruments he used, and of the nature, object, and results of his operations, was published in the "Philosophical Transactions." In the same year he transmitted to the Royal Society a paper called "Experiments and Observations made in Britain in order to obtain a Rule for Measuring Heights with the Barometer." He was also the author of a valuable work, entitled "The Military Antiquities of the Romans in Britain," in which he traced the march of Agricola from South into North Britain, and gave a description of the wall of Antoninus Pius, commonly called Grime's Dyke. At the outset of his career he had been employed in surveying and mapping, first the Highland districts, and afterwards the whole of Scotland. At his death he was fellow of the Royal Society, surveyor-general of the courts, deputy quartermaster-general, and major-general of the royal artillery. b. in London, 1790.

ROYER-COLLARD, Pierre Paul, ro'-yai-ko-lar', a distinguished French statesman and philosopher, who, shortly after his admission to the bar at Paris, embraced the principles of the Revolution in 1789; but he soon became disgusted with the scenes of violence that prevailed, bade adieu for a time to politics, and gave himself up to literary pursuits. In 1810 he was appointed to a chair of literature and philosophy. After the Restoration he again engaged in politics, and in 1828 was nominated president of the Chamber of Deputies, of which he had long been a member, but retired from this office in 1830. He was one of the founders of the French school of politicians called Doctrinaires; and introduced into France that system of philosophy illustrated by Cousin, Jouffroy, and Damiron, and which bears close analogy to that of Reid, and the other Scotch philosophers. b. 1783; d. 1845.

RUBENS, Peter Paul, roo'-bens or roo'-bans, a famous painter, and the greatest of the Flemish school, after studying under several of the most eminent of the Flemish artists, went to Italy, where he greatly improved himself by the study of the works of the best masters, but chiefly Titian and Paul Veronese. He sojourned at Rome, Florence, Mantua, and Genoa, and in 1609 settled at Antwerp, where he gained so great a reputation as to be sent for to Paris to paint the gallery of the palace of Luxembourg. He was afterwards employed by the infant Isabella and the king of Spain in some important negotiations, which he executed with such credit as to be appointed secretary of the privy council. On going to England as ambassador from the king of Spain, he obtained the favour of Charles I., who conferred on him the honour of knighthood, and made him some valuable presents. While in England, he sketched the design for the ceiling of the banquetting-house at Whitehall. He subsequently returned to Antwerp, where he resided till his death. b. at Cologne, 1577; d. 1640.

RUBINI, Giambattista, roo'-be'-ne, an Italian vocalist, who was the son of a professor of music, and was at first engaged as an instrumentalist in the orchestra of the theatre of Romano. He subsequently appeared as a singer at Bergamo, and at Brescia and Florence, but with small success. In 1825 he made his début at Paris, and was received with enthusiasm. His popularity soon afterwards became as great in England and in Italy. His voice was a tenor of the most beautiful and extensive kind, and, as an actor, he displayed much fervour and intelligence. b. at Romano, 1795; d. 1854.

RUBENQUIS, William de, roo'-broo'-ke, an eminent traveller of the Middle Ages, was a monk of the Franciscan order, and his real name was Ruysbroek, which according to the pedantic custom of his time, he changed into the Latinized form. In 1253 he was sent by Louis IX. into Tartary to preach the gospel to the Mongols. After undergoing dreadful fatigues, he and his two companions succeeded in gaining the encampment of Batu Khan, upon the banks of the Volga. They next proceeded, under the escort of Batu Khan, to Manchou Khan, the or conquest by force, of large tracts of surrounding territory. By the time he had reached his 29th year he had made himself master of a vast country, and had approached the boundaries of the British possessions. In 1809 he entered into a treaty, by which he engaged "to preserve peace and amity with the British; not to keep more troops on the left bank of the Sutlej than were necessary for preserving his territories;" which engagement he, crafty and prudent as he was courageous, faithfully kept during the remainder of his life. He subsequently made himself ruler of Gojerat, Moul-tan, Peshawur, and Cashmere, where by stratagem he obtained possession of the celebrated Koh-i-noor diamond, now the property of her Majesty Queen Victoria. Having thus extended his dominions upon every side, he assumed, in 1819, the title of maharajah (king of kings). At a later period he invited the European generals Allard, Ventura, and Court, to organize his army; and it was through these officers that the Sikh soldiery became so highly disciplined. Despite his active and ambitious disposition, Ranjeet had always indulged in excesses; so that, in his 50th year, he became disabled by bodily ailments, and in the last few years of his life could over the way; and had no brothers, nor sisters, nor companions." He received his education at the University of Oxford; but although his academic career was highly successful, his mind was mainly fixed upon the study of art. Many of the best painters of the English school of landscape-painting engaged his attention; but Turner became his idol. In 1843 he produced the first volume of his remarkable work on art, under the title of "Modern Painters, their Superiority in the Art of Landscape-painting to all the Ancient Masters." The English reading public were startled at the bold paradoxes, the affluence of words, and the poetical feeling of the new writer upon art, who denounced "Claude, Poussin, Salvator Rosa, Cuyp, Berghem, Ruysdael, Hobbins, Teniers (in his landscapes), Paul Potter, Canaletti, and the various Van-somethings and Baek-somethings, more especially and malignantly those who have libelled the sea." This remarkable work was completed in five volumes in 1860. Meanwhile, the author had produced, in 1849, the "Seven Lamps of Architecture," in which, in a strain of fervid eloquence, he sought to prove that "the attributes of a building were those of action, voice, and beauty," and adorned his bold theories with a multitude of allusions

RUPERT, Prince, rus'-pert, (otherwise Prince Robert Rupert of Bavaria), was the son of Frederick V., elector palatine, by Elizabeth, daughter of James I. He went to England at the beginning of the civil war, and, embracing the cause of his uncle, Charles I., proved himself brave and impetuous, but rash and unskilful as a general of the royalist cavalry. At Marston Moor, his want of discretion was the ruin of the king's cause; and, having subsequently surrendered Bristol to the Parliamentarians, after a mere show of defence, he was deprived of his command. He was, however, appointed commander of the king's ships, and served upon the Irish coast; but after being blockaded in port, and chased over the sea by Blake, his vessels were nearly all destroyed by the latter, in 1651. In the reign of Charles II. he commanded the fleet, and distinguished himself in several actions with the Dutch. The last years of his life were occupied with philosophical pursuits, and in making experiments in chemistry, engraving, painting, and mechanics. He is stated, but erroneously, to have been the inventor of mezzotint engraving. b. 1619; d. in London, 1682.

RUSHWORTH, John, rus'-werth, an industrious English compiler, who was educated first at Oxford, and was afterwards called to the bar. In 1640 he was appointed assistant clerk at the House of Commons, being expert in taking down speeches in shorthand. He was employed by the Parliament in several capacities; and his relation, Sir Thomas Fairfax, general of the forces, made him his secretary. He sat for Derwick in Richard Cromwell's Parliament. His "Historical Collections of private Passages of State," have proved of inestimable service to the historians of the Revolution. b. about 1607; d. in the King's Bench prison, 1690.

RUSKIN, John, rus'-kin, a modern English art critic, was the son of a merchant in London, where he was accustomed, he says, "to no other prospect than that of the brick walls and containing an impassioned rhapsody upon the architecture, the historical associations, and picturesque beauty of the fallen city. His "Lectures upon Architecture and Painting," delivered at Edinburgh, "Notes on the Construction of Sheep-folds," and a pamphlet upon the opening of the Crystal Palace, followed, and were in time succeeded by a brochure upon Pre-Raphaelitism. The band of young and enthusiastic English painters who, in 1849, sought to effect a revolution in the pictorial art of their time, and who styled themselves the "Pre-Raphaelites," were claimed as his followers by Ruskin, who declared that their style was evolved from a study of the principles enunciated in his "Modern Painters;" and it was to make known the beauties and the art-knowledge exhibited in their productions, that he put forth his pamphlet entitled "Pre-Raphaelitism." Not less eloquent in style, or authoritative in tone, were his "Notes on the Principal Pictures exhibited in the Royal Academy," which for several years in succession he published. In 1851 he produced a charming fairy tale, entitled "The King of the Golden River, or the Black Brothers;" and wrote some papers on political economy. Since this time he has written numerous lectures and works on art subjects and political economy, the principal of which are "Unto the Last," "Sesame and Lilies," "Crown of Wild Olive," and "Time and Tide by Wear and Tyme." In April, 1867, he was appointed Rode's Lecturer in the University of Cambridge, and shortly after the honorary degree of LL.D. was conferred on him. b. in London, 1819.

RUSSELL, Lord William, rus'-sel, an English politician, who, having entered the House of Commons, and being zealous for the cause of Protestantism, sided with the Whigs, and laboured with great earnestness for the exclusion of the duke of York from the succession to the throne. He afterwards appears to have taken part in some meetings at which the possibility of seizing the king's guard, and inciting the people to a general rising, was discussed; but there is no proof that he consented to either proposal. This scheme, which was called "the Rye House Plot," having been discovered by his political opponents, he and other members of the Whig party, including Essex and Algernon Sidney, were brought to trial upon the charge of conspiring to attack the king as he returned from the races at Newmarket, and to place the duke of Monmouth upon the throne. He was condemned upon the most insufficient and contradictory evidence, and beheaded. His excellent wife, Lady Rachel Russell, attended him during his trial, and acted as his secretary. This admirable woman remained a widow during forty subsequent years, always mourning her husband's death. n. 1639; beheaded, 1683.

RUSSELL, Edward, Earl of Orford, a British admiral, became gentleman of the bedchamber to James, duke of York; but on the execution of his cousin, Lord William Russell, he retired from court, and was an active promoter of the Revolution. He gained the celebrated battle of La Hogue in 1692, commanded subsequently in the Mediterranean, and was first lord of the Admiralty. n. 1651; d. 1727.

RUSSELL, Dr. Alexander, physician to the English factory at Aleppo, who in 1755 published the "Natural History of Aleppo," an excellent work, which has been reprinted and translated into different languages. He returned to England in 1759, and became physician to St. Thomas's Hospital. n. at Edinburgh, about 1700; d. in London, 1768.

RUSSELL, William, an historical writer, was brought up as a printer, which business he for a time followed, and then became an author by profession. His works are, "A History of America," "A History of Modern Europe," and "A History of Ancient Europe," which was completed by Dr. Cooté, the work being unfinished at Russell's death. n. 1741; d. 1793.

RUSSELL, Earl, long and perhaps better known as Lord John Russell, an English statesman, was the youngest son of the sixth duke of Bedford, and received his education at Westminster school and at the university of Edinburgh, where he had the celebrated Dugald Stewart among his teachers. In 1813, being then in his 21st year, he entered the House of Commons as the representative of the Whig borough of Tavistock, which was at the disposal of his father. The strong ministry of Lords Liverpool and Castlereagh was then in power, and the young politician went into opposition as a member of the Whig party. His conscientiousness and talents, no less than the advantage of his birth, concurred to pave his way to the leadership of the Whigs. From the outset he energetically demanded parliamentary reform, and, after having forced the Tory government to make concession after concession, he, in 1830, entered office as paymaster of the forces in the Whig administration of Earl Grey, an administration which was pledged to carry parliamentary reform. Early in the year 1831 he introduced the Reform Bill to the House, and after a debate of almost unparalleled violence, its provisions were carried, on the second reading, by a majority of one; but upon the subsequent motion for going into committee, it was thrown out by a majority of eight. The ministry of Earl Grey thereupon appealed to the country, to which a most energetic and decided response was given. After the general election, a new Parliament met, the Reform Bill was once more introduced, and was passed triumphantly. But now followed the opposition in the Lords. In that assembly it was thrown out by a majority of forty-one. The Commons responded by passing a vote of confidence with a majority of 131. The bill was, however, withdrawn, and underwent some slight modifications before it again made its appearance in the upper chamber, when, still meeting with a determined opposition to his measure, Earl Grey resolved to resign. The duke of Wellington came into power at the head of a Tory administration; but the nation was aroused, and loudly demanded the Reform Bill. The duke was forced to yield; the Whigs resumed the reins of government, and the Reform Bill passed. During this great crisis Lord John Russell conducted himself with much intrepidity, and won the most favorable opinions of the country at large. When the Whig cabinet of Lord Melbourne supplanted the Tory administration of Sir Robert Peel in 1835, he became home secretary and ministerial leader of the House of Commons. His party remained in office until 1841, and Lord John Russell went into opposition to Sir Robert Peel's Conservative administration till 1846, when, upon the disruption of Sir Robert's party, mainly in consequence of their chief having abolished the corn laws, Lord John Russell succeeded to power. In 1851 his cabinet was weakened by the secession of Lord Palmerston, who, in the following year, defeated his former chief upon the Militia Bill. Lord John Russell thereupon resigned. In the coalition administration of Lord Aberdeen, he held the appointment of foreign secretary during a few months, when, resigning the post to Lord Clarendon, he remained without a portfolio, but as a member of the cabinet. In 1854 he became president of the Council, and introduced his new Reform Bill, the consideration of which, however, gave way to the more pressing exigencies of the war in which England, allied with France, was engaged with Russia. As to the conduct of that war he disagreed with Lord Aberdeen, and a accordingly withdrew from his administration. At the fall of the Aberdeen cabinet in 1855, he took secretary under Lord Palmerston, but in consequence of the dissolution of the cabinet by his resignation, he retired in that year. In 1859, and was again minister in 1860. He was again minister in 1860, but in consequence of the fall of his new Reform Bill, he retired.

He is a biographer of his ancestor, Lord Russell, and an editor of the History of the English Government and Constitution, from the Reign of Henry VII. to the present time; "Don Carlos, a tragedy: the Affairs of Europe from the Peace of Utrecht," and memoirs of Fox and the poet Moore. n. in London, 1792.

RUSSELL, John Scott, a modern Scotch engineer, who studied mathematics and the physical sciences at Edinburgh and Glasgow, where he graduated in 1821. After being engaged in shipbuilding operations at Greenock, and at the head of an engineering establishment at Edinburgh, he went to London, where he directed his attention to the construction of iron vessels. In 1835 he built a ship upon his newly-discovered "wave principle," which together with other vessels subsisted constructed upon the same model, was perfectly successful. His greatest achievement, however, was the Great Eastern, a marvel of skill and mechanical science. He was a fellow of the Royal Society of London, secretary of the Society of Arts, and was one of the most active members of the Commission of the Great Exhibition of 1851. In 1837 he received from the Royal Society of Edinburgh, of which he was a member, a gold medal, for his proposed improvements in the form of vessels. B. in the Vale of Clyde, 1803.

RUSSELL, William Howard, a modern English littérateur, who received his education at the university of Dublin. In 1842 he repaired to London to seek employment as reporter for the daily press; and ultimately, in the following year, succeeded in obtaining an engagement on the staff of the "Times" newspaper, for which he reported, in 1845, an account of the monster meetings which were then taking place in Ireland. In 1846 he entered at the Middle Temple and in the same year visited Ireland during the famine as special correspondent of the "Morning Chronicle." He was, however, again taken on the staff of the "Times" in 1847, and was employed in making reports of various public events until the outbreak of the Russian war, when he was selected to proceed to the Crimea, and supply that journal with descriptions of the military operations. The result is well known. His brilliant and picturesque pen furnished the public with the most graphic accounts of what took place in camp, or in the field, while his quick-sightedness and fearless honesty led him to expose the defective arrangements, and the incompetence or inertness of those in command. In brief, he was a prime mover of that inquiry which resulted in improving the condition of the British army before Sebastopol. His valuable contributions were afterwards reprinted in two volumes. In 1856 he became LL.D. of the University of Dublin, and subsequently took the management of the "Naval and Military Gazette." He visited India in 1857, and witnessed the suppression of the Indian mutiny by Lord Clyde. After the outbreak of the civil war in America, he acted for some time as special correspondent of the "Times" in that country; but being refused permission to accompany the Federal army, returned to England in 1862. He accompanied the Austrian army in the "Seven Weeks war" of 1866, after recording the unsuccessful attempt to lay the Atlantic cable in 1865, and in 1869 visited Egypt in the suite of the Prince of Wales. Has written an amusing novel called "The Adventures of Dr. Brady." B. in Dublin, 1821.

РУССЕЛЛОН, Daniel, ru-thér-ford, a natural philosopher and physician of the university of Edinburgh, who succeeded Dr. John Hope as professor of Botany there in 1786. He was the discoverer of nitrogen, and the first who shewed that oxygen gas was the principal constituent of all acids. B. 1749; p. 1819.

RUTILIUS RUTRUS, Publius, ru-ti-l'i-us, consul of Rome, 150 B.C. His love of justice gave such offence to some of the Roman knights, that they accused him of peculation, and he was banished. Upon his passage from Italy to Asia, all the cities he passed through showed him the greatest honours, so that his progress had more the appearance of a triumph than an exile. Sylla subsequently offered to recall him to Rome, but he refused, and died in exile at Smyrna.

UTILIUS, Numatianus Claudius, a Latin poet, who made a voyage from Rome to Gaul, and wrote an account of his progress in an Itinerary, in elegiac verse. Flourished at the commencement of the 5th century.

RUYSCH, Frederic, roish, an eminent Dutch anatomist, who studied at Leyden, and after taking his doctor's degree, settled at Amsterdam. When the czar, Peter the Great, visited that city, he became his pupil, and purchased his collection of natural curiosities and preparations. Ruysch was a member of the Royal Society of London, the Academy of Sciences at Paris, and other learned bodies. He produced some anatomical works. B. 1685; p. 1731.

RUYSDAEL, or RUYSDAAL, Jacob, rois-dail, an eminent Dutch landscape painter. His pictures, which exhibit nature with great force and clearness, are very valuable. B. at Haarlem, 1625; p. at the same place, 1681.

RUXTER, Michael Adrian, roi-ter, a distinguished Dutch admiral, who went to sea at an early age, and after passing through the different ranks of the service, became an admiral in 1641. Not long afterwards he defeated the corsairs on the coast of Barbary. In 1653 he was second in command under Van Tromp, whom he ably supported against the English in three engagements. In 1659 he was sent to succour the king of Denmark against the Swedes, and for his services was ennobled by that monarch. After many gallant actions, he was killed on the coast of Sicily, in a desperate engagement with the French, in 1676. B. at Flushing, 1607.

RYCAUT. (See RICAUT, Sir Paul.)

RYLAND, William Wynne, ri-land, an eminent English engraver, who became an apprentice to a French engraver settled in London, and afterwards went abroad, and greatly improved himself in France and Italy. After his return to his native country, he introduced the art of engraving copper-plates so as to yield an impression resembling drawings in chalk. He was appointed engraver to George III., and had a salary of £200 a year conferred on him. Some of his first productions were a whole-length figure of the king, another of the queen, and one of Lord Bute. In 1782 he was found guilty of having committed a forgery on the East India Company, for which he was tried and executed. B. in London, 1732; hanged, 1783.

RYMER, Thomas, ri-mer, a learned English antiquary and critic, who became historiographer royal in 1692, and formed an immense collection of public acts, treaties, conventions, and state letters, under the title of "Fœdera," published in London in 20 volumes folio. He was also the author of a "View of the Tragedies of the Last Age," in which he made an absurd attack upon Shakspeare. B. in Yorkshire, 1639; p. in London, 1713.

RYSBRAECK, Peter, rise-brail, an eminent Dutch landscape painter, who was an imitator of Poussin, and became director of the academy of Antwerp. His figures and trees are well designed, and he painted expeditiously and with spirit. B. at Antwerp, 1657; p. 1716.

RYSBRAECK, Michael, an eminent Flemish sculptor, and son of the preceding, who had him educated under the sculptor Michael Vander Vorst. He repaired to London in 1720, and became extensively employed. He was a fine artist, and during his long residence in the English capital, greatly contributed to spread a taste for sculpture throughout the kingdom by

His most celebrated works were the equestrian statue of William III. in Soho Square; the monument to Sir Isaac Newton, in Westminster Abbey; the statue of George II., for Greenwich Hospital; the monument to the duke and duchess of Marlborough, in the chapel at Blenheim; and those to Milton, Ben Jonson, Sir Godfrey Kneller, Gay, and Rowe, in Westminster Abbey. n. at Antwerp, 1693; n. in London, 1770.

SAAD-ED-DEEN, Mohammed, sá-ál ed-deen', the most eminent of the Turkish historians, who was professor in the college attached to the mosque of St. Sophia, and subsequently became tutor to Mourad, the son of Selim II. When Mourad succeeded to the throne, in 1574, Saad was taken into the most intimate confidence, and in 1598 became mufti, the highest ecclesiastical dignity in the state. His work is entitled "Tad-jal-towarikh," or "Crown of Histories," and contains an account of the Turkish empire, from its establishment by Othman, in 1299, to the death of Selim I., in 1520. Of it Sir W. Jones says, that "for the beauty of its composition and the richness of its matter, it may be compared with the first historical pieces in the languages of Europe." He also produced a history of Selim I. This work has never been printed in its original condition, but an Italian translation was published in 1652. n. early in the 16th century; n. at Constantinople, 1590.

SAADI, sá'-a-de, an illustrious Persian poet, who, having quitted his native country when it was invaded by the Turks, proceeded to Palestine, where he was taken prisoner by the Crusaders, and compelled to labour on the fortifications of Tripoli. He was afterwards ransomed by a merchant of Aleppo, whose daughter he espoused with a dowry of a hundred pieces of gold. But the lady being of a capricious temper, the poet was unhappy in his marriage. "Once," he says, "she reproached me, crying, 'Art thou not he whom my father redeemed from captivity amongst the Franks for ten dinars?' I answered 'Yes, he ransomed me for ten dinars, and delivered me to you for a hundred.'" The poet spent thirty years as a traveller, or as a soldier; as many more were occupied in religious solitude; while the closing period of his life was devoted to the composition of his works, which are highly esteemed, and principally consist of "Gulistan; or, the Garden of Flowers," a collection of stories in prose, but interpolated with original or selected verses; "The Bostan, or Garden of Fruits," which is all in verse; and a collection of fragments and essays. The "Gulistan" has been translated into English by Gladwin, and published in 1808, and another edition was produced by Eastwick in 1862. n. at Shiraz, 1175; n. 1201, aged 116.

SAAYEDRA, Miguel Cervantes de, (SER CERVANTES).

SABAS, sai-bás, the founder of a sect called Messalians, who maintained that the Gospel was to be followed literally. In conformity with this rule, Sabas made himself a cunuch. This sect appeared about 310, but became extinct at the close of that century.—There was a saint of this name who was superior of the monasteries in Palestine, and died 531.

SABATH-NAVI, sá-bá-tel'-i se'-vi, a Jewish impostor, who declared himself to be the Messiah, and was acknowledged by several rabbins and other Jews, who sent letters to their dispersed brethren in all parts of the world, announcing the great event. Sabateli, however, was arrested at Constantinople, and sent to prison, whither the misguided Jews flocked in crowds, and bribed the governor by large presents for the privilege of kissing his chains. The sultan, Mohammed, having ordered him to be brought into his presence, demanded of him a miracle as a proof of his mission, which Sabateli declined to perform. Mohammed then gave him his choice, either to turn Mussulman or be put to death. The pretended prophet accepted the former condition, but was afterwards sent to prison, where he n. 1676. n. at Smyrna, 1625.

SABATHIER, Pierre, sab-bá-tel'-i, a Benedictine of St. Maur, who spent twenty years in editing a collection of the Latin versions of the Bible, which was published in 1743, under the title of "Biblorum Sacrorum Latine Versiones antiquæ." n. at Poitiers, 1682; n. 1742.

SABELLUS, sá-bel'-l-us, the founder of a religious sect called by his name. He maintained that there was no distinction of persons in the Trinity, and his followers became very numerous. The heresy was condemned by the council of Constantinople in 381. Lived in the 3rd century.

SABINA, Julia, sá-bé'-na, the wife of the emperor Adrian, and celebrated for her private and public virtues. When Adrian found his end approaching, he compelled her to take poison, that she might not survive him, a.d. 134.

SABINUS, Flavius, sá-bi'-nus, a brother of Vespasian, who was killed by the populace. He was a faithful adherent to the fortunes of Vitellius, commanded the Roman legions during 35 years, and was governor of Rome for 12.

SABINUS, Julius, a Roman officer, who proclaimed himself emperor at the commencement of the reign of Vespasian. He was soon afterwards defeated in battle, and, to escape from the conqueror, hid himself in a cave with two faithful domestics, and remained unseen during nine successive years. His wife having discovered his retreat, spent her time with him, until her frequent visits to the cave divulged the secret of her husband's concealment. Sabinus was dragged forth, and by Vespasian's order was put to death, although his wife showed the twins whom she had brought forth in the subterraneous retreat.

SACCHETTI, Franco, sak-ket'-te, an eminent Italian novelist and poet, who was the contemporary of Boccaccio, to whom he was scarcely inferior. He came of a considerable family of Florence, and in 1383 acted as one of the Council of Eight, or magistrates of that republic. He was also chief magistrate of Bologna. His novels were printed for the first time in 1724. Flourished in the 14th century.

SACCHI, Andrea, sak'-ke, a celebrated Italian painter, and one of the great luminaries of the Roman school. He received his first instruction in the art from his father, and afterwards became the most skilful of all Albano's pupils. In 1623 he was commissioned to paint a large altar-piece for St. Peter's. He was an enthusiastic admirer of the works of Raffaele, and being shown a design of his on one occasion, exclaimed, "What! they would make me believe that Raffaele was a man!—no; he was an al!" Among his most distinguished pupils

SACCHINI, Antony Mario Gaspar, sak'-ke-ne, an eminent Italian composer, whose operas are written in a fine style, and many of the best were executed by him in London; but they are now almost forgotten. n. 1735; p. 1786.

SACHEVERELL, Henry, sa-shev'-e-rel, a celebrated divine, who was educated at Magdalen College, Oxford, of which he became a fellow, and proceeded to the degree of doctor in divinity in 1709. He translated into English verse part of Virgil's first "Georgic" in Dryden's "Miscellanies," and Addison addressed to him the dedication to his "Farewell to the Muses;" but what has made his name remarkable was his trial by impeachment for two political sermons, the first preached at Derby, and the second before the lord mayor at St. Paul's, in 1709. In these sermons he held up the Whig party, which was then in power, to ridicule; and preached passive obedience to the regal authority. The trial occupied the public attention in an extraordinary manner; and though the doctor was suspended for three years, Queen Anne, who found his politics much to her taste, presented him, as soon as that period expired, to the valuable living of St. Andrew, Holborn. n. about 1673; p. 1724.

SACHS, Hans, saks, a German poetical writer, whose real name was Loutzdrorffer. He embraced the principles of the reformed religion, which he defended in his writings. He had been apprenticed to the trade of a shoemaker, but, upon the expiration of his term, commenced wandering over his native country, writing verses, and chanting them in the towns and cities on his way. In 1510 he married, and settled at Nuremberg, where he led a studious and retired life until his demise. He wrote upwards of six thousand different compositions. 35th, in some portions of "Faust," imitated the manner of Hans Sachs, who is, moreover, eulogized "for the fidelity of colouring with which he exhibits the characters and times which he paints." Only a small portion of his writings are printed in an edition which appeared at Nuremberg in 1579. They are redolent of wit and shrewdness, but have little pretensions to be deemed refined and learned compositions. n. at Nuremberg, 1494; p. 1578.

SACKVILLE, Thomas, Earl of Dorset. (See DORSET, Earl of.)

SACKVILLE, Edward, sak'-vil, an English statesman, earl of Dorset, and grandson of the first earl. In 1613 he fought a desperate duel in Zealand with Lord Bruce, who was slain. He was one of the principal commanders sent in 1620 to assist Frederic, king of Bohemia, and was at the memorable battle of Prague in 1620. The year following he was sent as ambassador to the court of France. He was in great favour with king Charles, and became knight of the Garter, president of the council, and lord privy seal. n. 1590; p. 1632.

SACKVILLE, Charles, earl of Dorset, an English statesman, who, after concluding his travels, sat in Parliament, and in the Dutch war of 1665 served as a volunteer under the Duke of York, and the night before the sea engagement in which the enemy were defeated, wrote the famous song commencing, "To all ye ladies now on land." He engaged early in the interest of the Prince of Orange, and, upon the accession of William III., was made a member of the privy council, lord chamberlain, and knight of the Garter. He was a patron of men of letters, particularly Prior, and wrote some poetical pieces of merit. n. 1637; p. at Bath, 1706.

SACKVILLE, George, Lord Viscount, was the third son of the first duke of Dorset. In 1737 he obtained a commission in the army, and served at the battles of Dettingen and Fontenoy. He was afterwards with the duke of Cumberland in Scotland, where he contributed to the quelling of the rebellion. In 1758 he was appointed lieutenant-general, and sworn a member of the privy council. In 1769 he went to Germany, where, at the battle of Minden, he commanded the British and Hanoverian horse. In the action he was ordered to charge with his cavalry, but took no notice of the command. He was, in consequence, severely censured, his name was struck out of the list of the privy council, and he was by court-martial dismissed from the service. On the accession of George III. he was restored to favour, and, in 1769, by the will of Lady Elizabeth Germaine, succeeded to her property; on which occasion he took her name. In 1775 he became secretary of state for the American colonies, and directed the American war, with what result is well known. n. 1716; p. 1785.

SACRO-BOSCO, Johannes de, sak'-ro bos'-ko, an English mathematician, who was contemporary with Roger Bacon. He wrote treatises in Latin upon arithmetic and the figure of the earth. He was chosen professor of mathematics at the university of Paris, in which city he principally resided. n. in England, at the close of the 13th century; p. at Paris, 1256.

SACR, Antoine Isaac Silvester de, sa'-re, an eminent French orientalist. On account of his delicate health, he received his education under a private tutor. At a very early age he became proficient in the Greek and Latin languages, and becoming acquainted, in his 12th year, with a learned Benedictine monk, imbibed from that scholar a taste for the eastern tongues. He proceeded to study Hebrew, Arabic, Chaldee, Samaritan, Syriac, and Ethiopic, as well as English, Spanish, German, and Italian. To this vast store of knowledge he added the Persian and Turkish languages; and, in 1780, being then only in his 23rd year, made some valuable Biblical researches, notably in examining a Syriac manuscript of the Fourth Book of Kings, contained in the Bibliothèque Royale. In 1785 he contributed two memoirs to the "Transactions" of the Academy of Inscriptions and Belles-Lettres upon Arabian literature, and was employed to make extracts from the orientalist MSS. in the royal library. At the outburst of the French revolution he retired from Paris, and while the storm of republicanism was raging, occupied himself with some profound researches in oriental literature. After the establishment of the Imperial government, De Saey was sent upon a mission to Genoa, the object of which was the examination of the Arabic MSS. preserved in the archives of that city, and in 1806 he presented to the Academy a report of his labours. He was soon afterwards appointed professor of the Persian language and literature. Napoleon I. created him a baron of the empire; but, upon the restoration of the Bourbons, he gave his adherence to the new order of things, and was rewarded with the post of member of the Council for Public Instruction and the presidency of the Asiatic Society of Paris, a learned body which he himself mainly contributed to found. Under the monarchy of Louis Philippe he became keeper of the oriental manuscripts in the king's library, and perpetual secretary to the Academy of Inscriptions. This distinguished scholar produced, among other important works, an Arabic Grammar, the result of fifteen years' assiduous application; "Biographies of the Persian Poets;" "Principles of General Grammar;" "Chrestomathie Arabe," a selection of extracts in prose and verse from different Arabian authors; the Arabic text of the fables of Pilpay; and some valuable memoirs upon the antiquities of Persia. At his suggestion, and under his direction, were established the professorships of Hindostanee, Sanskrit, and Chinese, at Paris, as well as the institutions formed for the study of the oriental languages in Russia and Prussia. His last great work was an "Exposition of the Religion of the Druses." B. at Paris, 1758; d. at the same city, 1838.

SADLER, Sir Ralph, said'-ler, an English statesman, who was educated under Thomas Cromwell, earl of Essex, and became master of the royal wardrobe, and afterwards a member of the privy council under Henry VIII., which post he again filled in the reign of Elizabeth. B. near London, 1507; d. 1587.

SADOLETO, James, surd-o-lai-to, a learned Italian writer. He became secretary to Leo X., who compelled him to accept the bishopric of Carpentras, which he would modestly have declined. Paul III. made him a cardinal, and appointed him legate to the court of France. His works, which are written in correct and beautiful Latin, are, Discourses, Epistles, Expositions of the Psalms and St. Paul's Epistles, and Poems. He was a man of unblemished character and unassisted piety. b. at Modena, 1477: d. at Carpentras, 1547.

SAINT-ARNAUD, Jacques Achille Leroy de, saint-er-no, a French general and marshal, who entered the royal Gaurdis in his 16th year, and afterwards attained to the grade of sub-lieutenant of infantry; but being of an erratic disposition, he quitted the army for the theatre, and for ten years occupied the position of a minor actor. After the revolution of 1830, his military predilections were reawakened, and in the following year he again joined the ranks of the army, and almost immediately obtained the rank of lieutenant. The partisans of the Duchess de Berri having risen in insurrection in La Vendée, he was sent thither with his regiment, and after a campaign won the friendship of Marshal Bugeaud. He joined the army of Africa in 1836, as captain, and quickly made himself conspicuous as one of the most brilliant officers in Algeria. He won the decoration of the Legion of Honour, and by the year 1841 had risen by his valour to the rank of colonel of the 33rd regiment. In 1847 he was appointed commandant of the province of Constantina; and in 1851 completely subdued the tribus, after a series of twenty-six desperate combats. This feat brought him under the notice of Louis Napoleon, then prince-president of the republic. He was summoned to Paris, made general of division, given the command of the second division of the army of Paris, and finally appointed minister of war. He was taken into the confidence of the president, and intrusted with the execution of the coup d'état. That memorable task performed, honours were heaped upon him by Napoleon III. and at the outbreak of hostilities between England and France and Russia, he was given the command of the French army intended for the East. In 1854, although he could scarcely sit upon his horse, his energetic mind enabled him to conduct the successful attack of his army upon the Russians at the Alma; but his frame was totally worn out with the fatigues of his career, and with the greatest reluctance he was compelled to leave a command in which all his ambitious spirit was concentrated. He embarked on board the French steamer Berthollet, and two days afterwards breathed his last, on his passage to Constantinople. b. at Paris, 1748; d. 1854. (See Kinglake's "Invasion of the Crimea," &c.)

SAINT-CYR, Laurent Gouvion de, mar., a distinguished French marshal, who was the son of a tanner, but received a fair education, and after spending his early manhood successively as a teacher of drawing and as an actor, he entered the army in 1792, as a chasseur. He was of fine stature, and, having shown considerable alertness and bravery, was made a captain in the following year. Having reached the grade of general of division, he served under Jourdan, and next under Moreau, and, in 1797, was chosen by the Directory to supersede Massena as commander-in-chief of the army of Rome. In the Prussian and Polish campaign he increased his reputation, and in 1807 was appointed governor of Warsaw. Upon the invasion of Russia, in 1812, Napoleon I. placed him in command of the sixth corps of the grand army, and, having won a glorious battle over the Russians at Polotsk, he was immediately elevated to the rank of marshal, but, after the battle of Leipzig, was forced to capitulate with 36,000 men. After the return of Napoleon from Elba, he remained inactive, and then joined the cause of the Bourbons, by whom he was loaded with honors, and appointed minister of war. He wrote a number of military works. N. 1764: D. at Paris, 1830.

SAINTE-BEVRE, Charles Augustin, bu(r)re, a modern French poet and studied medicine, but subsequently turned his attention towards literature.

by writing articles on history, philosophy, and criticism for a French newspaper, and, in 1828, produced his "Historical and Critical Picture of Poetry and the Drama to the 16th Century," a work which was accepted as a choice specimen of criticism. Some poems followed, but were less favorably received. He next supplied papers to the Revue des Deux Mondes, to the National, and other important French organs; but his great work on the "History of Port Royal," which appeared between the years 1840-46, gave him the high position among French littérateurs which he from that period maintained. His remaining works were,—“Literary Portraits,” several volumes of criticism and literary studies, and a great number of bibliographical and critical prefaces to classical authors. nat. biogr. arch. sur-Mer. 804; p. 1860.

SAINTE-CLAIRE DEVILLE, Henry, describ'd, a modern French chemist, who, after completing his education at college, formed for himself a chemical laboratory, where, during nine ye he experimented in an elementary fashion at the outset, and subsequently upon abstruse theories. In 1845 he became professor at the Faculty of Sciences, Besançon, and, in 1851, succeeded M. Balard in the chemical professorship at the Normal school. After making many important researches in the department of the chemistry of mineral substances, he turned his attention towards the metal called aluminum, which Sir Humphry Davy had supposed, and M. Wehler had proved, to be obtainable from clay. The emperor of the French thereupon charged him to make researches with the view of producing the metal in quantities sufficiently large to become available in the arts. His efforts were crowned with success, and, in 1855, several bars of the new metal were shown at the Paris exhibition. It was found to bear a close resemblance to silver, and to be not heavier than an equal bulk of glass. Medals, brooches, bracelets, ear-rings, spectacles, and even helmets, have been made of it, its cost being less than an equal weight of silver. He has contributed many valuable papers on his favourite study to the French annals of chemistry and natural philosophy. B. at St. Thomas, in the Antilles, 1818.

SAINTEVREMOND. (See EVREMOND, SAINT.)

SAINTE-HILAIRE, Geoffroy-Etienne, he-lair', an eminent French naturalist, who was destined for the church; but having acquired a taste for the natural sciences while pursuing his education at the college of Navarre, he resolved to devote himself to experimental philosophy. After ardently prosecuting his studies at Paris, he, in 1798, obtained the posts of sub-curator and demonstrator of natural history in the Jardin des Plantes. At a later period he became professor of zoology, and gave lectures in conjunction with Cuvier. He proceeded to Egypt as a member of the French expedition of 1798, and subsequently received the appointment of professor of anatomy and physiology in the faculty of sciences. In 1808 he was dispatched upon a scientific expedition to Portugal; and, in 1815, took his seat in the Chamber of Deputies, as a member for Etampes, his native city. Of that department of science entitled "Experimental Anatomy," which was first developed by the German naturalists, M. de Saint-Hilaire was a profound and brilliant expounder. The noble collection of the Jardin des Plantes furnished him with the means of prosecuting his invaluable researches. So great was the zeal, and so acute the power of analysis and generalization possessed by him, that the influence of his theories has been shown in almost every work upon zoology which has been published within the last quarter of a century. "The fundamental idea of this system," says a writer in the "English Cyclopædia," "is the unity of the composition of the various parts of an organic body, and that this unity is capable of expression in a few simple laws." Thus, amongst his other labours, he proved that the bones of the head of a fish, "and, by consequence, those of the higher animals, were transformations of the simple vertebrae; and that the laws of development which applied to the one applied to the other." He gave an exposition of these remarkable laws in his work entitled "Philosophie Anatomique," published in 1818; the same theories were supported in a small work which he also produced in 1818, by way of introduction to the "Lectures on Natural History," given in the Jardin des Plantes, and which was called "On the Principle of the Unity of Organic Composition." He also gave to the world a great work upon the anatomical philosophy of human monsters. His complete works were published in forty-two volumes, under the title of "Professional Studies of a Naturalist." B. 1772; D. at Paris, 1844.

SAINTE-JOHN, James Augustus, saint-jon' or sain'-gin, an English writer, who went to London in his seventeenth year, and obtained employment upon the newspaper press. He was subsequently the editor of a paper at Plymouth, and in 1820 produced his first work, entitled "Abdallah," an oriental poem. Not long afterwards he was appointed sub-editor of the "Oriental Herald," for which print he wrote a history of the rise and progress of British power in India. In 1829 he repaired to Normandy with his family, and published an account of his stay in that country, in a work entitled "Residence in Normandy." In 1832 he set out from Switzerland, where he was at the time living with his family, for an extensive tour in the East, and upon his return produced a description of Egypt and Nubia. Another important work was his "Manners and Customs of the Ancient Greeks," published in 1843. While engaged upon the latter part of this book, he became almost entirely blind, his son Bayle St. John acting as his amanuensis. The most successful of the remaining works of this laborious writer were "Tales of the Ramadnan;" "Isis, an Egyptian Pilgrimage;" "There and Back Again;" "Philosophy at the Foot of the Cross;" and a "Life of Napoleon III." He likewise edited the prose works of John Milton, Sir Thomas More's "Utopia," the "Religio Medici" of Sir Thomas Brown, and Bunyan's "Pilgrim's Progress." B. in Caermarthenshire, 1800.

SAINTE-JOHN, Bayle, an English Littérateur and son of the preceding, wrote "Village Life in Egypt," "Two Years in a Levantine Family," "The Christian East," produced an abridged translation of a French work, entitled "Travels of an Arab Merchant in the Soudan;" and also published a picture of manners in the French capital, under the title of "Purple Tints of Paris." Two of his latest and most valuable works were those entitled "Montaigne the Essayist," and an abridgment of the Memoirs of Saint-Simon. B. in London, about 1820; D. 1859.—Three other sons of James Augustus St. John,—Percy, Horace, and Vane, were engaged in literary occupations.

SAINTE-JOHN. (See BOLINGBROKE, Viscount.)

SAINTE-JUST, Antoine, zhooat, a notorious French democrat and the colleague of Robespierre. On leaving college, he became an enthusiastic adherent of the principles of the revolution, and was elected to represent the department of Aisne in the Convention. He made himself remarkable by the violence of his opinions, greatly contributing to the condemnation of Louis XVI., the establishment of the republic, and the concentration of absolute power in the Convention. He allied himself with Robespierre against the Girondins, was a member of the Committee of Public Safety, and was one of those who organized the Reign of Terror. He fell with his chief, Robespierre. He cultivated letters, and wrote some licentious verses. B. in the Nivernais, 1766; guillotined, 1794.

Saint-Leonards

SAINT-LEONARDS, Edward Bartschaw Sugden, Baron, len-ords, a modern English lawyer, who was called to the bar at Lincoln's Inn in 1807. At the outset of his professional career he obtained a large amount of practice in consequence of the popularity of his "Concise and Practical Treatise of the Law of Vendors and Purchasers of Estates." Of this work he himself states, "it was certainly the foundation of my early success in life." Until the year 1817, he was mainly occupied as a conveyancer and chamber counsel, and in preparing for publication several works upon jurisprudence, which achieved a large amount of success. One of these, entitled "A Series of Letters to a man of property on Sales, Purchases, Mortgages, Leases, Settlements, and Devises of Estates," was republished in 1838, with additions, in a work called "A Handy Book of Property Law," in which form it attained a larger share of popularity than was ever before the case with respect to a treatise upon legal questions. In 1817 he devoted his time to the chancery bar, where he obtained very considerable practice. He was made king's counsel in 1822, and in 1828 entered the House of Commons as member for Weymouth. In the following year he was knighted and appointed solicitor-general, which office he vacated upon the retirement of the Duke of Wellington's administration in 1831. In 1835 he was appointed lord chancellor of Ireland under Sir Robert Peel, but held the office during only a short period. He resumed the Irish chanceryship in 1841, and held it until 1846. Under the administration of 1852 he was appointed lord chancellor of England, and was created a peer, with the title of Lord St. Leonards. He resigned this post on the retirement of the Conservative ministry at the close of the same year. Although not remarkable as a Parliamentary debater, his profound acquaintance with the law made him an important member of the political party with whom he acted. n. in London, 1781.

SAINT-MARTIN, Jean Antoine, mar-tin, a learned French writer, who was a master of the Arabic and Armenian languages, and became superintendent of the Oriental department of the royal printing-office. In 1822 he was appointed editor of the "Journal" of the French Asiatic Society, but lost all his places at the revolution of 1830. He produced, among other important works, "Memoirs upon Armenia," "History of the Lower Empire," and "History of Palmyra." n. at Paris, 1781; n. 1832.

SAINT-PIERRE, Etienne de, pe-air, a burgher of Calais, who signalized himself when that place was besieged by Edward III., king of England, in 1347. The brave resistance made by the inhabitants so irritated the English monarch, that he is said to have demanded six of their principal citizens to be delivered up to him, that they might be put to death. St. Pierre offered himself for one, and was joined by five others, who went out to the English camp in their shirts, with halters about their necks, and bearing the keys of the city. At the entreaty of Queen Philippa, Edward pardoned these patriotic men, and dismissed them with presents. n. 1371.

SAINT-PIERRE, Charles Irenneus Fastel de, a Jansenist and politician, who accompanied Cardinal Polignac to the conference at Utrecht, and was also admitted a member of the French Academy; but after the death of Louis XIV. he was excluded for some political opinions which he had expressed. His principal works were, "Project for a Universal Peace between the Powers of Europe," "Memoirs for Correcting the Police," and a series of "Reflections on Duelling, the Celibacy of the Priesthood, on Reforms of the French Turbids," &c. Cardinal Dubois called his writings "the dreams of an honest man." n. in Normandy, 1658; n. 1713.

SAINT-PIERRE. (See PIERRE, Bernardin de Saint.)

SAINT-SIMON, Louis de Rouvroi, Duke de, se-mu-ni, the writer of the famous "Memoirs of Saint-Simon." After serving in the army under Marshal Luxembourg, and signalizing himself at Namur, and at the battles of Fleurus, and Neerwinden, he quitted the military profession, resolving to devote himself to the court and a diplomatic career. He was, however, little employed in state affairs under Louis XIV.; but in 1721 went as ambasador to Spain to demand the infants in marriage for Louis XV. After the death of the regent duke of Orleans, he lost the court favour; when upon his retired to his estate, and there occupied himself with the composition of his memoirs. In this exceedingly interesting and valuable contribution 1801 he removed to the neighbourhood of the Ecole Médecine, in order, in a similar manner, to add to his stock of ideas regarding organized beings. Here he traversed the whole field of physiological science, and having imbibed all the contemporary scientific thought of France, it was necessary, according to his plan, that he should visit England and Germany, lest in either country any ideas should be lurking, of decided European value, though France had not recognized them. He next proceeded to make his "experimental education," he married, and "continued to pursue his prescribed career." Balls and dinners followed each other in rapid succession; every new situation that money could create was devised and prepared,—good and evil were confounded; play, discussion, and debauch were alike gone into; the experience of years was crushed into a short space,—even old age was artificially realized by medicaments; and that the loathsome might not be wanting, this enthusiast for the universal would inoculate himself with contagious diseases. In 1807 his "experiments" ended. His marriage proved an unhappy one; and he was left so poor that he became a clerk in the Mont de Piété (government loan office), at a yearly salary of £40. In 1812, being then in his fifty-second year, he considered it time to "establish his theories." He commenced the publication of a number of remarkable works, which, however impracticable and visionary in their character, attracted around their author a circle of enthusiastic disciples; among whom were Augustin Thierry the historian, and Comte, the future author of the "Positive Philosophy." His last efforts were directed towards the foundation of a new religion, which he called the "New Christianity;" one of the objects of which was "the most rapid possible amelioration, physical and moral, of the condition of the class the most numerous and poor. To attain this object, society was to be reorganized upon this formula:—to each man a vocation according to his capacity, and to each capacity a recompense according to its worth." Before breathing his last, this extraordinary man gave his final instructions to his chief disciples. His most important works were,—"Introduction to the Scientific Labours of the 19th Century;" "The Reorganization of European Society;" and "New Christianity." n. at Paris, 1760; p. 1835. After the death of its founder, "Saint-Simonism" experienced some curious mishaps. Several of its most enthusiastic followers established a little church, where a mystical theosophy was propounded. In 1830, a weekly journal was started in furtherance of the movement, which had now attracted numbers of the educated classes to embrace its dogmas; but a split occurred between the leaders of the sect—one party forming a kind of monastic community, which, after a short time, was suppressed by the government, M. Enfantin, the abbot, being sentenced to a term of imprisonment.

SALA, George Augustus, sa'-la, the son of a Portuguese gentleman, who had married a popular vocalist, was educated for becoming an artist, but abandoned the pencil for the pen, in the exercise of which he was very successful. He began his career by contributing to various periodicals sketches of life, particularly in London, somewhat in the style of Dickens. Many of these papers have been collected and published in volumes, under various titles. His principal works are—"The Baddington Peerage," "A Journey due North," being notes of residence in Russia in 1858; "The Seven Sons of Mammon," "Dutch Pictures," &c. He was for some time editor of "Temple Bar," a London magazine, to which he contributed a tale entitled "Captain Dangerous," written somewhat after the style of Defoe, and a series of articles called "Breakfast in Bed." Some papers on Hogarth from Mr. Sala's pen appeared in the "Cornhill Magazine." He also contributed to the columns of the daily journals and some of the illustrated London newspapers. n. in London about 1826.

SALADIN, or SALAHEDDIN, sal'-a-din, a celebrated sultan of Egypt and Syria, who, in the time of the crusades, distinguished himself by his valour. He made great conquests in Syria, Arabia, Persia, and Mesopotamia; after which he defeated the Christians with great slaughter, near Tiberias, and took Guy de Lusignan, king of Jerusalem, prisoner. This was followed by the surrender of Jerusalem, where he behaved with great generosity to the Christians. In 1189 Richard Cœur-de-Lion, with his ally Philip Augustus, king of France, laid siege to Acre, which, after a two years' struggle, was taken by them. The crusaders subsequently took Caesarea and Jaffa, and Cœur-de-Lion advanced to within a short distance of Jerusalem; but a truce was afterwards concluded between Saladin and the Christians; soon after which the sultan died, broken down by incessant toil. n. 1187; p. at Damascus, 1192.

SALDANHA, Oliveira o Daun Joao Carlos, Duke of, sal'-dan'-a, a modern Portuguese marshal and statesman, who served with distinction in the Peninsular war while the Portuguese army was commanded by General Boreford. In 1814 he proceeded to England, whence he repaired to Brazil, where he signalized himself in both a military and diplomatic capacity. He was governor of Oporto and minister for foreign affairs in 1826; but resigned these posts, and again retired to England in the following year. The usurpation of Don Miguel recalled him to his native country, when, after experiencing some varieties of fortune, he became commander-in-chief of the constitutional army, and was made a marshal. In 1835 he became minister of war and president of the council, which posts he retained but for a short period, choosing rather to ally himself with the reactionary party. His political views again led to his being exiled; but after spending ten years in England and France, he returned to Portugal during the revolt of 1846. He held power under great difficulties until 1856, when the respect entertained by king Pedro for constitutional government led to his dismissing the old marshal, who afterwards assumed the leadership of the opposition. n. 1790; p. 1861.

SALÉ, George, sal', a learned English orientalist, whose greatest work was an excellent translation of the Koran, to which he prefixed a curious dissertation. Mr. Sale was also one of the principal authors of the "Ancient Universal History." n. 1650; p. 1736.

SALÉ, Sir Robert Henry, an English general in the service of the East India Company, entered the army in 1795, being then in his 18th year, and after particularly distinguishing himself in Burma, and at the taking of the Mauritius, he was, in 1833, appointed to the command of a brigade. In that capacity he participated in the storming of Ghuznee, and for his bravery was created K.C.B. and made a major-general. In 1840 he commanded against Dost Mohammed, whom he totally defeated and took prisoner. He subsequently played a brilliant part in those operations which redeemed the British name in Afghanistan. He forced the Khoord Cabul and Jugdulluck passes; and, after being shut capture of Cabul, and was created a baronet. After enjoying a very brief repose, he was again called upon to serve his country, being appointed quartermaster-general to the army of the Sutlej. He was unfortunately killed at the battle of Moodkee, his left thigh being shattered by a grape-shot. b. 1782; killed, 1845.

SALISBURY, Robert Arthur Talbot Gascoigne Marquis of, salz-bur-ee, is better known, first as Lord Robert Cecil, and then as Viscount Cranbourne, under which appellations he sat for Stamford in the House of Commons, prior to his elevation to the House of Lords by the death of his father, the second marquis, in 1868. His lordship, who was educated at Eton and Oxford, is a Conservative and a churchman, and in 1866 took office for the first time under Lord Derby as secretary of state for India, a post which he resigned in the following year because he could not conscientiously support Mr. Disraeli's reform bill b. 1830.

SALISBURY, William, a Welsh lawyer in the reign of Elizabeth, celebrated as the first translator of the Liturgy of the Church of England into the Welsh language. b. 1570.

SALLUST, Caius Sallustius Crispus, sal-lus a Latin historian, was educated under the grammarian Atticus Philologus, and after passing through different employments at Rome became successively quaestor and tribune. His manners were depraved, and he was degraded from the rank of senator, but was restored by Cæsar, who gave him the government of Numidia, to repair his dissipated fortune. On his return to Rome, he built a superb palace, and spent the rest of his life in luxury and debauchery. It is surprising that such a man should spare time for literature; yet his talents were great, and his histories of Catiline's conspiracy, and of the Jugurthine wars, throw light upon the defects of his moral character. The best editions of Sallust are the Elzevir 1651, and that of Zurich, 1840. There is an English translation of his works by Sir Hen. Stewart. n. at Amsterum, b.c. 86; n. Rome, b.c. 34.

SALOMON, John Peter, sal-o-mon, a German violinist and composer, who went to London and became highly successful as an orchestra leader, and projector of "subscription concerts." Twelve grand symphonies by Haydn, the oratorio of the "Creation," and many other fine musical works, were first produced under his direction. n. at Bonn, 1745; d. 1815.

SALVIATI, Francis, sal-ve-a-ti, an eminent Florentine painter, whose family name was Rossi, which he changed out of respect to his patron, Cardinal Salviati. He executed some fine works for various churches at Rome, and subsequently visited France, where he was paid by Francis I., for whom he painted a portion of the embellishments of the chateau Fontainebleau. n. at Florence, 1510; d. at Rome, 1563.

SALVIATI, Leonard, a learned Italian writer, who was a member of the academy Della Crusca, and one of the compilers of the dictionary published under the name of that society. He wrote two comedies; a critical attack upon Tasso, whose literary opponent he was; and Observations on Boccaccio. n. at Florence, 1610; d. at the same city, 1589.

SALVINI, Antony Marie, sal-ve-ne, a learned Italian writer, who was professor of Greek in the university of Florence. He was a member of the academy Della Crusca, and had a considerable share in compiling its dictionary. He also published translations from several Greek authors: the "Satires" and "Art of Poetry" of Horace; the "Metamorphoses" of Ovid; and other works from the Latin and French. n. at Florence, about 1524; d. about 1580.

SASCHO, Ignatius, sas-ko, an extraordinary negro, who was born on board a slave ship in the passage to Spanish America. At Cartagena he was baptized, and received the name of Ignatius. He was taken to England by some ladies, and afterwards became butler to the duchess of Montague, who left him £30 a year. He then set up a small shop in the grocery and tobacco trade. Being passionately fond of the stage, it was attempted to bring him forward in characters of Othello and Orosko, but a defect in his articulation caused the project to fail. He was intimate with Sterne, Garrick, and other eminent men. His correspondence has been published, and shows his genius and observation. n. 1729; d. 17

SANCHONIATHON, san-ku-ni-a-thon, a Phœnician historian, who was secretary to Adonilbanas, a king of Byblos, at whose command he wrote a history of his country, which also contained an account of the Egyptian theology. The work as we have it, was translated into Greek by Philo of Byblos. Of this translation, a complete copy was discovered in a convent in Portugal, in 1533; it should be said, however, that many scholars consider that the work was written by Philo himself, and that it is merely a literary forgery. Sanchoniathon is supposed by some to have lived in the time of Gideon, judge of Israel; others state him to have been contemporary with queen Semiramis.

SAND, William, sand, an eminent scholar, who was educated at Emmanuel college, Cambridge, where he obtained a fellowship, which he lost in 1619, for refusing to subscribe the Solemn League and Covenant. After the Restoration he became dean of the bishop of Durham; in 1664 he was dean of York, whence he removed to the deanery of St. Paul's. In 1677 he was raised to the rank of bishop.

SANDBY, a church, in which Henry VIII. buried himself with real and argument. It was one of the seven chapels sent to the Tower by James II.; but, when the Prince of Orange was declared king, as William III., he refused to take the oaths, and lost his dignities. He then retired into private life. He wrote a curious little dialogue in Latin against Calvinism, called "The Predestinated Thief," "Modern Politics," and several sermons. n. at Fressingfield, Suffolk, 1616; d. there, 1693.

SAND, George. (See DEBAYANT, Madame.)

by the duke of Cumberland, by whom he was appointed draughtsman to the survey of the Highlands. He was subsequently engaged in a controversy with Hogarth, whose opposition to the founding of the St. Martin's Lane Academy he ridiculed in a series of etchings in 1754. In 1768 he became one of the first members of the Royal Academy. He was the founder of the English school of water-colour painting, and was also among the first to employ the aquatint method of engraving. Besides many excellent pictures, he produced several collections of etchings, the most important of which were,—“The Cries of London;” illustrations to Allan Ramsay’s “Gentle Shepherd;” and views of Windsor and Eton. b. at Nottingham, 1725; d. in London, 1809.

SANDBY, Thomas, an English artist and architect, was the brother of the preceding. He held a post in the office of the chief engineer of Scotland, and while stationed in the Highlands, in 1745, learned the news of the Pretender’s landing, which event he was the first to communicate to the government. For this service he was taken into favour by the duke of Cumberland, and subsequently became deputy ranger of Windsor Great Park, and architect to the king. In 1754 he constructed the Virginia Water, and also effected many improvements in the surrounding locality. b. at Nottingham, 1721; d. at Windsor, 1798.

SANDEMAN, Robert, sân-de-mân, a Scotch minister, who, about 1748, formed a sect which still exists in England, Scotland, and the United States, under the name of “Sandemanians.” In 1768 he went to New England, where he obtained many followers. He wrote an answer to “Hervey’s Dialogues.” b. at Perth, Scotland, 1718; d. in America, about 1770.

SANDERS, Robert, sân-der-s, a Scotch compiler, who wrote a novel called “Gaffer Greybeard,” and put together for the booksellers the “Complete English Traveller” and the “Newgate Calendar.” He was also amanuensis to Lord Lyttleton when his lordship was engaged on the “History of Henry II.” b. in Scotland, about 1729; d. 1788.

SANDEBSON, Robert, sân-der-son, a learned English prelate, who was, in 1606, chosen fellow of Lincoln College, Oxford. Upon the recommendation of Laud, he, in 1631, became chaplain to King Charles I., who always had a great regard for him; and in 1642 appointed him regius professor of divinity at Oxford. He attended Charles to the Isle of Wight, and at his desire wrote his “Judgment of Episcopacy,” when the Parliament proposed to abolish that form of church government. At the Restoration, he was promoted to the bishopric of Lincoln, and was moderator at the Savoy conference between the Episcopal and Presbyterian divines. Bishop Sanderson was one of the most eminent casuists of his time, and profoundly learned. His chief works are, “Artis Logice Compendium,” a “Collection of Sermons,” “Cases of Conscience,” and a “Censure upon Antony Ascham’s Confusions and Revelations of Government.” b. at Rotherham, Yorkshire, 1587; d. 1663.

SANDOVAL, Fray Prudencio de, sân-do-val, a celebrated Spanish historian, who was educated for the church, became a Benedictine monk, and afterwards abbot of San Isidoro at Valladolid, and historiographer to Philip III. When he had acquired fame by his historical works, he was rewarded with the bishopric of Pamplona. He produced a number of historical works displaying great learning; the best known of which are those abridged and rendered into English, under the titles of “The Civil Wars of Spain,” “The History of the Emperor Charles V.,” and the “Chronicle of Alphonso, King of Castile and Leon.” b. in the province of Galicia, about 1560; d. at Pamplona, 1621.

SANDWICH, Edward Montague, Earl of, sand-witch, a gallant English admiral, who served under Cromwell, but afterwards concurred in the restoration of Charles II., by whom he was created an earl. In the battle of Southwold Bay, after he had by his conduct rescued a great part of the fleet from the most imminent danger, and given astonishing proofs of his bravery, his ship caught fire; on which he leaped into the sea and was drowned. He translated from the Spanish a treatise on metallurgy. His “Letters and Negotiations” have also been printed. b. 1625; d. 1672.

SANDYS, Edwin, sân-dis, an English prelate, who, at the accession of Mary, was vice-chancellor, and on refusing to proclaim her, was deprived of his office, and sent to the Tower; but, after a short term of confinement, was set at liberty; on which he went abroad. When Elizabeth ascended the throne, he returned, was appointed one of the commissioners for revising the Liturgy, became bishop of Worcester, and had a share in that translation of the Scriptures commonly called the “Bishops’ Bible.” In 1570 he was translated to London, and in 1576 to York. His “Sermons and Letters” have been printed. b. at Hawkshead, Lancashire, 1519; d. 1588.

SANDYS, George, an English poet, and son of the preceding, received his education at Oxford, after which he travelled through several parts of Europe and Asia. In 1615 a curious account of his travels was printed in a work entitled “Relation of a Journey in, and Description of the Turkish Empire, Egypt, and the Holy Land, &c.” He afterwards went to America, but returned to England, where he became gentleman of the privy chamber to the king. He produced poetical paraphrases of the Psalms, and translated Ovid’s “Metamorphoses.” Both Dryden and Pope bestow upon him great commendations. b. in Yorkshire, 1577; d. at Bexley Abbey, Kent, 1644.

SANGALLO, Antonio, sân-gal-lo, a celebrated Italian architect, who designed the Farnese palace at Rome, and was engaged upon St. Peter’s and other great edifices. b. at Turin, 1546.—Several other members of the same family were eminent as architects and artists.

SAN MARINO. (See MARINO.)

SANMICHELE, Michael, sân-mê-ke-li, a celebrated Italian civil and military architect, who studied at Rome, and was employed by the republic of Venice in 1525, to erect fortifications at Verona, Dalmatia, Cyprus, and other places. In those works he was the first to make use of triangular and pentangular bastions. The emperor Charles V. made him flattering offers if he would take service under him; but these were refused. He was equally successful as the designer of palaces and churches, his best edifices being the Palazzo Cornaro and Grimani at Venice, and the Capella Pellegrini at Verona. b. at Verona, 1484; d. 1569.

SANNAZARO, Jacopo, sân-na-sa-ro, an eminent

Italian poet. The most celebrated of his poems is his "Arcadia," printed first in 1502, in which, in the purest and most elegant Italian, he described the scenes and occupations of rural life. He also wrote some Latin poems, besides sonnets, madrigals, &c., in his native tongue. b. at Naples, 1458; d. 1530.

SANSON, Nicholas, sau-sung, a celebrated French geographer, who became engineer and geographer to Louis XIII. His maps, amounting in all to three hundred, are accurate and valuable. He wrote several learned and curious works on ancient geography, and is regarded as the founder of geographical science in his native country. b. at Abbeville, 1600; d. 1647.

SANSONO, James, sau-so-ne-no, an eminent Italian sculptor and architect, who pursued his studies with Andrea del Sarto, and took lessons from Sansovino, whose name he assumed. He studied both architecture and sculpture at Rome, and in the latter department of the arts, produced three masterpieces,—a Bacchus, destroyed by fire at Florence in 1762, and two statues of Mars and Neptune, which are contained in the ducal palace at Venice. The mirror, the library of St. Mark, and some portions of St. Mark's at Venice, are magnificent specimens of his skill. So highly were his merits appreciated by the republic, that when a tax was laid upon the inhabitants of Venice, Titian and himself were exempted. b. at Florence, 1479; d. 1570.

SANSONO, Francis, a learned Italian printer, and son of the preceding, took his degrees in law at Padua, but afterwards set up a printing-office at Venice. He published a translation of Plutarch, "Chronology of the World," "Annals of the Ottoman Empire," and a collection of novels, entitled "Cento Novelle scelti de' più Nobili Scrittori della Lingua Volgare." d. at Venice, 1583.

SANTA ANNA, Antonio Lopez de, an-na, a Mexican general and statesman, who, at the close of his career, served in the Spanish army, in which he attained the rank of lieutenant-colonel in 1821; but, in the following year, while stationed at Vera Cruz, joined the movement inaugurated by Iturbide, which resulted in the total defeat of the Spanish forces, and the reduction of the whole of that province. He next turned his arms against and overthrew Iturbide, who had proclaimed himself emperor. The Mexican republic was shortly afterwards formed, and, from that period until the year 1833, when he succeeded in himself obtaining the presidency of the republic, he was engaged in opposing or defending, at the head of the Mexican troops, the claims of rival chiefs. He maintained his position as president until 1836, when he was defeated and taken prisoner at San Jacinto, by his political opponents. Liberated in 1837, he participated in the repulse of the French troops at Vera Cruz in 1838, on which occasion he lost a leg. He was once more president, from 1841 until 1845, in which latter year he was deposed and banished for ten years; but was recalled soon afterwards, reinstated as president and charged to defend Mexico against the United States army. He was defeated in several encounters by Generals Scott and Taylor, and finally, in 1848, was compelled to resign, Mexico having obtained a peace with the United States, by the cession of California, and by submitting to the erection of Texas into an independent state. From the close of the year 1862 until the middle of 1865, he again held the reins of power, only to be driven into exile, however, at the latter date, by General Carrera, who had revolted against his rule. He retired beyond the frontiers of Mexico, and took no prominent part in the troubles which distracted his country after his abdication, d. in the city of Xalapa, 1793.
